

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

THE ENGLISH REVIEW.

ART. I.—The Life and Services of General Lord Harris, G.O.B., during his campaigns in America, the West Indies, and India. By the Right Honourable S. R. LUSHINGTON, &c. &c. London: Parker, West Strand, 1844. Second Edition.

WE rejoice that the popularity of these memoirs has produced the present portable and neat edition. They were written by Mr. Lushington, long and well known as Secretary to the Treasury under Lord Liverpool's administration, and afterwards as Governor of Madras. He was son-in-law of the first Lord Harris, and was himself present at some of the later scenes which he describes in that gallant nobleman's life. The book is written without any pretension, and is clearly a labour of love. But it is full of interest to those who delight to trace the effect which the character of individuals has had in building up the fortunes of this mighty empire, while they were achieving their own elevation from insignificance to renown. Lord Bacon tells us, “That history which may be called just and perfect history is of three kinds, according to the object which it propoundeth, or pretendeth to represent: for it either representeth a time, or a person, or an action. The first we call chronicles, the second lives, and the third narrations, or relations. Of these, although the first be the most complete and absolute kind of history, and hath most estimation and glory, yet the second exceedeth it in profit and use, and the third in variety and sincerity: for the history of princes representeth the magnitude of actions, and the public faces and deportment of persons, and passeth over in silence the smaller passages and motions of men and matters. But such being the workmanship of God, as he doth hang the greatest weight upon the smallest vices, ‘maxima è minimis suspendens,’ it comes therefore to pass, that such histories do rather set forth the pomp of business, than the true and inward record thereof. But lives, if they be well written, propounding to themselves a person, to represent in whom actions both greater and smaller, public and private, have commixture, must of necessity contain a more true, native, and lively representation.”—Bacon's Adv. of Learning, Book II.

The present period is certainly not barren of these contributions to history. During the last ten years a greater number of ment was then quartered. This lad of nineteen obeyed the strange summons, and, after literally helping his antagonist to climb over a wall, stood to be deliberately fired at twice, though narrowly escaping the first shot, without attempting to hit Captain Bell; he then again helped his adversary to get over the wall, and they returned home. As might be expected, the incipient madness of Captain Bell broke out so violently that he was soon afterwards placed in the confinement in which he died; not, however, before he had told the story of the duel to a most distinguished, gallant, and eccentric officer, Sir William Medows.

But it was 1769, that his character ever underwent. The c Bell, who had taken ou under his especial care warm friendship for each pretext, Lieutenant Ha manding officer a challen swords and pistols, at the

"The consequences were," writes Lord Harris in a memorandum which he subsequently made of this event, "the warm friendship of Sir William Medows, which ultimately led me to fame and fortune—the giving me such a confidence in myself, as to convince me that no dangers or difficulties could ever make me act in an unbecoming manner; and, lastly, enabling me to preserve a command over my passions and temper in many after scenes of trial and annoyance."

He borrowed soon afterwards from his brother a sufficient sum of money to enable him to purchase a company, which was in fact the main foundation of his fortune; it is singularly characteristic both of the strength and nobleness of his character, that by continued exertions of self-denial, shown in rigid and undeviating economy, he enabled himself to repay to his brother the 1100*l.* he had so opportunely bestowed on him. In 1774, his regiment was suddenly ordered to embark for America, to aid in carrying on that ill-advised and worse-executed scheme of war, which was destined to receive such an inglorious termination, though the young captain, like every other British officer, foresaw no possibility of any other event than the speedy annihilation of the rebels. His first service was to cover the retreat of a detachment, in which half his company and his lieutenant were killed. In this short essay of actual service his presence of mind and his humanity were equally conspicuous. His next engagement was the memorable attack on Bunker's-hill; his share in it is thus described in his own words:—

"We had made a breach in their fortifications which I had twice mounted, encouraging the men to follow me, and was ascending a third time when a ball grazed the top of my head, and I fell, deprived of sense and motion. My lieutenant, Lord Rawdon, caught me in his arms, and, believing me dead, endeavoured to remove my body from the spot, to save my body from being trampled on; the motion, while it hurt me, restored my senses, and I articulated, For God's sake let me die in peace!"

He was trepanned, amusing himself during the operation by looking into his own breast, he finally recovered. In 1777, at the attack at Bunker's-hill ; at the battle of Brandywine, he was wounded on account of his gallantry. He was borne on such a day took his share in the defence of the protector Meadows was directed to write home :—

In 1778, he embarked on an expedition which was directed by Prescott was employed in pushing forward under the command of the important Post of Vigie harbour. The French commander Meadows had cut himself off and had rendered a retreat impossible. The whole force against them failed, that his apparent ignominious defeat, was due to the want of Harris, and the confidence in his handful of troops, which was all lost but their honour

"I hope," writes Major-General Meadows, "our success almost to the point of the circumstances would, I hope, be in the hand of the Almighty who will not let it happen that 1300 bayonets and four six-pounders, should be defeated by a enemy than their own numbers

This almost incredible fact is also to be found recorded by the pen of Burke in the Annual Register of the year. Soon after his return to England his regiment was ordered to Ireland, and on the voyage, his characteristic quality, presence of mind, and the ascendancy he acquired over all who were associated with him, was very remarkably displayed. An incompetent captain having run the ship into a most perilous situation off the Irish coast, near Kinsale, the crew mutinied and refused to obey any orders but those of Major Harris, and these after many hours of extreme peril were successful in saving both crew and ship. This event took place in 1780. During the next eight years he passed his life in various country quarters, his family increased, his old love of retirement returned with increased strength, and at last he resolved to sell his commission, and, with the money it produced, settle with his family in Canada. He went to London for this purpose.

“On his arrival (says his biographer), he accidentally met Sir William Medows, in St. James's Street, and after mutual expressions of friendship and affection, awakened by the casual meeting of two such comrades in past dangers, he explained the purpose of his visit to town, and his future intentions. Sir William listened with impatience to the story, and asked if he had actually received the money, and if the new commission had been actually signed by the king. He was told there would be the delay of another day in consequence of the Princess Amelia's death. ‘Then,’ said he, ‘Harris, you sha'n't sell out, you shall go with me as secretary and aide-de-camp. I am just appointed Governor of Bombay, and your presence will be a host to me. I'll go directly and stop the sale.’”

Accordingly the sale was stopped. After a few years spent at Bombay, General Medows was removed to the more arduous and responsible government of Madras, and took with him the aide-de-camp who proved, as he had foreseen, “a host to him.” This was the most unexpected tide in Major Harris's affairs, which, taken at the flood, led him on to a greatness beyond the flight of the most extravagant aspirations of his youth, which had long been banished from his calm, firm, and happy mind. His sphere of action was suddenly widened; he was transplanted to those distant oriental scenes which were destined, as they were fitted, to call forth the attributes of the most distinguished soldiers and statesmen of Europe. The British power in India at this period, in spite of Clive and Hastings, was still in a critical state, and in no place so much so as at Madras, neighbour to an enemy whose equal India has never since or before produced in intensity of hate, religious, hereditary, and personal, to the British name, and in abundance of means to execute the purpose of that hate upon his detested and sometimes vanquished foes. Tippoo, the ruler of

Mysore, was, in every thing but the accident of walking on two legs, the tiger which he adored, and which his name denoted. It would require the pen of Livy to describe with justice the “inhumana crudelitas,” and “perfidia plusquam Indica” of this ferocious despot. About the year 1759, his father, Hyder Ali, had enlisted an army of freebooters (gathered from all the parts of Western India in which those scourges of mankind abounded), in the service of the Rajah of Mysore; in a few years, according to the approved oriental precedent, he had dethroned his master and his benefactor and seized the kingdom, and he soon extended his ravages to all the surrounding country. Most English readers, strangely incurious as they are of the history of our magnificent Indian empire, are acquainted with the desolation he brought upon the Carnatic, so that up to the gates of Madras the country, which had been as the garden of Eden, became now a howling wilderness; for who that has once read can ever forget the wondrous power of language in which that desolation and the character of the desolators is described by Mr. Burke in his ever-memorable speech on the Nabob of Arcot's debts. More than once the dreadful whirlwind of Mysorean cavalry, rushing through the passes of the mountain range called the Ghauts, which divide Mysore from the Carnatic, had swept, into a captivity worse ten thousand times than death, officers and soldiers of the British forces, which they had defeated. His son, Tippoo, had succeeded to his father's usurped throne in 1782; the father had certainly more qualities of a statesman than Tippoo, though they have been exaggerated by the highest colouring of morbid paradox, and we cannot agree with Lord Brougham, in his able life of Marquis Wellesley, that Tippoo had the faintest pretensions to these attributes. Both father and son had the sagacity to profit by the advice and aid of French officers, Nazarenes, whom for this reason only they detested less than the English. No Indian potentate had ever possessed such abundant and well-organized implements of war. A hundred pieces of ordnance were frequently moved during these campaigns with a rapidity far superior to that with which English artillery could be moved, while the velocity with which his cavalry charged, and the general rapidity with which Tippoo's movements were executed, is described by our officers as scarcely credible. In 1784, when the gallant resistance of Colonel Campbell had caused Tippoo to waste the half of his army in the fruitless siege of Mangalore, and when Colonel Fullerton was on his march to Seringapatam, determined to set free the British prisoners from sufferings too horrible to be named, and to wreak deserved vengeance on the head of their atrocious tormentor—at that very moment the British Government and the Court of Directors proclaimed peace with Tippoo—justifying themselves in India for such a measure by a reference to our European relations—that is, our relations with France; and in England, by a reference to the impoverished finances—a false peace founded on false reasons—“false blood to false blood joined.” France would not have made war for Tippoo’s sake alone, and Fullerton had shown he could maintain an army without remittances, while no one denied the hoarded treasures of Seringapatam. This hollow peace continued till the arrival of General Medows, at Madras, and Major Harris, in 1790. Lord Cornwallis, the second Governor-General, had ruled India since 1786, not indeed with the brilliant talents of his predecessor, Warren Hastings, but with prudence, good sense, and perfect integrity, and during three years of tranquillity his government had acquired order and strength to meet the exigencies of a new conflict with the tiger, whose invasion of our ally, the Rajah of Travancore, a district at the bottom of the Indian peninsula, was the immediate cause of the war. Before the beginning of 1791, our ally was reinstated in his dominions, and Tippoo stripped of all his occupations on the coast of Malabar. On the night of the 6th of February, 1792, that successful attack was made on the fortified camp and the island of Seringapatam which closed the war. But terrible had been the sufferings of our troops from disease, want of provision, the incessant rains, and bad management about those essential, indispensable instruments of Indian warfare, the draft bullocks—and once in the very hour of victory, before the face of Seringapatam itself, these evils had compelled the conqueror to break up his camp, burst his guns, and retreat before a vanquished foe. Throughout this campaign, and especially at the storming of the Pettah of Bangalore, of the fortresses of Bangalore, Severndroog, and Nundydroog, Major Harris bore a distinguished part. But God had destined this scourge of Southern India to survive yet longer—the measure of his iniquities was not yet full. Lord Cornwallis concluded a second treaty with this sanguinary, faithless tyrant. The feeble administration of Sir John Shore had succeeded to that of Lord Cornwallis, and Major Harris had passed through the grade of major-general to that of lieutenant-general, and become commander of the forces at Madras, when on the 22d of May, 1793, a day (says his biographer) ever to be remembered in the annals of British India, because we date from it a new and splendid era in our history,” Lord Mornington arrived in the Madras station. At the Cape he had become aware of Tippoo’s conduct, and of the Mauritius, and of various proofs that he was at the convenient moment to spring upon his unsuspecting prey. At the Cape Lord Mornington’s great genius conceived the expedition, and prepared the plan, afterwards by Lord Cornwallis.

was to rid the European and Hindoo of the worst of foes, and build yet higher the edifice of British power in a manner worthy of its original architects, Hastings and Clive. But Lord Mornington looked around him for instruments to execute his grand design—he looked anxiously, knowing well that, unless they could be found whose head and heart were worthy of the task, the whole scheme would fail—he looked anxiously, but not in vain. He found them in Lord Clive, the governor (son of the hero of Plassey), and General Harris, the commander of the forces at Madras, but especially in the latter, as he never ceased at any time and afterwards with real magnanimity to avow—and incident to this magnanimity was the true wisdom which induced Lord Mornington from first to last to place implicit and unreserved confidence in General Harris—it was well repaid; the unflinching firmness of the man he trusted counterbalanced the palsy produced by the dismay of the other authorities (excepting always Lord Clive) at Madras. That general communicated to Mr. Wellesley the chief secretary at Madras, and one of the ablest civilians in India, the secret dispatch of the governor-general, containing the development of his grand scheme; the bearer of the communication was the writer of the work before us, and he thus describes the effect produced:—

“As I had enjoyed many opportunities of becoming acquainted with this extraordinary man (Mr. Webbe), and knew with what deference his opinions were regarded in the settlement, I was dismayed by expressions of astonishment and alarm which this communication carried forth from Mr. Webbe, which were too remarkable to be ever forgotten. Our unprepared state for war, in the absence of a large portion of our troops in the eastern islands; our empty treasury, and bankrupt credit at Madras; all the horrors of Hyder's merciless invasion of Carnatic, of Tippoo's sanguinary destruction of Colonel Baillie's detachment, Sir Hector Munro's disgraceful retreat to Madras, and the first failure of Lord Cornwallis against Seringapatam, rushed at once into Mr. Webbe's mind after reading Lord Mornington's letter, and he exclaimed, with bitterness and grief, ‘I can anticipate nothing but the return of shocking disasters from a premature attack upon Tippoo, in our present disabled condition, and the impeachment of Lord Mornington for his temerity.’”

All the leading men in the settlement to whom the scheme was imparted shared these opinions. But neither Lord Wellesley's confidence in the wisdom of his plan nor General Harris's determination to execute it were to be shaken, though the latter drew up an able paper, in which all the difficulties relating to the preparation, and the requisite army, and the line of march were fully brought to Lord Mornington's attention. A year was in consequence allowed for preparation, but the resolution anticipate the attack meditated by Tippoo, with the co-operation of French troops, on the Malabar coast, by marching to Seringapatam, was steadily adhered to. The policy of the Indian balance of power, advocated by Webbe and others, was (to use that gentleman's own language from a memorandum in the work before us), "the preservation of Tippoo as a power of India, and to balance between him, the Mahrattas and the Nizam by our superior force." Lord Mornington saw that this system, if ever good, was effete. He resolved to have as efficient allies in this war the Nizam and the Mahrattas; both were more than suspected to be hostile to us. At Hyderabad, the capital of the Nizam, where a French subsidiary force was maintained, by a stroke of vigorous policy, admirably executed, an English force was substituted for it, and the French officers and men sent under our care home. By another effort, Poonah, the capital of the Mahrattas, governed by the Peishwah, was freed from the terror of Scindiah, and was compelled, from interest at least, to be our ally. A Bombay army under General Stuart, to march along the Malabar coast, and through an invasion of Tippoo's territories join the main army under General Harris, was prepared. But Lord Wellesley's despatches, aided by the sketch drawn by Lord Brougham in the life of that nobleman, should be resorted to for obtaining an adequate notion of the wisdom and comprehensiveness of his scheme. Still, however, without a careful perusal of the latter part of the volume before us, this great epoch in our Indian history can be but ill understood. The accounts in these pages are taken from three sources—General Harris's public dispatches, his very interesting private journal, and the confirming statement of Sir David Baird. Whoever reads these pages will see how all the qualities of General Harris, to which we have already alluded, shone forth with the brightest lustre; his forethought, the admirable order of his military dispositions, his patience, constancy of purpose, ever-vigilant circumspection, and his sagacity, strengthened by long experience, and stimulated not depressed by the great responsibility of his position. The reader will remark the modesty which made him at first to decline that command which he knew so well how to wield—the magnanimity with which, when the funds were forthcoming to raise the requisite number of soldiers, he made himself responsible for them, and so silenced the opposers of Lord Mornington's policy—the piety which for every step of victory rendered due thanks to Him that giveth the victory—the firmness with which he resisted all advice and attempts to swerve from his fixed purpose of avoiding the fate of Lord Cornwallis, and of appearing before Seringapatam only to leave it when the British flag was waving from its battlements. He will be struck with the various anecdotes of no mean interest.

the account recorded in General Harris's journal of Colonel Wellesley's appearance in his tent, after his failure in the attack on the tope, the sagacity and kindness of the general in affording him an early opportunity of redeeming the failure; and no doubt the general often thought in after times that the little word "Assaye" contained a sufficient answer to those who maligned the motives of his confidence in Colonel Wellesley. One other anecdote we must notice before we conclude, in the words of the biographer:—

"The hour appointed by the commander-in-chief for the storm, one o'clock, had nearly arrived, when a little before this time, while General Harris was sitting alone in his tent, anxiously reflecting upon the course he had resolved upon if the Sultaun should succeed in beating off the first assailants, Captain Malcolm (afterwards Sir John Malcolm) came into his tent, and, seeing him full of thought, cheerily exclaimed, 'Why, my Lord, so thoughtful?' 'Malcolm,' said the general, 'this is no time for compliments, we have serious work on hand; don't you see that the European sentry over my tent is so weak, from want of food and exhaustion, that a Sepoy could push him down?—we must take this fort or we must perish in the attempt—I have ordered General Baird to persevere in his attack to the last extremity: if he is beat off, Wellesley is to proceed with the troops from the trenches: if he also should not succeed, I shall put myself at the head of the army, for success is necessary to our existence.'"

The attack was successful; in a few hours Seringapatam, the stronghold of the usurper whose name had filled India with terror, the far-famed capital of Mysore, looking down with apparently impregnable fortifications upon the sparkling waters of the Cavery, which encircled it, with all its vast military equipments, and all its accumulated treasure, was under the command of the humble curate's son. Tippoo was found among a heap of slain. His ferocity was not coupled with cowardice. We have no other eulogy to pass upon him. Many readers of this work have, we are convinced, repeated the words of the Duke of Wellington, in one of his dispatches, "It is a fact not sufficiently known, that General Harris himself conducted the details of the victorious army which he commanded in Mysore."

Towards the close of the little volume before us, there is one chapter with the title "Correction of some mis-statements in Mr. Alison's history." We select one specimen, which, from the illustrious character of the principal person in the legend, cannot be uninteresting to our readers, p. 349:—

"Mr. Alison's description of the first operations of the siege is of the same character. He says, 'The camp was formed opposite to the south-western side of the fortress. The army from Bombay effected its junction on the 9th. The approaches were conducted with great vigour. In the course of these operations, much annoyance was experienced from an advanced post of the Sultaun's, placed on a rocky eminence near the walls, from whence a destructive fire, chiefly with rockets, was kept up on the parties working in the trenches. In order to put a stop to this harassing warfare, an attack on the post during the night was resolved on, and entrusted to Colonel Wellesley and Colonel Shaw. This nocturnal encounter would be of little importance, were it not rendered remarkable by a circumstance as rare as it is memorable, and worthy of being recorded for the encouragement of young officers exposed to early disaster—a failure by Wellington!

“ ‘Col. Wellesley, on entering the rocky eminence, near the Sultaunpettah tope, was assailed on all sides with so severe a fire that both the 33rd regiment and sepoy battalions,¹ which he commanded, were thrown into disorder, and he was obliged to fall back to the camp; and such was the confusion which prevailed, owing to the darkness of the night, that he arrived there, accompanied only by Colonel Mackenzie. The young officer proceeded at midnight to the general's tent, at first much agitated, but, finding General Harris not yet awake, he threw himself on the table of the tent, and fell asleep,—a fact, in such a moment, singularly characteristic of the imperturbable character of the future hero of Torres Vedras.’

“This is a mis-statement both of facts and dates. The Bombay army did not join till the 14th of April. The Madras army arrived before Seringapatam on the 5th of April, and on the same night General Harris ordered the attacks to be made by Colonel Shaw and Colonel Wellesley, not on a rocky eminence near the walls, but on the Sultaunpettah tope, and the banks of the water-course which ran through it, nearly three miles from the fort. No annoyance had been sustained from Tippoo's troops, nor had we any trenches for many days afterwards. The nature of Colonel Wellesley's failure has been already fully described (pp. 210-223) and it has been shown that he made his report at twelve o'clock at night to the Commander-in-Chief, who was anxiously waiting to receive it. What is therefore stated of General Harris, ‘not being yet awake’ at midnight, and of Colonel Wellesley's throwing himself on the table, and falling fast asleep before he had made his report to General Harris, as a ‘fact singularly characteristic of the imperturbable character of the future hero of Torres Vedras,’ is mere fable. Mr. Alison goes on to state, ‘General Harris next morning drew out the troops for a second attack, and offered the command to General Baird, but that generous officer suggested that Colonel Wellesley should be again intrusted with the command. But for the elevation of mind which prompted both General Harris and General Baird to overlook this casual failure, and intrust the next attack to the defeated officer, the fate of the world might have been different, and the star of the future conqueror of Napoleon extinguished in an obscure nocturnal encounter in an Indian water-course.’

before he died, proves that this story is not true. That he suggested nothing to General Harris respecting Colonel Wellesley, and that there was nothing calling for the display of any elevation of mind, either from General Harris or General Baird, however natural it would have been for both to have shown this character in the highest degree, if any occasion had required it. The only thing which called for the Commander-in-Chief's indulgence on the morning of the 6th of April, was the blunder in the Adjutant-general's office, in not duly advising Colonel Wellesley of the time when he was to be on the parade, to command the second attack on the Sultaunpettah tope."

"The events of the 4th of May (according to the language of the governor-general's order in council), while they have surpassed even the sanguine expectations of the governor-general in council, have revived the reputation of the British arms in India, to a degree of splendour and glory unrivalled in the military history of this quarter of the globe, and seldom approached in any part of the world. The lustre of this victory can be equalled only by the substantial advantages which it proposes to establish, by restoring the peace and safety of the British in India on a durable foundation of genuine security."

No one acquainted with Indian history will deny that the effect produced by the reduction of the Mysorean power is justly described in these words. Soon afterwards Lord Mornington writes to Mr. Dundas, the president of the board of control :—

"I have already had repeated occasion to express to you my feelings of public and private gratitude towards Lieutenant-General Harris, as well as to explain the strong grounds on which both these sentiments are founded in my mind. The share which General Harris has received of the prize taken at Seringapatam has placed his fortune above the want of any public aid : otherwise I have no doubt that the magnitude of his services would have insured to him a liberal and munificent provision from the East India Company. Under Lieutenant-General Harris's actual circumstances, I should hope that his Majesty might deem it proper to confer a distinguished mark of honour upon that deserving officer, and, impressed as I am with the importance of the conquest achieved under Lieutenant-General Harris's command, I trust that his Majesty will confer no honours on General Harris below those of the order of the Bath, and of a peerage of Great Britain. It is my duty to state to you, that any honours inferior to these would not meet the public opinion entertained in India with respect to the importance of the late victories, nor satisfy that sentiment of honourable pride which they have diffused through every branch of the civil and military service in this country. I must, therefore, make it my most anxious and earnest request to you that you will omit no endeavour to obtain for Lieutenant-General Harris the honours which he has so well merited."

Lushington's Life of Lord Harris.

The answer of General Harris to Lord Mornington, when surprised of the honours intended for him, is eminently characteristic of the real nobleness and simplicity of his nature. After deprecating honours which neither he nor Mrs. Harris wished for, adds :—

“ Indeed, my dear Lord, you could not have puzzled me more, supposing I was solicitous to succeed, than by asking me what title I should choose to take? An humble clergyman's son, thrown very early in life into the army, entirely a soldier of fortune, with scarce any assistance save his own exertions, is little likely to have any hereditary place he would choose to commemorate, and in my instance the 5th regiment has been twenty-six years my constant home.”

We would fain for the honour of our country pass over in silence the incredible treatment which this distinguished officer received at the hands of the country he had so well served. The grossest misrepresentations and calumnies obscured for some time the sense of his service, both in the minds of the East India Company and of the Government. The latter withheld from him marks of distinction; the former exerted every effort to deprive him of half his share of the prize booty. However,

And malice vanquished heighten virtue's praise.”

And never was the moral conveyed in these beautiful lines more fully exemplified. After six years of litigation, both in the Court of Chancery and before the Privy Council, his share of the prize was confirmed to him, his enemies signally defeated, and his bright character burst through all the mists with which the mean acts of mean persons had for a moment surrounded it. Fifteen years after the capture of Seringapatam, Mr. Perceval, then prime minister, who was certainly a just man, perused a memorial which General Harris had been with difficulty persuaded to draw up in his own vindication, examined the case himself, became convinced of its truth, and was eager to retract the hostile opinion which he had previously formed. In 1815, the General was created Baron Harris of Seringapatam, and received the order of the Bath, and shortly afterwards the governorship of Dumbarton Castle. Lord Harris passed the rest of his time—honoured and happy—at Belmont, a place near Faversham, which he had purchased in the county of Kent—he lived to a good old age, but not without experiencing those misfortunes which Juvenal has so pathetically described as incident to that general but too often mistaken object of human wishes, length of years—he grew old in mourning for many of his children, among others a gallant son who fell at the storming of New Orleans, in America. But he lived to see his eldest son earn for himself a reputation scarcely, if at all, less brilliant than his own. In the journal kept by General Harris shortly before the storming of Seringapatam, is this entry, "Shook hands with George, and bid him do his duty." George did his duty on that occasion, being one of the first to enter the breach of Seringapatam, and was sent home with the captured colours. And on many other occasions he rendered brilliant military services to his country, which were gloriously closed by Quatre Bras and Waterloo; at which ever-memorable period he commanded the 73rd regiment, assisted in covering the retreat at Quatre Bras, and at Waterloo, being in square with the 30th regiment, he withstood during the whole of that fearful day the repeated charges of the French cavalry, made under cover of the unceasing fire of one of the French batteries, till his regiment was literally cut to pieces, 50 remaining unwounded out of 600 men. When the peril of the day was almost over, while cheering his men and waving his sword, Colonel Harris received a severe wound, which placed his life for some time in jeopardy.

Comparison best enables civilians to estimate the carnage of battles. More men were killed and wounded in the single regiment of Colonel Harris at Waterloo than in the whole army commanded by his father at Seringapatam. Yet it must not be forgotten, being a merit of no mean order, that to the admirable providence of General Harris is to be ascribed the economy of human life at Seringapatam. The grave has recently closed over the last of these two brave soldiers and Christian men, for such were both father and son. And let us observe, in conclusion, that it is to such as they—to men combining the enterprising courage and unconquerable firmness with which with the spirit which, in the hour of defeat, is resigned to the wisdom, and in the hour of victory ascribes success to the mercy of God—with the spirit which distinguishes the Christian warrior, that this country owes an everlasting debt. It is to the union of these attributes in the character of her children, or, perhaps, it may be further said,—it is to the fact that their noble qualities sprang from the root of religious feeling, that we are to look for the real cause of the unrivalled glory and the unparalleled greatness of the British Empire.

time, among ourselves, by those who look upon our ancient Constitution in Church and State as upon the safeguard both of our civil liberties and of our religious privileges. We have no sympathy with the empty philosophism by which the University of France endeavours to discipline the minds of the rising generation into artificial enthusiasm for the social system erected upon the uncouth and unsafe foundation of the barricades; still less can we have aught in common with that wild spirit of Democracy, which has been drained off during the last thirty years from the different monarchies of Europe into the Swiss republics, as into a common cesspool of political offscourings, and being pent up there within a narrow space, without any outlet, is venting itself from time to time by violent revulsions and lawless outbreaks. But we do sympathize most fully, most deeply, with the sense of alarm which recent measures, and, still more, recent occurrences, have excited among ourselves; and the more we reflect upon the tone of mind, and the habits of thought and action which have led to a legislative dereliction of our Protestant principles, and to extensive defections from our Protestant camp, the clearer and firmer becomes our conviction, that so far from the alarm being groundless, we are, both in a political and a religious point of view, standing on the brink of a fearful precipice.

If the question turned merely upon some one or more of the causes of public distemper and perplexity, which in the natural course of human affairs must necessarily develop themselves periodically in the social body, in the same way as ill humours gathering from time to time breed distempers in the natural body; if, for instance, the extensive pressure of poverty upon the labouring classes, the want of an adequate provision for their spiritual instruction and the proper training of their children, the increase of pauperism and of crime outrunning the increase of population; or if, on the other hand, the mercenary materialism of the great body of the trading portion of the community, the luxury and listless selfishness prevalent among the higher classes, the absence of public principle and public confidence, brought about by a system of expediency and political tergiversation; if, worse than all, the lukewarmness towards works of charity and piety, the contentiousness for trifles, and indifference to great and eternal interests, which we have to deplore in a vast proportion of the nominal members of our Church; if any, or all of these,—or if even that greatest of all our difficulties, the monster difficulty of the British Empire, starving, superstitious, disaffected, demagogized Ireland,—were all that we have to contend against, though we should see great and pressing dangers,

yet we might contemplate our position without alarm ; might with a calm and resolute eye look about for remedy. But we have not only all these and many more evils of threatening character to encounter, but we have opposed us, ready and eager for the conflict, intensely stimulated by hope of making us an easy prey, closely allied with our most powerful foreign, with our most insidious domestic enemies, lying in wait upon our shores, in the heart of the Empire, and in the bosom of the Church, an enemy more subtle than any enemy in human form ever was, and that enemy bent upon our ruin more than he ever was upon the ruin of any Church or State. That enemy is the Society of Jesuits, a body of men united under the absolute control of one presiding will, as one man ; a giant like the giants of ancient fable, a centimanus Gyges, and a centimanus only, but centiceps ; a human monster, present in a hundred places at once, with hundreds, ay, thousands of eyes to spy, thousands of heads to scheme, thousands of hands to execute, and thousands of tongues to beguile and to deceive ; but one soul, one will, to direct the whole ; a monster whose life never dies out, whose devices are numberless and ever changing, but the fell purpose, the bitter hatred, especially towards our Church and State, one, perpetual and unchangeable. No contemptible enemy, forsooth, if this be not an exaggerated picture. Whether it be so or not, the sequel will show. So if it is true, think that such apprehensions are altogether groundless, and laugh them to scorn. The Jesuits, they say, belong to another age than that which prints and travels by steam, diffuses knowledge and conveys intelligence with lightning speed ; who dallies with Mammon, and laughs at Beelzebub ; which investigates every thing and believes nothing : in such an age as this surely it is ridiculous to be afraid of an order which received its death-blow seventy years ago. But they forget, if indeed they ever knew, that the order of Jesuits has kept pace with the ages, and not only kept pace with them, but far outstripped them in the race of intelligence ; that in the art of turning every feature of the world to account for its own ends, that order has never been surpassed by any man, or body of men ; that even its partial and temporary defeat has only served to place its indomitable tenacity of purpose and its gigantic strength in a new light ; for while it maintained itself in the hour of its weakness and apparent death by the support of those who, of all others, were the most unlikely to come to its aid—by the support of two powers, one of which it denounced as atheistical, and branded the other as schismatic, it compelled, and that before one generation had passed away, the very power whose sovereign it owned, and by whose arm it had suffered itself to be broken in pieces, to restore it, with many marks of repentance and affection, in the integrity of its former station and influence. And so restored it now stands again, firm and upright, bidding defiance to the nations of the earth, but defiance, above all, like another Philistine, to that Church and nation which stands forth pre-eminently as the army of the living God¹. And, whatever we

Jam defecta vigent renovato robore membra,

¹ That the British empire is particularly singled out at this time, as the object of attack by the Papal power and the Jesuits, can admit of no doubt. In the nature of things it must be so. The Protestantism of the continent is preying upon its own vitals, and has ceased to give Rome any serious uneasiness. It may seduce individuals from her pale, but it cannot raise a Catholic testimony against the usurpation of the Papacy. If our Church, with her Apostolic succession, and her adherence to the ancient Catholic faith, could be got rid of, then would Rome have an easy triumph. Upon us, therefore, are her forces now principally directed. Apart from the many alarming symptoms of the progress of Popish principles both among our Churchmen and our Statesmen, apart from the amazing advances which the Papists have made towards the attainment of that ascendancy which is the ultimate object of all their outcry for equality, the direction which has been given of late to the Romish Missions clearly shows what is the arrière-pensée of Rome at this time. It is to undermine the power of Great Britain by the importation of French settlers and French prejudices, and the strength of the English Church by the intrusion of Romish bishops and Romish missionaries, into all the colonial possessions of the empire. Through the kindness of a gentleman who has paid much attention to the missionary movements of the propaganda, whose head-quarters are virtually at Lyons, though nominally at Rome, we are enabled to lay before our readers the following figures, which must convince the most incredulous. Looking over the last twenty years, it appears that the activity of the propaganda has increased to a most astonishing degree; and not only so, but that it has thrown a share of its activity altogether disproportionate upon the British territory. The total income of the propaganda at Lyons amounted

———— 1844	—	£161,408.

The total expenditure was

———— 1835	—	£21,663.
———— 1844	—	£149,756.

Of which sums there was laid out in missions throughout Great Britain and its dependencies

———— 1844	—	£40,865.

That is to say, more than one fourth of the Romish missionary power throughout the world is set in motion for the overthrow of our Church, and the establishment of the Romish communion in her place. It will be seen, by reference to the above figures, that in the year 1835 the increase of missions in the British dominions bore no proportion at all to the increase of the Romish missions generally; from that year the outlay for missions in the British dominions has been rapidly advancing, till, from one twenty-second of the total outlay of the propaganda, it rose to more than one-fourth. Looking at this increase in comparison with the general increase of expenditure for Romish missions, it is sixfold; looking at it by itself only, it is more may think, though "wisdom is a defence, and money is a defence," yet shall neither our money, nor our wisdom be a defence to us against that enemy, against whom we can prevail only if we go forth to meet him "in the name of the Lord of Hosts."

What the position is which the Jesuit order has again assumed, what are its deliberate designs, its ambitious projects, and its daring hopes, a glance at the titles of the works prefixed to this article will suffice to show. There was a time when the policy of the Society was to work in secret, to keep its constitution and its affairs from the eyes of men as much as possible; but another age has arisen, in which publicity is the order of the day; and therefore (although we do not mean to insinuate that the Jesuits have no secrets now), in the hearing of all the world, the Society proclaims, to borrow a phrase from facund George Robins, "My name is publicity." To say that the Jesuit order is a lover of darkness, because its deeds are evil, and cannot bear the light of day, must surely be an old wives' fable, an idle calumny; for, behold, the Society, of its own free accord, throws every thing open to the world's inspection; its constitution, its discipline, its rules and regulations, its proceedings past and present, the very records of its latest congregations at the Gesu at Rome, are published to the world as regularly as any report of the proceedings at St. Stephen's, and that not by a "breach of privilege," but "by authority." There is no trial to which the Society has in former times been subjected, no scandal that has been raised against it, which the Society is not ready, nay, anxious to submit to the revision of public opinion in this unprejudiced, this enlightened age; its archives are freely thrown open, its ancient scrolls and parchments, those mummies of days that have been, and of bygone deeds, are unrolled before the wondering world. Why should they not? But for the darkness of former ages, which they did all to dissipate, the proceedings of the Jesuits would always have been transparent; those simple-hearted, guilethan fortyfold within the last ten years. The cause of this increase is no doubt the encouragement which at that period Popery was beginning to receive from the British government. That was the time when our government was courteous, not to say simple, enough to send out in a king's ship, as chaplain to a convict settlement, in the employ and pay of the British crown, that Popish firebrand, Mr. John Bede Polding, who is now, under the title of Archbishop of Sidney, with his three suffragans of Adelaide, Hobart-town, and Perth, disturbing the religious peace of our colonies, and treating the prelates of the established Church of the empire with affected scorn. The sums which are spent by the French Jesuits—for they are the life and soul of this propagandism—sufficiently attest the value they set upon every position from which they hope in course of time to undermine our political and ecclesiastical state. While upon their own colony of Algiers they spent in the year 1844 only £2360, they laid out upon our colony of New Zealand £5618, and the still larger sum of £7280 in the preceding year, 1843.

less men always lived in glass houses, and how happy they are to have fallen at last upon a generation capable of appreciating their candour and cancelling the injustice of past ages ; a generation which brings public opinion to bear upon every question ; for—κλύειν δὴ θαύματος πάρεστι—none so much as the Jesuits will be gainers if fairly subjected to the test of public opinion :—

“ Grave old Tertullian,” says the Ami de la Religion in its notice of M. Crétineau-Joly’s history of the Jesuits, “ used to exclaim, that religion required but one thing ; and that was not to be condemned unheard². Being the daughter of the Gospel, the society of Jesus also is not afraid to see light diffused over what have been called its mysteries, which are mysteries only of devotion, of charity, of self-immolation. The serious public will in this eminently attractive work find an answer to the attacks and the calumnies of malevolence. As for those who have made up their minds to hatred, they are to be pitied ; there is no hope of an obstinacy which delights in blind animosities, and wilfully shuts its eyes to the evidence of facts.”—Ami de la Religion, vol. cxxiii. p. 70.

The evidence of facts, the evidence of authentic history, of original documents, this is what the Society of Jesus in the consciousness of its more than innocence, in the exuberance of its love of publicity, presents to the world with but one request, that it may be subjected to a searching examination, and to an impartial judgment³. With this request we will to the utmost extent of our limits endeavour to comply ; and, with a view to our doing so, we must take leave to go considerably further back than the controversy of the day on the merits and demerits of the order, a step or two even beyond the primordia rerum of M. Crétineau-Joly, and the Exercitia and Constitutions of St. Ignatius himself ; to the question, namely, what was it that called the Jesuit Order into being ?

We hold it to be an unquestionable axiom in the philosophy of history, that it is not the men that make the times, but the times that make the men ; that it is not in the power of any individual, however exalted in station, however strong of will, firm of purpose, or gifted in mind, to fasten upon the world the exergue of his own individuality, and by the mere power of his thought and action to give a permanent direction to future generations. Those whose works and endeavours have endured long, and exercised an extensive influence over mankind, themselves bore the stamp of their age, not, as is commonly supposed, their age and after-ages the stamp of their mind. Genius, though it presupposes transcendent mental endowments, is yet so dependent, for its development and its domination, upon the opportunity on which it brings its powers to bear, that the instinct of adaptation to the peculiar character of the age in which it appears may be justly considered, not only as a characteristic mark, but as a component part of true genius.

With the last-named document, those who wish to hear both sides of the question, should compare the interesting work of Count Alexis de Saint Priest, published last year, under the title "Histoire de la Chute des Jésuites au XVIIIe. siècle." The point of view of the author is, that the Jesuits being essentially anti-national, and at variance with the spirit of the age, cannot and ought not to be tolerated in France ; and he endeavours to bring past history in aid of his position. Various interesting pieces are contained in an appendix to this volume ; among them the Brief of Clement XIV. which cashiered, and the Bull of Pope Pius VII. which restored, the order.

Καὶρὸς γὰρ, ὅσπερ ἀνδράσι

Whenever a man is pre-eminently possessed of that instinct, he is sure to leave a deep and lasting impression behind him,

" His power's a crescent, and his auguring hope Says " (and says truly), " it will come to the full."

And vice versa, whenever the conceptions of a mind have outlived its age, and left a long track behind on the ever-flowing tide of events, it is a sure proof that that man comprehended the signs of his time, that his soul was lodged in the very heart of humanity, and had a supernatural insight, such as the somnambule state is said to produce, into its secret distempers. So it was with Ignatius Loyola. There was a film over his mental vision, the film of the Papal delusion; that film prevented him from seeing clearly what was needed to heal the distemper of the times; yet he saw it in some measure: and it is to this, his appreciation of the state of the Church and the world, as both presented themselves in his day, that we must attribute the permanent duration and the extensive success of the Institute which he founded. Nothing can be more unphilosophical, nothing more contrary to the inner truth of history, than the notion that a society, which not merely influenced, but to a great extent controlled, the march of the human mind and the course of events all over the world, for the space of two hundred years, and which appears to be destined to achieve yet greater triumphs, and to do more extensive mischief, was nothing more than the wild conception of an overwrought and partially diseased brain. So far from being an accidental hors-d'œuvre in the history of the Christian Church, the Society of Jesus was, on the contrary, the direct offspring of the circumstances and necessities of the times; its erection was the only alternative left to Popery, if the iniquity of its system was to be maintained, and the call to repentance so loudly, often it may be harshly, uttered by the Reformation, to be resisted.

Based originally upon an untrue foundation, the universal spiritual monarchy of Rome, that splendid but anti-christian dream of the middle ages, had, in its endeavours to maintain itself, become entangled in a net of falsehood and iniquity of its own fabrication; a net so closely woven that there was no escape from it, except by a gigantic moral effort, such as could not be expected of those who were from time to time called to occupy the "chair of St. Peter." By little and little the falsehood came to be seen through; the iniquity, by the very burdens which it laid upon the nations of the earth, became hateful and apparent; and when at last the primitive truths of the Gospel of Christ were disinterred from under the superstitions which through long ages had been accumulated upon them, and placed in contrast with the doctrine, the discipline, and practice of the Romish hierarchy, the indignation of a long deluded and rudely undeceived world knew no bounds. The grossly earthly character to which the Roman usurpation had by degrees sunk down; its unblushing avarice and its simoniacal traffic with holy things, yea, with the very remission of sins, for which Christ paid the price of his blood; the luxury and the carnal excesses by which the sanctuary was defiled; the barbarities which in the name of the religion of mercy had been perpetrated by the butchers of the Holy Inquisition, were so revolting, that they destroyed all moral reverence for an authority which had been propped up by such supports; if it had been possible, they would have brought the Gospel itself and the name of Christ into everlasting hatred and contempt among mankind. As it was, it became wholly impossible to uphold the pontifical supremacy, and the hierarchy which bore sway in its name, any longer by those means which had formerly sufficed to keep down occasional symptoms of discontent, and to make the nations bow their heads in the obedience of an abused faith. Unless some new power arose to re-establish the tottering authority of the Roman Pontiff upon a fresh and a more solid foundation, the whole fabric of the Papacy, which had been so warily erected during the course of centuries, must inevitably have crumbled in the dust before the moral and intellectual strength, and the religious enthusiasm of the Reformation. This was felt most deeply by Rome herself, openly acknowledged by the Papal legates in their opening address to the Tridentine Council, and kept in view throughout the proceedings of the Council, as the Decretum de Reformatione variously attests. But no deliberative assembly, least of all, one composed of men many of whom were deeply implicated in the iniquities of the times, could call forth the novel power of which Rome stood in need. They might restrain excesses, they might lop off excrescences, but they had no power to create a new instrument, full of health, and life, and vigour, to stand forth in support of their falling cause. Such a creation could only be the work of some master mind, animated by an unquestioning faith in the Apostolicity and divine authority of the Roman hierarchy, and deeply impressed with both the possibility and the necessity of applying a remedy to the corruption of the times. Such a master mind was Loyola. He comprehended the condition of the Church as far as a mind wedded to the fundamental errors of the Papal theory could comprehend it, and he devised with a skill and firmness of purpose rarely equalled the only system which could preserve the spiritual monarchy of Rome from sinking under the weight of its internal corruption.

That system was admirably calculated for the exigencies which evoked it. The assertion of the external unity of the Church under the dominion of the Pope, and of the claim of the latter to an external power of government over the kingdoms of the earth, lies at the foundation. The association contemplated by Loyola was to be an instrument at once ready and powerful for the maintenance of those fundamental principles of Popery in the world; and in order to render that instrument more certainly and more permanently serviceable, he determined to keep it free from all the influences which had proved so fatal to the hierarchy of former days. For this purpose, he not only adopted into his Institute the vows of celibacy and of poverty, but by the vow of perfect obedience, and by the renunciation of all ecclesiastical preferment for the members of his order, he guarded against those jealousies and schemes of personal aggrandizement and of worldly ambition, to which the interests of the Church had been so fatally sacrificed, both by the secular Clergy and by the religious orders. And while he extended his views to every field of spiritual influence, from the village school to the royal confessional, he took care that his labourers should not be encumbered by any formal observances, such as the rules of other religious orders imposed upon their members; and that not one of them should ever be able to form for himself a personal sphere of action, distinct from that general action in which, as a member of the entire body, he should be involved.

How then did Loyola accomplish this difficult task? The first thing which he devised, that which still is the first thing put into the hands of every willing and of every unconscious candidate for admission to the order, is his famous book entitled "Exercitia Spiritualia." "These exercises," says M. de Ravignan⁴, "are

⁴ De l'Existence et de l'Institut des Jésuites, p. 12. This pamphlet, which, according to the Ami de la Religion, went through four editions, amounting altogether to 25,000 copies, in little more than a twelvemonth after its appearance, and which has since reached the sixth edition, is, on account of the high respectability of its author, the most powerful defence which has been made for the society. M. de Ravignan was originally a distinguished member of the legal profession, and highly connected; he afterwards joined the order of Loyola, and produced a great sensation in Paris by his pulpit eloquence. It was not, however, then known that he had become a Jesuit, and the encomium which the Constitutionnel bestowed upon the celebrated preacher afforded the Univers the triumph of informing its contemporary that it had lavished its praises upon "un Révérend Père Jésuite." M. de Ravignan speaks of the Institute with all the ardour and enthusiasm of a neophyte; the following passage appears to contain the history of his conversion:

"A man has been pursuing a wrong course in life; he has been losing himself in crooked ways, amidst foolish opinions and unruly passions. Ambition, the quick affections of youth, perhaps his very success, have lavished their enjoyments upon not our Institute ; they do not even, properly speaking, form part of our rules ; but they are, I admit, its soul, and as it were its fountain." To this book, then, if we would know the spirit of him ; he has had his fill of them. He becomes sad, and sits down by the road-side, like a weary and disappointed traveller.

"All at once he feels a desire to find something better, to fly into the arms of that happiness, the want of which renders him desolate. He seeks after God ; he would fain lay hold on Him again, draw near to Him, in order to lift up his downcast soul, and to calm the anguish caused him by the terrible judgments of conscience.

"Urged by an undefinable longing, he bursts his bonds. In one of those hours which God knows, and marks with the seal of his infinite attentions, he flees, the newly enlisted disciple of repentance, into that solitude to which the Lord calls him in order to speak to his heart. He has resolved to live for a time unknown, hidden, far removed from the illusions which had fascinated him, from the tumult which had stunned him. Noble effort ! generous enterprise ! for nothing is so difficult as to tear one's self away from agitation, from noise, and from all those powerful snares which one deplures and loves at one and the same time.

"The first beginning indeed is painful ; but soon one feels that happiness commences, that after so many cruel fluctuations one has ceased to be tossed : it is the transition from the storm to the port. One also feels that one has found the needed friend, the disinterested friend who was wanting, the father of a new existence. One hears the voice of God in the enlightened priest who counsels and directs. It is he who teaches one to handle the spiritual weapons of the exercitia, and distributes them suitably for the combats in preparation.

"The generous refugee proceeds then to pitch his tent for thirty days in solitude, and to accomplish the great work of those regenerating and transforming exercises ; like so many others before him, he is born anew to a pure, strong, and devoted life.

"The end, however, of the enterprise is propounded without circumlocution. I read on the title : 'Spiritual exercises to learn to conquer one's self, and to regulate the whole future course of life, without taking counsel with any unruly affection.'

"I still remember the impression which these words produced upon me, when I read them for the first time ; I saw in them all the engagements of my future life. Immense purpose, said I to myself, noble aim of a higher philosophy, whose object it is to establish in the soul the sovereign empire of truth, grace and virtue."—pp. 15, 16.

The following is a brief sketch of the contents of M. de Ravignan's pamphlet. After a short introduction, in which he reviews the state of the question, as it stood at the time, he considers in the first chapter the Exercitia Spiritualia, "an admirable book, which is all life and spirit," with a view to show both their value as a manual of edification, and their use in determining the choice of one's state of life. The constitutions of the Jesuits form the subject of the second chapter ; the preliminaries of admission to the novitiate are discussed ; then follow the two years of novitiate with their ascetic discipline, the course of studies to be pursued after taking the vows, and the probationary year preceding admission to holy orders. After this M. de Ravignan gives an account of the government of the society, and of the manner in which a Jesuit spends his day ; and, lastly, he enters upon what he calls the "point capital" of the Institute, the obligation to absolute obedience, which he attempts to justify by the analogy of military obedience. In the third chapter he endeavours to vindicate the society from the charges brought against it on account of its doctrines ; and in the fourth chapter he glorifies the order on the score of its missions. In conclusion, he protests against the injustice of former proceedings and of the present outcry against the society, and quotes himself as an evidence, that a man may "freely and conscientiously become a Jesuit, without resigning his reason, or renouncing his age and his country ;" a mode of argument on which Mr. Génin justly observes : "All through it is the personality of M. de Ravignan which the author extends to his entire order ; he paints his own portrait, and writes underneath : 'Portrait of the Jesuits.'" Of the appendix, containing the legal opinion of the order, our attention must be particularly directed. And first as to its outline. After certain preliminary notices (Annotiones) we are met at the threshold, under the head "Principium sive Fundamentum," by a statement which not only no Christian can gainsay, but which we should think no Deist can peruse without being startled by its truth:—

"Man is created to this end, that he should praise and worship the Lord his God, and, serving him, should ultimately be saved. All other things upon the earth are created for man's sake, to assist him in the prosecution of the end of his own creation; whence it follows that we are to use them, or to abstain from them, so far as they either forward or obstruct the prosecution of that end. Wherefore we are to feel indifferent touching all created things (according as this is permitted and not forbidden to the freedom of our will); so that, as far as in us lies, we may not seek health rather than sickness, nor riches rather than poverty, honour rather than contempt, a long life rather than a short one: but it is fitting that we should of all things choose and desire those only which lead to the end for which we are created."—Exerc. Spir. 1a Hebdom. Princ. p. 31, Ed. Aven.

Upon this basis the exercises proceed through four stages, entitled weeks, because the time occupied by them will last about that period, so as to finish the whole in a month; although this division of time is not intended to be strictly adhered to in practice. The first of these divisions, or "weeks," is appropriated to the contemplation of sin and its consequences; the second to the history of our Lord from the incarnation to his entry into Jerusalem; the third to his passion; the fourth to his resurrection and ascension. During the first three weeks, five hours of meditation on the subjects given are appointed, viz.: in the middle of the night, at daybreak, about the time of saying mass, about the time of vespers, and before supper; in the fourth week the hour in the middle of the night is relaxed.

The arrangement of the subjects for these different hours is (with two exceptions, of which more hereafter) as follows:—The hour in the night and the hour at daybreak, in the last week the latter only, are occupied with the first meditation upon the subjects of the day; the two following hours are given to repetitive meditations; the last is devoted to what is termed Applicatio Sensuum. This is described as follows:—

"After the preparatory prayer, and the three preludes before men-

M. de Vatimesnil, minister of public instruction under Charles X., on the laws affecting the order in France, it is unnecessary to say any thing, as that point has since been decided in an adverse sense by the French legislature.

tioned⁵, it is useful above all to bring the five imaginary senses to bear upon the first and second contemplation," (by which the subject was first brought before the mind,) "in the manner following, according to the nature of the subject.

"The first point is, to behold in imagination all the persons, and having noted all the circumstances concerning them, to draw thence improvement for ourselves.

"The second point is, to hear as it were what they say, or what it is fitting they should say, and to turn all this to account for ourselves.

"The third point is, to perceive by a certain internal taste and smell, how pleasant and sweet is the divinity of the soul and of its virtues and other properties, according to the character of the person which we are contemplating; applying to ourselves whatever may in any way do us good.

"The fourth point is, by an internal touch to handle and to kiss the garments, the places, the footsteps, and all other things connected with those persons, whence we may gather a greater increase of devotion or of any other spiritual good.

"This contemplation is to be terminated by a colloquy⁶, like the former, adding again a Pater Noster."—Exercit. Spirit. 2a Hebd. 5a Contempl. pp. 71, 72.

Here the tendency of these exercises to carnalize by an artificial excitement of the sensual nerves, (for what else can be meant by the quinque sensus imaginarii?) what the mind ought spiritually to realize, clearly appears; but this is a part only of an entire system of sensualizing things spiritual. That system is more fully developed in the Annotationes, where, ex. gr. the exercitant is directed during the first and third weeks to shut himself up in the dark; during the second week to select light or darkness as may best suit the subject of meditation; and during the last week to seek the light and the air, especially in fine weather; thus calling in these outward influences for the purpose of inducing sad or cheerful emotions, in harmony with the particular disposition of mind in which, agreeably to the minute directions given on this point also, each exercise is to be gone through. This excitement of the senses and the imagination is, however, more particularly brought into play during the first week, in which the prescription for the five daily meditations is the same on every day of the week, or as long as that portion of the exercises may, according to the appointment of the spiritual director, under whose guidance the exercitant is placed, be protracted. That prescription is as follows: The first hour's meditation (in the middle of the night) has for its subject sin in general; first, the sin of the fallen angels; secondly, the sin of our first parents; thirdly, mortal sin: the second hour's meditation, (at daybreak,) is set apart for the contemplation of the exercitant's own personal sins, committed during the whole course of his past life, with a view to self-knowledge and self-condemnation: the third and fourth hours (about mass and vesper time) are devoted to a repetition of the foregoing two meditations, with the addition of three colloquial addresses at the close, the first to the Virgin, the second to Christ, the third to God the Father: lastly, the fifth and last hour of meditation is given to the "contemplation of hell;" which answers to the applicatio sensuum of the closing hour during the other three weeks. After a preparatory prayer for grace, that all our powers and actions may be directed sincerely to God's glory and worship, the directions for this exercise run as follows:

⁵ These are: 1. To place before the mind the historical fact to be meditated upon. 2. To arrange the place of action, first comprehending in imaginary vision the whole circuit of the earth, with all the various nations which inhabit it, and then fixing the mind upon the scene of the particular transaction in question. 3. A supplication for grace for an inward understanding of the historical fact contemplated, with a view to more fervent love and zeal in God's service.—Exerc. Spir. 2a Hebd. 1a Diei Medit. 1a. pp. 65, 66.

"The first prelude in this exercise refers to the arrangement of the place, the eyes of the imagination being fixed upon the length, breadth, and depth of hell.

"The second prelude consists in asking an inward apprehension of the punishments which the damned are suffering, so that, if at any time I should lose sight of the love of God, the fear of punishment at least may restrain me from sin.

"The first point of the exercise is, to behold in imagination the vast burnings of hell, and the souls enclosed in a kind of bodies of fire, as in houses of correction.

"The second point is, to hear in imagination the wailings, howlings, shouts, and blasphemies against Christ and his saints, which break forth from thence.

"The third point is, to perceive likewise, by an imaginary smell, the smoke, the brimstone, and the stench as of a sink of filth and rottenness.

"The fourth point is, to taste in like manner things most bitter, as tears, spite, and the worm of conscience.

"The fifth point is, to touch in a manner those flames, by the contact of which the souls themselves are burnt.

"Meanwhile, in colloquy with Christ, the souls of those are to be called to mind, who are condemned to the punishments of hell, either because they would not believe the advent of Christ, or because, although believing, they did not lead a life agreeable to his commandments; and that either before the advent of Christ, or at the time of his living in this world, or subsequently to that time. Lastly, exceeding thanks are to be given to the same Christ for not having suffered me to sink down into such perdition, but on the contrary, having dealt with me to this day in the greatest loving-kindness and mercy. The exercise is to be closed by saying the Pater Noster." Exercit. Spirit. 1a Hebd. 5um Exerc. pp. 52, 53.

The wretchedness and prostration of soul which it is the object of the exercises of the first week to produce, is increased by a course of penitential and ascetic practices, to be gone through, in combination with the daily contemplations before described, during the intervals between the latter. These consist in an examination of the conscience three times a day, throughout the whole course of the exercises, and mortifications of the flesh by abstinence, scourging, &c., of which no particular account is given, as they are left to the discretion of the spiritual director. The examination is to be had in a general way, under the three heads of transgressions in thought, word, and deed; and in a special manner respecting those sins to which the exercitant is most prone. The method of proceeding for this latter purpose, is singularly mechanical; it is thus prescribed:

"PARTICULAR AND DAILY EXAMINATION, EMBRACING THREE TIMES, ADAPTED TO THE FORMING OF GOOD RESOLUTIONS, AND A TWOFOLD SELF-EXAMINATION.

"The first time is in the morning, when, as soon as the exercitant is risen from sleep, he is to resolve upon keeping a diligent watch upon himself, respecting some particular sin or vice of which he desires to be corrected.

"The second time is in the afternoon, when he is to ask God for grace that he may be able to remember how often he has fallen into that particular sin or transgression, and guard against it in future; then let him enter upon his first examination, requiring an account of his soul touching the aforesaid sin or vice; how often during the different portions of the day that are past, from the hour when he rose, to the present hour, he has committed the same; and let him mark as many dots in the first line of the figure below⁷. Which being done, let him again resolve to restrain himself more diligently during the remaining portion of the day.

"The last time will be in the evening, when, after supper, the second examination is to be instituted, again inquiring into every separate hour, from the former examination to the present; and having in the same way called to mind and counted up the number of times that he has transgressed, he is to mark a similar number of dots in the second line of the figure prepared for the purpose, in accordance with that given below.

"FOUR ADDITIONS, USEFUL FOR THE EASIER AND READIER EXTIRPATION OF ANY GIVEN SIN OR VICE.

"The first⁸ is, that as often as a man has committed that kind of sin or transgression, he should, with his hand placed on his breast, lament his fall; which may be done even in the presence of others without their being aware of it.

"The second is, that counting up at night and comparing with each other the number of the points on the two lines, one of which belongs to the first, and the other to the second examination, he should mark whether any amendment have taken place between the first and the second examination.

"The third is, that he should compare together the examinations of the first and second days, considering whether any amendment have taken place.

"The fourth is, that comparing together the examinations of two weeks, he should in like manner render an account to himself of the improvement which he has made, or else failed to make." Exercit. Spirit. 1a Hebdom. Examen. part. et quotid. pp. 32, 33.

If this plan had been devised expressly as a short method for "making clean the outside of the cup and of the platter," it could not have been better arranged, seeing that according to this prescription sins and vices of any kind may, if all goes well, be cut down to a very minimum, if not wholly eradicated within the space of a week, or a fortnight at the most. What notions of the nature of sin, of its action in the soul of man, and of the difficulty of restraining, not to say "extirpating" it, must they have, to whom such a scheme of self-examination and spiritual improvement can give satisfaction! It must be confessed, however, that it is in perfect keeping with the entire character of the exercises, which amount to nothing more than a piece of mechanical mysticism, devoid of all that truly deserves to be called spiritual⁹. Indeed, by a striking coincidence, that which alone can impart spirituality in the true sense of the word, the influence, viz. of the Holy Spirit, is not so much as mentioned among the means pointed out for the attainment of the end proposed. With the exception of one or two passages in which the Three Persons of the Holy Trinity are spoken of, and therefore the Holy Ghost by implication, without being expressly named, and the incidental mention of the Holy Ghost in two or three passages of the history of our blessed Lord, the existence of the Third Person of the ever-blessed Trinity is not even alluded to, and the exercitants of St. Ignatius Loyola might almost say with those half-instructed converts at Ephesus, "We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost." The principal stages in the work of redemption, from the incarnation to the ascension, are proposed as subjects of meditation; but that which of all others would have been appropriate in a compendium of spiritual exercises, the outpouring of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost, is passed over in total silence. Of his office to convince the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment, to renew and sanctify the soul, to guide us into all truth, and to show us the things of Christ, to help our infirmities, making intercession for us, and to bear witness with our spirit that we are the children of God, at which the last devotion left off, and then resuming the process of "rumination." The prescription for the third mode of prayer is to the following effect: "Between every two respirations insert one word of the Lord's prayer, or of any other given prayer, pondering meanwhile either the meaning of the word uttered, or the dignity of the person to whom the prayer is addressed, or your own vileness, or lastly, the contrast between these two; and proceed in the same manner with the other words." In this way, word for word, and breath for breath, may be treated at one time the Lord's prayer, at another time the Ave Maria, or the Credo, or the Anima Christi, or the Salve Regina; and if any one be particularly devout, he may join two or more of these forms of prayer together, proceeding with them in the manner before stated. The rationale of this devotional mechanism is given in the Directorium, (cap. xxxvii. p. 303.) where we are informed, that the use of this method is to accustom men to recite vocal prayer with due attention and devotion, agreeably to the Apostolic precept: "I will pray with the spirit, and I will pray with the understanding also;" for which reason this exercise is particularly recommended to "those who are obliged to recite the canonical hours, or other vocal prayers." To this two observations are appended; first with regard to the choice between the three modes of prayer here prescribed; not only, it is said, will one mode suit one person better, and another mode another person, but one and the same person, according as he is in different dispositions of mind or body, will prefer one at one time and another at another time; for instance, if he be tired or ill, and not inclined for long meditation, the second or third mode will be preferable to the first. The other observation is, that it is not intended by this direction to exclude other modes of prayer, which the Holy Ghost may teach, or which experience may suggest. No Jesuit, however, is in any case permitted to adopt any mode of prayer in the least differing from the foregoing prescriptions, without special leave from his superior; to whom he is at all times bound to give a full and particular account of the method he pursues in his devotions. To such miserable bondage is the freedom of access reduced, which we have "through Christ, by the Spirit, unto the Father."

of all this there is not a syllable to be found, from first to last, in these so-called spiritual exercises. The omission is characteristic in the highest degree of a plan of spiritual discipline distinct from that which Christ himself has provided in his Church. Indeed, with all due reverence be it spoken, there does not appear to be any room left in this system for the operation of the Holy Ghost. The conviction of sin is produced by a simple exertion of the memory, aided by the lines and dots before described; for the apprehension of the things of Christ, the "five imaginary senses" are chiefly relied upon; the intercession devolves upon the Virgin Mary, whose aid is invoked again and again, as an introduction to the help of Christ himself, throughout the whole course of the exercises¹; and the guidance

¹ The author of the "Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine," asserts that in the Exercitia, "a work so highly sanctioned, so widely received, so intimately bearing upon the most sacred points of personal religion, very slight mention occurs of devotion to the blessed Virgin, Mother of God." And after referring to several passages of the Exercitia, he adds: "And this is about the whole of the devotion, if it may so be called, which is recommended towards St. Mary, in the course of so many apparently as a hundred and fifty meditations, and those chiefly on the events in our Lord's earthly history, as recorded in Scripture. It would seem, then, that whatever be the influence of the doctrines connected with St. Mary and the Saints in the Catholic Church, at least they do not impede or obscure the freest exercise and the fullest manifestation of the devotional feelings towards God and Christ."—pp. 439, 440. With this exculpatory plea for the Mariolatry of the Romish Church, founded on the Exercitia, let the reader compare the following direction given in one of the very passages referred to by Mr. Newman, as a general rule respecting the Colloquies, which are of constant recurrence throughout the exercises. "In the Colloquies it is to be observed (as we have partly explained before) that I ought to treat of, and ask for something agreeable to present circumstances; for instance, as I feel in myself consolation or tribulation; as I am seeking to obtain one virtue or another; as I am intending to make this or that resolution respecting myself; as, again, I desire to be sad or joyful on the subject on which I am meditating. In one word, I ought to ask for that which on a certain point I am most anxious for; and either there may be but one Colloquy addressed to the Lord Christ, or else, if devotion prompt it, a threefold one, namely to the Mother, to the Son, and to the Father, as is delivered in the contemplation of the second week on the three classes, with the note there following."—Exercit. Spirit. 3a Hebd. 1a Dies. 1a Cont. p. 99.

The passage here referred to, in the second week, prescribes, in the manner indicated in the contemplation of the two Standards, three Colloquies, i. e. to the blessed Virgin, to Christ, and to the Father. Not only, therefore, is the "Devotion to the Virgin" much more intimately interwoven with the "Spiritual Exercises" than the author of the "Essay on Development" would have his readers believe; but it is moreover clear that it supersedes the honour and worship due to the Third Person of the ever-blessed Trinity; instead of addressing THE FATHER, THE SON, AND THE HOLY GHOST, the disciple of Ignatius Loyola addresses THE MOTHER, THE SON, AND THE FATHER. An undeniable and very characteristic instance this of "development!" But the capability for development is unlimited, and accordingly the Jesuit Bellecus, in his Medulla Ascensus, p. 13, informs us that a number of men distinguished for their knowledge and probity, some of whom he mentions by name, "not only fearlessly assert" (which it is not at all difficult to believe), "but satisfactorily prove, solide probant" (which it would be curious to see), "that these commentaries of St. Ignatius" (the Exercitia) "were written with the finger of God, endued with the unction of the Holy Ghost, indited by the blessed Virgin, and of the soul is transferred in the most absolute sense to the spiritual director, under whose auspices the exercises are gone through. And that advisedly so, if we may judge from the fearful language to which M. de Ravignan commits himself on this subject.

“Those,” he says, “who pretend to see in a succouring direction a degrading yoke, do not perceive that they reject the support offered to prevent men from falling into the waves of the torrent; for to precipitate one’s self amidst the depths of divine things, to adventure one’s self into the vast deserts of contemplation, without rule, without guide, in order to follow simply the spontaneous impulse and THE CAPRICE OF INSPIRATION, is to court all the dangers of extreme illusions, and of the most disastrous follies.”—De l’Exist. et de l’Inst. des Jésuites, p. 23.

Even so! let us beware of the dangers of inspiration; let us mistrust the guidance of the Holy Ghost; let us invoke the Virgin Mary, and commit ourselves to the spiritual mechanism of Loyola, the airy imagery of our own excited senses, and the crafty counsel of a Jesuit director, and we shall be perfectly safe! Can folly, can blasphemy, further go?

Hitherto, we have considered the Exercitia in the abstract, with reference to their intrinsic pravity as a means of promoting personal religion; but in order to comprehend their full importance, they must be considered in their connexion with the Institute, as the means of entangling men in the meshes of Jesuitism. That this is the light in which they should be viewed, is expressly stated by M. de Ravignan:

“It is not to be supposed,” he says, “that the book of the Exercitia was composed with a view to supply holy employment for the leisure of the mind. Their principal object is to produce decision and action. Not only is the past to be repaired, but the future is to be fixed; a decision is to be formed for time and eternity. There is more here than a mere contemplative recreation. The warrior of Pampeluna, who borrowed more than one idea from the profession of arms, has introduced one here: soldiers go through the ‘exercise’ only to prepare themselves for war.

“This is the reason why in the middle of that holy course a grave deliberation is to be entered upon, in presence of the divine examples

lastly, without one jot of alteration, approved, commended and patronized in a bull by Paul III.” The Exercitia themselves go no further than to assert that Loyola was taught them, “not so much from books, as by the unction of the Holy Ghost and internal experience.” (Præfatio ad Lectorem; Exercit. Spirit. p. 14.) A number of learned Jesuits, men of sterling honesty no doubt, whose word “we may well believe,” afterwards discover what Loyola himself was ignorant of, that he wrote them under the dictation of “the most august Queen of Heaven.” Such are the truly wonderful effects of “the process of development in ideas.”

of Jesus Christ, which determine the beau idéal of perfection for all, both for those who are called to an apostolic mode of life, and for those who are called to the life of the world and of the family; the time has now arrived for what the book of the Exercitia calls the "election," that is to say, the choice of a state of life. The soul which is as yet free, is now maturely to consider what mode of life it ought to embrace with a view to God's glory, and to a future eternity. It contemplates faithfully the Divine Redeemer, it interrogates itself and prays continually.

"Such is this great business of choosing a state of life; it is the centre of the Exercitia, the focus to which every thing converges, the mighty knot to which all our hopes and destinies are tied."—De l'Ex. et de l'Inst. des Jés. pp. 23, 24.

The central point of the Exercitia here alluded to is the Meditatio de duobus Vexillis, which is inserted, as an exceptional exercise, between the meditations on different parts of our Lord's history, on the fourth day of the second week. We despair of doing the subject justice without a literal translation of

"THE MEDITATION CONCERNING THE TWO STANDARDS,

"The one that of our excellent Captain Jesus Christ, the other that of Lucifer, the most deadly enemy of mankind.

"The preparatory prayer as usual.

"First prelude, a kind of historical contemplation of Christ on the one side, and Lucifer on the other, both calling upon men to collect under their respective standards.

"Second prelude, for the construction of the place; let there be imagined a very large plain near Jerusalem, and in it the Lord Jesus Christ as the chief captain of all good men; again another plain in Babylonia, with Lucifer, the captain of the wicked and the adversaries.

"Third prelude, to ask for grace that we may be able to discern all the wiles of the evil captain, imploring at the same time the help of God for avoiding them; and further, that it may be given us to know and to imitate the good character of Christ, the true and excellent captain.

"First point, to imagine before my eyes, in the Babylonian plain, the captain of the wicked, sitting on a throne of fire and smoke, of a horrible figure and terrible countenance.

"Second point, to observe how he disperses the innumerable devils congregated around him, throughout the world, to do mischief, not sparing any city or place, or any kind of persons.

"Third point, to observe what kind of speech he makes to his servants, instigating them to take snares and chains and throw them over men, and to drag them first (as is mostly the case) to the love of riches, whence afterwards they may the more easily be forced on to the ambition of worldly honour, and finally to the abyss of pride.

"These are the three principal steps of temptation grounded on riches, honour, and pride ; whence there is a rapid descent to all other kinds of vices.

“ Likewise, on the contrary part, our sovereign and excellent ruler and captain Christ is to be contemplated.

“ First point, to look upon Christ standing in a pleasant plain close by Jerusalem, in an humble position, but very beautiful in form and most lovely in countenance.

“ The second point, to watch in what manner he, the Lord of the whole world, sends his chosen apostles, disciples, and other servants through the world, that they may impart his holy and saving doctrine to every sort, class, and condition of men.

“ The third point, to listen to the speech in which Christ exhorts all his servants and friends, destined for this work, and commands them to use their endeavours in assisting others, with a view first of leading them on to a spiritual love of poverty, and moreover (if a regard for Divine obedience, and their heavenly election dispose them that way), to an actual embracing of true poverty ; secondly, of luring them into a desire for reproach and contempt, out of which grows the virtue of humility. And thus rise the three steps of perfection, viz. : poverty, abjection of self, and humility, which are diametrically opposed to riches, honour, and pride, and which at once bring in all the other virtues.

“ After this a colloquy is to be addressed to the blessed Virgin, and through her grace is to be solicited from her Son, that I may be received and may remain under his standard ; and that, first, by poverty, either spiritual only, or else accompanied by the spoiling of goods (that is, if he deign to call and admit me thereto) ; secondly, by abjection or ignominy, whereby I may the more closely imitate Him, yet deprecating the guilt of others, lest the contempt shewn me should be injurious to any one or offensive to God.

“ A second colloquy is to be addressed to the man Christ, that he may obtain the same things for me from the Father, and at the end the prayer *Anima Christi*², is to be added.

“ A third colloquy is to be addressed to the Father, that he may grant the petition, concluding with the Pater Noster.

“ This exercise is to be gone through once at midnight, and a second time at daybreak.

“ It is further to be repeated twice, about the time of morning mass

² The prayer Anima Christi stands at the beginning of the book of the Exercitia, with the sensual character of which it entirely harmonizes. It is as follows :—

Anima Christi, sanctifica me.
Corpus Christi, salva me.
Sanguis Christi, inebria me.
Aqua lateris Christi, lava me.
Passio Christi, conforta me.
O bone Jesu ! exaudi me :
Intra tua vulnera absconde me ;

Ne permittas me separari a te :
Ab hoste maligno defende me :
In hora mortis meæ voca me,
Et jube me venire ad te,
Ut cum sanctis tuis laudem te,
In sæcula sæculorum. Amen.

and of vespers, with the three colloquies added at the end. And before supper the following exercise is to be performed :—

“ A MEDITATION TO BE HAD ON THE SAME FOURTH DAY,

“ First prelude, to set before the mind, by way of history, three distinct classes of men, every one of which has gained ten thousand ducats by other means than the worship and love of God ; but now desires to be reconciled to God and to be saved, forsaking by all means the hurtful love of the thing gained, as being an obstacle to salvation.

“ Second prelude, to construct in imagination some place, in which I may see myself standing before God and all his saints, earnestly desiring to know by what means I may best please God.

“ Third prelude, to pray for that which I wish, namely, for grace to choose that which may be both most acceptable to God, and most salutary to myself.” Exercit. Spirit. 2a Hebd. 4a dies. pp. 77—82.

Then follows the description of the three classes of men ; the first being ready to part with their wealth, but delaying till the hour of death ; the second trying to combine the possession of their wealth with the service of God ; the third, the class in which the exercitant, if he is at all in earnest, must aspire to find himself of those who are ready at once to resign all for God's sake. In an appendix to the second week, a variety of directions are added in reference to the election, which is to be the subject of daily consideration after the exercise of the two standards, until the matter has been brought to a final issue ; and in the event of hesitation the spiritual director is empowered to protract the exercises of the second week, by the insertion of additional portions of the Gospel history. How these meditations of the two standards, and of the three classes of men, are brought effectually to bear upon the mind of the exercitant, so as to drive him to the conclusion to which, if he be considered a fit subject, it is the business of the spiritual director to conduct him, will appear yet more clearly on reference to the Directorium, a work of consummate subtlety, which was first suggested in the first General Congregation, held after the death of Loyola, in the year 1558, but not executed till the year 1599, when it was completed by Polanco, and circulated by command of General Aquaviva throughout the order, for the guidance of those to whom the management of exercitants should be committed. In the first instance the greatest caution is enjoined in proposing the exercises, to prevent the parties who are induced to go through them, from suspecting that the object is to draw them into the society. (Dir. c. i. § 2, 5 ; c. iv. § 8.) The time of proposing them is cunningly chosen ; it is never to be done abruptly, but always upon some suitable opportunity, (aliquâ commodâ occasione, vel à re natâ, vel DEXTRE ACCERSITÂ) ; for instance, if a person appear dissatisfied with his condition, or labour under some scruple of mind, or some difficulties in his circumstances ; if his affairs go on badly, or his friends treat him ill ; or if he has fallen into some vicious habits or some great faults, whereby his conscience is troubled,—in all such cases a course of the Exercitia is to be recommended, either in the confessional, or out of it. (Dir. c. i. § 3.) The exercitant is required from the first to make up his mind to whatever God may lead him to in the course of the exercises, to look upon his director as upon an instrument sent to him by God, that he may show him the way unto life, and accordingly to make him privy to all his most secret thoughts. (Dir. c. ii. § 5—7.) But while the exercitant thus lays his soul open in the most unreserved manner, the director is to use such reserve as he may see expedient ; not letting him see the whole of the exercises at once, lest he should get frightened, but bringing him on by slow degrees. (Dir. c. ii. § 8.) When at last the exercitant has reached the point at which he is to make his election of a state of life, the director is called upon to put forth all his skill, at one time pressing on towards a decision, at another time holding back and delaying, and if the party hesitates, keeping him under a wretched sense of spiritual desolation, which he is taught to look upon as a punishment inflicted upon him by God for his reluctance to enter into his service. The whole of the rules bearing upon this part of the subject (Dir. c. xxii.—xxxiii.) are contrived with such profound skill, and so deep an insight into human nature, that it is next to impossible that any one who has so far committed himself, should recede. The strength of his mind and will must be considerably broken by the whole course of the exercises from the beginning, and as long as he has not resolved to enter the order at the sacrifice of every other consideration, he cannot, upon the premises to which he has been led to give, under the most solemn sanctions of religion, a hearty and unsuspecting assent, view his own conduct in any other light than as a base and cowardly backwardness to obey the manifest will of God. So much so, that as the Directorium observes, persons who have to the last been unable to make up their minds while under the influence of the exercises, which is called the state of “hallucination,” are often at a subsequent period brought to the point by the inward dissatisfaction which the whole process leaves behind in their souls, and which they cannot get rid of. Nor is it at all surprising that there should be considerable danger of unsettling the intellect of the exercitant,—a danger to which the Directorium draws particular attention, and prescribes the rules of prudence and discretion necessary to be observed in order to avoid such a result. (Dir. c. viii. § 3.)

We have seen by what methods the unhappy man who is overtaken by some wily Jesuit confessor or director in the evil hour of calamity or of remorse, or, which is the more usual case, the unhappy youth who is laid hold of in the seminary, at the moment when the awakening passions make him a fit subject for this spiritual circumvention, is tortured into persuading himself that it is a duty from which he dares not shrink, at the peril of his soul, to devote himself to the service of God in the order of St. Ignatius Loyola. Let us next ascertain on what terms the admission into the society, which he has been goaded to solicit, is granted him. For this purpose we now turn to the *Constitutions*³,

On reviewing this comparative table, it appears that the Prague edition comprises all that is contained in the Avignon edition, with the exception of the decrees of the general congregations held subsequently to the year 1757; the few pieces marked [Qu?] being in all probability omitted on account of their smallness by the Paris editor, though contained in the Prague edition. On the contrary, it appears that the Avignon edition omits altogether two documents, the Compendium Privilegiorum, which it might not be prudent to obtrude on the world at this early period of the Society's revival, and the Ratio Studiorum. The omission of the latter is accounted for by the 15th decree of the XX1st general congregation, from which it appears that at the XXth congregation, held in the year 1820, it was proposed that the Ratio Studiorum should be revised and adapted to the present time. The subject having again been brought forward in the next congregation, the general stated that he was fully impressed with the necessity of the measure, and determined to apply himself to it; but that it required in his opinion much consideration, and that he did not think any thing ought to be proposed by way of general rule, until it had been subjected to the test of experience. To this view of the general the congregation warmly assented, and the educational movements of the Jesuits are therefore to be considered, for the present, experimental. It was, we are ready to admit, a wise and prudent thought to try first how much the world will bear at their hands in that line, and above all, to give their opponents no handle by a premature prospectus of their doings.

After this full account of the two editions of the Institute, we have room for a few words only on the two editions of the Constitutions before mentioned. The edition published in 1838 by Messrs. Rivington, the first English edition of the Constitutions, is a reprint of the Latin text of the first edition (in which the Examen Generale and the declarations are not comprised) printed at the society's press at Rome in the year 1558; to this reprint is added a collation of that text with the Antwerp edition of 1702, a copy of which is in the University library at Cambridge. The text of the Prague edition, and of the Paris and Avignon editions, recently printed from it, corresponds with that of the Antwerp edition, and seems to be that finally settled by the 59th decree of the IVth general congregation (1581), as a proposal for further correction made in the Vth, and referred to the VIth congregation, was quashed by the latter. The English edition contains, besides, an English translation, both of the Constitutions and of the three bulls by which the order was founded by Paul III. in 1540, suppressed by Clement XIV. in 1773, and restored by Pius VII. in 1814. An "Outline of the present condition of the Romish Church in this Kingdom," originally appended to a sermon preached by the bishop of Australia, closes the volume.

The Paris edition of the Constitutions (No. 5) accompanies the reprint of the Latin text by a new French translation, that made in 1762 by order of the Dauphin being in the opinion of the editor unsatisfactory. It also contains Loyola's famous letter on the virtue of obedience, with a translation, and in an appendix a series of valuable notes illustrative of different parts of the Constitutions, chiefly by reference to other parts of the Institutum.

first subjected to a searching examination touching his past history, his position in the world, his family and connexions, his circumstances, his bodily and mental constitution, and other points upon consideration of which the society decides how far he may make a good Jesuit. This is fair enough ; if a man is not likely to answer its purpose, the society has a right to say that it will have nothing to do with him ; though it may seem hard to shut him out from what, according to the representation of the Jesuits themselves, is the royal road to Christian perfection. If, on the contrary, the candidate is thought worthy, the terms of admission to the novitiate are communicated to him. These are as follows : —He is to dispose of all his property, actual and reversionary, by application of the surplus, after the payment of his just debts, to pious and charitable uses ; practically, for the most part, in favour of the order of Jesuits, which undertakes the office of Great Almoner for its deluded victims. This disposal of property is to be made either on entering upon the novitiate, or at all events after the expiration of the first year, at any moment that the superior may command it to be done ; and that without any reservation in favour of his relatives⁵. Though he may decline to strip himself at once of all his property, he is not to retain any money in his hands, nor to deposit money with any person whatever ; but to place all the money he has in the hands of the cashier of the novitiate. He is never to go out of the house without permission from the superior, and then as a rule only with a companion, chosen not by him but for him ; and in the house he is only permitted to converse, and that but sparingly, with particular individuals pointed out to him for that purpose. He is not to hold any communication personally, or by letter, ⁵ “ In order,” says the Examen, “ that they may yield more perfect obedience to the Gospel, which says not, ‘ give to your relations,’ but ‘ give to the poor ;’ ” [“ IT IS CORBAN !! ” Mark vii. 11.] “ and that they may set to all a better example of laying aside all inordinate affection towards relatives,” [“ WITHOUT NATURAL AFFECTION !! ” 2 Tim. iii. 3.] “ and of avoiding the inconveniences of an inordinate distribution arising from this affection ; and moreover, that they may the more firmly and stably persevere in their vocation, all recourse to parents and other relations being cut off, and the very recollection of them become useless, (ad parentes et consanguineos recurrendi, et ad inutilem ipsorum memoriam aditu præcluso.”) —Exam. Gen. c. iv. § 2. The rigidity with which these terms are enforced is incredible ; none but a Jesuit can insist on such a bargain. We know a case of recent occurrence in this country, in which a young man who was not only most anxious to join the order, but was already more than half accepted, was harshly repelled, simply because he had too much heart to suffer his aged father, who had a wife and daughter to support by his exertions as a trader, to make the sacrifice of nearly half his little property, to be paid down in ready money, the price which the Jesuits had actually prevailed upon him to offer for his son’s admission. The young man afterwards went to the English college at Rome, and is now one of the Romish clergy of the London district : his refusal by the Jesuits left for years after an impression of deep melancholy upon his mind.

with any of his friends or relatives, unless on a special emergency, with the permission of the superior; and in that case he is to put any letters which he may write or receive, into the hands of his superior, on the understanding that he is to forward or to suppress them as he sees fit. He is to lay aside all natural affection⁶ towards relatives, and to resign all friendships. He is to be content to have all his faults reported to his superiors, and in like manner to report those of others⁷. Upon these terms, and a

⁶ Again, ἀστροφῶν. The passage, Luke xiv. 26. is perverted to support this atrocious injunction; and by way of making compliance with it easier, the following prescription is given:—"In order that the expression may come in aid of the sentiment, it is a holy counsel that they should accustom themselves to say, not 'We have parents, or brethren;' but 'We had parents or brethren.'" Examen Gen. c. iv. Decl. C.

⁷ The rules upon which this horrible system of universal mutual espionage rests, are laid down with admirable naïveté. "For the greater advancement in spirituality, and especially for the more effectual promotion of submission and humility in the individual himself, every one must be content to have all his faults and defects, and whatever else has been noticed or observed in him, reported to the superiors by every one who has become acquainted with them otherwise than in the confessional."—"All are to be content to be corrected by means of their neighbours, and to assist in their correction, and to be ready to report each other, in all due love and charity, for their greater spiritual advancement; especially if this be enjoined and required by the superior who has charge of them, for the greater glory of God." Summ. Constit. Reg. IX. & X. A feeling of repugnance against this system, which is not confined to the pupils and the novices, but pervades the entire order, reaching even the general himself, by means of his admonitor and assistants, appears to have gained ground at one time in the society; for in the sixth congregation these rules were sharply canvassed; but General Aquaviva was wide awake for the interests of the order, and took care that no ambiguity should remain on the subject. It was therefore settled, that it is lawful for all to report to the superior as to a father, every fault of his neighbours, whether serious or trifling; and that this is the meaning of the rule; that by agreeing to the terms proposed in the fourth chapter of the Examen, the members of the society renounce every right in regard to their good name, which might stand in the way of this system of reporting, and give to all permission to inform the superior of every thing, important or unimportant, which may have been noticed in them; that although, generally speaking, confidential communications voluntarily made by one to another under the seal of secrecy, though not in confession, are not to be included under this rule, yet if he who has received such a communication should for some grave reasons doubt whether he ought not to divulge it, he is to look diligently into the opinions of the doctors, and thereupon to act as he shall see fit; that the express order or demand of the superior is not to be waited for, but that the members are to report each other voluntarily, without being required to do so; that in matters likely to lead to mischievous consequences, and more especially in cases of evil speaking, murmuring, or discontent against the superiors, it is an imperative duty to give immediate information, and that equally with a view either to moral discipline, or, if the case require it, to judicial proceedings. It was further determined, as regards the use to be made of information so secretly obtained by the superior, that he is never to give up the name of his informant without his consent, which, however, the latter may at times be bound to give; that he is in every possible way to bear his informant harmless; neither is he, if it can be avoided, to allow the information itself to transpire; nor in any case to make it known farther than is necessary with a view to the application of a remedy; that superiors are to communicate freely with each other on the information they receive concerning those placed under them; that the superior is general promise of submission to his superiors in all things, he is admitted to the novitiate, which lasts two years, and is passed, to the exclusion of study or any other occupation which might help to sustain, satisfy, or enlarge the mind, in the repetition of spiritual exercises, in the examination of the constitutions of the society, or rather of such parts of them as it may be judged expedient to show him, (Exam. Gen. c. i. Decl. G.) and in the practice of the one and all-sufficient virtue of the Jesuit, obedience. For the more effectual exercise of the latter, the novice is during the first year of his novitiate subjected to various probations, such as the following:—To serve for a month or two as attendant in a hospital; to travel without money, begging his way; to fill the lowest situations in the household, to assist in cooking and sweeping the house, and to perform other menial offices; to instruct young children and ignorant persons; and to be content with the worst possible fare. In whatever situation he may find himself, and whosoever may be placed over him for the time, even though it should be one of the household servants, to whom he is assigned as an assistant, he is to show to this his temporary superior all due reverence, and to “obey his commands, as if they came from the lips of our Lord Jesus Christ himself.” The novice is to confess, and to receive the holy sacrament once a week, on pain of having his food withheld from him, (si ad Confessionem non accederent, subtrahatur eis cibus corporis, donec cibum spiritus sumant. Const. Pars iii. c. i. Decl. Q.) Within three months after his entrance he is to make a general confession of his whole life, and this is to be repeated from the point last arrived at, from six months to six months. He is of course bound to submit to all in no case to require his informant to give the information in writing, as that might expose him to judicial proceedings; that the superior is to proceed against the person denounced not only by private admonition, by threats, by stricter surveillance, but also by removal, by deprivation of office and the like; that in minor cases the superior may make the matter a subject of public reprehension in the refectory, saving the person informed against, but above all the informer, as much as possible; that in cases of a more serious nature, the superior may, upon such private information, even proceed to expulsion from the order, provided it be done quietly and upon some plausible pretence. Lastly, to soften the odiousness of the system, an appeal is made to the rules of the Franciscans and Minorites, and more particularly to a decree of St. Bonaventura, which, however, only declares that the fact of his participation in crime does not relieve the accomplice from the obligation of giving information to the superior. Decr. Congr. VI. 49 & 50 passim. It is worthy of observation, as showing the extent to which the French clergy of the present day are imbued with the principles of Jesuitism, that the vile system of secret spiritual police here recommended, has been adopted on a large scale by the French Bishops with regard to the unhappy desservants, and has borne such abundant fruit that, according to the statement of the Frères Allignol, in their work de l'Etat actuel du Clergé en France, “secret accusations have in all the dioceses been multiplied beyond measure, and that in some dioceses there is not a single priest who has not at one time or another been denounced.”

the rules of the society, and also to undergo without murmuring the different penances which his confessors and his superiors may prescribe to him from time to time ; as well as to endure, without murmur or complaint, any ill-treatment, defamation, or indignity to which he may be subjected. Lastly, at the expiration of the two years, he is questioned as to the state of his mind, and the spiritual desires after perfection which he experiences ; if he should answer unsatisfactorily, he is asked next, whether he feels in himself at least a desire to feel such desires ? By this means, and by a continuance of ascetic practices, he is generally brought at last to answer in the affirmative, and is then, on taking the three vows of obedience, poverty, and chastity, formally admitted as a member of the order, and put under further training for whatever station in it the superiors may consider most suitable to him. Examen Generale, c. iv. passim. Constit. Pars iii. c. i. passim.

Having conducted the unhappy novice thus far, let us pause for a moment and realize his situation. Under the influence of religious excitement, real or factitious, he has taken the fatal step of cutting from under him all the supports with which a kind Providence had surrounded him, and cast himself into the arms of a body, of whose immense power he had often heard, and by whose iron grasp he now feels himself crushed. Excitement does not last for ever ; the hour of reflection arrives in its turn ; a sense of disappointment begins to creep over him. At first he resists it ; but it returns again and again ; recollections of his former life, of his friends and his family, crowd in upon him ; with them his heart felt warm and happy ; here all is icy coldness around him, and deep indescribable misery within. The thought suggests itself that he has been too hasty, that he has taken a false step, that he has been mistaken as to the character of the order with which he has connected himself, or, at any rate, that he has formed an erroneous estimate of his own fitness for such a life. At first he seeks to suppress that too ; but it rises again and again ; the experience, the bitter, desolating experience of every day and hour goes to confirm it. He becomes more and more deeply convinced that he has fooled away his life's happiness, and, what is far worse, possibly his eternal salvation ; for he feels that spiritual improvement is impossible in a situation against which his whole being revolts. He looks forward upon what lies before him, upon the vows which he is to take, the obedience which he is to promise, the uncertainty of the employment to which he will hereafter be put, by the arbitrary decision of those under whose cold, hypocritical tyranny he is already suffering so much. He sees that he must unavoidably become more and more deeply entangled in the meshes of the net in which he has been caught; that he is hopelessly and for ever the abject slave of a pitiless system; and to work up his indignant sense of the situation in which he is placed, to the highest pitch, he remembers, and is told time after time, that all this is expressly ad majorem Dei gloriam.

Might he not retrace his steps? What would he not give, if he had a friend with whom he might consult! Perhaps his confessor or his superior might give him good advice? They treat it all as the rebellion of the old Adam, which must be repressed; they inflict penances, but do not produce conviction. He looks around him, but there is no friend whom he could trust. If he were to open his lips to any of the associates which have been assigned him, the chances are that he would be reported to the superior as a bad subject, as a breeder of discontent and mutiny against the order. The false and unnatural language which he has been taught to make use of by way of spiritual exercise, now returns upon him in bitter reality: "I had a father, a mother, friends, relatives!" Could he but take counsel with them! but that is impossible. If he were to write to them, his letter probably would never reach them. Or, if it did, how is he to know that they would sympathise with him? If they approved the step he took, they will blame him; if they disapproved it, they may not be disposed to pity him. Possibly they may love him still; possibly they would assist him; but how is he ever to know? Suppose he were to make his escape. But how shall he manage it? He has not a farthing at his disposal. If he fail, he will be sent he knows not whither, and subjected he knows not to what punishment. If he succeed, what is to become of him? Like a dead man returned from the grave, he will scare men by his very look, and whithersoever he goes, the curse of excommunication will follow him⁸. What then is he to do? Finding himself thus fenced round on every side, his living soul immured as it were within the more than stone walls of the order, he may perhaps for a time secretly indulge a raving mood, approaching even to blasphemy at the remembrance of the oft repeated phrase ad majorem Dei gloriam; but as madmen, after fruitlessly knocking their heads against their prison walls, grow tranquil from very exhaustion, so will it happen to him; he will sink down into a state of mental and moral prostration. Then, probably, the thought of that God in whose name he has been so fearfully abused, will occur to him; he will seek to calm the storms of his soul by prayer to Him who is the refuge of the oppressed. Prayer? oh, torment of hell! even that is not sacred in this fearful place. He will have to render an account of every hour he spent on his knees, and either have to tell a lie as in the presence of God, or else, if he suffer the least hint of his secret sorrows and his unbosomings to the Father of Spirits to escape him, he will be interdicted this last refuge of the oppressed soul, and referred back to "ruminations" and "respirations." Where is the man of a thousand, nay, of ten thousands, that would venture to affirm that his moral courage and energy, even though he be in the fulness of his strength, would rise superior to the horrors of such a situation? And how shall a youth rise above them, whose strength has been broken before it has come to its ripeness? or the weary pilgrim, who took refuge in the novitiate, because his soul was longing for rest and peace? Of the immense majority of men it may with perfect certainty be predicted, that under the influence of this discipline they will become, what the system is confessedly intended to produce, dry sticks and dead corpses', mere passive tools, yielding themselves instinctively to the impulse of the power that holds and wields them.

This feature of the system of Loyola, that it is a process of spiritual homicide, we hold to be a very important point; one to which sufficient prominence has not, so far as we know, been given by those, who have written upon the dangerous character of the order. In the first place, it accounts for what on no other supposition appears credible, the compactness of villany to which the thousands of puppets, of which the order is composed, are easily made subservient, whenever it may suit those who pull the wires in the eternal city; in the second place it throws immense light upon the debasement of mind and character which must inevitably diffuse itself wherever that order obtains extensive influence in the education of a people; a conclusion strikingly borne out by the decay of the national mind and character in all those countries in which the Jesuits succeeded in establishing themselves as the instructors of the nation; and, lastly, it goes to the very root of the iniquity with which the order is chargeable, viz., that it kills and destroys by its wily machinery that which it is the will of God should be quickened and sanctified by the Holy Ghost. The last consideration is chiefly interesting to the theologian, enabling him to form a decisive judgment on the subject, independently of all the secondary points upon which the controversy respecting the merits and demerits of the Jesuits usually turns. The first consideration concerns the historian, who finds it often difficult, with the clearest evidence of facts in his hands, to gain credence for the tale of enormous wickedness which he has to tell when he comes to chronicle the doings of the Jesuits; as a conspiracy of so many and so devoted individuals to work out an evil purpose, appears to the ordinary apprehension and the common charity of mankind too monstrous a supposition to be true. The second of the considerations named is of the utmost importance to the politician, who may be called upon to decide, as our legislators are at this present crisis, whether it be lawful for any state to hand over the rising generations of the land, or any portion of them, to a corporation whose whole system is calculated, and with the most consummate skill adapted, to destroy in man all that makes him a man, and renders him capable of being made a Christian. And all this with what view? With no other view than to level all opposition against the anti-christian usurpation of Rome, whose tool Jesuitism has been from its beginning, and has finally become its last and only resource. Nothing short of the most absolute resignation of both the will and the judgment can render any man a trustworthy instrument of Rome and of its manifold and offensive corruptions. That resignation is attained in the Jesuit order, as under no other system of training or discipline, and it is what in Jesuit language is called "obedience."

"What I have thus spoken concerning obedience," says the celebrated epistle of Ignatius, "is to be observed alike by private members towards their immediate superiors, by the rectors, and local superiors towards the provincials, by the provincials towards the general, and by the general himself towards him whom God has set over him, his vicar on earth; so that a perfect distinction of orders, and thereby peace and charity, may be maintained, without which it is impossible to preserve the good government either of our society or of any other association. For in this way does Divine Providence order all things sweetly, leading on the lowest things by things middle, middle things by the highest, and all things to its own ends. Hence that subordination of one angelic hierarchy under another; hence the connexion by which the heavenly and other moveable bodies are linked together in their several positions, whose changes and motions all descend in regular order from one highest movent to the very lowest. Even so on earth also the like is seen, both in every state ruled by good laws, and especially in the ecclesiastic hierarchy, all the members and functions of which are derived from the one general vicar of Christ our Lord: and the more accurately this order and arrangement is adhered to, the righter and the better is the government. How grievous ills on the contrary are brought upon many human societies by neglect of this order, is most evident. And therefore do I most ardently wish, that in this society, whereof the Lord has committed to us some charge and care, this virtue may so diligently be practised, and flourish, as if therein consisted the well-being and the entire safety of our Society." Epist. S. P. N. Ignatii de virt. obed. § 20.

This was the fundamental principle of Loyola, not to found a particular order, in which individuals might practise a particular rule of religious life, but to create an instrument, compact and powerful, for the maintenance of the Romish hierarchy. Upon the attainment of this object, that admirably contrived code of laws to which we must once more call the attention of our readers, the Constitutions, is calculated. The general of the order resides at Rome¹; at Rome the General Congregations are held²; at Rome, therefore, both the legislative and the executive powers of the society are concentrated. From Rome, as the centre, the chain of the order is laid around the earth with iron links, riveted together by the vow of blind, unquestioning obedience.

The general holds in his hands the most absolute means of control over the movements of this Papal militia in every quarter of the globe. Not only are reports periodically sent from every point at which the society has a station of any kind, to the provincials, and from them to the general, but the local superiors and the missionaries in all parts of the world are also in direct communication with the general, who thus receives constantly a double set of reports, some of which are official, and laid by him before the board of assistants, others secret (with the inscription solì), which are read by none but the general himself and the secretary of the order. Lists of all the members of the society, with notes on their character, conduct, abilities, &c., are likewise sent at regular intervals, so as to enable the general to keep a complete survey of the instruments at his command, and of the materials he has to work upon³. The property of the order⁴ is all vested in the general, the provincials and local superiors acting in all financial matters by procuration from him, and agreeably to his direction; with this only restriction, that the dissolution of any college, and consequent appropriation of its revenues to other purposes, and the transfer of property from one province to another, requires the concurrence of the general congregation⁵. And as over the property, so is the general's authority supreme over the persons belonging to the society. The power of admission both to the novitiate, and to the society itself, is inherent in him, and is exercised by others only as his representatives, and in common cases. Cases which present any special difficulty, must be referred to the general. Those to whom the power of admission is ordinarily delegated, are the provincials, the rectors of colleges, and superiors of houses⁶. With the exception of the four assistants and the admonitor, who are, like himself, elected by the general congregation⁷, the general appoints all the great officers and other functionaries of the society; the offices of provincial, local superior, and rector, are generally held for three years; but they may at any time be revoked by the general⁸. He has complete power over the employment of all the members, whom he can order to pursue particular studies, to execute special missions, to go forth as preachers, confessors, or missionaries into any part of the world, the general's command being at any moment sufficient to effect the most complete change in the position, the station, and occupation of every member of the society⁹. He exercises over them all a sovereign penal and dispensing power, including that of expulsion and re-admission¹; for so absolute is his sway, that he is not bound by the acts of those who hold his commission for any given purpose, but may at any time rescind or modify their determinations, according to his good pleasure, which is law to the whole society, and to all colleges. The amount of the society's wealth may be judged of from the fact, that at the time of its expulsion from France the property of the order within the territory of France alone amounted to 58 millions of francs. The endowed colleges were always the most numerous. At the end of the 16th century the society had 21 professed houses and 293 colleges, that is to say, as M. Quinet shrewdly observes, 21 hands for refusing and 293 for accepting wealth. There is an amusing slip of the pen in one of the decrees (the 58th) of the 2nd general congregation, the society being placed in contradistinction with the veri Christi pauperes.

its members, on the ground that he is to them in the place of Christ².

Such are the gigantic powers wielded by that irresponsible³ spiritual despot, the general of the order of Jesuits. But who are his subjects? This is a question far more difficult to answer than might at first sight appear. Ostensibly⁴ they are :—

1. The professed Jesuits under obligation of four vows, Professi quatuor Votorum, i. e., of obedience, poverty, and chastity, and of special obedience to the Pope respecting the missions; who alone have an absolute right to sit and vote in the general congregation, and by whom exclusively the general is elected. Their number is exceedingly small in comparison with that of the other members. At Loyola's death there were not more than forty professed Jesuits, while the numerical force of the order exceeded one thousand⁵.

2. The professed Jesuits under obligation of three vows only, Professi trium Votorum, viz., those of obedience, poverty, and chastity; an exceptional grade, conferred upon laymen as well as priests, as a special favour, by virtue of a bull of Julius III. There is reason to suppose that this class comprises what are called Jésuites de robe courte, that is, incorporated members who do not avow their connexion with the order, and have dispensation to live in conformity with the world; a position occupied chiefly by men of influence and high standing, who can serve the interests of the society more effectually than if they were to make open profession of Jesuitism; they may be called to sit and vote in general congregations, but not for the election of the general⁶.

³ It is true that the constitutions contain certain provisions for controlling the general in the exercise of his power, and in certain cases calling him to account, and even removing him from his office. (Constit. Pars ix. c. iv. v.) But it is difficult to understand how, with the despotic power possessed by the general, these provisions can ever be brought to bear; and it is a remarkable fact, that in the only two instances throughout the whole history of the society, in which the general was interfered with, it was done for the maintenance of the corruptions of the order against contemplated reforms.

⁶ There is an evident mystery about this class of members. Its institution dates of the year 1550, when it was provided for in a bull of Julius III. by an exceptional

3. The formed Spiritual Coadjutors, Coadjutores formati spirituales, an inferior grade to that of the Professi quatuor Votorum. A lower degree of qualification, and a shorter time of probation, is required for their admission; they take the three clause; "præter aliquos, qui de licentiâ Præpositi Generalis, propter ipsorum DEVOTIONEM ET PERSONARUM QUALITATEM, tria vota hujusmodi solemnita facere poterunt." Bulla Julii III. Exposcit debitum. In the text of the Constitutions they are thus described: —"Præter hos (professos quatuor votorum) nonnulli ad trium votorum solemnium tantum professionem admitti possent: raro tamen, et NON SINE CAUSIS PECULIARIBUS ALICUJUS MOMENTI: et hos septem annos in societate notos fuisse, et NON MEDIOCREM SUI TALENTI AC VIRTUTUM SATISFACTIONEM, ad gloriam Dei præbuisse in ed oportebit;" and in the declaration, "Qui ad professionem trium votorum solemnium admittuntur, ordinariæ sufficientiam in litteris, quæ saltem ad confessarii munus bene obeundum satis sit, habeant oportet; VEL CERTÈ, DONA DEI ALIQUA RARA, QUÆ ID COMPENSARE VIDEANTUR, ita ut Præpositus Generalis, vel alius, cui suas vices ad hoc ille SPECIALI COMMISSIONE concederet, ad majus Dei obsequium et SOCIETATIS BONUM, sic convenire judicaret. Et hi ut plurimum homines erunt, qui PROPTEREA QUOD BENE MERITI SINT, ET VALDE DEVOTI, quamvis MINORI DOCTRINA AC CONCIONANDI APTITUDINE PRÆDITI, quam nostrum Institutum in professis requirat, admittendi esse in Domino videbuntur."

—Constit. Pars v. c. ii. § 3, Decl. c.—From this last description one might at first sight be led to suppose that they differed from the Professi quatuor Votorum only by the inferiority of their literary and theological attainments, and were professed priests, destined for what the Jesuits consider the lower walk of the sacerdotal office, and especially for the office of confessors. This, however, is palpably contradicted by the fact that the hearing of confessions is one of the principal employments of the Coadjutores Spirituales (Exam. c. vi. § 2.), who in all respects answer to the inferior sacerdotal grade; and on weighing the words of Decl. c. more accurately, it appears that it does not say they shall be employed as confessors, but only have the same degree of literary attainment as that required of confessors. It is nowhere said that they shall be necessarily in holy orders, and it is evident from the various expressions which we have marked, that they are a class of members, specially created for certain important objects, on the ground of their being by their singular devotion to the interests of the society, and their personal quality, likely to render eminent services. They might therefore be both secular ecclesiastics incorporated in the society, and allowed by special dispensation, and for the more effectual furtherance of the society's objects, to retain their preferment (an arrangement perfectly compatible with the rules of the society), and laymen of distinguished talents and station, admitted into the society upon account of their ability and willingness to advance its interests. We are confirmed in this view by the mystification of M. Crétineau-Joly's language in regard to them. While he states that their employment is the same as that of the spiritual coadjutors (which remains to be proved), he says that they are admitted to profession "à cause de quelque autre qualité ou d'un mérite dont l'ordre peut tirer parti dans un certain cercle d'idées." Vol. i. p. 62. What is the meaning of "un certain cercle d'idées?" or rather what cercle d'idées is there, in which a spiritual coadjutor may not be employed by his superiors if they see fit, without lifting him out of his class, an honour to which he is expressly forbidden from aspiring? (See Exam. c. vi. § 5. Constit. Pars v. c. iv. § 5.) Or, if his superiors should, on account of his distinguished merits, see fit to advance him, what is there to prevent his being promoted to the class of the Professi quatuor Votorum? On the whole, by far the most probable interpretation of this mysterious passage of the Constitutions is that above given; it was first suggested by Ripert de Monclar, who was procureur-général at the parliament of Provence, about the time of the expulsion of the Jesuits from France, and in his Compte rendu (1 vol. 12mo. 1765) gave a lucid abstract of the laws of the society. See Constitutions des Jésuites. Paris, 1843. Append. note L. The form of the vow taken by the Professi trium Votorum will be found in Constit. p. v. c. iii. § 5, 6.

vows only, but must be in holy orders. They are employed as assistants to the professed Jesuits, and generally the rectors and professors of colleges are chosen out of this class. They may, like the Professi trium Votorum, be summoned to the general congregation by the general, but cannot take any part in his election⁷.

4. The Simple Spiritual Coadjutors, Coadjutores Spirituales, a transition grade, from which, after two years' probation, they are promoted to that of Formed Spiritual Coadjutors⁸.

5. The Formed Temporal Coadjutors, Coadjutores formati temporales. These are the lay administrators and servants of the order, employed in the management of its temporal affairs, and in the performance of the various domestic offices; they are forbidden, if literates, from aspiring to the priesthood, and if uullettered, as most of them are, from learning even to read. They are bound by the three vows⁹.

6. The Simple Temporal Coadjutors, Coadjutores Temporales, probationers for the foregoing class¹.

7. The Approved Scholars, Scholastici Approbati, who are not properly members of the order, but rather aspirants to the membership. They are separated from the novitiate by the three vows which they have taken, and are in training for the degrees of coadjutors, or professed members, as may seem fit to their superiors².

8. The Novices, Novitii, who have placed themselves under the direction of the order with a view to entrance into it, and are undergoing the two years' preliminary probation, before they can be admitted to take the vows³.

Of these eight classes it is to be noted that four only, the first, second, third, and fifth, are permanent grades, which being once attained, no further advancement is, as a matter of rule, contemplated, whereas the other four are of their very nature probationary and transition classes, through which individuals pass into the former.

This hierarchical array, however, formidable as it is⁴, does not

by any means comprehend the whole body of what may be justly called the Jesuit militia ; what we have now enumerated, are but the skeletons, as it were, of the Jesuit regiments, distributed over the different countries of the world. There are countless individuals, and whole bodies of men, who are, without taking the vows, without complying with the rules of the order, perhaps even without knowing it, in a state of more or less subserviency to the interests and purposes of the society. We will endeavour to sum up the means which the Jesuits put in operation for this purpose under a few principal heads.

1. The Jesuits sometimes disguise their existence by assuming the names of other congregations. They did so at the very commencement of their order, when they played hide-and-seek in Spain under the name of Theatines ; and again in 1561, when the French parliament prohibited their existence in France as a branch of the order, but permitted them to reside there under episcopal control, a condition of which the reverend fathers, as M. Crétineau-Joly⁵ informs us, “made no account.” They put up Aquaviva ; 1626, under Vitelleschi ; 1749, under Retz ; and after their re-establishment in 1838, 1841, and 1844.

Year.	Provinces.	No. of Establishments.	No. of Members.
1580	21	110	5000
1615	33	550	13,000
1626	39	803	15,500
1749	..	1603	22,500
1838	14	173	3067

Hence it appears that their progress since their restoration in 1814 has, in spite of the violent prejudice existing against them in every country of Europe, been on the whole rather more rapid than it was at their commencement. Within twenty-five years of the foundation of the order they had 3500 members in 130 establishments ; within the same period since their restoration they have between 3000 and 3500 members, and about 200 establishments. They have certainly no reason to feel discouraged.

⁵ We cannot say much in praise of the work of M. Crétineau-Joly, from which the above account is derived. We should have taken him for a Jésuite de robe courte, did not charity forbid it after his positive assertion to the contrary. “The Jesuits,” he says in his introductory chapter, “have never counted me among their pupils ; they have never seen me among their neophytes. I have been neither their friend, nor their admirer, nor their opponent. I owe them no gratitude ; my mind is wholly unprejudiced in regard to their order. I am neither theirs, nor with them, nor for them, nor against them. They are to me what Vitellius, Otho and Galba, were to Tacitus. I have received neither injury nor benefit at their hands. As an historian I confine myself to history ; I am bent upon truth alone ; I only endeavour to induce logical consequences from undisputed and indisputable facts, without forming any opinion except after the most conscientious examination.” We are sadly afraid that M. Crétineau-Joly has every way failed to come up to this high-sounding programme of his own performance. Verily he is no Tacitus, either in historical truth or in style. As regards the former, the reader will be astonished to over the door of their college at Clermont the inscription, "Collegium societatis NOMINIS Jesu," but continued in all other respects to be what they had been before; and it is curious to see how, in their interrogatory before the rector of the university, they evaded the knotty question whether they were Jesuits or no. In later times, since their suppression by Clement XIV., they have haunted different parts of Europe under the names of Pères de la Foi, Victimes de l'Amour de Dieu, Picpus, Paccanarists, Missionaries, &c., and if the statements of some of their French opponents may be relied on, they have assumed the disguise of Lazarists, Dominicans, and even Benedictines. This we are scarcely disposed to believe on the bare assertion of partisans like M. Michelet⁶ and M. Génin⁷; but it is far from improbable hear that the five volumes are nothing more than one continued encomium and apology of the order. M. Crétineau-Joly had free access, he says, to the archives of the Gesù at Rome. No doubt the Jesuits knew whom they trusted with their secrets. In point of style and arrangement it has scarcely ever fallen to our lot to wade through a heavier book. It is a voluminous and crowded mass of ill-assorted and ill-digested materials; and from the violent partizanship of the author little reliance can be placed upon his statements, except when they make against his clients.

⁶ M. Michelet makes a statement to that effect, as far as the Lazarists and Benedictines are concerned, in his book on the Jesuits, (No. 7,) and he repeats it in his later work, du Prêtre, de la Femme, et de la Famille. Of this it will not be necessary for us to speak on the present occasion, as it touches upon our subject only incidentally. With regard to his book on the Jesuits, published in conjunction with M. Quinet, it consists of the two courses of lectures, or rather sketches of them, which were delivered by the two professors and friends at the Collège de France in the early part of the summer of 1843, and which, thanks to the outcry raised by the Jesuits themselves, have become so notorious since. M. Michelet's lectures are in substance a half political, half philosophical tirade against the order, written in an exceedingly animated, clever, aphoristic style. There are many brilliant flashes of thought; but the spirit of the whole savours too much of that modern French school, which assumes the principles of the revolution as the basis of the national life.

The lectures of M. Quinet are greatly superior, both in matter and manner; they contain more real information on the subject of which they treat, and their tone is in keeping with the religious character of the question at issue. He briefly reviews the history of the Jesuits, their constitutions and their missions, with a view to show that their system is a gross corruption of the Gospel; at the same time he too enters most warmly into the demi-political controversy of the day. We incline to think that both the professors might easily have chosen topics far more appropriate to the capacities and the literary wants of the youths who compose their legitimate audience.

⁷ Of Mr. Génin's book we cannot speak otherwise than in terms of strong reprobation, at least as far as its tone and spirit are concerned. It is in some respects an interesting volume, as it contains a brief history of the literary warfare which has been carried on for the last five years in France between the ultramontanes and the ultra-liberals. Mr. Génin is an able dialectician; though in many parts he has weakened his argument by hypercritical remarks on the style of his opponents. But what we chiefly find fault with, is his scoffing spirit, and his occasional scurrility on subjects which ought never to be spoken of otherwise than with reverence. There is an affectation of jealousy for true religion, but every now and then the cloven foot too evidently appears, to leave any doubt as to the real sentiments of the author.

that they are in communication with the different congregations recently revived in France, and that they exercise very considerable influence over them, especially as there is a provision in the Directorium, which contemplates the infusion of Jesuitism into other orders⁸.

2. The Jesuits form various religious congregations and other associations, the members of which are under an obligation of obedience to the superiors, who themselves are Jesuits. The establishment of such auxiliaries is contemplated by the rules of the order⁹, and as a matter of history it is well known that some of the most popular of these associations owe their existence to the Jesuits. The most ancient of them, the Sodality of the Blessed Virgin of the Annunciation, was, and to all appearance still is, established in all the colleges and seminaries of the order, under the provisions of the *Ratio Studiorum*¹. Another association of Even such a pun as that which he perpetrates on the text, "Qui potest capere, capiat" (p. 203), would hardly come from the pen of an ordinarily religious person; but the flip-pant witticism in which he indulges on the subject of our blessed Lord's address to St. Peter (p. 175, note) is positively and shockingly profane. Neither have we any very high opinion of the sincerity of M. Génin's zeal for moral purity; we cannot understand how any man could make up his mind to the republication, in a book intended for extensive popular circulation, of the frightful obscenities which M. Génin has dragged from their hiding-places in the manuals of Jesuit Theologia Moralis. To obtrude such things upon the public eye is both indecent and mischievous; it infinitely aggravates the evil which it pretends to cure.

⁸ The ninth chapter of the Directorium turns upon the use of the Exercitia for persons who have already irrevocably chosen a state of life, such as married persons, or persons bound by monastic vows. In reference to the latter the Directorium decides, that such persons may not only themselves be made to go through the exercises, but they may be initiated into the method of using them, especially if they be superiors of religious houses, or otherwise in a position in which they would be likely to introduce them into more general use. "And this," says the Directorium, "will be better than if we did it ourselves, lest we should incur the odious appearance of wanting to reform other orders."

¹ See Constitutions, Paris, 1843. App. Note D, where the passages from the Ratio Studiorum are quoted. It appears that the first idea originated with the Jesuit John Léon, who about the year 1560 established "une petite Confrérie de la Sainte Vierge," among the junior classes. The notion soon spread; in 1569, there were congregations of this kind established at Rome, at Naples, at Genoa, and Perugia; and in the same kind, under the name of "The Pious Sodality of the most Blessed Heart of Jesus," was established towards the end of the 17th century, likewise under the auspices of the Jesuits, by the joint efforts of the fanatic Mary Alacoque, and the Jesuit Claude La Colombière, chaplain to the Duchess of York, afterwards queen of James II. Amidst the convulsions which marked the close of the last century, it seems to have languished for a time, but new life was infused into it in the year 1803 by a brief of Pius VII., and it is now in full operation both in this country and in other parts of the world, as an auxiliary of the Jesuits².

1584 Pope Gregory XIII. authorized the establishment of such congregations, in connexion with the central congregation of the church of the Roman College, all over the world, by the Bull "Omnipotentis Dei Salvatoris." "Under the hand of the Jesuits," continues M. Crétineau-Joly, "whose general was the Director in chief of the congregations, they grew mightily, like the grain of mustard seed. They passed beyond the precincts of the college with the young men who entered upon life, and who desired to remain in communion of prayer and remembrance with their masters and their fellow-pupils. . . . They had statutes, rules, prayers and duties in common. There was one great fraternity which reached from Paris to Goa, and from Rome to the obscurest little town. The congregations of Avignon, Antwerp, Prague, and Fribourg were the most celebrated. Some of them consisted of ecclesiastics, military men, magistrates, nobles, citizens, merchants, artizans, and servants, all devoting themselves to good works; all according to their ability assisting the poor, visiting the sick, comforting the prisoners, instructing the children, and endowing poor girls. Tasso and Lambertini, St. Francis de Sales and Fénelon, Alphonso de Liguori and Bossuet, Ferdinand of Austria and Maximilian of Bavaria, the Princes of Conti and of Turenne, piety and genius, the majesty of the throne and military glory, associated together in these assemblies, over which a Jesuit, under the title of Director, presided. . . . This congregation, which embraced the whole world, doubled the moral power of the society of Jesus; patronized by the Popes, countenanced by kings, it went onward to accomplish its object, without taking notice of the attacks directed against its religious practices and its humane purpose. . . . That great Pope Benedict XIV. . . . who had been the pupil of the Jesuits, knew by experience the spirit of the associations directed by them. He had belonged to them in his youth, and on the 27th September, 1748, he published the golden bull "Gloriosæ Dominæ."—Crétineau-Joly, vol. i. p. 342; vol. iv. p. 221—223.

² We have now lying before us the "Devotion and Office of the Sacred Heart of Jesus," published in London, 1821, and containing among other documents an "Indult of his holiness Pope Pius VII., in favour of it, for the use of the midland district;" dated June 27, 1814; and another smaller manual of the same devotion, published at Dublin, 1826, which gives a list of the "Pious sodalities of the Sacred Heart," established in Ireland, beginning with St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, and ending with an &c. In the former there is a short history of the origin and progress of this devotion; with an essay on its nature and effects, in which it is stated that "our amiable Redeemer" being "banished from many places wherein his love induced him to reside, Catholics alone now possess him;" and in reply to the objection why there should be a particular feast in honour of the divine heart of Jesus, and not other feasts also "to honour every part of his sacred body," it is said: "It is of little purpose to dispute whether the feast of the sacred heart deserves to be approved. In a point of this nature, a great part of the Church, authorized by so many bishops, and the holy see, cannot mistake." We should have supposed it would have been quite sufficient to refer to the fact alleged in an earlier part of this singularly profane and superstitious composition, that our Lord himself, having personally appeared to "the holy nun, the venerable mother, Mary Margaret" (Mary Alacoque), complained to her of the ingratitude he met with among mankind, and commanded the feast of his divine

Among the various movements connected with these sodalities, the following deserves particular notice :—

“ At this crisis,” says M. Crétineau-Joly, speaking of the opposition made to the Jesuits and to the bull Unigenitus, during the minority of Louis XV., and quoting the words of Lemontey in his Histoire de la Régence, “ the Jesuits conducted themselves like men inured to storms. They patiently pocketed the various affronts which they had to endure, and relied for an improvement of their condition upon time, upon the faults of their opponents, and upon the corrupt character of the regency, which would without fail bring their flexible doctrine into request. But while they themselves proceeded with the utmost circumspection, they secretly incited the court of Rome and the bishops who were favourable to the bull, to various resolutions. But what admirably characterizes the indefatigable policy of these regulars, is their attempting at that moment an enterprise so daring and so deep, that they had not ventured upon it in the days of their highest prosperity. They conceived the plan of establishing in the garrison towns congregations of soldiers, and the Jesuits would have had the army on their side, if the government had not quickly put a stop to this religious decoy, and rescued military discipline from a corruption so ingeniously devised.”

“ The accusation,” sneeringly continues the unwary advocate of the Jesuits, M. Crétineau-Joly, “ of congregationizing the army was a much greater novelty than the fact itself. The Jesuits had been living under the tent of the soldier in France, from Henry II. to Louis XIV., and in Europe from 1584 to 1715 . . . they had formed a kind of military literature³ . . . they had instituted congregations in the levels of Poland, in the mountains of Bohemia, in the plains of Flanders, and in heart to be instituted, naming the very day on which it was to be celebrated. Pages might be filled with extracts illustrative of the grossness and carnality of this superstition ; we shall content ourselves with one more, detailing the proceedings at the monthly meeting of the association, for the choice of the devotional practices (of which the volume contains a great many), to be followed by each member during the ensuing month. “ Let there be as many billets folded up as there are persons who compose this association : on the inside of each of these must be wrote (sic !) some particular practice. The whole being mixed together, each draws one billet for himself, and engages himself to offer up, on the Fridays of the following month to the sacred heart, that practice which has fallen to his lot.” Piety by lottery ! how characteristic of that state of the heart which it is the object of the rule of St. Ignatius Loyola to produce ! An account of this sodality will be found in an article on the revival of Jesuitism, in No. xlix. of the British Critic.

the military towns and fortresses of France . . . In the session of the council of war of July 19th, 1716, associations of soldiers presided over by Jesuits were prohibited." Créteau-Joly, vol. iv. pp. 482—484.

The same system of enlisting large masses of the people under the Jesuit banner by means of religious congregations is pursued with renewed vigour in the present day; not only are the old sodalities revived, but new ones are established. In the year 1837 was instituted at Paris, in the church of Notre Dame des Victoires, under the patronage of M. de Quélen, Archbishop of Paris, the archi-confrérie du très-saint et immaculé cœur de Marie; and it has since been extended to almost every part of the world.

"There are few dioceses in France which do not reckon, among the faithful, associates of the sacred heart of Mary. This devotion is spreading in foreign lands, it has its associates in almost every country of Europe. Portugal, Naples, and Sweden, alone are not to be found on the register. The new world begins to go forth to the conquest of sinners, under the banner of the holy and immaculate heart of Mary. . . . In all classes of society, both at Paris and at a distance from the capital, the sick are healed, unbelievers brought back to the faith of our fathers, women of the world become chaste, military men blush not to avow that they owe their cure to Mary; youths and philosophers confess their crimes and their errors, and march unabashed under the banner of the Virgin; such are the immense fruits which have been obtained by the archi-confrérie of the most holy and immaculate heart of Mary.

"It appeals also to the charity of its members in favour of the conversion of England; generous appeal for that ancient cradle of religion, that land of saints! And to the ardent prayers of the associates is already, perhaps, to be attributed the propagation of the faith in the three kingdoms, and especially in London, where the number of Catholics so sensibly increases⁴."

For a further account of this association, and of the superstition of the Médaille Miraculeuse connected with it, we refer our readers to a former number of the English Review, (No. vii. p. 147). Up to January 1842 the muster-roll of the sodality amounted to 250,000 members.

Another auxiliary of the Jesuits, of a yet more formidable character, is the "Catholic Association," which has been established both in France and in this country, and which has for its object the restoration of papal ascendancy to its pristine vigour. The book of M. Génin contains some extracts from the programme privately circulated among its members, with a recommendation to "use the greatest discretion; no member being permitted, of his own motion and authority, to communicate or to make known to any one, directly or indirectly, the existence, the means, or the rules of the association." The following passage throws light on its spirit and on the objects it has in view:

"The novice admitted into the association shall swear to combat even unto death the enemies of humanity. Every day and every hour is to be devoted to the development of Christian civilization. He has sworn eternal hatred to the genius of evil, and he has promised absolute and unreserved submission to our holy father the pope, and to the orders of the hierarchical superiors of the association. The director, in admitting him, has exclaimed, 'We have one soldier more!'" Les Jésuites et l'Université, par F. Génin, pp. 266, 267.

Here again we have the characteristic features of Jesuitism. War, war to the knife, against all that is not popery; and blind, absolute submission to the superiors, and through them, to the Pope. Who can doubt that the Catholic Association is either the right hand, or the twin sister of the society of Jesuits? That association is established within these realms, and we know therefore (have we not already felt it?) what we have to expect. Our "heresy," our "Anglicanism," what is it, in the eyes of these men, but an offspring of that "genius of evil," against which they have sworn to fight, "even unto death?"

Besides these, which are of a more general character, there are a variety of associations, formed since the recrudescence of Jesuitism in France, which have for their object to lay hold of particular classes of the population. Of this kind are the Œuvre de la Sainte Enfance, for children; the Association des jeunes économes, for maid-servants; the Association de secours mutuels sous l'invocation their prayers, which they have offered so long,—at times I think night and day, or at the Holy Eucharist, have been heard?" Dr. Pusey's "Letter to a Friend," on Mr. Newman's Apostasy. Church Chronicle, p. 451.

de Notre Dame du Rosaire, a kind of benefit society for the working classes; the Œuvre des Apprentis, for apprentices; and, last, not least, the Œuvre de St. François Xavier, for mechanics and workmen. In all these associations the promotion of the temporal interests of the members, as well as secular instruction, and even amusement, are blended with those religious objects and practices, by means of which the members of these associations are made subservient to the purposes of the Jesuits.

3. The Jesuits convert the schools and colleges over which they have influence or control, into nurseries for recruiting their order by the ablest and fittest subjects, and into channels for the extensive diffusion of their principles. To get the education of all the classes of society into their hands was from the very first one of the principal objects of their ambition, as the surest means of attaining that universal monarchy of mind to which Loyola had, on behalf of the papacy, the daring to aspire. The Constitutions bear witness how deeply this thought was interwoven with the whole of his system.

“Forasmuch,” he says in the introduction to that part of the Constitutions, “as good and learned men are comparatively but few, and most of these of an age to look for rest from their labours, we conceive it to be extremely difficult to increase our society by the accession of such men, seeing how great labours and self-denials its Institute imposes. Wherefore all we who desired its preservation and increase, for the greater praise and the service of our Lord God, thought fit to pursue a different course, viz., to admit youths of promising character and abilities, likely to become good and learned men, fit to cultivate the vineyard of Christ our Lord; also to admit colleges upon the terms set forth in the apostolic letters, both in universities and elsewhere; and in the former case equally so, whether the universities be placed under our charge or no⁵.”—Constit. Pars iv. Proœm. Decl. A.

These scholastic establishments were, however, not to be mere nurseries of the order; the founder looked far beyond that; though he puts forth his ideas cautiously and by degrees, as if he was afraid of the boldness of his own conceptions.

“If there should not be found in the colleges of the society a sufficient number of scholars dedicated to the service of God in it, by promise or intention, it will not be repugnant with our institute to admit, by licence from the general, and for such time as he shall appoint, other poor scholars who have no such intention, provided they labour under none of the impediments” [to admission into the order] “specified in the first part, and from their disposition afford a reasonable hope that they will be good workmen in the vineyard of Christ our Lord, on account of their talents, their proficiency in letters, their good character, suitable age, or any other gifts of God that might appear to render them suitable for God's service, which is all that is required both of those that belong to the society, and of those without its pale. Such scholars, however, must be conformable to the scholars of the society in their attendance upon the confessional, in their studies, and their manner of living; although they be differently dressed, and live in a distinct part of the college, so that those who follow the institute of the society may still remain separate, and not mix with others that are without; at the same time they may have intercourse with them so far as the superior may judge fit for greater edification, and the more effectual service of our Lord God.

"But even though the number of our own pupils should be sufficient, yet it will not be repugnant to our institute to admit scholars who have no intention to enter our society, provided the terms agreed upon with the founders require it (for it will be considered conducive to the end which the society has in view, to admit colleges on such terms), or else upon other uncommon and important accounts. Such, however, must live separate, and not converse, without the superior's leave, with any persons of the society, except those specially pointed out to them for that purpose.

"The expense of poor scholars not belonging to the society will be defrayed by the general, or by his deputy. And sometimes for just causes, there appears to be no reason why the sons of wealthy and noble persons should not be admitted, provided they live at their own charges."—Const. Pars iv. c. iii. Decl. B.

Thus from a seminary of young Jesuits, Loyola rises insensibly to a mixed college, a foundation college, and a college for commoners. But even that falls very far short of his desire to benefit the world by having it under the influence of his system.

"The same motive of charity which leads us to admit colleges, and to maintain in them public schools, for the edification in doctrine and life, not only of our own scholars, but still more of those that are without, may be further extended to undertaking the charge of universities, with a view to still more extensive usefulness, as regards both the sciences taught, and the men who congregate in them, as well as the degrees to which they are promoted; so that they may in other places also teach with authority what they have duly learned in them to the glory of God."—Constit. Pars iv. c. xi. § 1.

Perhaps our readers think that these schools will be very unattractive considering the severe discipline of the Jesuits, their confessions, their restrictions upon the common freedom of intercourse. If so, they are much mistaken. The Jesuit's policy is not so short-sighted. His is an iron grasp after you are caught, but, while he is trying to catch you, velvet is his touch. The schools being conducted by a religious order, and for religious ends, no doubt they will be begun with prayer? Undoubtedly so, as a rule :—

“ Let it be the peculiar study of the teachers to excite the scholars both in their lessons, as occasion may occur, and at other times, to the obedience and love of God, and to the practice of the virtues by which they may please him, so that they may refer all their studies to this one end. And, in order that they may be put in mind of this, let some short prayer composed for the purpose be said at the beginning of the lesson, to which both the teacher and the scholars are to listen attentively with heads uncovered.”—Constit. Pars iv. c. xvi. § 4.

So far so good, but there is no rule without exception :—

“ The prayer is either to be said in such manner as that it may lead to an increase of devotion and edification, or else it is not to be said at all; in which case let the teacher, uncovering his own head, make the sign of the cross, and so proceed.”—Constit. Pars iv. § 4, Decl. c.

But what in the name of wonder should prevent a school prayer from being said with edification, especially when the teacher is a Jesuit? Perhaps the chapter which treats of the matriculation of the pupils, may help us out of the difficulty. In the first instance, it seems, there is free admission for all to the class or lecture rooms; afterwards comes an attempt to introduce order :—

“ When any continue to attend the schools diligently for more than a week, they are to be invited to give their names for entry in the matriculation book; at the same time, such constitutions as they have respectively to observe are to be read to them, and a promise, not on oath, to obey and to observe the same, is to be required of them. If any refuse to make such promise, or to give their names for matriculation, they are not on that account to be excluded from the schools, provided they conduct themselves peaceably and inoffensively; and this may be intimated to them, yet with this addition, that more attention is usually paid to those pupils whose names are on the book of the university.”—Constit. Pars iv. c. xvii. Decl. d.

We venture to say that the wildest educational liberalism of Lord Brougham and Mr. Wyse never contemplated going nearly as far that. We should like to see some poor wight compose himself on the benches of Gower-street College, week after week, without paying a fee (the Jesuits never took any), without taking off his hat, compelling the Rev. Anybody to cross himself, because there is no saying prayers reverently in the presence of such a fellow, and withal, when asked his name by the beadle, refuse to give it. But there was no new police in the days of Loyola, except that which he himself set on foot for the benefit of Christendom.

The reader may laugh; but the plan answered. All the Jesuits had to do, was to take care (which they soon learned to do) not to accept any colleges without sufficient endowments⁶, nor to take in hand more schools than they could find teachers for. With a view to supply these, the second general congregation decreed that a seminary for the education of professors and other teachers should be established in every province⁷. As the society increased in numbers, this difficulty was overcome, a large portion of the members being, agreeably to the vows of the professed members and spiritual coadjutors⁸, which contain a special clause to this effect, employed in the business of instructing youth. Such was their success, that in the year 1710 they had under their management 24 universities⁹, 612 colleges, 157 seminaries, and 59 novitiates, besides 340 residences, 200 missions, and 24 professed houses.

Such are the means by which the Jesuits put themselves in possession of the principal channels of influence over the minds of men; they borrow, as occasion may serve, the names of other orders, and lend to them their spirit; they gather the unconscious masses around them in congregations and sodalities, in which they take them captive by the most debasing superstitions; they erect schools and colleges, where they may pick the choicest spirits to be cadaverized for their own use, and turn the rest loose upon the world to rule and to fashion it in their sense and upon their principles.

Yet even this is not all. There is yet remaining behind the most powerful of all the engines which they have brought to bear upon mankind, not the less powerful, because it acts individually and imperceptibly, the confessional. The direction which Loyola has given to this influence in the hands of his order, is not the least remarkable of the many evidences of deep design and far-sighted calculation, with which his whole system abounds. By a special provision, the charge of confessing nunneries is declined in the statutes¹; partly no doubt to avoid the scandals to which that charge not unfrequently gave rise, but chiefly because the Jesuits would have no time to bestow upon an employment so utterly foreign to the purposes of their Institute. What interest could they possibly take in the contemplative piety of a number of cloistered beings, shut out from all intercourse with the world? If they were to trouble themselves at all with undertaking the spiritual charge of women, it would be those rather who lived in the world, whose influence might be turned to account; but even they were to be despatched as briefly and as dryly as possible². What Loyola sought to attain by means of the confessional, was to get the ear of kings and princes, and of other men placed in high stations, and possessed of extensive power. It was the official rather than the personal conscience that he desired to bring under guidance and control. With that profound penetration with which he scanned the secret springs of human actions, he perceived that the reins of the world's government would be far more securely and efficiently under the command of his order by this indirect rule over the minds of those in whose hands the power was, than if he could have placed members of the society on every throne and in every episcopal chair³. A coldness of calculation, and a firmness of purpose, which none of the actual holders of power will ever be able to attain in his own person, was made to preside over its exercise by the influence of a confessor and spiritual director, who was himself a man without a will of his own, the mechanical exponent of the will of his order, and, by the power of that order, as it was in its palmy days, protected from dependence upon even princely favour or displeasure.

² There is an almost ludicrous anxiety apparent in the instructions to confessors, lest they should get entangled with the spiritual difficulties, and the contemplative propensities of the fair sex, from the toils of which even a Bossuet and a Fénelon found it not always easy to escape. No confessor is to hear the confessions of women, until he has had two years' practice in confessing men. The penitents are to confine themselves strictly to confession, and not to be allowed to talk on spiritual subjects; if they require special consolation or counsel, it is to be administered not in the confessional, but standing or sitting in the open area of the Church; cravings after devotional exercises and instructions are to be satisfied by handing them some book treating of spiritual matters; the same woman is not to be allowed to come to confession twice in the same day; the office of spiritual director is not to be undertaken at all, except by special permission of the provincial, who will only grant it upon these three conditions: that the woman shall be a woman of rank and consequence, that she shall have rendered the society important services, and that it shall be agreeable to her husband or her other relatives. Instructio iii. pro Confessariis, § 1, 3, 6, 9.

It is the fashion with the apologists of the Jesuits, to deny that such ambitious projects ever entered the mind of Loyola. They would have us believe that all he aimed at, was to found an order of self-denying men, thoroughly devoted to the service of their Church, and bound together for that service by the link of absolute obedience; and that the immense political influence which the order no doubt exercised at one time, was the unforeseen effect of its transcendent merits, rather than the result of premeditation and the fruit of intrigue. The answer to this is obvious; the constitutions, which were drawn up by the hand of Loyola himself, clearly contemplate the political importance of the order, and make provision for it.

“Because good is the more divine, the more universally it is diffused, a preference is to be given to those men and to those places, from which, if they be benefited, the same good will reach many others which follow their authority, or are governed by them. Thus spiritual help given to great and public men, (whether they be men of the world, as princes, lords, magistrates, or ministers of justice, or else ecclesiastics, as the prelates,) and to other men eminent for their learning or their influence, is to be accounted of greater importance for this reason, that the good done is more universally diffused.” Const. Pars vii. c. ii. Decl. d.

And again, in the end of the constitutions, where the means of preserving and promoting the well-being of the society are under consideration:

“With the same view, care ought to be taken to preserve the love and good-will of all towards the society, even of those that are without; but especially of those whose good-will or ill-will towards us has great weight in opening to us the door of God’s service and of usefulness to the souls of men, or shutting it against us.”

And in the declaration appended to this passage:

“Above all, the good-will of the apostolic see is to be preserved, to whose service the society is to be more especially devoted; and after that the good-will of secular princes, of magnates, and men in high authority.” Constit. Pars x. § 11. Decl. b.

It is self-evident that the subsequent position of the order, when behind every Roman Catholic throne in Europe there stood a Jesuit confessor, and a Jesuit emissary ascended the backstairs of every Protestant palace, where by any possibility access could be obtained, was nothing but the successful realization of the bold thought which Loyola had conceived, and which his first successors at all events were well qualified to carry into effect. Never perhaps was an abler masterpiece of diplomacy drawn up than the instruction to the confessors of princes by General Aquaviva⁴. High as the confessor is placed, he is kept tightly grasped within the discipline of the order; he is to remain entirely isolated from the court and the men in power; his business is with the prince and with the prince alone. To him he is to speak without reserve; not only on those points which the prince may have revealed to him in confession, but on any point involving the welfare of his kingdom and the interests of religion, which may otherwise fall under his observation. He is never to lend himself to the furtherance of any measure, even though recommended by himself. To him it belongs to advise ad maiorem Dei gloriam; the execution is the prince's own affair. The Jesuit takes the responsibility in the closet, the prince is left to take it before the world. So was James II. of England, so was Charles X. of France undone!

Hitherto we have traced out the character of the society of Jesuits, as it may be gathered from its origin and its constitutions; we have ascertained that the order is in fact a gigantic engine for the maintenance and consolidation of popery in the world; we have seen by what means it recruits itself from the general body of the Romish Church, by what process it reduces its members to a condition of blind instrumentality, and in how subtle a manner it contrives to gain influence in every class of society, and in every country of the world, acting like a leaven of spiritual corruption upon the mass of mankind. In order to complete the portraiture of the society, it remains for us to examine the system of morality, the rule of right and wrong, which the society has adopted, and by which it regulates the actions and directs the consciences of those over whom it has obtained control or ascendancy. This is a subject which has been frequently discussed; from the publication of the famous Lettres Provinciales, down to the recent exposures contained in the works of Messrs. Michelet, Quinet, Génin, and others, the relaxed morality of the Jesuits has been the constant theme of the enemies of the order; and as constantly have the Jesuits themselves pleaded "not guilty" to the impeachment which charged them, not unjustly as the sequel will show, with a total subversion not only of the lofty morality of the Gospel, but even of the commonest principles of right and wrong, recognized

Before going into the particulars of the evidence by which that impeachment is supported, and which has gained less credence in the world than it deserves, on account of the incredible wickedness of the entire system of Jesuit morality, it will be useful to point out the foundation on which that system rests, and the causes from which its corrupt character flows by a kind of moral necessity. The ultimate basis of the Jesuit doctrine de officiis is, strange to say, one in which all Christian men cannot but agree; it is that which meets us at the very threshold of the Exercitia, viz. that all human actions are to be subservient to one great and universal purpose, which is the glory of God; "ad majorem Dei gloriam," is the warrant by which all the doctrines as well as the proceedings of the society are supported. It is in the practical application of this first and unimpeachable principle that the iniquity with which the Jesuits stand charged, is introduced; and that by means of two axioms, which being once granted, all the rest follows as a matter of course. These axioms are, first, that the way to promote the glory of God, is to extend and to strengthen the supremacy, temporal and spiritual, of the Roman See throughout the world; the Romish communion in the most uncompromising form into which ultra-montanism would mould it, being, in the language of the order, synonymous with the kingdom of Christ; secondly, that the most efficient way to propagate and consolidate this papal ascendancy, is to increase the power and advance the interests of the Jesuit society. Of the rules laid down by God himself as to the manner in which He desires to be glorified by mankind, i. e. of the rules of Christian morality revealed in the gospel, the Jesuit doctrine takes no cognizance. The question here is, not what is according to God's own declarations lawful, or acceptable in the sight of God, but what is, in the judgment of the superiors of the order, expedient for the advancement of the society, which is equivalent with the advancement of popery, and that again equivalent with the major Dei gloria. In the judgment, we say, of the superiors of the order, because they are the sole interpreters of the divine will to its members. The conscience of the individual Jesuit is discharged from every responsibility except one, and that is the absolute submission both of his judgment and of his will to the decision of the superior. This principle cannot be enunciated in terms more distinct or explicit, than those in which it is propounded in the Exercitia and Constitutions. In the former we read :—

"That we may be altogether accordant with, and conformable to the Catholic Church, we are bound, if she have defined anything to be black, which to our eyes appears white, in like manner to pronounce that it is black. For it is without doubt to be believed, that the Spirit of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the spirit of his spouse, the orthodox Church, is one and the same Spirit by which we are governed and directed towards salvation; nor is the God who of old gave the precepts of the Decalogue, another than he who at this time instructs and rules the hierarchical Church.”—Exerc. Spirit. Reg. ut cum orthod. Eccl. xiii.

This general principle, inculcated in the Exercitia, is carried out into its practical consequences in the Constitutions. In the preliminary examination for the novitiate, the candidate is asked whether he is willing to submit his judgment on all matters of opinion to the decision of the society, and on all cases of conscience to the verdict of those to whom the society may refer him for this purpose⁵. In the third part of the Constitutions, which treats of the progress of the novices to the membership of the society, the perfect obedience to be yielded to the superior as being “in Christ’s stead to them,” is explained as applying, not to external actions only, but, it is said,—

“They must endeavour to have inwardly a resignation and real abnegation of their own will and judgment; conforming their will and judgment entirely to the will and judgment of the superior in all things (where no sin is discerned⁶), by taking the will and judgment of the superior for the rule of their own will and judgment, in order that they may become the more perfectly conformable to the first and highest

⁶ This reservation of the case of sin intervening is further defined in the passage referred to, (Decl. B. to Pars vi. c. i. § 1.) as applying to a case of manifest sin. In the Summarium the reservation is altogether omitted. But whether omitted, as superfluous, or inserted, as it is in both these extracts, it is manifestly nugatory. The very submission of will and judgment here required, being a blind submission, on the ground that the superior is in the place of Christ, and that the spirit which speaks in the superior, is the same Spirit which spoke in Christ, virtually renders this reservation useless for every other purpose but that of saving appearances. How far the members of the order are in a position to discern “manifest sin” in any thing taught or commanded by their superiors, will become yet more evident on considering the necessary effect upon the conscience of the rule of probability, of which more hereafter. Meanwhile it may not be uninteresting to notice a practical illustration of the working of this principle of blind submission of the will and judgment, which appears in the eighth report of the commissioners of Irish Education Inquiry. It is there deposed to by several witnesses, that the students at Maynooth College declare solemnly upon oath, that they do not believe that the pope has power to dispense with the oath of allegiance, at the same time that they all firmly believe that the pope has the dispensing power. (Compare below, notes 5 and 6, p. 66). The only account the witnesses could give of this contradiction, which one of them confessed “struck the students with astonishment,” was, that as they were ordered by their superiors to take the oath, they felt satisfied that it was correct to take it. See commissioners’ report, Appendix, No. 40, p. 325. No. 45, p. 365, 366. The evidence here referred to will be found also in notes w and x to Dr. Wordsworth’s “Maynooth, the Crown and the Country.”

rule of every good will and judgment, which is eternal goodness and wisdom."—Constit. Pars iii. c. i. § 23; cf. Summ. Constit. § 31.

Again, in the directions by which the admitted members are to regulate their conduct, the great aim upon which they are to direct all their energies and intentions is thus described:—

"That holy obedience may be at all times and in all respects perfect in us, both in execution and in will and intellect, performing with great alacrity and spiritual joy and perseverance whatever may be enjoined upon us; persuading ourselves that all is just, and denying with a kind of blind obedience every contrary opinion or judgment of ours; and that in all things which are ordered by the superior, wherein it cannot be positively shown, as has been said before, that some kind of sin intervenes⁶."—Constit. Pars vi. c. i. § 1. cf. Summa Const. § 35.

The way being thus paved for the introduction of any system of morality which might be propounded in the name of the order, the question arises whether (always assuming in charity that men congregating together under the name of religion would not be villains for the mere abstract love of villany) there is any thing, in the position of the order and in its objects, to induce so signal a departure from the principles of pure morality as can be clearly established from the society's own documents⁷. In answer to this question we must consider separately each of the three classes of men with whom the order has to deal, distinguishing them according to the view which the Jesuit takes, and necessarily must take, of mankind, viz., as the faithful, the unconverted, and the heretics.

With regard to the faithful, the great object of the order is to obtain an extensive influence over them; popularity in the "Catholic" world, but more especially princely favour in the courts of "Catholic" princes, is an essential condition of its success. But that popularity and that favour are not to be obtained by austerity; compromise, and that to a very great extent, is generally required to gain and to keep it. Considering the state of public morals, and especially of those prevalent in kings' courts, during the first two centuries after the foundation of the order, and the necessity in which the order found itself, with a view to the attainment of its purpose, to become, in a far different sense from that in which St. Paul uses the expression, "all things to all men;" considering, moreover, that the father confessors whom the order sent forth on its ambitious missions, were not at such a distance from the sins they witnessed as to be enabled to pass them over in tacit connivance, but that they were brought, and for their own ends it was desirable they should be brought, face to face, in the confessional, with each particular sin, and every individual act of sin, we cannot at all feel surprised that the authors entrusted by the order with the task of providing rules for the guidance of its members in the ticklish business of confession, should have exhausted all the arts and shifts of casuistry in order to avoid inexpedient collisions with a moral corruption which they could not ignore, and cared not to redress. And this became the more necessary, as they had to uphold, in the consciences of those to whom they ministered in the confessional, at once the authority of the sacerdotal office, and the belief in the sufficiency of their absolution. Distinctions had to be invented which should, as much as possible, palliate their monstrous compromise with the grossest wickedness, and at the same time open the door for absolution on easy terms. Thus did the relation in which the order placed itself to the general body of the faithful, necessarily involve a relaxation of the rigid rules of gospel morality, to whatever extent the temper of the times and the circumstances of each case might require it. The consequence is, that while in theory the landmarks by which moral right and wrong are separated, have been altogether removed by the casuistry of the Jesuit moralists, in practice the moral tone of the order has varied considerably, being in better times more severe, and laxer in times of greater corruption; its rule stretching or contracting with wonderful elasticity, in exact proportion to the magnitude of the sins with which it has to deal.

Considerations of a similar nature tended to corrupt the morality of the Jesuits in their intercourse with the unconverted heathen, among whom they went forth to preach the gospel. Here also their object was not so much to win souls to Christ, or to preach the pure doctrine of the gospel, (which indeed they could not do, seeing they had totally lost sight of it themselves), as to extend the power of their own order and the dominion of the Roman pontiff. It was this which betrayed them into those scandalous practices, indignantly reprobated even by the papacy itself, by which the labours of the Jesuits have become infamous in missionary history ; the practice, on the one hand, of suppressing of the gospel whatever might prove an offence and an obstacle to their success, so far even as altogether to conceal the truth of Christ crucified from their pretended converts ; and on the other hand the practice of sanctioning conformity to the grossest rites of idolatry under cover of a mental reservation, by which the worship paid was not directed to the idol, but to the image of Christ, worn secretly within their garments by the double-minded hypocrites who were thus nominally gathered into the fold of the Church.

Lastly, the morality of the Jesuits owes some, and some of the very worst, of its corruptions to the attitude which they have assumed towards all whom they brand with the name of heretics. The perpetual warfare upon which they have entered against these, and which is the very life and soul of the order,—its chief occupation as well as its most prominent feature,—being a conflict, not for the faith of the true Church, which would have constrained them to abide in the truth, but for the ascendancy of the lying Church of Rome, which threw them at once into a position of falsehood, they were compelled by the very necessity of that position to have recourse to weapons such as never could have been employed in the cause of truth and charity. The infamous maxim that as towards heretics all the rules of truth and justice cease to have any validity, that hæreticis non est habenda fides, led, in its practical application to the various circumstances under which the Jesuits had to encounter both evangelic truth and apostolic order, to a system of perfidious treachery beyond all past example, which has for ever identified in all the idioms of Europe the name of the order with all that is disingenuous and traitorous. Nor should we forget, in estimating the influence which this source of corruption must have had upon the general tone of Jesuit morality, that inasmuch as in many of the conflicts in which they engaged against the so-called heretics, they in fact took up arms against the true and living Church of Christ, their sin assumed the awful character of a wilful and deliberate opposition against Christ and against the Holy Ghost, and consequently brought upon them that terrible recompense of spiritual wickedness, the hardness and blindness of a reprobate mind.

Under the influence, then, of these various causes of moral deterioration, was the system of Jesuit morality developed. The first requisite, to make it practically available, was, that it should be sufficiently pliant, affording a choice of rules of every imaginable degree of strictness and laxity. This want is admirably met by the doctrine of probable opinions^a, which the casuists of the order

^a "The authority of one good doctor is a sufficient reason on which to ground the probability of any opinion, so that every one may safely follow it."—Georgii de Rhodes, Disput. Theol. Schol. De Act. hum. Tom. 1. Disp. 2. Qu. 2. S. 3 § 1. Extr. p. 81.

"He acts prudently upon a moral opinion, who is certain that it is probable; and this, in my opinion, no one will deny. For if it is certain that it is probable, it is also certain that it is safe; i. e. that the use of it is safe, and the practice lawful."—Ibid. n. 53. Extr. p. 83.

"When the opinions of the doctors are divided upon any point, we may follow either opinion, even the less safe, and the less probable, provided it be truly probable."—Gil. de Coninck, Comm. ac Disp. in univ. doct. D. Thomæ. Disp. 34. Dub. 10. n. 84. Extr. p. 90.

"Of two contradictory probable opinions touching the lawfulness or the unlawfulness of any human action, every one may follow in practice or in action that which he prefers, although it may appear to the party himself less probable in theory. Of two probable sides of such a question it is also lawful to follow that which is the less safe; that is, the opinion which seems less remote from every kind of sin than the other which is opposed to it."—Paul Laymann, Theol. Mor. Tr. 1. c. 5. § 2. n. 7. Ass. 1, 2. Extr. p. 96.

"Among many probable opinions, can there be one more safe than another? that is to say, can there be a greater danger of committing sin in adhering to one opinion rather than to another? I answer in the negative; for since every probable opinion renders the conscience safe in acting, the agent will not be less safe in following one opinion rather than another. Indeed, when I perceive so many different opinions maintained in matters of morality, I seem to see the brightness of divine foresight; because through the variety of opinions the yoke of Christ is pleasantly borne."—*Ant. "Albeit one opinion be more probable and more safe than another, and seem to you also more probable and more safe, yet it is lawful for you to abandon that opinion in practice, and to follow the less probable opinion, even though you do not abandon your speculative judgment of the matter."—Sim. de Lessau, Prop. dict.; De præc. Decal. c. 1. art. 4. Extr. p. 106.

"Whether it is lawful to follow one probable opinion at one time, and a different probable opinion at another time, upon the same subject? It is probable, for instance, that a tax has been unjustly imposed; it is also probable that it has been justly imposed. May I then to-day, in my capacity as the king's tax-gatherer, exact the said tax, and to-morrow, or even on the same day, in my capacity as a merchant, secretly defraud it? Again, it is probable, that pecuniary compensation may be made for defamation; it is also probable that it cannot be made. May I then to-day, being defamed, demand pecuniary compensation from my defamer; and to-morrow, or even on the same day, I myself defaming another, refuse to make pecuniary compensation for my neighbour's good name which I have taken away? . . . I affirm that it is lawful to do, at pleasure, sometimes the one and sometimes the other."—Thom. Tamburin, Expl. Decal. Lib. i. c. 3. § 5. n. 1, 2, 5. Extr. p. 108, 109.

"There will never be any danger of corruption, if a man follow what shall appear to him more convenient, provided a probable opinion teach it not to be unlawful."—Georgii de Rhodes, Disp. Theol. Schol. T. i. De Act. hum. Disp. 2. Qu. 2. S. 3. § 3. Extr. p. 116.

"We are never more free from the violation of the law, than when we persuade ourselves that we are not bound by the law. For it is rather he who says that the law is binding, that exposes himself to the danger of sinning. For he who has thus have brought to such perfection that any given action which may occur in human life, may be pronounced either a heinous sin, or a trifling offence, if not a blameless act; nor will in either case authorities be wanting to support the decision. By means of this contrivance the individual may at any time persuade himself that that which his passions or desires prompt him to do, may safely be done; and, lest this licence should be interfered with, the confessors of the order are directed to take this doctrine of moral probability for the rule of their determinations in administering the "Sacrament of penance," and that to such an extent as to make the decision of the penitent himself, if supported by a probable opinion, binding upon the confessor⁹. But however persuaded himself, will perhaps sin; but he who says that the law is not binding, cannot sin. . . . Consequently he who follows the less strict and the less probable opinion, cannot sin."—Car. Ant. Casnedi, Cris. Theol. T. ii. Disp. 10. S. 2. par. 2. n. 47. Extr. p. 120.

⁹ "It may be asked whether a confessor may give advice to a penitent, in opposition to his own opinion? . . . I answer, that he lawfully may; because he may follow the opinion of another in his own practice; and therefore he may advise another person to follow it. Still it is better in giving advice, always to follow the more probable opinion, to which a man is ever accustomed to adhere; especially when the advice is given in writing, lest contradiction be discovered. It is also sometimes expedient to send the consulting person to another doctor or confessor, who is known to hold an opinion favourable to the enquirer, provided it be probable."—Joann. de Salas, Disp. in primam Sec. D. Thomæ, T. i. Tr. 8. Disp. un. S. 9. n. 84. Extr. pp. 87, 88.

"A doctor may give advice to a person who consults him, not only according to his own opinion, but even according to the opposite probable opinion of others, if the latter should be preferable or more favourable to the enquirer . . . although the same doctor should be certainly persuaded that the opinion is false in theory, so that he could not follow it in his own practice. . . . And hence it appears that a learned man may give contrary advice to different persons, according to contrary probable opinions; provided discretion and prudence be observed."—Paul Laymann, Theol. Mor. Tr. i. c. 5. § 2. n. 9. Extr. pp. 96, 97.

"If the confessor be the parish priest, or ordinary confessor of the penitent, he ought to absolve the penitent whom he perceives to follow a probable opinion, whether it be in the refusal of restitution, or in doing any other thing which should seem, in the opinion of the confessor, to be sinful, but which the penitent himself thinks lawful."—Gabr. Vasquez, Comm. ac Disp. in prim. sec. D. Thomæ, T. i. Disp. 62. Q. 19. c. 7. art. 6. Extr. p. 93.

"A confessor may lawfully follow the probable opinion of his penitent, and reject his own . . . And this is true, although the probable opinion which the penitent follows should be injurious to another, as in withholding restitution. For although Adrian asserts, that a confessor is bound to advise his penitent to abandon his opinion when it is prejudicial to another, yet it seems not to be said with reason; since the confessor, in the act of confession, is not bound to consider the advantage of a third person; and the penitent will not sin in following the probable opinion, even in withholding restitution."—Nic. Baldel, Disp. ex Mor. Theol. L. iv. Disp. 13. n. 5, 6. Extr. pp. 101, 102.

great might be the latitude allowed in following probable opinions, it would have been of little avail, unless it could be made to appear, that those opinions had some reasonable foundation; it became therefore necessary so to define the nature of sin, as to make every individual act of sin susceptible of palliation by a variety of subtle distinctions. This was accomplished on the one hand by requiring for the establishment of sin, in the true and proper sense, such a concurrence, not only of the outward act and the inward disposition, but of deliberate forethought and wilful design¹, as is but rarely met with; the great majority of transgressions being the result of an evil instinct in man, and of the excitement of his passions; and on the other hand, by admitting as pleas in mitigation of sin a variety of collateral considerations, and among them not unfrequently such as constitute manifest aggravations of the original offence². The character

“If a penitent should err only in the opinion of his confessor, and err perhaps unquestionably, but still pursue an opinion which is truly probable, his confessor is not obliged to reprove him; neither can he deprive him of the right which he possesses of following a probable opinion; and he should be judged according to it by the confessor, if he choose to persevere in it . . . After he has once heard him, he is obliged by his duty to absolve him, if he be in a suitable disposition of mind, provided there be no reasonable cause for delaying absolution; the resolution of adhering to a truly probable opinion, although the contrary opinion may be more probable, or more safe, or more remote from sin, not being in itself a sufficiently valid reason for deferring it.”—Joh. Martinon, Disp. Theol. T. v. de pœnit. Disp. 53. S. 15. n. 190. Extr. p. 103.

¹ “There is no deadly sin in the consent of the will, unless some thought or express consideration have preceded it . . . Therefore for a man to sin mortally, it is necessary that he should consider either that the action itself is evil, or that there is danger of sin, or that he should have some doubt upon it, or at least a scruple. But if none of these have preceded it, his ignorance, inadvertence, or forgetfulness, are accounted perfectly natural and invincible.”—Thom. Sanchez, Op. Mor. in præc. Decal. L. i. c. 16. n. 21. Extr. p. 124.

“As long as the understanding does not reflect upon the wickedness of that which is offered to the will . . . the consent of the will is not a sin, because the sinfulness of it was not known; unless the inadvertence should have arisen from gross negligence, or from a depraved inclination to sin.”—Valer. Reginald, Praxis fori pœnit. L. xi. c. 5. S. 3. n. 46. Extr. p. 125.

“Suarez, Sanchez, and Vasquez, are right, who maintain, that for an action to be imputed unto man for sin, which is sinful and forbidden by some law, it is necessary that the agent reflect, or have reflected upon the sinfulness of the action or the danger of the sin.”—Paul Laymann, Theol. Mor. L. i. Tr. 2. c. 4. n. 6. Extr. p. 126.

“If a man commit adultery or murder, reflecting indeed, but only very imperfectly and superficially, upon the wickedness and great sinfulness of these crimes, however heinous may be the matter, he still sins but slightly. The reason is, that as a knowledge of the wickedness is necessary to constitute sin, so is a full and clear knowledge and reflexion necessary to constitute heinous sin.”—Georg. de Rhodes, Disp. Theol. Schol. T. i. De act. hum. Disp. 2. Qu. 2. S. 1. § 2. Extr. p. 131.

² As for instance drunkenness: “The sins of blasphemy, perjury, and unfaithof sin, which is thus stripped of its intrinsic heinousness, is made to depend mainly upon the circumstances under which it is committed, and upon the view which the transgressor himself takes of it; he may have such particular occasions and motives of sin, he may be so hurried and so thoughtless, as to do away almost entirely with the sinfulness of his action; nay, he may by an obstinate, an "invincible" persuasion in his own mind, however erroneous in itself, turn wrong into right, and sin into virtue³; and lest so precious a privilege should be placed in jeopardy, the confessor is again specially enjoined to be careful how he disturbs his penitent from that salutary state of ignorance which neutralizes the sinful character of his actions⁴.

By dint of these various fallacies and facilities, the casuists of the order, writing under its directions, and subject to its approbation, have managed to accumulate a mass of rules and decisions, one more iniquitous than another, the enormity of which surpasses all belief. They have discarded the first and great commandment, the love of God, in so many words, as superfluous⁵;

fulness, committed in a state of drunkenness, either are not, or are, to be imputed unto sin. I think the former opinion sufficiently probable . . . to be guilty of such things in a state of intoxication is not sin, but the effect of sin."—Ant. Escobar, Univ. Theol. Mor. recept. absque lite sentent. necnon problem. disquis. T. i. De Vit. Capit. L. iv. S. 2. pr. 30. n. 246. Extr. p. 159. Compare also the case of a son murdering his father while in a state of intoxication, note 9, p. 78, several of the cases of Simony mentioned in note 9, p. 76, and the doctrine, that the injustice of his sentence exempts the judge from the obligation of restoring the bribe by which he was induced to pass it, note 1, p. 78.

³ "It is certain that a full knowledge of the wickedness of the sin is required to constitute mortal sin. For it would be unworthy the goodness of God to exclude a man from glory and to reject him for ever, for a sin done without full deliberation; but if the perception of its wickedness be only half-full, there is no full deliberation; and consequently no mortal sin."—Georg. de Rhodes, Disp. Theol. Schol. T. i. De Pecc. Disp. i. Qu. 3. S. 2. § 3. Extr. p. 132.

"So far from being false, I hold it to be most true, that a man sins not, when he does that which he considers to be right, without any remorse or scruple of conscience."—Car. Ant. Casnedi, Cris. Theol. T. i. Disp. 7. S. 3. § 2. n. 149. Extr. p. 134.

"The converse law as it really exists in God, is this: obey an invincibly erroneous dictate of conscience; as often as you believe invincibly that a lie is commanded, lie . . . Let us suppose some Catholic to believe invincibly that the worship of images is forbidden: behold in that case the Lord Christ will have to say: 'Depart, thou cursed, &c., because thou hast worshipped my image' . . . So on the other hand it is no ways absurd to suppose, that the Lord Christ should say, 'Come, thou blessed, &c., because thou hast lied, invincibly believing that I in such a case commanded thee to lie.'"—*Car. ⁴ We cannot defile our pages with any of the turpitudes which under this head are collected together in the Jesuit treatises on moral theology. Suffice it to say, that from the amount which may lawfully (sic!) be taken as the wages of prostitution, to the commission of the most horrible and unnatural crimes, nothing has escaped the disquisition of these casuists, and that the whole subject is handled in the same revolting spirit of palliating, excusing, nay sanctioning sin, which runs through their whole system of morality.

blished the lawfulness of murder, as a matter of probability in some cases, as a matter of certainty in others⁶, more especially in the case of offenders against the papacy and the religious orders⁷; they have given the adulterer leave to slay the injured husband⁸, and declared the son blameless if he kill his father in a drunken fit, allowing him even to rejoice at his consequent succession to the inheritance⁹; they have sanctioned corruption on the seat of judgment¹, and prevarication in the witness the action or omission. . . . As if the mind, in a violent transport of anger or of grief, is so absorbed in the thought of what may be convenient or useful, that it either reflects not at all, or very slightly, upon the sinfulness and discredit of the action: in which case it will either be no sin, or only an imperfect and venial sin; which I think sometimes happens with those who are so completely absorbed in the excess of their sorrow, that they commit suicide."—*Paul Laymann, Theol. ⁹ Father Fagundez (In Decal. Lib. ix.) thus expresses himself: "It is lawful for a son to rejoice at the murder of his parent committed by himself in a state of drunkenness, on account of the great riches thence acquired by inheritance . . . since it is supposed, on the one hand, that the parricide was blameless, as well from deficiency of deliberation caused by drunkenness, as through the absence of premeditation; and on the other, that very great riches would result from this parricide, an effect which is either good, or certainly not bad. It follows that the doctrine of Father Fagundez, which may seem a paradox, is true in theory, although it may be dangerous in practice. . . . He would be mistaken who should infer from what has been said, that for the sake of such results it would be lawful to desire voluntary drunkenness, or to rejoice in it. He would more rightly infer, that it is sometimes lawful to desire a blameless drunkenness, by which the great benefit would be produced. See Caramuel, in Theologia Regulari."—*George Gobat, Oper. "He would not sin mortally who, without deception, but, influenced by his reverence for an oath, and from scruple, should feign to swear, so that the bystanders and the notary might think that he did swear."—Thom. Sanchez, Op. Mor. in præc. Decal. P. ii. L. iii. c. 7. n. 2. Extr. p. 191.

"If there is a lawful cause for using equivocation or artifice in swearing, even though he to whom the oath is sworn should understand it in a sense different from that in which it is understood by him who swears it, and would thus be deceived, a mortal sin is not committed; and sometimes it does not even amount to a venial sin."—Valer. Reginald, Praxis fori pœnit. T. ii. L. xviii. c. 7. S. 1. n. 90. Extr. p. 191.

"Equivocation is nothing more than this, that the swearer understands the words in a sense different from that in which another person receives them. . . . It is not in itself a sin to use equivocation in swearing."—Vinc. Filliucius, Mor. quæst. de Christ. offic. et cas. consc. T. ii. Tr. 25. c. 11. de juram. n. 321, 322. Extr. p. 194.

"With what precaution is equivocation to be used? When, for instance, the swearer begins by saying, 'I swear that,' let him in a low voice insert the mental restriction 'to-day,' and then continue aloud, 'I have not eaten such a thing;' or, 'I swear,' inserting 'that I say,' then again finish aloud, 'that I have not done this or that;' for in this manner the entire speech is most true."—Ibid. n. 328. Extr. p. 195.

⁵ "Princes are bound to obey the command of the pope as the word of Christ; and if they resist, he can punish them as rebellious persons, and if they undertake any thing against the Church and the glory of Christ, he may deprive them of their empire and kingdom, or he may transfer their dominions to another prince, and absolve their subjects from their allegiance which they owe to them, and from the oath which they have sworn; that the word of the Lord, which he spake to Jeremiah the prophet, may be verified in the Roman pontiff: 'Behold, I have put my words in thy mouth. See, I have this day set thee over the nations and over the kingdoms, to root out and to pull down, and to destroy and to throw down, to build and to plant.'"—Alph. Salmeron, Comm. in Ev. Hist. et in Acta App. T. iv. P. iii. Tr. 4. p. 410. Extr. p. 220.

"We are not so timid and faint-hearted that we fear to affirm openly, that the Roman pontiff can, if occasion require, absolve Catholic subjects from their oath of allegiance, if the prince should use them tyrannically, and destroy the true religion; and we add, moreover, that if it be done discreetly and circumspectly by the pontiff, it is a meritorious work."—Jac. Gretser, Vespert. Hæret. p. 882. Extr. p. 256.

"The whole school of theologians and ecclesiastical lawyers maintain, (and it is both certain and a matter of faith,) that any Christian prince, if he has manifestly departed from the Catholic religion, and has wished to turn others from it, is immediately divested of all power and dignity, whether of divine or of human right, and that too even before the sentence pronounced against him by the supreme pastor and judge; and that all his subjects are free from every obligation of the oath of allegiance which they had sworn to him as their lawful prince; and that they may and must, if they have the power, drive such a man from the sovereignty of Christian men, as an apostate, a heretic, a deserter of Christ the Lord, and as an alien, and an enemy to his country, lest he corrupt others, and turn them from the faith by his example and command."—Andr. Philopater, Resp. ad Edictum, S. 2. n. 157. Extr. p. 217.

One might reasonably suppose that the exposure of these enormities must at once and for ever have ruined the character of the order in the estimation of the world, and put an end to its existence in every country in which there is, not to say any allegiance to the gospel, but any the least sense of moral right and wrong remaining. So far from it, the order has survived both the shock of the first exposure, which took place nearly two hundred years ago, and that of a judicial inquiry a century later, which ended in its expulsion from the different countries of the "Catholic" world; and it is now rapidly recovering its ground, not only in popish but in protestant countries, and more particularly in our own land, in spite of the many proofs which constantly transpire, that the order has not in any respect receded^a from the moral atrocities of which it has again and again been proved guilty. By what means, then, have the Jesuits compassed this moral impossibility? By an "invincible" conviction on their part that it is their duty, ad majorem Dei gloriam, to lie, and to continue

"The sovereign pontiff, as the vicar of Christ and the superior of all Christendom, can directly annul and remit any obligation contracted with another upon the faith of an oath, when there is a just cause for it; which remission is no less valid than if it had been granted by the person himself in whose favour the oath was sworn."—Leon. Lessius, de just. et jure, L. ii. de juram. c. 42. dub. 12. n. 64. Extr. p. 242.

"Does a prince, by reason of his apostasy, lose his sovereignty over his subjects, so that they are no longer bound to obey him? No, because sovereignty and infidelity are not incompatible, and may subsist together; but the Church can deprive him of his sovereignty by a decree. Wherefore, as soon as he is declared excommunicate on account of his apostasy from the faith, his subjects are absolved from the oath of allegiance."—Pet. Alagona, S. Thomæ Aquin. Summ. Theol. Comp. Ex. Sec. Sec. qu. 12. Extr. p. 244.

⁷ "When the state is oppressed by the tyranny of the prince, and the people are deprived of the power of assembling, the will is not wanting to abolish the tyranny, or to avenge the manifest and intolerable crimes of the prince, and to restrain his mischievous efforts: as if he should overthrow the religion of the country, and introduce a public enemy within the state. I shall never consider that man to have done wrong, who favouring the public wishes, would attempt to kill him."—Joh. Mariana, De rege et regis Instit. L. i. c. 6. p. 61. Extr. p. 224.

"It is useful that princes should be made to know, that if they oppress the state, and become intolerable by their vices and their pollution, they hold their lives upon this tenure, that to put them to death is not only lawful, but a laudable and a glorious action."—Ibid. Extr. p. 225.

⁸ As regards the political perfidy of the order, and the seditious tendency of its influence upon the people, the present state of Ireland, the attitude which popish priests and agitators have assumed, and the impossibility of bringing the law of the land to bear upon the open outrages committed against the peace of the realm and the lives and properties of individuals, can leave no doubt on the mind of any unprejudiced person, that the principles set forth in the latter portion of the preceding extracts are in full force and active operation to this day; and in reference to all the other heads of casuistry, the hand-books of moral theology recently published in France for the use of the ecclesiastical seminaries, which are mostly under Jesuit management, and all under Jesuit influence, afford more than sufficient evidence that the art "de chicaner avec Dieu," as it has been wittily called, is not likely to be lost for want of cultivation.

to lie, in spite of whatever evidence may be adduced against them. With the world at large they content themselves to ridicule, as preposterous and beneath contempt, the notion that a religious order, so austere, so influential, so respectable as theirs, should give countenance to such corruptions. With those who will not be pooh-pooh'd in this manner, who appeal to the law and the testimony of the order itself, they reply—1. That the evidence against them is made up of misquotations and garbled extracts. 2. That the society is not answerable for the opinions of its individual members; and 3. That the principles which have been made the subject of such violent accusations against them, are not exclusively maintained by the Jesuits, but were inculcated in the schools of “Catholic theology,” long before the order of Jesuits came into existence.

As regards the first of these apologetic pleas, it is undoubtedly true that the Jesuits have in a few instances succeeded in making out a case of verbal inaccuracy against their opponents; but the instances are so few, and in themselves so trivial, that considering the numberless quotations, the accuracy of which is undeniably established, the main question is not in the least affected by them; nor should it, in connexion with this point, be forgotten that the Jesuits have, by the most barefaced denials and the most impudent falsehoods⁹, repeatedly endeavoured to throw dust in the eyes of the public, and have by this mode of defence afforded a further illustration of that total disregard of truth which is so prominent a feature in their system of morality.

With regard to the second plea, the constitutions of the Jesuits themselves witness against them; they subject all the writings of members of the order to the strictest scrutiny, and prohibit, under severe penalties, their publication otherwise than

by permission of the general¹, so that the society is to be held, most justly, responsible for all the statements of its members; especially when it is considered that whatever may be at any time the employment of any individual Jesuit, is so by the express sanction, if not by command, of his superior; so that no individual Jesuit can write, much less publish, digests of moral theology without the commission and the sanction of the order. The occasional disclaimers put forth by the Jesuits in their controversial and apologetic writings are therefore perfectly valueless, as the conduct of the society on more than one occasion clearly proves. Thus, for instance, when their doctrine on regicide had caused a general outcry against the order, when Henry III. had been murdered, and the life of Henry IV. attempted by Jean Chastel, when the gunpowder plot had been discovered in England, when two members of the order had suffered the extreme penalty of the law, one in Paris, the other in London, as accessories before the fact, not without abundant proof of treason in both cases, General Aquaviva thought it expedient on the 6th of July 1610, to publish a stringent decree, for the suppression of the regicide doctrines². Notwithstanding this, however, care was taken to place the names of both Jean Guignard³ and Henry Garnett in their martyrology, and to have the latter even canonized; and to this day the manuals of theologia moralis, composed by Jesuits and their copyists, propound, under the title tyrannicidium, the infamous doctrine which places the life of every sovereign who is considered as an enemy of the order and of the Roman Church, at the disposal of any fanatic who may be bold enough to stake his life ad majorem Dei gloriam. But the most striking proof of the countenance given by the society as a body to the infamous moral teaching of its casuists, is the fact, that in the only two instances in which the machinery which the society possesses for controlling the general in the exercise of his despotic power, was brought into operation, the opposition of the society against its chief was provoked by attempts to restrain the laxity of the moral theology of the order. The first of these cases was that of Goswin Nickel, who, alarmed probably by the effect which the Lettres provinciales produced, set himself to reform the order, but was removed from power, and Oliva substituted in his place⁴. The second was that of Gonzalez, who, while yet in a private station, wrote in opposition to the lax casuistry of the order; but his work was condemned by five examiners, and suppressed by order of General Oliva. Having, after the death of Oliva's successor, been himself raised to the generalship, chiefly through the influence of Innocent XI. who shared his sentiments, he succeeded with much difficulty in obtaining from the XIIIth Congregation an ambiguous decree⁵, allowing the advocacy of stricter opinions, and he afterwards managed to get his book printed. But he had a narrow escape of sharing the fate of his predecessor Nickel; the assistants threatened to proceed against him, with a view to his removal, which would certainly have been effected but for the powerful support which Gonzalez received both from the pope and the Emperor.

¹ "Let us be of the same mind, and, as much as possible, all speak the same thing, as saith the apostle. Let no difference of doctrine be permitted, neither by word of mouth in public sermons or lectures, nor in written books, which shall not be allowed to be made public without the approbation and consent of the general; who shall cause them to be examined by at least three persons of sound doctrine and clear judgment concerning the matter."—Const. P. iii. c. 1. § 18.—P. iv. c. 6. § 16. Decl. O.—This rule was subsequently enforced by severe punishments, by removal from office, degradation, and even corporal chastisement, and that not only in the persons of the authors, but of their superiors, for not preventing them.—Congr. xi. Decr. 32.

As regards the third allegation, that the casuistry so much reprobated was not invented by the Jesuits, however serviceable it might be to them in controversy with Romish writers, it is evident that not only it does not weaken our argument, but that it greatly strengthens it; for what we maintain, and have been endeavouring to demonstrate, is precisely this, that Jesuitism is nothing else than popery in a more concentrated and more effective form.

We have completed the task we had proposed to ourselves; we have examined the Jesuit order by the aid of its own documents, of the facts authenticated by itself. We have sought for its origin in the necessities of the times in which it rose; we have seen the complexion it wore in the mind of its founder; we have traced the process by which a number of living souls are emptied of their life, and strung together into one huge skeleton of dead members; we have ascertained by what subtle devices it lays hold of the living masses of humanity around it, for the purpose of clothing itself with their flesh, and making them move according to its will; we have laid bare the fearful iniquity of its moral code, to the utter abrogation of all laws, human and divine, whenever they may militate against the interests of the order. We have found Jesuitism to be a gigantic power, but a power whose strength is death, whose breath is corruption; a power raised up with Satanic skill, for the purpose of destroying Christ's life in individuals and in nations, and enthroning the lie of Rome in the hearts in which the Spirit of truth should reign.

To follow the movements of this body through the three centuries of its past existence, what an interesting task! But that we must, for the present at least, forego. We have room only to notice one leading fact, which runs through the history of the order in all parts of the world; and that is, that none of their counsels ever prospered, none of their works ever endured, for any length of time. Their power rose now here, now there, and at one time over the whole earth, to a fearful height; but suddenly, as if smitten by an invisible hand, it fell. It has risen again, with giant strength, and, we doubt not, it will again prepare the way for its own downfall.

What, then, have we to fear? Nothing, as far as regards the ultimate success of the Jesuit system, or the ultimate triumph of the papal power, whose tool it is. But every thing as regards the treasures of family and national life, the treasures of Apostolic Christianity, with which the goodness of God has hitherto blessed us. If the Jesuits be permitted to strike their fangs into the life of our Church and nation, we are undone. "A fire devoureth before them; and behind them a flame burneth."

The enemy is closing in upon us; he has already gained a firm footing in many a place where our defences once stood. The Jesuit is going to and fro in the land, walking up and down in it. In masked ubiquity he surveys the field and watches his opportunity. He has found him a place in the senate-house and at the council-board; he agitates Ireland, and keeps England in uneasy suspense; he stirs up the hatred of France against us, and sows in our colonies the seeds of discord and disloyalty.

He has even ventured to go a step further ; he has begun to teach in our schools, and to influence our pulpits ; the quiet of our universities, the peace of our Church is disturbed.

There is but one chance of escape for us. The nation must be aroused from the slumber of a treacherous prosperity, from the dreamy visions of a false liberality. We must fall back upon the ancient creed of our land ; we must again believe, in good earnest, as once we did believe it, when the blood of martyrs attested the nation's faith, that there is but one God, and one Lord, and one Spirit, and one holy truth ; that that truth is a principle of life to be held sacred in the nation's conscience, and to be worked out boldly in the nation's life. We must not with hands uplifted only, but with hearts devoted, appeal to Him who alone is mighty to save, and say : "Awake, awake, put on strength, O arm of the Lord ; awake, as in the ancient days, in the generations of old !"

ART. III.—1. Ægypten's Stelle in der Weltgeschichte; Geschichtliche Untersuchung in fünf Büchern, von CHRISTIAN CARL JOSIAS BUNSEN. (The position of Egypt in the history of the world; an historical enquiry in five books, by C. C. J. BUNSEN, Doctor of Philosophy and of Law; Honorary Member of the Royal Academy of Science of Berlin, and of the Royal Society of Literature of London; general Secretary of the Archæological Institute of Rome.) Two first books, and two first sections of the third, with a supplementary volume of Records. 8vo. Hamburg, 1845.

2. Operations carried on at the Pyramids of Gizeh in 1837, by COLONEL HOWARD VYSE; three volumes. 8vo. With large Atlas in folio. London, 1840—1842.

THE object and the age of those stupendous masses of masonry, which lie between the Libyan desert and the Nile, a little before the waters of the latter are parted at the summit of the Delta, have been alike subjects of controversy. With respect to their use, as many different opinions have been entertained as with respect to that of the round towers in our sister island. Not content with the simple statement of Herodotus, that they were the sepulchres of ancient kings, various writers have imagined that their recesses were designed for the celebration of mysteries, like those of Eleusis or of Samothrace; or, more absurdly still, that they were intended for astronomical observations, or for granaries; their immensity being accounted for by the wish to give employment to an idle people, or to squander superfluous treasures. Again, as to the period of their erection, Herodotus was informed, if he did not misunderstand his Egyptian authorities, that it was subsequent to that of the conquests of Sesostris and of the building of the principal temples. Calculating from his statements, the reign of Cheops, the reputed builder of the largest pyramid, commenced about 900 B.C. Diodorus Siculus takes a similar view of the matter; and so in our own times does Mr. Sharpe. On the other hand, the fragments of Manetho, preserved by Africanus and Eusebius, represent the pyramids as the work of very ancient kings, who reigned long before those by whom the greater part of the other monuments in existence were constructed. Most of the recent writers on Egyptian affairs have adopted this opinion ; and, without pretending to assign the exact dates of the reigns of their builders, have placed them 2000 years, at the least, before the Christian era.

We have now before us two works, which go a great way towards settling all disputed points connected with these wonderful monuments. No well-informed person will now venture to deny that the pyramids were designed to contain the remains of the kings who built them, or of members of their families ; or that these kings were among the earliest of those who have left any monuments. The author of one of these works pretends to have ascertained the exact dates when their several builders reigned ; and they are such as, he has no hesitation in avowing, are irreconcilable with the chronological statements of Moses. On this point, we will before we conclude state our reasons for dissenting from him ; but we will first lay before our readers some of the interesting facts relating to the pyramids, which have been recently brought to light ; and before we do this we must say something respecting the sources from which we derive our information.

The latter of the two works which we are reviewing, contains the record and the result of a series of operations at the pyramids, scientifically planned with a view to ascertain in the most accurate manner the dimensions and the internal structure of each of them, and executed with a liberality as to expenditure, which is, we believe, without a parallel in modern times. We understand that these operations cost Col. Howard Vyse no less a sum than 10,000*l.* ; a princely contribution, indeed, for a private individual to make to a public object ! Not content, however, with merely giving this large sum of money, although he had secured the services of an eminent engineer, Mr. Perring, to conduct his operations, he remained on the spot, himself, an entire year, exposed to the manifold inconveniences and annoyances of Egyptian life.

The other work which we have before us, if it does not record the labours of its author, in personally exploring the monuments of Egyptian antiquity, shows that he has been a most attentive observer of what others have done in this way. To the results of their researches he has applied that architectural skill, which had previously enabled him to throw so much new light on certain antiquities of Rome ; and he has thus made discoveries at home, which escaped those who had laboured in Egypt. This, however, is but a small part of what Chevalier Bunsen flatters himself that he has accomplished in the work before us. From the short sketch of it which we are about to give, it will be evident that one of higher pretensions has seldom been undertaken. Most of our readers will probably agree with us in thinking, that much of what the author proposes to execute in his fifth book is beyond the power of uninspired man. It is not here alone, however, that we think he will be found to have failed in his undertaking. We regard his Egyptian chronology as having no foundation in reality. While we look up to him as furnishing interesting information respecting individual kings and their monuments, we are not disposed to acquiesce in the order in which he arranges these kings; and still less can we believe in the authenticity of the dates, which he assigns with so much confidence to the commencements of their several reigns. Our reasons for incredulity on these points will be given in the latter part of this article. We will not now detain our readers any longer from an account of this most interesting and important work.

It consists, or, we should rather say, it will consist, should it ever be completed, of five books, bearing the names of five literary heroes. The first book, which is introductory, bears the name of NIEBUHR, whom our author venerates as the best model in the department of historical criticism. By naming it after him, he tells us that he would be understood as expressing his conviction, that "the true seal and sure attestation of genuine criticism lies not in the annihilation, but in the recognition and restoration of history."

This book consists of six sections. The first three of them are introductory to the three following books, which treat of the period that commenced with Menes, who, according to our author, first reigned over the entire of Egypt, in 3643 B.C. From that time downwards, he affirms that the Egyptians had a chronology, as far, at least, as respects the leading events of their history, which is more to be depended on than that of the Romans, until long after the building of the city, or than that of the Greeks, until long after the origin of the Olympiads! These sections treat respectively of the historical tradition and investigation of the Egyptians; of the investigation of the Greeks concerning Egyptian chronology; and of the tradition and investigation of the Jews, and the investigation of the Christians of different countries, concerning Egyptian times. It may be right to apprise our readers that, in the language of Chevalier Bunsen, the tradition of the Jews includes those historical books of the Old Testament which were written in the times of which they treat. Their investigation comprehends all which relates to times anterior to the writer. Under this head he places the book of Genesis, the discourse of St. Paul at Antioch in Pisidia, and the Archæology of Josephus; and he rejects, almost contemptuously, the supposition that either tradition or investigation was ever guided by Divine Inspiration. The remaining sections of the first book treat of the language, the mode of writing, and the mythology of the Egyptians ; or, to translate our author's titles more literally, of the fashioning of their speech, their writing, and their gods. They are introductory to the yet unpublished, and we believe unwritten, fifth book, in which these guides are to be followed in tracing back the human race from Menes to its origin.

The second book, ERATOSTHENES, contains a restoration of the chronology of the Old Egyptian kingdom, that which preceded the invasion of the Shepherds ; which is chiefly founded on the catalogue of Theban kings, attributed to the author whose name it bears. It is in this book that our author describes the different pyramids, arranging them in the order in which he supposes their builders to have reigned.

The third book, MANETHO, of which only a part is yet published, treats of the middle and the new kingdoms ; those concurrent with, and subsequent to, the domination of the Hykshos or Shepherds ; and here, as in the preceding instance, the name given to the book is that of the author on whose statements the chief dependence is placed. The part of this book which is already published contains a restoration of the chronology of the entire period ; but no monuments belonging to any part of it are yet described ; and, consequently, there is no test within our reach, by which the soundness or unsoundness of the alleged restoration can be ascertained. This will be a sufficient reason for noticing very briefly this portion of our author's work.

The fourth book is to be called CHAMPOLLION ; and will contain a connected view of the chronological results obtained in the two preceding ones, together with verifications of them derived both from the heavens and from the earth ;—from the determination of “ infallible astronomical epochs,” and from historical synchronisms. The discoveries of Champollion in the former department are spoken of as most brilliant and important, though scarcely known out of France. We presume he alludes to his alleged discoveries respecting the epoch when the year of 365 days must have been introduced. If so, we can have no hesitation in pronouncing them to be altogether visionary. His arguments are no other than what were put forward in the first instance, from recollection of his lost papers, by M. Biot ; and they have been refuted in a paper “ On the years and cycles used by the ancient Egyptians,” contained in the 18th volume of the Transactions of the Royal Irish Academy.

The first four books are only preparatory to the fifth, which is looked forward to as their end and their reward. . In it he proposes to consider questions of a higher order. He will first endeavour to trace the early history of Egypt, in connexion with that of the human race, through those old times before chronology existed, the sole records of which are language and mythology ; —those two poles, as he fancifully styles them, by the alternate electrical action of which the knowledge of a people is formed. He will then descend through the long succession of centuries, the existence of which he supposes that he has ascertained ; exhibiting the history of the world in connexion with, and as a developement of, that of Egypt. The hero after whom this wonderful book is to be called is SCHELLING ; who, in our author's judgment, laid the foundation of the true philosophy of history.

From this brief analysis of Chevalier Bunsen's work, which we have felt it due to him to give, we pass to the subject which he appears to us to have treated in the most satisfactory manner ; we mean THE PYRAMIDS.

Every one has heard of the three pyramids of Gizeh, which, in ancient and in modern times alike have been classed among the wonders of the world. Most persons are, we presume, aware that, though the most remarkable, these are by no means the only pyramids in Egypt ; but few know the precise number remaining, or are acquainted with their arrangement in groups. Mr. Perring reckons thirty-seven, exclusive of those at Biahmoo, of which only a few stones remain together, and which are believed to have supported statues ; and of that called El Koofa¹, one of those built in steps, which lies far to the south of the others. Of these thirty-seven the most northern is situated in N. lat. 30°2'20". This is the ruined pyramid of Aboo Rôâsh, of which only the base is remaining. The most southern is at Illahoon in N. lat. 29°16'56". A bird's flight from one of these extremes to the other would be between 54 and 55 English miles. The most northern group is that of Gizeh ; so called from a village opposite Cairo, where travellers who visit these pyramids usually land. The name signifies "the passage." The Egyptians commonly pronounce the initial letter hard ; but Arab scholars consider it incorrect to do so. This group is four or five miles to the south of the ruined pyramid already mentioned, and something more than five miles from the village ; it contains six small pyramids in addition to the Three. The next group to the south of this, distant from it near six miles, is that of Abouseer, which includes four pyramids. Two others stand between the two groups, and are called after the neighbouring villages of Zowyet el Arrian and Reegah. The Sakkara group commences about two miles to the south-east of the preceding, and contains eleven pyramids, scattered through a space of about two miles long. Further south are the pyramids of Dashoor, five in number. From the most southern pyramid of this group to the great pyramid at Gizeh is about twelve English miles, in which are reckoned thirty-one pyramids, of different sizes, and in different degrees of preservation. They lie to the west of the site of Memphis. At Lisht, twelve miles south of the Dashoor group, there are two pyramids; and another near Meydoom, about the same distance south of these. Between this and the pyramids of Lisht, near a village called from them El Abrám, or the Pyramids, there were formerly the remains of two pyramids, which Mr. Perring has omitted. He has also omitted two in the Sakkara group, besides the Mustamet el Faroon, or "Pharaoh's throne," which he does not consider to be a true pyramid. And, indeed, we have observed in the accounts of the older travellers mention of several others, chiefly small ones, all trace of which seems now to have passed away. Most of the Egyptian monuments are, we grieve to say, rapidly disappearing; the stones of which they are built being used in modern buildings, or burned for lime. The most southern pyramid, that of Illahoon, stands in the opening of the Lybian hills which communicates with the Fayyoom; and about seven miles from this, up the valley to the north west, is the pyramid of Howara or of the Labyrinth. Chevalier Bunsen pronounces nine of these pyramids to have been intended for kings' wives or children; namely, five in the Gizeh group, two in that of Sakkara, and one in each of those of Dashoor and Abouseer. On the other hand, one at least—probably two—of the Gizeh pyramids contained the bodies of two sovereigns. The great pyramid also of Sakkara, which has several apartments in its interior, may have been the tomb of many kings; though it seems more likely that it was intended only for the builder and his wives. It would appear, then, that at least thirty Egyptian kings were buried in pyramids;—how many more there may have been it is impossible to say, but it is not likely that there were many; as the destroyed pyramids were for the most part too small to have been intended for kings.

The classification of the pyramids in groups is of some importance; as Chevalier Bunsen justly supposes that the kings of one family would have their sepulchres contiguous. If, therefore, one pyramid in a group can be assigned on satisfactory grounds to a king whose place in the series is known, a very probable conjecture may be formed respecting the builders of other pyramids in the same group, especially if they be similar to it in material and construction. This is particularly the case with the three large pyramids of Abouseer; and from observations made on the direction of an ancient causeway, it appears that the third or southernmost of these pyramids was erected before the second. The first and second of these pyramids exhibited the names of their builders on stones in their interior; and when these kings shall have their places in the royal succession ascertained, it will be easy to determine, with a high degree of probability at least, by whom the third of these pyramids was built, and by whom the foundations of a pyramid in its neighbourhood were laid; who was doubtless one of the same family, with a very short reign. As yet, however, we cannot think that the places of the builders of these pyramids are known. Chevalier Bunsen in the body of his work supposes the first or northern one to belong to Biyres, the ninth king of the third dynasty; but in his prefatory postscript he refers it to Sirius, the sixth king of the same dynasty. The middle pyramid he gives to Rasosis the eighth king of this dynasty. Of course, he assigns the southern one to Chnubos, the seventh king.

As we expect to be able to show that the Chevalier's system of arranging these ancient kings is fundamentally and altogether erroneous, we need not bring forward any special reasons for objecting to this particular part of it. We believe, however, that it would not be difficult to prove that the Abouseer pyramids were built subsequently to the Gizeh group; which is the reverse of what our author supposes. If the true order of these ancient kings shall ever be completely ascertained, it will probably be by help of the inscriptions on the tombs of individuals who held offices under them. Some tombs contain the names of several kings; and the order of their succession may be indicated by the inscription in which they occur. Unfortunately, those who have examined these tombs have hitherto been for the most part satisfied with copying the royal shields without the accompanying hieroglyphics. Mere names of kings are of no value; nor can much dependence be placed on a series of royal names, if each be followed by the characters signifying prophet. The tenant of the tomb would in such cases be styled the prophet of the kings named; but this appears not to indicate a sacerdotal office, which he held under those kings when living, but one which he held in reference to them when dead and venerated as gods. A number of such kings might, therefore, be arranged, not in the order in which they had reigned, but in that of the appointments of the individual to their several prophetships. If, however, the name of the king under whom an individual lived be directly stated, or if it can be inferred from his having given his children names, of which his master's name formed a part; and if he be also stated to have been prophet of one or more kings, we can safely conclude that the latter must have preceded the former. It is understood that the Prussian expedition under Dr. Lepsius has collected a large number of inscriptions from tombs, containing royal names, which have been accurately copied. They will probably, when published, furnish data by which the royal succession may be determined to a great extent. In the meantime it is useless to indulge in conjectures.

Of the pyramids which we have enumerated, some are of stone, and some of brick. It is natural to suppose that one or other of these kinds was in use before the other, and was superseded by it. If so, one would think that the positive statement of Herodotus, grounded on an inscription which existed in his time on a brick pyramid, would suffice to establish the claim of the stone pyramids to priority of erection. "Do not despise me," the brick pyramid is supposed to say, "in comparison with those pyramids of stone, for I am as much superior to them as Jupiter is superior to the other gods. Poles were plunged into the lake; of the mud which adhered to them bricks were formed; and thus was I made." To us it appears evident that the superiority here claimed for this pyramid over the stone ones consisted only in its material. It was not absolutely larger, or better built than they, but it was superior to them as a work of art, as its builder thought, or pretended to think, on account of its being made of a material more difficult to obtain. We should infer from this that the pyramid here spoken of was the first that was made of brick, and that most, if not all, of the stone pyramids had been previously built. Such, however, is not the construction put upon the passage by Mr. Perring and Chevalier Bunsen. Mr. Perring, supposing the northern brick pyramid of Dashoor to be the pyramid in question, understood the inscription as implying that this was a finer object than the stone pyramids of Dashoor in its immediate neighbourhood, which in point of fact it is. To the other pyramids he did not conceive that any allusion was made. We think Mr. Perring decidedly wrong, first in his interpretation of the inscription on the pyramid of Asychis; and secondly, in identifying the pyramid of Dashoor with it; but we must admit that he has advanced a consistent hypothesis. Not so with the Chevalier. Agreeing with Mr. Perring in other points, he represents the stone pyramids of Dashoor to be the tombs of kings subsequent to Asychis, or, as he calls him, Sasychis. To what stone pyramids then can he suppose that the author of the inscription alluded? The notion of this being one of the earliest of the pyramids appears to us inconsistent with all the facts of the case. It has the remains of a temple in its front, such as the Ethiopian pyramids have, and as no other Egyptian pyramids has. Consequently, as the supposition that Egypt was colonized from Ethiopia, or originally derived its arts from thence, has been shown by Dr. Lepsius to be without foundation, we are led to place the erection of this pyramid subsequently to the conquest of Ethiopia, which took place in the reign of Osortasen I. With this the sculptures found in the interior of the pyramid agree, being such as are met with on monuments of the twelfth dynasty; and with this the fragment of a royal shield, found along with them, also agrees. Chevalier Bunsen has completed it, so as to form a name, which, he says, may be read Sessercheres-Mares, and may thus represent at the same time the Sasychis of Herodotus (as restored) and the Mares of Eratosthenes; but we think that the Chevalier's restored shield has very little of the appearance of a genuine Egyptian shield; and we have no doubt at all that the fragment in question made a part of the prænomen, either of Amenemhe II., or of Osortasen III.—probably the latter, as it is the exact conclusion of both of these.

It is probable that this error in respect to the brick pyramids would have been avoided, if the chamber in the pyramid of the labyrinth had been reached by Mr. Perring. Unfortunately that gentleman was prevented by circumstances from opening this pyramid; he only ascertained that the pretended opening of it by M. Malus was a hoax. This person had stated in conversation that he had opened it, and found in its central chamber a salt spring. Soon after this, before he drew up a written account of his proceedings, he fell sick and died. The consequence has been that this idle tale has gained credit, and has been copied into one of our best modern accounts of the pyramids. Chevalier Bunsen, in the body of his work, supposed that this pyramid was the tomb of Smenteti, whose name has been corrupted to Pemphos, partly by the informants and partly by the copyists of Eratosthenes; the process of corruption is traced by our author through six intermediate forms! He was the fourth king after Menes, and this was the oldest of the pyramids that have been preserved. After this was printed, an account came that Dr. Lepsius had penetrated into this pyramid, and found in its chamber, as the name of its tenant, that of — Amenemhe III. Accordingly, in his prefatory postscript, our author has had to remove this pyramid from the very first in the chronological series to the very last! Osortasen III., to whom we would ascribe the northern brick pyramid at Dashoor, was the father of this king; and we entertain little or no doubt that most, if not all, of the remaining brick pyramids are the tombs of the immediate predecessors of these kings. Independently of the testimony of Herodotus, and of the surer evidence of the hieroglyphics found within the two pyramids mentioned, when we consider that all the brick pyramids which remain appear to have been coated with hewn stone, the hypothesis that these were older than the stone pyramids appears to us exceedingly improbable.

Chevalier Bunsen, in acknowledging that the pyramid of the labyrinth was the tomb of Amenemhe III., remarks that he does so in defiance not only of the statement of Herodotus, but of that of "the surest authority in historical matters, Manetho, who relates in plain terms, that 'this king built the labyrinth in the Arsinoite nome for his grave.'" We cannot see the inconsistency of this statement with the facts. We take it for granted that Manetho considered the labyrinth to include its pyramid; just as, when we speak of a church, we include its steeple. Pliny expressly describes the labyrinth as comprehending (complectens) a pyramid. The Chevalier's description of the labyrinth is most interesting and satisfactory. We have only room to say that he considers it to have been of a quadrangular form, containing twenty-seven palaces, fourteen on one side and thirteen on the other side of a wall, which ran from end to end. Each palace contained an immense number of apartments. Twenty-seven was the number of the nomes of Egypt; and each nome had a palace appropriated to it. His description is accompanied by a drawing, made by Mr. Arundale, in accordance with his views. As to the object of this stupendous work, our author shall speak for himself. Vol. II. p. 338.

"The labyrinth has evidently the character of a national building, common to the whole of Egypt. In it the élite of every district assembled together; the most respectable members of the military and agricultural castes, with the priests and priestesses of the temples. There were the great festivals celebrated; there were the most important suits decided, and quarrels made up². To such a building an historico-topographical exhibition is very well adapted. The labyrinth was thus in reality a civic, religious, and political sanctuary; a museum, in which the exploits of the kings and the history of each district were represented, and without doubt explained by hieroglyphical inscriptions. Each district found there presented to the eye the history of its princely families, and the monuments that they had erected: and consequently the leading features of both particular and general Egyptian traditions."

labyrinth, Chevalier Bunsen considers it probable that twelve of the palaces may have been repaired by the twelve chiefs whom he represents as having built it. He thus, according to his notion of the duty of an historical critic, expressed in a passage that we have already quoted, endeavours to recognize the portion of truth which lurks in a statement that is proved to be in the main false. It seems to us far more likely that the whole story of the dodecarchy was a fable, improvized by the Egyptian cicerone of Herodotus ; who was ignorant of the real history of the labyrinth, but who must needs say something about it, in order to satisfy the inquisitive Greek. Diodorus took the story from Herodotus, embellishing it by the addition of the number of years that the twelve kings ruled ; but there is no trace of any such government, either in Manetho or on the monuments.

What appears among the most remarkable circumstances connected with the labyrinth is, that modern travellers should have so completely overlooked it. Dr. Lepsius said that “he could scarcely believe his eyes when he read the accounts of previous travellers. Where they saw formless hillocks and a few walls, he found at once several hundred chambers, some of them with roofs, corridors, and remains of columns.” Belzoni, who, uneducated as he was, surpassed most persons in power of observation, is the only traveller who appears to have been impressed with the importance of these ruins³. He had no idea, however, that they were the remains of the labyrinth, which he vainly sought for on the shores of the Birket el Kerún.

From the mention of the labyrinth it is an easy transition to that of the lake of Moëris, on the shores of which others, as well as Belzoni, have supposed that it should be found. The subject of this lake is discussed at great length by Chevalier Bunsen, and we must say a few words respecting it. Till within the last few years two propositions were esteemed incontrovertible ; one, that the lake now existing to the northwest of the Fayyúm was the lake of Moëris ; the other, that it was asserted by ancient writers that this lake, receiving the waters of the Nile during the inundation, sent them back to the valley of the Nile during the dry season, so as to water its more elevated parts. It was shewn by Sir G. Wilkinson, and subsequently by Mr. Perring, that this was physically impossible ; the level of the lake, the Birket el Kerún, being above a hundred feet below that of the Nile. Are then the statements of ancient writers in respect to this lake to be rejected as fabulous ? Such was the general opinion, when in 1843 M. Linant, inspector-general of bridges and roads, under the Viceroy of Egypt, published a memoir on the subject. He affirmed that the lake of Mœris, spoken of by ancient writers, was not the Birket el Kerûn, but an artificial lake, formed on the most elevated part of the Fayyûm by enormous dams, of which he pointed out here and there existing remains. Chevalier Bunsen has now proposed a different theory. He denies the second of the above propositions, in place of the first; maintaining that the ancient writers did not mean to say that the lake of Mœris sent back its waters to the valley of the Nile, but only to the upper part of the Fayyûm. He brings forward several strong objections to M. Linant's theory; among others, he asserts that in tracing the dam which formed the northern boundary of the lake, Dr. Lepsius had found that it did not include the two pyramids, mentioned by Herodotus as supporting statues. The site of these pyramids seems unquestionable; as travellers in the sixteenth century mention that a portion of a granite colossus then stood on one of the pyramidal pedestals, of which the remains are now visible at Biahmoo. M. Linant will, of course, reply to these objections; and we shall then be better able to judge of their validity. The greatest difficulty, however, in the way of admitting his theory appears to be its physical impossibility. It would appear from Chevalier Bunsen's statements—we have not seen M. Linant's own work—that the highest ground in the Fayyûm was 90 feet above the level of the lake, while the Nile is said to be at least 130 feet above the same. If so, it must be 40 feet, at least, above the supposed lake of M. Linant; and surely this is inconsistent with the notion that the waters of the latter could flow to the former. As to the Chevalier's own theory, it appears to us that it cannot stand a moment. To convey the water from the Birket el Kerûn, up an open canal, to water the high grounds 80 or 90 feet above it, is obviously impossible. If the Egyptians could have accomplished this, they might surely have carried it the remainder of the way into the valley of the Nile, where the gradients (to speak in railway phrase) would have been comparatively good. This is one of the cases in which ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte.

With respect to the description given by Herodotus, Chevalier Bunsen rightly distinguishes between what "the Father of History" saw, and what he heard. He supposes, and we think justly, that he went to the labyrinth, and no further. From the high ledge of rock, on which it is situated, he looked down on the Fayyûm, the present upper terrace of which was then under water. According to the Chevalier's theory, this visit must have been paid at the time of the inundation; according to M. Linant's, it might have been at any time. Herodotus saw the colossal statues of Mœris and his queen, on pedestals, in the midst of the water; but all the rest of his statement he derived by hearsay from his guide, whom, the Chevalier says, he misunderstood, but who, it appears to us, misinformed him. There are three of his statements, which according to both theories are absolutely false, and which could not have been misunderstood; the guide must have stated what was not the fact. We allude to the statements, that the basin which contained the water was excavated; that the earth which was dug out of it was carried away down the Nile; and that the pedestals of the colossi were 400 cubits high, 200 above and 200 below the water. These statements are unquestionably false; but both Chevalier Bunsen and M. Linant contend for the truth of the rest of this witness's testimony. The former thinks that Herodotus misunderstood him, as if he spoke of the water before him; whereas he was speaking of the Birket el Kerûn, of which he told the truth. This, however, is inconceivable. The pyramids supporting colossi were in the water which lay before Herodotus. The guide told him that they were in the lake of Mœris, and were the statues of him and his wife. No confusion of the two lakes could, therefore, have existed. Besides, the guide's story could not be true of the Birket el Kerûn, as we have already shewn. That lake is in the lowest part of the basin of the Fayyûm; and however the water of the Nile may have been kept from descending to it by dams, it is clear that, when it once reached it, no sluice, or combination of sluices, could bring it back from it. According to M. Linant's view of the matter, Herodotus rightly understood his informant as speaking of the water which lay before him; and his statements respecting it, with the exception of the three above mentioned, were true. We will not offer a positive judgment on the subject; but certainly we incline to the opinion that the dams discovered by M. Linant, by whomsoever made, were of the same nature as those in other parts of Egypt, and had no other object than to keep up the waters of the inundation, so that the high lands might derive more benefit from it. The construction of these dams, by which the benefits of the inundation were extended to the upper part of the Fayyûm, which thence derived its name, (Copt. Phiom, the sea) was the work of Mœris, whoever he was; whether, as Dr. Lepsius supposes, the builder of the labyrinth, or an earlier king, as Chevalier Bunsen still thinks, or the Mœris of the eighteenth dynasty, as others have supposed. The water, at the end of the inundation, was drawn off by sluices, but we are disposed to regard the statement that it returned to the Nile as a falsehood told to Herodotus by his guide.

mentions this lake, and its supposed use; and although we agree with Chevalier Bunsen that most of the others merely copied from him, the testimony of Strabo, who visited this part of Egypt, must not be overlooked. It is very evident that in Strabo's time, the aspect of the Fayyûm was the same, or nearly the same, as it is at present. The lake, which he calls that of Moëris, was unquestionably the Birket el Kerûn; and he describes it as a natural lake, accounting for its existence, as for that of other natural lakes, by the action of the sea in former times. He sailed, too, along the canal which now exists from Ptolemais, the modern Ilahûn, past the labyrinth, to Medînet el Fayyûm. M. Linant would perhaps explain this by saying, that the real lake of Moëris had disappeared since the time of Herodotus; its dams having been allowed to perish, or having been destroyed by Ochus; and that the canal from the labyrinth to Arsinoë, had been constructed through its former bed. But is it certain that Strabo states on his own authority that the water flowed back from the lake of Moëris? May he not have drawn up his description of Egypt after he had left it, combining his personal observations with what he found stated by previous writers? and may not this statement have rested on the testimony of Herodotus? We have some doubts, whether our author gives the true meaning of Strabo, in respect to the double termination of the canal. He makes this to be on the west, at Arsinoë, and at the lake; but Strabo may have meant that the canal joined the Nile in two places, above and below the Heracleopolitan island.

We return to the pyramids. The first in point of workmanship, as well as the largest, are in the Gizeh group, and of these it has been supposed hitherto that the largest was the oldest. Chevalier Bunsen denies this. His arguments in favour of the contrary supposition are rather numerous than cogent. "It is natural," he says, "to suppose that the younger brother and surviving successor should have endeavoured to surpass his predecessor." Probably, however, it would be more natural to suppose that a king who came to the throne in his old age, or, at any rate, when far advanced in life, should have despaired of equalling his predecessor, who had commenced his pyramid when young, and had probably found it begun by his father. The construction of the larger pyramid is peculiar; and therefore it was, in the Chevalier's opinion, probably later. The principal peculiarity in its construction was, however, evidently occasioned by its being intended to receive the bodies of two kings; and if the superior antiquity of the second pyramid be contended for, on the ground of its more nearly resembling the older pyramids of Abouseer, we reply by denying that those pyramids are older than the Gizeh pyramids. The Chevalier founds another argument on the manner in which Manetho mentions the building of the great pyramid. If he had agreed with Herodotus, he thinks he would have said, "Whom Herodotus called Cheops;" whereas he says, "Who built the great pyramid, which Herodotus says was built by Cheops." These words appear to the Chevalier to imply that Manetho considered Herodotus to have been mistaken, and that, therefore, it was the younger brother who built the great pyramid. There is no doubt that Manetho considered Herodotus to have been mistaken; but we cannot see the necessity of attributing to him any other mistake than that he referred to a late period, a little before the Ethiopian conquest, works which Manetho ascribed to the fourth dynasty. It appears to us that the position of the second pyramid furnishes a strong presumptive argument that it was the later of the two. The diagonals of the two pyramids are in one line; consequently, the position of the pyramid which was built last was regulated by that of the other, while the builder of the first was at liberty to choose for it the ground that he liked best. Now it is scarcely to be supposed that the builder of the second pyramid would have selected for it its actual site, had he been at full liberty. It stands on an irregular mass of rock, which had to be cut down, in some places to the depth of thirty feet, to form a level for it. On the other hand, if the great pyramid were first built on the level ground, that was best suited for such a work, we can easily conceive that his successor would choose the rocky ground to the south-west, rather than that in any other direction, in order that his pyramid, by being on a more elevated base, might not be overtopped by its larger neighbour.

These arguments, however, on both sides are merely presumptive ones; the Chevalier principally relies on the direct evidence furnished by the name of the builder of the great pyramid, which was found by Colonel Vyse in its interior. This name was found painted on the stones, as if it had been done by the quarrymen, not engraved, or forming a part of a regular inscription. Still, there can be no reasonable doubt that it is the name of the king who built the pyramid; and the question then arises, is it the name of Cheops or of Cephren? Chevalier Bunsen contends for the latter; but his mode of dealing with the name is a violation of all the established principles of etymology. The names of the earlier Egyptian kings, and the first names of the later ones, consisted in almost every instance of the name of the sun, Râ, or Phrâ (which Major Felix long since identified with the Pharaoh of the Scriptures), and a simple or compound epithet or qualification. The name of the king in question, who was probably the very earliest king of whom we have any cotemporary monument, differed from these, in that it consisted of the name of another God, Nu, Nemu, or Nev (for the latter part of the name is uncertain), with a qualification. It was Nev-Khuv, or Khuv-Nev, i. e., "Nev, the director." In the majority of instances, where the name occurs on the stones, it is thus written in full; but once it is written simply Nev, and once simply Khuv⁴.

Where the king is referred to in monuments of a later age, the name of the god is, we believe, in all instances omitted. So it is in a tomb at Benihassan, of the age of the twelfth dynasty, and on a gold seal, in the possession of a gentleman at Cairo, of the age of the twenty-sixth dynasty; both of which mention a town, or district, in Egypt, which was called after this king. It is in this form, therefore, that we should expect to meet the name in Herodotus; and accordingly, he gives Χεοψ, which is as good a representation of Khuv as we could expect to meet in Greek. The final sibilant is, as in all similar cases, an addition. It is uncertain whether the true reading of Diodorus be Χεμμις or Χεμβης. In either case, the initial letter is correct; and the Egyptian labial, to which the Greeks had no equivalent, is expressed by labials. Manetho gives Σουφίς, pronounced Shooφis; which, again, is intended for the same name Khuv; the Kh of the early Egyptians being in course of time softened down into Sh, as in a host of other instances. We will now describe the process, by which Chevalier Bunsen converts this name into Kephren. He takes for the name of the king Nev, in which form, as we have seen, it once occurs; and, observing that Egyptian royal names in general included the name of the Sun, he adds that name here, so as to form Nev-re; thus combining the names of two gods, in a manner which is without a parallel. Genuine Egyptian names of kings consist of one name of a god, and one epithet or qualification. Nevre, however, is not Kephre; and the letters N and K have never hitherto been considered so near akin, as that one of them could pass into the other. Many persons would have been checked by this difficulty; but it is easily surmounted by that etymological skill, or hardihood, which discovered in Pemphos a corruption of Smenteti ! “The Greeks and Romans in their transcriptions of Egyptian words were in the habit of prefixing a guttural to N. Nephre would thus become Knephre ; and this might be contracted into Kephre.” In other words N might be converted into K. But experience shows that Kn is not contracted into K. The combination occurs at the commencement of many English and German words ; and we are pretty sure that the Chevalier cannot name one, in either language, in which the sound of the N has been dropped. In order to expose completely the tissue of mistakes which Chevalier Bunsen has made on this subject, we have only to show who the king was that Herodotus calls Kephren. This is easily done. It is the king whom the Chevalier calls Schafra. His name is properly Kâv-râ (or Khâv-râ, the power of the initial letter being not quite certain) that is “Ra (or Pharaoh) the ruler,” a name very similar to that of his brother. Accordingly Manetho gives the name of Suphis to both of them, which represents only the verbal noun, or participle, that was one element in the name ; while Herodotus and Diodorus call the second brother Kephren and Chabryes, taking into account the divine name Ra⁵, which he bore, and which his brother did not bear. This Kâv-râ or Schafra has a title on cotemporary monuments, which the Chevalier rightly translates “der Grosse der Pyramide,” “the Lord of the Pyramid ;” but he appears to reason on it, as if it signified “of the great pyramid.” According to his view of the matter, this king completed the great pyramid, which the king whose name is found in it had begun ; for he shows that it is highly probable, if not certain, that this pyramid was not the work of one king, but was intended to contain the bodies of two. We should rather think that Cheops, whose name is found in it, was the king who completed it ; and that it was begun by some unknown predecessor, probably his father. According to the original plan of the pyramid, the underground chamber, to which the first entrance passage directly leads, was the tomb of the builder. The two upper chambers were, according to Chevalier Bunsen, originally designed to be parlours, such as every pyramid contained, in addition to the chamber where the body was deposited, and where a funeral feast was probably laid out. To take this view of them he was in a manner constrained by his hypothesis of the name found in the upper chambers being that of the first builder of the pyramid. We, who think that it was that of the king who completed it, are relieved from the improbabilities connected with this hypothesis. We suppose that the original builder merely commenced the work, and that the upward passage and the apartments to which it leads were designed by the king who completed it. It is not unlikely, too, that he increased the dimensions of the pyramid, so that each side should contain eight times that Egyptian measure of length, which the Greeks translated $\pi\lambda\acute{\epsilon}\theta\rho\omicron\nu$, as being nearly equivalent to their own measure so named.

⁴ The name is sometimes apparently written Khuvu, the name of the last letter, vu, being substituted for the letter itself. Of this fundamental principle in Egyptian writing, it appears from Chevalier Bunsen's section on that subject, and from the very defective and erroneous alphabet which he has consequently given, that he is completely ignorant. The hieroglyphical name of the river Euphrates, which consists of eight signs, would, according to his system, be read in four syllables, Pu-ha-ru-ta (!), instead of in one, PHRaT, as in Hebrew. The Egyptians, having no F in their language, expressed its sound by PH. What the Chevalier imagines to be an F was really an English V, or a German W.

Mr. Perring has contributed to Chevalier Bunsen's work an appendix "on the original measures of the pyramids;" in which he endeavours to assign the number of cubits which each linear element of each pyramid was originally intended to contain. The idea is a good one, but a fundamental error has vitiated all the operations. Mr. Perring has assumed that the Egyptian measure above mentioned contained 56 cubits instead of 55; he has consequently made the side of the great pyramid 448 in place of 440 cubits; thus making the cubit about a quarter of an inch less than the truth. The incorrectness of this estimate appears from two wholly independent considerations.

In no Egyptian measurements which we possess is the number 56 or its multiples connected with the cubit; but 55 and its multiples are so repeatedly. Thus, in the Anastasi papyrus No. I. col. xiv., a building is mentioned, which was 330 cubits in length by 55 in breadth; and in the following column, an obelisk is mentioned of the height of 110 cubits. Mr. Perring was, doubtless, unaware of this fact; but we are surprised at his overlooking the argument which we are about to notice. He himself has pointed out the remarkable relation which exists between the side of the base and the height. The half-side is to the perpendicular height, as the slant height to the whole side; or, at least, this proportion holds good as nearly as it is possible that it should do. Now the lowest integral numbers which satisfy this condition are 40, 25, and 32. They are in the required proportion; and the half of 40 forms with the other two numbers a triangle which is very nearly right-angled. Its angle is in point of fact $89^{\circ}56'33.5''$, which the Egyptians could not have distinguished from a right angle. Of these integral numbers the numbers of cubits contained in the side of the base, the interior and the slant height of the pyramid must have been multiples. The Egyptians, with their scanty knowledge of mathematics, could not have applied this proportion to the fractional numbers which Mr. Perring's hypothesis assumes; but, if we take 440 cubits for the length of the side, we have 275 for the altitude, and 352 for the slant height; all integral numbers and all multiples of the "khe," tree or rod, which contained eleven cubits⁶. The true length of the cubit was then about 1.736 foot, in place of 1.713, as assumed by Mr. Perring. This agrees with the length obtained by supposing the height of the floor of the king's chamber in the great pyramid, (138.75 feet), to be eighty cubits; and it agrees pretty well with the length of the cubit at the ancient Nilometer at Elephantine, which is still preserved. This gives 1.729 foot. The Babylonish cubit, too, which was, doubtless, the same as the Egyptian, was, according to Böckh, 1.737 foot. It is very true that some of the ancient Egyptian cubits preserved in museums are shorter than this; but why may we not suppose that they were made so intentionally, with a fraudulent object?

The third of the Gizeh pyramids is ascribed by Herodotus and Diodorus to a king Mycerinus, or Mencherinus; but the former mentions a report that it was built by a female named Rhodopis. By Manetho it is assigned to a queen Nitocris, who, according to him, was the last sovereign of the sixth dynasty. Herodotus mentions her, and relates her unfortunate end, but says nothing of her pyramid. Chevalier Bunsen has reconciled these apparently inconsistent statements, pointing out the portion of truth which is contained in each. The history of this pyramid, is, indeed, a most extraordinary one. The work of two sovereigns, it was twice rifled, at remote epochs, before its mysterious recesses were penetrated by Col. Vyse. Mr. Perring furnished the data, by which the secret of the pyramid was rendered discoverable; but it was the Chevalier who made the discovery. As this pyramid, though the most interesting of all, is the least known, many of our readers being probably still ignorant of the fact that it has been opened; we will give a full account of it from the work of Chevalier Bunsen, vol. ii. p. 166, &c.

"This is called by the ancients, 'the most costly and magnificent of all the pyramids;' and such it still appears to be, even in its ruins. Its coating was of granite up to a considerable height; and its interior exceeded even the first pyramid in beauty and regularity of structure. Its magnitude was, indeed, much less. It did not cover quite three English acres. The base of each of its faces measured only $345\frac{1}{2}$ feet⁷; its altitude was only 218 feet (it is still 203) and its slant

⁷ The text of our author says $354\frac{1}{2}$, and so Mr. Perring seems to have estimated height was 278 feet 2 inches, now 261 feet 4 inches. But in the boldness and massiveness of its foundation it surpassed all the pyramids, no less than in beauty. In order to obtain a level surface for it to stand on, instead of taking away the rock, which rose more than ten feet at the west above what it did at the east, two courses of enormous blocks were built under the lower side, which is particularly depressed at the north-east. At that angle, this underwork extends considerably beyond the base of the pyramid, so as to supply the place of the pavement which encircles the pyramid, and which was, doubtless, originally coated with finer materials. There is this peculiarity also in the plan of this pyramid. It was originally built in several steps, rising perpendicularly, and decreasing towards the top ; the form of a pyramid being given to this kernel by filling up the void spaces between the steps."

"The solution of the enigma lies, we believe, in a circumstance, which the fidelity of the discoverers of the interior has reported to us ; though it could not have had the great value in their eyes, which it has acquired for us. . . . Thirteen feet above the base, a passage which descends at an angle of $26^{\circ}2'$, of the usual breadth and height, and 104 feet long, now leads into the interior of the pyramid. The granite coating ceases on the rock being entered 28 feet 2 inches down. From the termination of this passage a horizontal one, slightly inclined towards the end, leads to a great chamber. On the way to this, it passes through an antechamber, 12 feet long, 10 feet 5 inches broad, and 7 feet high. Its walls are coated with white stucco, which divides them lengthwise into narrow stripes. Through the whole length of this chamber, the road was blocked up with great stones, which kept both the doors closed. This obstacle being surmounted, three granite portcullises, at short distances from each other, check the progress of the intruder. These defensive arrangements announce that a sanctuary is near. The chamber itself is actually a tomb, 46 feet 3 inches long from east to west, 12 feet 7 inches broad, and originally 12 feet high. The bottom was covered with a pavement, which has been torn away, so that the uneven surface of the rock is now exposed. In this destroyed pavement and in the rock a sarcophagus was fastened, the dimensions of which corresponded to those of the sarcophagus in the great pyramid. Mr. Perring found in the chamber several pieces of red granite, which he recognized as the remains of the sarcophagus ;—no doubt the fragments which remained after its destruction. We must necessarily assume that this destruction was the work of the Egyptians themselves, in order that we may account for the total disap-

it. A calculation from the altitude and the slant height shows, however, that the two last figures have been transposed. Here again we have 200, 125, and 160 cubits for the three dimensions, not 206, 128, and 165.56, as Mr. Perring makes them.

pearance of the sarcophagus. The plunderers of the pyramid would perhaps have broken the sarcophagus ; but they would not have been at the pains to break the hard mass into small pieces, so that it could be carried away through the entrance. This would have given considerable trouble, which for them would have been quite useless.

“The plan, however, does not end here. Seventeen feet from the east end there appears in the pavement the mouth of a descending passage. This extends at an angle more than 33 feet ; and then proceeds horizontally 10 feet further, to the tomb of Mycerinus. Along this way, also, every thing was done to prevent an entrance, and to render the carrying away of the sarcophagus impossible. The descending passage is 4 feet 9 inches high, and the same in width ; but for half its height it is confined by projecting banks on both sides, so as to be scarcely three feet across ; and this space is again stopped up by blocks fixed in the wall for 16 feet 9 inches in length. Lastly, just before the horizontal part is reached, a granite portcullis stops the way. . . . The tomb itself is coated with blocks of granite, two feet and a half thick. Artificially formed iron cramps seem to have connected these together, and fastened them to the rock. Two of them were found, and are preserved in the British Museum. This tomb is not so spacious as the upper one. Its length from north to south is 21 feet 8 inches, and its breadth 8 feet 7 inches. Blocks of ten feet and a half long, bent together, form the roof ; their under surface is cut away, so as to form an arch. The height at the gable is 11 feet 3 inches. . . . In this tomb Col. Vyse found the sarcophagus of Mycerinus, the Holy. . . . This venerable work was unfortunately lost on its way to England, on the coast of Spain. It was of a dark brown basalt, blue in the fracture, very beautifully wrought. The stone was evidently first sawed, and then carefully polished. The exterior was very elegant, architecturally divided, somewhat in the Doric style.”

The cover, in fragments, was found under about three feet of the rubbish in the great chamber, and near it pieces of a coffin with the remains of Mycerinus.

The latter have fortunately escaped the fate of the sarcophagus, and are now in the British Museum. The body is not wrapped in byssus, as in later times, but in coarse woollen cloth. Some have questioned the genuineness of the body from this circumstance ; but the inscription on the cover of the coffin should remove all doubt. It is in two vertical columns, and has been thus translated by Mr. Birch :—“Osirian (blessed) King Men-ke-u-ra, of eternal life, engendered of the heaven, child of Netpe (Rhea), offspring of the mother (of the Gods) [beloved by Seb (Saturn)]. May thy mother Netpe (the Neith of heaven) extend herself over thee by her name of Spreader of the heaven ! presenting to thee the God, destroyer of thy impure enemies, O King Men-ke-u-ra, the everliving.” The middle of both columns is wanting, and part of the above is translated from a text supplied by the conjecture of Dr. Lepsius. Of the meaning of the greater part, however, there can be no question.

“Here, then (our author proceeds), we have come from the entrance into the undoubted tomb, and have reached the resting-place of Mycerinus. But is it by the way that Mycerinus reached it? All the passages through which we have wandered (as far as the great chamber) are, as Mr. Perring’s sharp eye observed, chiselled from within outwards. How, then, did Mycerinus come into the pyramid? Originally, it is certain, by the upper passage. At the top of the so called great chamber, that is, the upper tomb, a horizontal passage terminates; and this is joined to one which descends at the same angle at the entrance. It terminates at the beginning of the rock. If it were to extend further, to the original face of the (present) pyramid, its lower part would terminate about thirty-three feet above the ground line, or twenty feet above the under, now the only, entrance. Now this upper entrance is chiselled from without inwards, as the under one is, on the contrary, wrought outwards, by a person who was already in the pyramid. This may be accounted for in two ways, Mycerinus either built the pyramid, as we now see it, or a smaller one, of which the present upper passage was the entrance. On this supposition, it terminated about as much above the ground line as the present entrance does above that of the present pyramid. In the other case, the stopping up with masonry of the entrance, which had been opened through the rock, can only be accounted for by supposing that the original plan was abandoned, with a view to build a larger pyramid. It is thus that Mr. Perring explains it. Such a change of purpose, however, in respect of the most skilfully constructed of all the pyramids is certainly very improbable. Now Manetho says expressly, ‘Nitocris built the third pyramid.’ Diodorus ascribes its building to Mycerinus, but he adds that ‘he did not complete it.’ Herodotus and Strabo also had heard of the building of the third pyramid by this celebrated queen.”

The Chevalier argues that Nitocris was the Rhodopis of these writers. This name signifies “the rosy-cheeked;” and in the Armenian version of Eusebius, the remark of Manetho respecting Nitocris is thus rendered; “she was the most beautiful of women, yellow, with rosy cheeks.” The conclusion then at which he arrives is this, Mycerinus built a small pyramid in the heart of the present third pyramid. Its dimensions are said to be about 180 feet along the base, and 145 in altitude; but it strikes us that these cannot be stated with any confidence, from the uncertainty that must exist as to what was the horizontal line of the original pyramid, and how high above it the entrance was. The two chambers in this pyramid were intended, the one for his tomb, the other for the parlour, or anteroom, that generally accompanied it. Some generations after his death, Nitocris enlarged the pyramid, taking the outer chamber of Mycerinus for her tomb. Whether she was buried in it or not is uncertain. If she was, the Egyptians, to whom she had given mortal offence, violated her tomb and carried off her coffin; if she was not buried there, they wreaked their vengeance on the empty sarcophagus that had been intended for her; but they spared the tomb of the holy Mycerinus. Long after this, about 1240 A.D., the pyramid was opened again, avarice being now the inducement in place of enmity. Edrisi, cited by Col. Vyse (ii. 71, note) states that, shortly before he wrote, a company of adventurers undertook the opening of the pyramid.

“After they had laboured in the pyramid for six months with pick-axes in great numbers, hoping for treasures, they at last discovered a long blue vessel. After they had broken off its cover, they found nothing but a body, beside which lay some gold plates, on which were inscribed unknown characters. From the proceeds of these, each man received a hundred dinars.”

With respect to the destruction of the pyramids in general, Chevalier Bunsen says (p. 149.):

“The history of the destruction of these wonderful works shows that curiosity and a thirst for hidden treasures induced the old khalifs to open an entrance into them; the first of these was probably Mam-mún, the son of Harún Al Raschíd. Afterwards, under Saladin, the pyramids, and especially their coatings, were regularly used as quarries. The wantonness and destructive propensity of the Mamelukes completed the work of destruction.”

We now come to consider the time at which the pyramids were built. Chevalier Bunsen seems to have no more doubt of the dates of the accession of these sovereigns, whose tombs they were, than of those of the Emperors of Germany, or the Kings of France. Mycerinus, according to him, began to reign in 3173, B.C.; and reigned for thirty-one years. Nitocris reigned six years, commencing in 2973 B.C. And so with the other kings of the Old Kingdom; Menes, the first of them, beginning to reign in 3643 B.C. Our readers will naturally wish to know the grounds on which he assigns these dates, so strangely at variance with the received chronology. The Chevalier informs us very candidly (vol. ii. p. 3,) that his chronological system is independent of the discoveries recently made. It stands or falls with the philologico-historical investigation from which he deduced it. It is founded on the fragments of Manetho, and on the catalogue of Theban kings attributed to Eratosthenes. Our readers do not need to be told that these sources of information have been long open to the learned. They have been carefully studied by a great number of individuals; many of them, we will venture to say, quite as capable of forming a right judgment of them as the Chevalier Bunsen; and, we will add, some of them quite as free as he is from that belief in the veracity of Moses, by which he complains that his predecessors have been fettered. Several of these have published their respective theories as to the mode in which statements that appear at first sight very discordant might be reconciled. Others, perhaps the ablest, have, after a full investigation, abandoned the attempt to reconcile them; being convinced that the truth could never be elicited from statements so corrupted as these appear to be.

The genuineness of the catalogue of Eratosthenes is exceedingly doubtful. If genuine, there is no doubt that it has been corrupted to an enormous extent. Chevalier Bunsen admits that the names of the kings have been in many cases completely altered. We have given one instance, already, of his restoration of the original text from the corrupted MS. One other such will probably suffice to satisfy the curiosity of our readers. Where the MSS. read Στροϊχος υἱὸς αὐτοῦ, ὃ ἐστὶν Ἀρης ἀναίσθητος, he affirms that Eratosthenes wrote Τοιχαρῆς υἱὸς αὐτοῦ, ὃ ἐστὶν Ἡλιόθετος. He admits, again, that the interpretations of the names are not to be depended on. He thinks that many of them have been corrupted from what Eratosthenes gave, and that many others were in the first instance erroneous, the informants of Eratosthenes having given him fictitious derivations, somewhat in the style of Dean Swift's. Yet, while he thus admits that both the names and their interpretations are proper subjects for the boldest inner criticism, strange to say, he claims exemption from it for the numbers of years which the thirty-eight kings are said to have reigned. Hitherto the numbers found in MSS. have been considered peculiarly liable to be erroneous; but the Chevalier will not allow those in the pretended list of Eratosthenes to be disputed! Now, though it may perhaps be admitted that the numbers given by the Chevalier are the same which Syncellus wrote in the eighth or ninth century, we should like to know how it can be proved, or shown to be at all probable, that they were those which Eratosthenes wrote a thousand years before him. If the catalogue were genuine, we think it would be entitled to very little credit, from the corruption which it must almost necessarily have undergone; we regard it, however, as a contemptible forgery.

The fragments of Manetho possess much higher claims to authenticity; and if they had reached us in their original form, they would be of great assistance to us in restoring the old Egyptian chronology ; so far back, at least, as the seventeenth or eighteenth century before Christ. In their present state, however, we cannot think them to be of much value. We entertain no doubt that Manetho copied from Egyptian sources of considerable antiquity. From comparing the best preserved portion of his work, the account of the eighteenth dynasty, as given by Josephus, with the list of the twelfth dynasty, as restored by Dr. Lepsius from the fragments of the Turin papyrus, we cannot doubt that he made use of an Egyptian manuscript, similar to that of which the fragments are now in the Turin museum. The date of this manuscript corresponds with the close of his second volume. Probably, therefore, he extracted from this work the contents of his two first volumes, while he collected those of the third from various later authorities. But, admitting this, we seek in vain for any proofs that the Egyptians had any authentic dates, in the eleventh or the twelfth century before Christ, by which they could determine the succession of their kings for more than a few centuries back. Dynasties of fabulous kings might have been invented then, just as well as at a later period. Among their names those of the more ancient kings that were preserved by tradition might be introduced ; and, to give greater plausibility to the imposture, the number of years, months and days that each king reigned may have been set down. We ask for proof that the earlier dynasties of Manetho were, in their original state, any better than what we have described. Chevalier Bunsen tells us that “the oldest writings of the Egyptians were contained in their holy books ; and that these contained an historical element derived from the old kingdom ;” whence he infers that registries of ancient kings made by their contemporaries must have existed from this remote period. When, however, we come to the proof of these statements, we are referred to a passage in the Todtenbuch, in which the name of Menkare, the builder of the third pyramid is mentioned ; and when we examine this passage, we find that it is not in the Todtenbuch itself, but in an annotation, in the Turin MS.—found, we believe, in no other copy ; in which, after some directions have been given as to the use to be made of a certain chapter, it is promised, that, if those directions be complied with, the deceased person shall share the blessedness of this celebrated king. The age of the Turin MS. is in dispute. Dr. Lepsius assigns it to the thirteenth, fourteenth, or fifteenth century before Christ ; others maintain that it is not older than the first or second ; but, assuming the earlier date to be the true one, we still deny the historical character of the passage ; we should consider it to be no evidence even of the existence of the king named.

Beyond the last twelve or thirteen centuries of the Egyptian monarchy,—or, at any rate beyond the period to which dated monuments can be proved to extend, we consider the statements of Manetho, even if we had them in their original form, to be of but little moment ; and even within that limit we could not regard them as conclusive evidence for the true chronology. It appears probable—and Chevalier Bunsen has admitted it to be the case (vol. ii. p. 3, &c.)—that Manetho himself represented cotemporary dynasties as successive ; and, what is still more likely to lead astray, because it is less easy to be detected, that in cases of disputed successions and divided sovereignties, he represented each of the claimants of the crown as reigning alone for the whole time that he reigned at all. If Manetho did not commit this error himself, his editors or copyists certainly did. Nor was this the only fault committed by them. It is beyond a doubt that they falsified his numbers to make them accord with their several chronological systems. Mr. Browne has shewn this very clearly in the appendix to his “Ordo Sæclorum.” It has been done by them to such an extent, that the true reading of Manetho can in very few places be relied on ; and, when this consideration is combined with the former ones, a restoration of the chronology from his fragments appears to us the most hopeless of all tasks.

Our readers will have no difficulty, from what we have already said, to discover the position which we mean to take in opposition to Chevalier Bunsen. We do not propose to set up any other chronology of the old dynasties as a rival to his ; but we contend that there is no chronology to be had for these dynasties. There is no evidence that the Egyptians in those times referred their years to any era ; and if they did not, the Egyptians in subsequent times could not so refer them on any sure grounds. Before the twelfth dynasty we have very few dated monuments ; and none of those that we have is much earlier than the first Amenemhe⁸. To determine the dates before his accession from the monuments is, therefore, impossible ; and we really

There is an argument, however, which Chevalier Bunsen adduces, which we feel ourselves called on to notice. He lays much stress upon it; but, so far from its being of service to him, it recoils fearfully against him:—

“If,” he says, (vol. ii. p. 17,) “from any period monuments are preserved with historical names and facts, and if a chronology is offered to us, which not only professes to be drawn from cotemporary monuments, or to be taken from records, which are founded on such; but which also actually agrees with the monuments that are preserved to us, the full weight of historical assurance must attach itself to such a chronology.”

He repeats in different places his positive statement that, where the monuments can be used as a test of his system, they agree with it. So in his preface to the second volume, (p. iii.) “So none of the names of kings on cotemporary monuments, and none of their numbers of years, is at variance with the Eratosthenic list; they all confirm it, and thereby also Manetho;” for he had previously stated his conviction, that he had reconciled the apparently contradictory statements of Manetho and Eratosthenes.

Now, there is one period in our author’s old kingdom, in which the truth of this boast, that his system is confirmed by the monuments, may be tested. We allude to the twelfth dynasty, in which a monumental chronology is clearly traceable. We must do him the justice to say, that he himself acknowledges this. After stating his mode of reducing Eratosthenes and Manetho to harmony in what they say of this dynasty;—or, we should rather say, in what the latter says of it, and the former is supposed to say of it; he proceeds (p. 279):—

“THE TWELFTH DYNASTY IS THEN THE TOUCHSTONE AND KEYSTONE⁹ OF OUR ENTIRE CHRONOLOGICAL SYSTEM FOR THE OLD KINGDOM.—If the chronological assumptions respecting this dynasty just announced be correct, then is the immediate and constraining proof of our fundamental principle, which alone was yet wanting, supplied; and we possess a chronology of the old kingdom, which is a matter of fact, proved by records of three thousand years’ duration, and confirmed by cotemporary monuments much older still; a chronology, such as in the Grecian and Roman history we first attain a long time after the Olympiads and the Building of the City. BUT IF OUR CHRONOLOGICAL

STATEMENT RESPECTING THE TWELFTH DYNASTY BE INCORRECT, WE POSSESS NO CHRONOLOGY AT ALL. For the monuments do not naturally give any reckoning of time; although, in this dynasty especially, they mention isolated regnal years. The two old tables of kings contain just as little chronological information. . . . And, lastly, the papyrus itself, even if it must be supposed to state the actual length of this dynasty, fails us for all the other dynasties of the old kingdom, and consequently only proves the hopeless situation of Egyptian chronology."

This is just what we before endeavoured to show. The recovery of Egyptian chronology, except by slow degrees, and with intervals of unknown length between the reigns that are known, is HOPELESS. Chevalier Bunsen ought in candour to acknowledge this; for we will now prove that his last alternative is the fact. His chronological statement respecting the twelfth dynasty is incorrect; it is irreconcilable with cotemporary monuments, to which we will refer him.

A very brief view of the Chevalier's arrangement of the twelfth dynasty will suffice; but, before we proceed to give it, we must make some preliminary remarks. It appears from cotemporary monuments that this dynasty included eight sovereigns, the first, third, sixth, and seventh of whom bore the name of Amenemhe, and the second, fourth, and fifth that of Osortasen¹. The name of the last has not been yet ascertained, but according to Manetho, as reported by Africanus, it was that of a queen; and Dr. Lepsius, who found the prænomen at the labyrinth, calls her a queen in one of his published letters; Chevalier Bunsen, however, maintains that this sovereign was a king. The number of reigns mentioned in the Turin book of kings, the fragments of which containing this dynasty have been for the most part recovered, is also eight; and the number of years that they reigned in all is said to be 213, with an overplus of one month and 17 days. We give this list along with the corresponding list of Africanus, in order to show how little dependence can be placed on that writer's representation of Manetho; for there is no reasonable ground for doubting that the latter agreed with the papyrus. Eusebius differs from Africanus, in that he omits the last three reigns, giving their sum as 42 years, which would give 198 years for the whole. He, however, states the sum to be 245 years.

¹ Chevalier Bunsen writes this name Sesortasen. We have no doubt, however, that the first letter had the power of the Hebrew ע, as in ער, עור, to both which roots the Egyptian verb, which is the first element in this name, has relations. As a noun, this word signifies an oar [Copt. Ⲡⲩⲟⲥⲣ]; and is also the name of a town to the north-east of Egypt, probably Gaza, עזה. To derive either of these from Sesor appears to us impossible.

The three units wanting in the years, and the six deficient numbers of months and days must have amounted to sixteen years, eleven months, sixteen days. We will add, that it appears probable, from one of the Sallier papyri in the British Museum, that Osortasen I. was not the son of Amenemhe I.; he, in the first instance reduced him to insignificance, but allowed him to retain the royal title, probably marrying his daughter; and in the end he seems to have deposed, and perhaps murdered him. A confusion in the reigns of these two monarchs is therefore to be expected, such as we meet in a later period in the case of Wavra and Amos, the Saïtes; but we cannot reasonably infer from this that similar confusion prevailed through all the reigns in the dynasty.

According to Chevalier Bunsen the true duration of this dynasty was only 147 years. He makes these eight reigns to correspond with four in the list of Eratosthenes, namely, the thirty-second and three following, which, according to his restoration of the text, stand thus:—

Ammenemes	26 years
Sesortosis and Ammenemes II.	23 do.
Sesortosis Hermes	55 do.
Mares	43 do.

In order to reconcile this statement with that of the papyrus, and with the two statements, as he appears to consider them, of Manetho, adopted by Africanus and Eusebius respectively, he has devised the following arrangement of these 147 years:—

Amenemhe I. reigned alone.....	4

The Chevalier says that both the author of the Turin papyrus and Manetho were ignorant of this key, but that Eratosthenes was in possession of it; and that, consequently, he alone gives the true duration of the dynasty; the others counting particular intervals twice over, or even oftener. There is one interval, indeed, the reign of Amenemhe IV., which Manetho, according to the statement followed by Eusebius, counts no less than five times! Now our objection to this system is not its intrinsic improbability; though on that ground we think, that if it were worth while, a strong case could be made against it: we take a different ground of opposition. We say that this system palpably contradicts the monuments, which, to take a single instance, represent the reign of Osortasen II. as subsequent to that of Amenemhe II., whereas Chevalier Bunsen makes the two reigns nearly to coincide. There are two monuments, the evidence of which as to this point is decisive against the Chevalier. To one of these he refers himself (vol. ii. p. 310), a sculpture in the tomb of Nevotp at Benihassan, in which 37 strangers (or $\frac{1}{37}$ of the strangers) are represented as being brought before Nevotp with great solemnity, as a present from his lord, in the sixth year of Sesortasen II. Our readers will mark this date, and will observe that, according to the Chevalier's system, it corresponds with the 55th year of the dynasty, or the ninth year of Amenemhe II. Now in another part of this tomb (Burton's Excerpta Hieroglyphica, Pl. xxxiii.), it is stated that this Nevotp, having been educated by king Amenemhe II. was promoted by him to the rank of chief, and sent to govern this district in the nineteenth year of his reign. Thus, according to the Chevalier, he received a present as chief of a district ten years before he was sent to govern it!

But the Chevalier says, "There is a sarcophagus in Florence, which mentions Sesortasen II. and Amenemhe II. as reigning together." We admit it, but it only proves that they reigned together for a year or two, when the latter, being old, took the former into partnership with him; just as his father, Osortasen I.

had done with him. A stele at Leyden mentions the forty-fourth year of Osortasen I., as synchronizing with the second of Amenemhe II.; and a similar monument exists, showing what years of Amenemhe II. and Osortasen II. really synchronized; and thus, in the most satisfactory manner, showing the falsity of the Chevalier's synchronisms. In the sixty-first plate of the "Hieroglyphics," published by the Royal Society of Literature, we have an inscription, copied from the rocks between Assouan and Philæ, which bears date in the thirty-fifth year of Amenemhe II., being the THIRD year of Osortasen II.; and not the THIRTY-SECOND, as the Chevalier pretends. He is thus convicted on the clearest testimony of having subtracted twenty-nine years from the length of this dynasty, in the course of a single reign²! The chronological scheme of the dynasty which he has elaborated from Eratosthenes, or the Pseudo-Eratosthenes, is thus proved to be erroneous; and with it, by his own admission, "the entire of his chronology of the Old Kingdom" is demolished, and,

———— like the baseless fabric of a vision,
Leaves not a wreck behind.

With respect to the Middle Kingdom, we do not feel ourselves called on to say more than a very few words. The question to be decided here is not whether the Middle Kingdom had or had not a chronology, but whether it had or had not an existence. The Champollions, Rosellini, and the English Egyptologists without exception suppose the king whose shield occupies the sixth place in the tablet of Abydos, to be the immediate successor of the king whose shield preceded his, or to be only separated from them by a female reign. Chevalier Bunsen affirms that between these two kings 1016 years are to be interposed, which he calls the Middle Kingdom. All that he has yet offered in support of this strange assertion, appears to us frivolous in the extreme. The only evidence on which we could ² Another palpable inconsistency between his scheme and the monuments, respects the second and third Osortasens. The former of these is, according to him, the Sesostris of Manetho, a great conqueror, who overran Europe and Asia, and reigned fifty-five years; whereas the latter was an obscure prince, whose name was omitted from the list of kings of Karnac, on account of his insignificance. The monuments on the contrary know nothing of the conquests of Osortasen II., whose reign appears to have been a short and inglorious one; whereas it is Osortasen III. who appears from them to be the hero of this dynasty. To him, as to a god, the temple of Samne, in Nubia, was dedicated by Thothmos III.; that very king who, according to the Chevalier, considered him unworthy of a place among those of his ancestors, or rather predecessors at Karnac. To us it appears quite evident, that this last is the king whose figure, with the name defaced, follows that of Amenemhe II. at Karnac, and who appears as Sesostris in the list of Manetho. This identification of him is, however, utterly irreconcilable with Eratosthenes.

such a series of kings, would be the production of monuments in their reigns, which could be proved to be later than the twelfth dynasty, and earlier than the eighteenth; but no single such monument has yet been produced. Is it meant to be maintained, that this interval was in point of monuments a tabula rasa? If not, where are the monuments? We can conceive the possibility of an Ojibbeway Indian setting himself to compile a chronology of the English sovereigns; having a very good supply of documents, and a very imperfect knowledge of the language in which they are written; and finding among these documents certain monarchs, whose portraits he had been told were painted on the walls of Holyrood House. We can conceive the possibility of such an investigator coming to the conclusion, that the sovereigns in this list must be introduced among the earlier kings, so as to fill up a supposed gap between Elizabeth and James I.; and, for aught that we at present see to the contrary, we think that he would have about the same grounds for his English middle kingdom, as Chevalier Bunsen has for his Egyptian one. We do not profess to have examined into this matter; nor, indeed, are we yet aware what there is to exhibit; but such are our present impressions; and they are not weakened by the result of the examination which we have made, into the Chevalier's arrangement of the earlier kings. What we have said on this subject, we have confined our argument to the monumental evidence; laying no stress on the opposition between Chevalier Bunsen's views and the statements of the Bible, or the argument against the correctness of the former. We have shown on his own ground, and shown, from purely Egyptian evidence, how much he has been mistaken. Having done this, we may be permitted to add, that we think—and probably most of our readers will think too—that, taking no account of the claims to inspiration, and regarding him as a mere inquirer, Moses had much better means of knowing what the Egyptian historical knowledge the Egyptians really possessed than Chevalier Bunsen, or any of those comparatively recent writers, who have reported statements he places so much confidence in. We do not say, that if Moses had known that the Egyptians possessed chronological records of a series of kings, extending back to ten thousand years before his time, he would have carried his history of the ancestors of his countrymen, if he must write one, some centuries at least beyond the commencement of that series, before he cut it short by a general deluge. We do not say, that we are free from the grave imputations which we incur by advancing such an opinion. The Chevalier will give no credit for honesty or love of truth, to those who will not admit the falsity of the chronological statements in the book of Genesis. "They have, he says, (vol. i. p. 7.) little knowledge, or less honesty!"

We deeply regret the composition and the publication of the present work—we mean, the chronological portion of it; not on account of any injury which it can do to the cause of divine revelation; in that point of view, we regard it as telum imbellæ sine ictu. But we regret to see time and ingenuity wasted in theorizing on apocryphal lists of kings, which might have been so much better spent in examining the Egyptian monuments, and eliciting from them the facts which they would make known to one who knew how to consult them. It is too early, as yet, to theorize as to either the chronology or the mythology of Egypt. We want in the first instance FACTS. Let as many as possible be collected. Let there be some means devised, by which independent investigators may interchange the facts which they may severally know. When a number of such facts is collected and arranged, it may be the task of the next generation to theorize about them. Above all things, the language should be first studied. Until the knowledge of it shall be brought to a greater degree of perfection than it now exhibits, even right inferences from the monuments will be received by many with doubt and suspicion. The Chevalier admits vol. i. p. 320, that his present knowledge of the language is very defective. He admits that he has much to learn; and we will venture to add—which he does not seem sensible of—that he has much also to unlearn, which he thinks that he knows, before he can accurately translate the entire of Egyptian texts. The process which we recommend is a tedious one, but it is sure. He has tried a more rapid one, and we must pronounce him to have failed.

A CENTURY ago the reign of King James the First was read by Englishmen out of a large folio volume, a hundred pages of which contained the life of this monarch, written with some honesty, with much asperity, and in a style remarkably like that of the Seven Champions of Christendom.

This characteristic piece of biography was the work of Arthur Wilson, a friend and client of King James's Earl of Essex. It was first published shortly after his death, which happened about the year 1653. And some sixty or seventy years later, when Bishop Kennet was compiling that complete History of England of which we have spoken in a previous number of this Review, it was selected by the careful prelate as the best memorial of those particular times, to be incorporated in his work. In fact, he had no great choice for this period, as we shall presently see.

The earliest history of this reign was that written by Edmond Howes, the continuator of Stowe, which was composed first in the king's lifetime up to the year 1614, and again, before the civil wars, up to the years 1631. It is curious as having been compiled before the ruin of the Stuarts, for the times were speedily to follow, when the fortunes of this royal house would be told in a very different tone. The axe had scarcely fallen upon Charles, when a variety of publications appeared, suited to the taste of the day. These were mostly low libels, professing an historical character, and resembling those memoirs of the Court of Louis XV. which were common at the close of the last century. And as it happened that the private life of Charles, like that of Louis XVI., supplied few of the peculiar topics in requisition by writers of this class, they ascended a step higher, where the materials were more abundant, and the truth was more obscure. Thus originated what are called the Secret Histories of the court of king James, works containing probably some truth but more falsehood, and which sin especially in this, that they display in a strong light, and with exaggerated features, the crimes of an abandoned court, as the chief transactions and characteristic events of the reign, and as illustrating the manners of the monarch and his house. The best known of these is the "Court and Character of King James, written and taken by Sir A. W., being an eye and ear witness." The author was Sir Anthony Weldon, sometime a clerk of the king's kitchen, and though the tract is full of spite and bitterness, and was avowedly composed to advise the people "lest they sided with that bloody house," yet some of its scandalous traditions are so intrinsically probable, or so far borne out by other authorities, that they have found a place in our Histories of England; and have contributed not a little to form our received notions of those times. A more respectably written production is that attributed, perhaps falsely, to Fulke Greville, the friend of Sir Philip Sidney. This originally appeared as "Five years of King James, or the State of England at his majesty's entrance, and the relation it had to foreign parts," a subject which, if well treated, would have shown a considerable advance beyond the ordinary conceptions of history in those days. It was afterwards enlarged into a small quarto tract, very well known, but now rather scarce, entitled, "Truth brought to light by Time, or an Historical Relation of the first XIII years of King James's Reign." This contains, in addition to the original matter, the proceedings in the divorce between the Earl and Countess of Essex, and the arraignment of the murderers of Overbury¹. Peyton's Divine Catastrophe of the kingly house of Stuart, and Osborne's Memoirs of these times, are publications of the same kind and the same date. They all appeared about the middle of that century, and all tended more or less directly to show that the Stuarts had brought Divine wrath upon their own heads by their own misdoings. These were not unanswered, even at the time. A reply to Sir Anthony Weldon appeared under the title of Aulicus Coquinaria, which takes upon itself to refute five main points of the knight's pamphlet; and the work of Bishop Goodman, now first published, and presently to be referred to, appears to have been composed principally for this same purpose. Unfortunately, these scandalous writers had such materials to work with as ministered to the sharpest appetites of the vulgar. They had truth enough to appease suspicion, and frightfulness enough to satisfy credulity. They combined the great attractions of mystery and murder; of mystery such as modern researches have not cleared, and of murder such as a man would remember for life, if he had but read it in a novel. These productions were in honour during the Commonwealth, and not without credit at subsequent periods, but they had latterly been less known till they were published under Scott's editorship in 1811.

Little more was done during the Protectorate, but with the Restoration there appeared two works of much historical value, Rushworth's Collections, and the Cabala. Rushworth was a Commonwealth man, who wrote for the sake of illustrating the disputes between Charles and the Commons, and only went back to the sixteenth year of king James in order to throw light on the opening of his own subject. The Cabala, or Mysteries of State, as it was entitled, is an early instance of a collection of political documents, relating both to foreign and domestic affairs, from Henry the Eighth's time downwards. It contains a very useful series of original records, but nothing more. Rushworth connects his documents with sufficient narrative to make them more of a continuous history, and this he extended from time to time. Both these are works of value, and the Cabala of course liable to little imputation, as the collectors interpose no remarks of their own. The historians of Charles the Second's time were naturally less severe upon the king's grandfather, and wrote in a very different spirit from those we have been speaking of. Such were Brady and Frankland; with other defenders of absolute monarchy. The former of these writers did not bring his history to the times in question, but the latter wrote the Annals of following. Sir Thomas Monson was arraigned in 1615, but tried neither then nor afterwards. As the author speaks of Northampton's being succeeded in the Treasurership "by my Lord Treasurer that now is," it must have been written before 1618, when Suffolk (Northampton's successor) lost the office.

England from 1612 to 1642, with a strong prejudice against the Puritans and Republicans, and with especial reference to Rushworth, whose collections he thinks have been selected with partiality, and illustrated with unfairness. His work is now very little known, indeed it was never very famous, but Hume, with some sympathy, perhaps, towards his bias, has collated him with Rushworth, and occasionally cited his authority². It is a desultory kind of history, interspersed with numerous transcripts of State papers and other documents, professing to be taken from good sources; but not very clearly so derived. Still there had been no regular history of James the First's reign to supersede Wilson's. The important subject was naturally the time of Charles, and writers did little more than ascend a few steps into the previous reign by way of preface.

A change again came over English History at the Revolution, and, in its results, a most important change it was. There were now two parties in the country, each appealing to history, each writing it, and each confuting the other. Faction produced controversy, and controversy research. To the landing of William III. we owe it that Carte and Ralph wrote not like Speed and Stowe. What Burnet did for history was wonderful, not by teaching others, but by teasing them. His book was like a knight's shield suspended at a cross-road. It was a challenge to all comers, and kept alive the historical contest from generation to generation. Men wrote in earnest too. They were wrangling, not about the descent of Brutus, or the site of Caer-leon, but de vita et sanguine Turni. At first, however, the change was of course unfavourable to the Stuarts. The panegyrists of them and their doctrines again gave place to others, who availed themselves of their new license. The reign of James, however, was left without much fresh matter, except that supplied by Hacket in his life of Keeper Williams, and was still without any peculiar historian, so that Bishop Kennet did probably the best he could at the beginning of the next century, in making Wilson bear this part in his Complete History. And, indeed, Wilson's performance is not a bad one, and should by no means be classed with such books as Weldon's.

² Brady left behind him a considerable collection of historical MSS. which are still preserved in the Library of Caius College, Cambridge, where the portrait of the author adorns the Combination-room. He was a learned man and an acute controversialist, and his reputation would be more general if he had written less for the times in which he lived. Some day we hope to say more about these MSS. Frankland's History was published anonymously in 1681, under the title of "Annals of King James the First and Charles the First both of happy memory." Hume quotes him by the name of Franklyn. His book contains a more circumstantial account of Prince Charles's visit to Spain than is to be found in any other English History. It is remarkable that neither for this, nor for any other of our transactions with Spain, so numerous and important in these times, has any English writer consulted the Spanish historians. Besides Cespedes, who wrote a diffuse narrative of the period, there are many minor authors who treat especially of these occurrences, but the reader will vainly look for their names even in Lingard.

Shortly after the accession of the House of Hanôver, there appeared a work of singular importance towards the illustration of this reign, more especially as regards the foreign politics of the ministry, and the relations subsisting between this kingdom and the other states of Europe then flourishing. Edmund Sawyer, a barrister, collected into three volumes a series of original documents touching State affairs in the reign of king James and his predecessor. They included the correspondence and instructions of Nevile and Winwood in France and Holland, of Trumbull at Brussels, and Cornwallis at Madrid, together with a vast number of Cecil's despatches to these ambassadors. The whole were published in 1725, by subscription, and under very good encouragement, and they now form the principal source of information respecting these matters. The editor, however, has been defrauded of the just meed of his exertions, for, as the correspondence of Sir Ralph Winwood formed the bulk of the collection, the name of the said Secretary became attached to the work, and it is now universally known as Winwood's Memorials, under which title, to the utter exclusion of all other commemoration, the reader will see it appealed to in almost every page of English History at this particular period.

But though this work furnished the means of setting in a better light the conduct of James, or at least of his ministers, yet the character of this monarch did not rise in public esteem. The spirit of the times was against him. It was not only that he was the head of a proscribed family, but his principles were precisely those which all parties were now ridiculing. His scholarship and his politics were as obsolete as his peaked beard and his points. It might have been expected, at all events, that his reluctance to interfere in the affairs of the Continent would, in those days, have been quoted with admiration, and that a peace-making king would have met with some consideration from those who were so bitter against war. Nor was this circumstance forgotten in the controversies of the times. But though Bolingbroke has discussed this reign at great length, and examined the policy of James with especial care, he has given sentence against him throughout, even on the point of his non-intervention, though his arguments are somewhat like those of a man endeavouring to destroy an analogous case which tells strongly against him. Still his opinions have carried much weight, and naturally so too; for the invective, though fierce, is not vulgar, and it is grounded on truth, though raised by exaggeration. The reputation of James was altered, but not much improved. Men who believed in nothing, would hardly respect a king who believed in witches. His memory was less odious, but more contemptible. Instead of being charged with poisoning his son, he was charged with writing against tobacco; an imputation more fatal to his dignity in the eyes of a polite club. The wits were amused with a king who really thought there was a devil. The more sober considered him a pedant and a fool, who had contributed at least as much as folly and pedantry could afford to the mischiefs which followed. The critics of the times were content to drop the secret histories, and to resort to the king's own works for their caricatures. The reader who is desirous of seeing what can be done in this way, can refer to Harris's Historical and Critical Account of the Life and Writings of King James I., after the manner of Mr. Bayle.

There did appear, however, about the same time, some publications of a different character, at least in point of merit. Birch produced, in 1749, his Historical View of the Negotiations between the Courts of England, France, and Brussels, from 1592 to 1617, and he followed up this quasi history of king James by a particular Biography of Prince Henry, a person of whom we shall speak by and by. Yet these were not histories of the life and reign of James the First, nor did Carte's work, which actually comprised such a performance, ever obtain a large circulation, or establish itself in the character of a standard History of England, as we have elsewhere remarked in this Review³. We suspect that Kennet's compilation approached most nearly to this desired eminence, and thus Wilson's biography conveyed to ordinary students their first impression of James's reign up to the middle of the last century.

At this period Hume stepped forth as an historian, and his first essay was on this identical reign. It thus becomes a curious piece of investigation to discover clearly what he achieved; to take the reign of King James as it had been written before him; to observe the auxiliary materials which had been supplied in the interval; to distinguish between what is due to these, and what is due to himself alone; and to mark those peculiar merits which at once separated him from his predecessors, and raised him to the hitherto unknown dignity of a philosophical historian. It will soon be seen that Hume was not much indebted to new materials. Since Kennet's history very few had been forthcoming. The ambassades of La Boderie, the French minister at our court from 1606 to 1611, had just been published, and Hume availed himuntrustworthy records, as he did also of Sully's Memoirs. In addition beyond this had been made to the authorities enumerated in the foregoing pages. And some accessible sources of information appears to have neglected. He does not refer to that mass of miscellaneous intelligence concerning these times in Howell's Familiar Letters. He had not, apparently, himself of what Carte had just done, nor had Birch's time reached his hands, though he employs it after his reign of Queen Elizabeth. It was not, in fact, practice or province to accumulate new materials, or to searchingly through the old ones, as we have observed

What then did he do?

He recorded, not very diffusely, the events of the time; retained in the narrative, as he went along, with much temper and great judgment. He did too avail himself of the journals of the two houses, not (as his predecessors had done) by inserting in his text speeches or resolutions, but by collecting the opinions of parties, and giving the result in a few words. In consequence—for his whole History of England is scarcely larger than his reign of William and Mary, he gave a lucid history of each period, in which, if the details are seldom circumstantial, the facts are never inaccurate, yet the outline of any period is general, the features not distorted, and the perspective well kept.

He told in most cases something very like the truth, and retained the whole of it. His philosophy, for which he is so famous, assumes the simple form of good sense. He estimates events with great accuracy. He judges of men and actions by the edge of human nature dictates, and he seldom makes a mistake, or draws a conclusion, which may not be considered reasonable and just. But, in thus speaking, we except topics connected with religion.

These were his qualifications for writing history generally. As to his particular reign, he came to it with the prepossessions of a Scotchman in favour of James, and the prejudices of a Presbyterian against his puritanical opponents. The last of these influences was perhaps stronger than the first, but neither led him into palpable extravagance. The result was a history more favourable to King James than had before been written, and his new work speedily superseded others in ordinary use, so that the Stuarts became a personage much less contemptible in the eyes of the rising generation than he had been considered by his contemporaries and fathers.

It was thus a portion of the traditional obloquy rested on him. The secret histories of his court were republished, and he mentioned, in the present century, and one of the most curious of modern scholars, after confessing publicly some thirty years ago that he had commenced his investigations of the Curiosities of Literature, with the popular notion of James's character, sent forth to the world a recantation of his own private opinion as a matter of literary conscience, and endeavoured by arguments and documents to prove that this monarch was neither a pedant nor a despot, but a good scholar and a worthy king. How far our own judgment coincides with Mr. D'Israeli's may be seen by and by. The literary character of James he has well defended, but he has been less successful against Bolingbroke than against Walpole. That Walpole had never opened the books he was so fluently criticising is plain enough. But Bolingbroke has exhibited articles of impeachment against the king's conduct which are clearly stated, and eloquently urged; not drawn from rumours or traditions, but specifying seriatim his several errors; and it is a pity that in any professed apology for him, they should not be met as formally as they are advanced.

Since these times the reigns of James and his predecessors on the English throne have been written by an author whose pages no student of history can neglect, though they will seldom please him, often perplex him, and sometimes mislead him. In Dr. Lingard's chapters the reader will find not an authority overlooked, except wilfully. He will see research extended to the most distant limits, and singular acuteness exercised on its results. With all this he will not find the warmth of an advocate, or the wrath of a partizan. Few writers deny themselves the license of an occasional peroration, but Dr. Lingard is one of those few. As far as regards any expression of private opinion, any vehemence of panegyric or censure, his work appears strangely impartial. It is this very suppression of the writer's individuality, this seeming forbearance even on the fittest occasions for interposing, that causes such dissatisfaction. The reserve is not the reserve of modesty, but of design. It is that of a man who makes no statement, because he knows his statement will not be believed. As far as words go, Dr. Lingard is far less severe upon Henry VIII. than is Sir James Macintosh; far less bitter against Cranmer than Mr. Macaulay. Yet his work conveys somehow even a worse impression both of the king and the archbishop. Dr. Lingard never pleads. He makes out his case by putting his own witnesses into the box, and examining them himself. We form our opinions from the evidence, not the speeches. The strongest points are handled with the greatest quietness. When Cranmer kisses the gospels with a private reservation, even Mr. Hallam speaks of his disingenuous shift. Dr. Lingard merely throws out a remark that the security of oaths is diminished if they are taken in a sense different from that understood by the imposer. When a poor wretch is hanged and embowelled for saying mass privately, Sir James Macintosh launches the whole force of language at the unspeakable atrocity. Dr. Lingard relates the facts without comment, but he adds a note from an eye-witness, who says that the executioner was a bungler, and that the butchery lasted half an hour.

Yet this history is a great acquisition to us. Out of twenty material incidents, we find fifteen set in a new light, if not in a true one; and the very novelty of the view is instructive. Besides, the accounts of a Roman Catholic are the altera pars of all our history for the last three hundred years, and it is hard to come to a decision without hearing them. From what we have been saying, it will be seen at once how peculiarly requisite it is to get a correct appreciation of Dr. Lingard's authorities. If these are credible, his case is proved. If they are not, the reader is very insidiously misled. For the period in question, the authorities recently brought to light are numerous, rather than severally important, and on this account require the greater attention. The Clarendon and Hardwicke papers, Murden's collection, and the selection made by Dalrymple from the advocate's Library at Edinburgh, are well-known sources; but, besides these additional helps, Dr. Lingard quotes frequently from MS. documents and letters which may be less faithful informants.

Three more authorities are specified at the head of this article. The name of Sir Simonds D'Ewes has hitherto been principally known by his journals of Queen Elizabeth's parliaments, which were always quoted, and which form the basis of that part of the Parliamentary History. His diary, however, was also known and indeed frequently cited from the MS.; and portions of it had been actually published by Hearne in his quaint way of filling up his books with scraps of the most heterogeneous information, just as Casaubon and his contemporaries used to add an explanation of an elegy of Propertius to a note on a construction of Suetonius, and finish up with a Greek epigram on some event of the day. This diary is now published entire. It is less valuable for the times of James I. than those succeeding; as the writer only came into the world, just as James was coming to England, and could consequently know but little of what occurred during his boyhood. His stories are always emphatically gossiping; but sometimes it is very useful to know the gossip of two hundred years ago, and generally very entertaining. His bias is considerable; and allowance must be made for it in all he says for the Puritans, and against the court. The title of the second work sufficiently explains itself; the portion of its contents referring to these times is very small. The third is more curious. To say that Godfrey Goodman was an English Papist, who was advanced to the see of Gloucester in 1625, would be rather a startling opening of the story. Yet he certainly held tenets higher than those held by gentlemen of the present day, who have been made Papists, just as Bolingbroke says Jansenists were made in France, and Jacobites in England, viz. by being called so, and treated as such. And he was undoubtedly made a bishop by his good master King James. After being plundered and ejected like his brethren during the civil wars, he lodged obscurely somewhere in Westminster, and wrote these Memoirs. The book which he refutes throughout, namely Weldon's, did not appear till 1650, and as the bishop died in 1655, his commentaries were composed in the interval. His sole aim seems to have been the conviction of Weldon, whose statements he handles successively throughout his story. His words must be weighed with much caution. Dr. Lingard does not appear to have been aware of the existence of these commentaries, or they would have been evidence after his own heart. The intelligent editor, Mr. Brewer, is not much inclined to find fault with this author's sentiments. We shall refer occasionally to all these as we proceed.

One mischievous effect of the Secret Memoirs to which we have alluded, as well as of the misconception of history generally, was the direction of the student's attention almost exclusively to the court. Even Hume says, that "except during sessions of parliament, the history of this reign may be more properly called the history of the court, than that of the nation." But nothing can be falser history than this. There are periods, it is true, when history becomes necessarily more personal, and more centred in a few individuals, than at other periods. But it is never entirely so, even in France. Generation is always succeeding to generation, and seldom, in Europe, without the development of one or more phases of society. People, if not writing and thinking, are building and trading, or, at all events, living and moving, and marrying and giving in marriage. No European country, excepting, perhaps, England just latterly, has maintained an unaltered position in relation to the other powers for three-score years. And no change in such relative position is without its corresponding effect on the people. But it cannot be for a moment pretended that the times of James I. even approximate in their character to such periods. At the very outset, the position of the nation was entirely changed. Its dominions were doubled in extent. One of the ancient kingdoms of Europe disappears and is merged in ours. And it was not only what we gained, but what our enemies lost. The Scotch court was the very focus of continental intrigue, and never more so than just before this event. On every occasion the first glance of Paris or Madrid was towards Holyrood or Linlithgow. But all this was now changed. Half the island was no longer an enemy's country. We had no longer to divide an army of ten thousand men, and send five thousand to defend the borders; but we could leave the borders behind us, and ship off twenty thousand to Flanders. We were now indeed insulani, with the ocean for our barrier instead of Berwick and Carlisle.

Not less striking were the changes abroad. In this reign Spain, the greatest of the European powers, made the first of those humiliating sacrifices which in less than half a century left her the least. And in that corner of the huge fabric which first crumbled, there arose, and mainly through our agency, a new state; a state at first laughed at, and next hated, but which was presently to form with England the new and formidable class of powers maritime; which in seventy short years was to be the protector of its ancient mistress, and even intercessor with her enemies; and which was to exercise the mightiest influence over the course of events in Europe. The Republic of Holland set an example which was followed in England, and gives Cromwell his chance of a statue; which was debated in Portugal, and nearly cost John of Braganza his chance of a throne; and which in its effects depopulated Naples, and ruined Messina.

Nor can it be said that society remained without progress or change. A disorganization was taking place which materially affected the habits of half the nation. Just at this period, the country gentry broke up their ancient establishments, and dismissed their retainers. The aristocracy of the shires flocked to London, like the French noblesse to Paris, and squandered their fortunes in the grossest and most abandoned licentiousness. Royal proclamations were vain against this new mania. The effect went to complete what the wars of the Roses and the rise of the commons had commenced, and almost destroyed the last traces of feudalism. They were not quite destroyed, it is true, for in the next reign the country gentry could still muster their troops to join the royal standard, but perhaps the issue of the wars might have been in some degree changed, if the multitude of retainers and serving men who were now sent abroad upon the world had remained to swell the squadrons of their masters. The luxury of the times was excessive. Not even the abbots and sacrists of the fourteenth century were so lavish and magnificent in their buildings as these lords of the seventeenth. The public mind was in a continued state of ferment throughout this reign of peace. The spirit which had arisen under Elizabeth, to do its work under Charles, was rapidly, and not secretly, extending itself. The feelings of the nation, as regarded its neighbours, underwent an entire alteration. In one point this is especially remarkable. The strange feelings of awe with which our ancestors in the sixteenth century regarded the Spaniards, have not escaped the notice of historians; and they have been likened to those with which a savage might look towards an Englishman. But in thirty years all this had been reversed. The writers of James's time speak of Spain as France might now speak of China. The country was still disliked, but no longer feared. Its wretchedness and poverty are already laughed at. A score of years had not passed since the whole force of the island had been marched to meet the Spanish invader with less of daring than of despair, with a resolution of dying in the field rather than with a hope of escaping defeat. Now, at the news of a peace with Spain, all the nation is indignant. Ambassadors confess gravely in their despatches that the country had lost its most glorious opportunity of aggrandizement. The tone of the people was like that of sailors forbidden to engage a Frenchman, and robbed of their lawful prize-money. Vessels used to be sent to the Spanish colonies with the same regularity and much the same expectations that they now sail with for the whale fishery. And only a few years later, the parliament, clergy, and commons, are all raving mad, because King James will not do what Marlborough was thought demented for doing a century after, because he will not march an English army to the Danube, and that against the combined forces of Austria and Spain. How can the history of these times be the history rather of the court than of the nation?

The truth is, that so it had been written, but so it ought not to have been written. Hume's predecessors had so viewed it, but he should not have followed them, nor, in point of fact, has he altogether done so.

The title of James I. to the throne of England has been the subject of curious controversy. That the first of the Stuarts, the head of that house who carried the doctrines of hereditary right so high, and with results so fatal to themselves, was particularly deficient in a good title to his crown, was observed by Bolingbroke. But Bolingbroke overlooked the main point. He merely asserted that the succession to the crown from the earliest times had notoriously not been governed by hereditary right, and that the title of Henry VII., from whom James deduced his, was even more irregular than ordinary. Mr. Hallam first showed reasons for coming to the conclusion that no one of the Stuarts was, in the strict sense of the word, a legitimate sovereign, and that the title of this family to the throne was, in point of fact, very analogous to that of the family who succeeded them. He proves his case by four propositions. 1. That a lawful king of England, with the advice and consent of parliament may make statutes to limit the inheritance of the crown. 2. That King Henry VIII. was by statute invested with such powers. 3. That he did thus entail the inheritance on the issue of his younger sister Mary to the exclusion of his elder sister Margaret, queen of Scots. 4. That such issue was living at the decease of Elizabeth. From these propositions he proves that James was not the legal heir, and that he was constituted a lawful king only as William III. was so constituted, viz. by the choice of the people and the recognition of parliament. Now these propositions, we think, are true, but they only prove this, that the first title of the Stuarts to the throne was not parliamentary,—a fact which few of their supporters would care about acknowledging. It would surely have been bootless to have set about persuading a Jacobite that James did not originally derive his title from act of parliament. Yet these were the persons who upheld the family claim, and they would have denied Mr. Hallam's first proposition. Such denial would be perilous, no doubt, but not more so than the march to Derby. James I. came in to the exclusion of those who were not the lineal heirs, William III. to the exclusion of those who were. Both were alike the choice of the people over others, but with this difference in the premises: the offer of the crown to William was a transfer, to James it might have been termed a restitution. No advocate of constitutional freedom would have doubted either the truth or the consequence of Mr. Hallam's propositions, but these were the precise parties with whom such arguments were not required. The parties to be convinced were the advocates of divine right, and against these the proof would have failed.

The truth is, there was no other candidate but James in a plight to contest the prize for a moment. The descendants of Mary of Suffolk were utterly powerless, and the claim of the Spanish infanta was too ludicrously preposterous to be thought of. Nor do we mean to say that the point of lineal descent was without its weight, independent of the acquisition of a kingdom—an acquisition which was by no means duly appreciated at first. And, moreover, the new king had this especial advantage, that all parties were in the dark as to his disposition. He was a Protestant, and this pleased the people. He was thought to lean to his own Church, and this pleased the Puritans. All writers appear surprised at the singular tranquillity attending his accession. The fact is, that all parties were quiet, because all expected to be gainers. And the necessary disappointment of some was the cause of those explosions which perplex historians as much as the previous tranquillity. One thing explains the other. Cecil's friends hoped to be taken into confidence as well as Cecil. The Roman Catholics hoped for great things from the son of Queen Mary, and the correspondent of the pope. Both parties were disappointed. From the disappointment of the first arose Raleigh's conspiracy; from the second, the Gunpowder Treason.

Few monarchs have been the object of more desperate and audacious plots than king James. The seizure of his person during his Scottish reign had been a matter of almost ordinary occurrence. And his misfortunes had this peculiar aggravation, that they were seldom credited. When the news of the Gowrie conspiracy reached Edinburgh, the first impression of the people was disbelief. Before the mysterious circumstances of the case could have attracted attention, before any contradiction could have been fairly detected by a comparison of evidence, the affair was discredited. On the first blush of the matter, on the bare tidings that the king's life had been attempted, but happily saved, the ministers of the city refuse to believe the particulars communicated by the council. Raleigh's plot was called a contrivance of Cecil. And even after the detection of Guy Fawkes with the lantern in his hand, attempts were made to throw discredit on this matter too. Bishop Goodman, forty years afterwards, in speaking of the gunpowder plot, mentions as a remarkable feature in it, that it was "generally acknowledged as a truth on all sides."

That persons of different character and pursuits should engage together in a conspiracy with different motives, and for different ends, is known to be not improbable; and if the conspiracy be hasty and ill concerted, the evidence of its existence may be made to appear incredible and self-contradictory. And such was the case with this plot of Raleigh's. It is now clear that there were two treasons on this occasion, the first called the "Main," and the other the "Bye." The first was Cobham's and Raleigh's, which might have had some grand object in nubibus, but which certainly never proceeded farther than a few negotiations with the Spanish ambassador. The second was that of Markham and Brooke, with the fixed object, but indefinite means, of procuring from the king some liberty of conscience for Papists and Puritans. When it is considered, that though these plots went on together, the agents were unacquainted, at all events, with the details of each other's schemes; that both schemes were indefinite, and both abortive; and that the evidence was mainly sought from the confessions and recriminations of the parties, it can hardly be matter of surprise that the result of the investigations was unintelligible⁴. It was impossible to detect what the witnesses themselves could not tell—the ultimate aim, for instance, of Raleigh and Cobham; but perhaps, as much as was to be learnt is now known. Hume tells the story in a page and a half, just as he found it in ordinary authorities, and leaving it just as unintelligible. In Lingard it will be found related with the utmost clearness of detail, and confirmed by all such evidence as has since come to light.

The famous gunpowder treason is a far more interesting subject of enquiry, especially in the chapters of a Romish historian. The method in which Dr. Lingard treated the massacre of St. Bartholomew, is generally known from its discussion in the pages of a popular review. He has conducted this case in a manner more ingenious, and, we think, more successful; he makes no attempt to deny the reality of the danger, or to treat it as a stratagem of Salisbury's. He offers no direct palliation of the enterprise, which he describes as "so atrocious in principle, and so sanguinary in execution, that it is difficult to conceive how it could be harboured in the mind of any human being." He wishes, however, to establish the following points: 1. That the body of English Papists was entirely ignorant of the plot. 2. That the English Jesuits had no knowledge of it, except such as Greenway learnt from Catesby in confession, and communicated to Garnet his provincial. These points, we think, he goes nearly to prove, and, with this, a partial justification of the conspirators is indirectly conveyed by an elaborate recital of the persecutions with which their religion was then visited. With such a preface, constructed not with declamation nor arguments, but from an assemblage of authenticated details, the story opens, in the spring of 1604, eighteen months before the catastrophe. The traitors, at first but four in number out of the whole kingdom, are represented as suspending their operations till the conclusion of the treaty between England and Spain had destroyed all chance of Philip's mediation. When every ray of hope is extinguished, they exhort each other to brave death "like the Maccabees" for the liberation of their brethren. The current of the narrative is only interrupted by notices of the increasing severity of the persecution; and the circumstance that the conspirators succeeded, in March 1605, in conveying two hogsheads and thirty barrels of powder into the vaults, is coupled with the mention of a rumour, that, in the next parliament, measures would be taken for the entire extirpation of the ancient faith. This is not exactly such a history of the gunpowder plot as would be gathered from Mr. Close's Anniversary Sermon, but, of the two, it is the truer one.

It may be observed, that the conspirators had, before this, been under the suspicion of the government. Not only had Catesby, Tresham, and Percy been concerned in the treason of Essex, but the two former of these, and both the Wrights, had actually been put under arrest, at the death of Elizabeth, as dangerous characters. They do not, however, seem to have been suspected now, even by Cecil, though it is clear, from documents in Birch's Negotiations, and from his own letter afterwards, that he was more than once warned from abroad that something was in hand. But when the continued prorogation of parliament had rendered additional funds indispensable, and Tresham, at length, for this purpose, was taken into confidence, the death-blow was given to this infernal plot. This did not occur till the 15th of October, so reluctantly was Tresham trusted. From this period, the story assumes a complexion very different from that which it wears in ordinary histories of England. It seems clear that Tresham, from his first admission into the secret, was completely frightened, and resolved at once to frustrate the design with as little mischief as possible to his associates. Before ten days had elapsed he went to Catesby, and suggested that the explosion should be postponed from the opening to the close of parliament. He said that delay was necessary to enable him to raise money; and he pleaded earnestly that Lord Monteagle, his brother-in-law, might have warning given him. Now this Lord Monteagle himself had been engaged in some of the treasons of the Papist party, and it seems extremely probable that he had been already enlightened by Tresham, and that all the following piece was played between the two in order to frighten the conspirators into an abandonment of their projects. On October 26, Monteagle, much to the surprise of the family, ordered supper to be prepared at one of his houses a little way out of town, instead of at his usual residence, which was at Bethnal Green. During the meal, the celebrated letter was left for him, brought in, and read by one of his gentlemen named Ward⁵. On the next day, the 27th, Ward called personally on Winter, one of the traitors, and related this occurrence to him, advising him, if he had any thing to do with the plot to take himself off. Winter immediately informed Catesby and Percy, who, on the 30th, sent a message to Tresham to meet them at Enfield, with the resolution of killing him, if they found good ground for their suspicions. But he stood the trial and protested his innocence of the matter. It does not seem quite clear when the information was first conveyed to Cecil⁶. The letter was laid before James on the first of November, a circumstance of which Winter was immediately apprised by this same Ward. Tresham was again repaired to, and he this time said, that he had learnt that ministers knew of the mine, though he could not tell how. This was on the 2nd. Still, however, they took courage from the fact, that the cellar had not been searched, and they were confirmed by Percy (who came to town on the 3rd) in their resolution of waiting for the worst. And then followed the events of the 5th.

⁵ It was scarcely possible to doubt that Tresham was the writer of the letter, yet some have done so. The MSS. of the conspirators in the possession of Dr. Lingard show that they all attributed it to him. Bishop Goodman mentions it as a well-known fact. Sir E. Hobart writing to Sir T. Edwards at Brussels a fortnight after the dis-

Few persons, we imagine, after considering these particulars, will doubt but that the whole plan of the discovery was concerted, step by step, between Tresham and Monteagle. It is absurd to suppose that no more ingenious method could have been devised for preventing Monteagle's attendance on parliament, than the sending him so suspicious a letter as this, at least nine days earlier than was necessary. In fact, it had been determined to save others too, and the security of several had been actually cared for without giving rise to any suspicions at all. Digby, in his letter to his wife, says, "I do not think there would have been three worth saving that should have been lost. You may guess that I had some friends in danger, which I prevented, but they shall never know it." Whether Mounteagle, in communicating the letter to the council, gave them any further insight into its meaning or not, may be doubted. We think the probability is that he did so; and Cecil's adroitness could easily so manage it that the discovery might appear to come from the king. Yet in his letter to the British ambassadors afterwards, he openly takes the credit for himself and Suffolk.

covery, says, "Such as are apt to interpret all things for the worst, will not believe other but that Monteagle might in policy cause this letter to be sent, fearing this discovery of (i. e. made by?) the letter: the rather that one Thomas Ward, a principal man about him, is suspected to be accessory to the treason, others otherwise." Cecil's letter to Cornwallis (Winwood II. 171.) says that Monteagle, when he accompanied Suffolk on the 4th into the vault, and the latter was told that the faggots belonged to one Mr. Percy, "took notice that there was great profession between Percy and him, from which some inference might be made that it was the warning of a friend." Yet Monteagle could not really have supposed that Percy sent the letter.

⁶ It must, however, have been very soon after the delivery of the letter, for Cecil in the despatch last quoted implies, that they kept it a day or two before showing it to the king, which they did on the 1st.

Hume's narrative of the plot contains few of the details given above, and indeed many of them were not known at the time he was writing. But it is not only by the inaccuracy or incompleteness of particulars, that his pages convey a wrong impression to the reader. Tantum religio potuit suadere malorum is the moral, which, as applicable to all creeds alike, he insinuates throughout. He represents the previous conduct of the conspirators as "liable to no reproach," and observes that they were not men of desperate fortunes or profligate habits, so that "bigoted zeal" and "holy fury" are made responsible for the whole iniquity. We have, however, remarked a page or two back, that the conspirators had borne very suspicious characters for some years past. It is requisite, too, in order to get a good view of the matter, to distinguish between the original contrivers of the plot, and those who were only taken in as the catastrophe approached. These latter persons were men of a better stamp, and probably aimed chiefly, if not solely, at the advancement of their religion. Such was Digby, whose words Hume quotes to confirm his own reflections⁷. But Digby was only admitted to the secret a month before the time. The real gunpowder traitors—the persons whose principles and conduct must characterize the scheme—were Catesby and Percy. Catesby had been a man of the most abandoned habits, and most reckless dissipation. He had ruined his fortune by his extravagance, and he was notorious as having been engaged, for some purpose or other, in perpetual plots against the government. Percy was of no better repute. He had two wives, Bishop Goodman says, one in the north and the other in the south, and lectures on atheism were reported to be read in his house. "So I conceive," adds the Bishop, "that he was not very religious." Now these are not those kind of characters whose crimes are to be imputed to religious enthusiasm⁸.

It is not altogether easy to form at once a correct idea of this famous treason. That Catesby and Percy devised the scheme originally without some political or personal aims, will hardly be believed, though no such particulars were permitted to transpire⁹. That the persecutions at this time were most iniquitous and cruel is undeniable, and this too under the sway of a new monarch, a period which had been anxiously looked for as promising to terminate the miseries of years. If the Papists had risen against their oppressors in arms—if they had collected themselves in some corner of the country—if they had garrisoned Exeter, and even drawn succours from Spain, they would have been no more liable to historical censure than the Protestants of Rochelle, or the Camisards of the Cevennes. The people who rose against Charles I. and James II. were not suffering more grievous impositions than the Papists suffered now. The infamy of this plot arises from the horrible wickedness of the means devised—a wickedness so far transcending the ordinary accompaniments of rebellion; from the utter improbability there was that the catastrophe, even if fully achieved, could have gratified the conspirators in any point except revenge; and from the deliberate malice with which they pondered for eighteen months over a purpose almost too atrocious for the first impulse of momentary frenzy. And in popular histories and declamations, this peculiar villany is generally connected with the essential tenets of Popery, as if no creed but this could prompt or promote such a characteristic plot. It cannot be denied that religious feelings, if they did not originate this treason, at least kept it alive. It was a Popish plot in growth, if not in conception. Whatever may have actuated the ringleaders, the majority of the little band who subsequently joined them, after hesitating, as well they might, at the first proposals, did, beyond a doubt, suffer themselves to be convinced that this outrageous massacre was justifiable on the score of religion, and forwarded it with the sole view of advancing, or perhaps, to speak more fairly, of protecting, the faith they professed. Yet it should be remembered that the number of such persons was exceedingly small; that they had been selected singly by the leaders, with the greatest care, as the fittest objects of temptation; and that, as they were not consulted till the eleventh hour, they had less time for reflection and dismay. One of the twelve, too, a strict Papist, did actually at last prevent the conspiracy, under the influence of these feelings; for, that such were the motives which prompted Tresham, and not the compassion either for a Papist or a brother-in-law, is abundantly clear. Above all, it must be borne in mind that it is quite certain that the Papists, as a body, were entirely ignorant of the design, and that it is not proved that any priest of that Church gave it his countenance or approval¹.

These plots gave King James but an ill promise of peace on his newly gained throne. They formed, however, the last of that remarkable series of designs which had been projected against him, and he rested undisturbed, at all events by similar attacks, for the remaining twenty years of his reign. It was at this period, when the troubles connected with his accession had been quieted, and those arising from his continental alliances had not commenced, that those strange passages occurred at his court, which have formed the staple of the Secret Histories, and stamped their character on the times. The king had always been surrounded by a number of persons, not exclusively, though mainly Scotchmen, to whom he was attached either by gratitude or caprice; but some years elapsed before he selected any especial favourite, or permitted any monopoly of the royal grace. Lingard, however, is in error in tracing this change to the death of Cecil, for Carr was in favour in 1610, and was created Viscount Rochester in 1611, whereas Salisbury did not die till the following year, and had not long previously experienced any disfavour. If a man fills the post of prime favourite without being generally hated while living, or generally abused when dead, he is entitled to some credit, and such was the case with Somerset. He was not a man of talent or of principle, of sagacity or of caution; but either by his manners or disposition, or by both, he certainly made himself somewhat popular while in power, and earned a good word in disgrace, and after death². Weldon allows him considerable praise, and Bishop Goodman speaks of him with marked respect. There can be no doubt though, that in many of these panegyrics the chief object is to contrast him invidiously with Buckingham. It is hardly safe to take a man's character from his own lips, but there is a curious letter of Somerset's to Northampton in the Egerton Papers, in which the favourite appeals, as to a well-known fact, to his "carefulness to preserve the nobility here, rather than invade the right of any," and avers himself to be the courtier "whose hands never took bribe." These claims tally precisely with the acknowledgments of Weldon, and they point exactly to such a disposition as would have secured him a good name at the least expense. We do not find it satisfactorily shown at what particular period Somerset was introduced to the friend whose name and fate were afterwards so notorious³. It must, however, have been soon after his own appearance at court, for in September, 1611, he was in disgrace for a supposed offence offered to the queen, which she never forgot.

² The reader will find considerable variation in the general colouring given to this story. The Secret Histories generally represent Overbury in a favourable light in order to make the case blacker. This line is taken by Greville and by Weldon; and the Aulicus Coquinarius admits that Weldon's statements on this point are tolerably accurate. Wilson's attachment to Essex made him speak very strongly, and as Hume here rests on his sole authority he has taken his tone. Goodman seems disinclined to say much about the matter. Lingard takes an exactly opposite view of the case,

Thomas Overbury was a gentleman of decent extraction, the son of an ancient benchman of the Middle Temple. With the approbation, and, it is said, at the instance of the king, he was early attached to the person of the favourite, in the capacity of a friend and confidant, to aid him with his experience, and especially, in later times, to assist him in that business of state which after Cecil's death was entrusted to his hands. That he discharged this office with considerable ability is allowed on all sides, but his temper is represented as violent, and his manners as overbearing; and it is clear from his actions that he was both unprincipled and unscrupulous. That he, as well as his master, was obnoxious to the queen there can be no doubt, but we see no sufficient grounds for asserting that he was disliked by James. He filled the invidious post of a favourite's favourite, with some skill and no extraordinary disrepute, for no mention of any disturbance occurs, excepting the pettish displeasure of the queen in 1611. The year 1612 ended well for him and his master. Cecil was dead; who, if he had done no more, had occasionally intercepted the stream of royal favour which was flowing so profusely to Carr. Prince Henry was dead also, who was in some abusing Overbury and exculpating Somerset as far as he can; from no motive, that we can imagine, except his ordinary one of going counter to the received version of a story.

³ Bacon describes Overbury as "known to have great interest and strait friendship with my Lord Somerset, both in his meaner fortunes and after." State Trials, II. 974. Other statements represent him as introduced to Somerset by James. Mr. Brewer has printed (from Birch's collection) a letter from Overbury to Salisbury, showing that his disgrace was in Sept. 1611, and also one from the queen, in which she styles him "that fellow."

degree a rival, though perhaps not an enemy. There does not in fact seem to have been any party formed against Carr, as long as he held merely the first place in his sovereign's affections, without being prominently set forward as his counsellor. Weldon says, that as James was notoriously bent on a favourite, schemes were tried by all parties to get the appointment, but that when the place was accidentally filled by Carr, they acquiesced in the fortuitous settlement of the question.

Now, however, during the vacancy of offices which ensued on the death of Salisbury, considerable jealousy arose between the Howards—Suffolk and Northampton, and the favourite, and in this interval of ministerial anarchy, the services of Overbury were in great demand. It is needless to recite that at this period Carr had conceived a violent passion for the Lady Frances Howard, daughter of Suffolk, and wife of the Earl of Essex. The question appears to have been regarded at court simply as one of convenience. James, though he had contrived the original match between Essex and his lady, was glad to please his favourite, and anxious to embrace what he thought so simple a method of reconciling parties. Suffolk and Northampton, the lady's father and uncle, made no objection to the arrangement, and it was agreed that the Lady Essex should sue for a divorce from her husband, and marry Carr. The only dissentient was Overbury, who, though he had been the chief abettor in the previous passages between Carr and the lady, was averse to the project of a marriage, which he opposed with much violence of temper and language, using the remarkable threat, that he both could and would throw a fatal obstacle in its way. It is not difficult, of course, to discover considerations which might have influenced him in this conduct, apart from any of the more respectable motives which some writers have given him credit for. No act, however, of overt hostility was committed towards him till the 21st of April, when he was suddenly sent to the Tower. The reason given for his arrest was his refusal of an embassy which the king had just offered him. It happens that we possess a remarkable letter of Sir H. Wotton's, written the day after, in which he states that Overbury, only two hours before his commitment, had told him with his own mouth that he "conceived himself never better of his own fortunes and ends,"—a remark very characteristic of the man's presumption. No sooner was he imprisoned than the formal suit for a divorce was instituted, and the requisite sentence obtained, not without great notoriety and scandal. The proceedings lasted nearly six months, and just as they terminated Overbury expired in the Tower, on the 15th of September, 1613. That his death should at once be attributed to poison was not remarkable, since few deaths of eminent persons occur unattended with similar suspicions. On the 26th of December following, Carr, created Earl of Somerset for the occasion, was married to the divorced countess,—a proceeding somewhat unreservedly stigmatized even at the time. Such are the bare circumstances of the first part of this drama.

The year 1614, though a stormy period in parliament, was not attended with any remarkable events at court, excepting the death of Northampton, who expired in July. The marriage of Somerset had produced the desired effect in reconciling the court factions, and things went on pretty smoothly till the spring of the next year 1615. On the 23rd of April, George Villiers was sworn in as a gentleman of the privy chamber, which was the first step in the rapid rise of the new favourite. This was a sufficient indication that the royal favour was at least divided, if not transferred. On the 1st of August Somerset was arrested in the royal presence at Royston, charged with being concerned in the murder of Sir Thomas Overbury.

The particulars were soon public. It transpired that the scheme of offering Overbury an ambassadorship, and persuading him to refuse it, had been preconcerted, in order to get him into the Tower. When he was there, it was contrived to surround him with agents in the plot. Wade, the lieutenant of the Tower, was removed, and Sir Gervase Elwes appointed in his room. A man named Weston had been placed in particular attendance on the prisoner, and this man had poisoned him. The poisons were furnished to Weston by the countess, who had procured them from Franklin, an apothecary, by the assistance of Mrs. Turner, a woman of infamous character, who had also been instrumental in the scandalous transactions preceding the divorce. These operations had extended over a space of nearly five months, during the whole of which time poisons had been periodically administered, till at last they took effect. The circumstances of the discovery are differently told. By some it is said that the apothecary's boy, who had been shipped off for safety's sake to Flanders, had there divulged particulars which Trumbull, our ambassador in those parts, thought fit to communicate to secretary Winwood. Other statements allege, that the secretary, happening to meet Sir Gervase Elwes at dinner at Lord Shrewsbury's, learnt from him enough to lead to the whole disclosure⁴.

Winwood communicated the matter to the king, who sent for Coke, to whom he committed the investigation. The result was the apprehension of Somerset, as we have stated. Between the 19th of October and the 9th of December, Weston, Mrs. Turner, Sir G. Elwes, and Franklin were all tried and executed. Somerset and his countess were detained in prison till the 24th of the next May. In the interval the earl and countess were subjected to repeated private examinations, Bacon being the chief agent in the business. It was clear that the king wished to avoid a trial, and to that end Somerset was advised to plead guilty, by a prospect of pardon, but this he refused to do⁵. It was also clear, however, that he was as much averse to a trial as the king, but that he did not choose to humour his majesty on his own terms. To gain his end, he solicited an interview, or permission to correspond privately. When these requests were denied, he employed menaces, and threatened to make disclosures if he were put on his trial. At last he feigned sickness and madness, but all to no purpose. He and his wife were convicted, the latter pleading guilty, but both received pardon.

Such are the ascertainable details of this scandalous story; a story which originated and supplied all the libels of the day. For it is upon this that all the Secret Histories turn, it being connected in some of them with other crimes equally black, but not equally clear, and made to ramify through all the court intrigues of this portion of the reign. And it cannot be denied that many mysterious circumstances of the transaction remain unexplained, which perplex the best judgments of modern historians. These relate to certain secrets of which both Overbury and Somerset declared themselves the possessors, and with the disclosure of which Overbury first threatened Somerset, and Somerset afterwards threatened the king. It has been inferred, from these circumstances, that all three parties were conscious of some criminal deed, either perpetrated or planned, which would not bear the light; that Overbury was first put out of the way, with the king's sanction, to prevent his telling tales; and that the publication of these matters was what the earl threatened, and the king feared, on his trial. Such is the opinion formed by Mr. Hallam.

Unfortunately the histories which should help to enlighten us on these points are of little service, being mainly taken up with gossip and anecdote, to the exclusion of such facts and dates as we might base our judgment on. Our chief materials are the details to be gathered from Bacon's letters, and the State Trials.

⁵ James was very cautious and niggardly in his promises to Somerset. He seems to have been afraid of public opinion if he showed him too much lenity. Bacon, that the king's word might not be compromised, suggested that these promises should be added "by the messenger, as from himself;" so that they might afterwards be repudiated. See his letter to Buckingham of May 5. Works, IV. 624. Ed. 1740.

The insufficiency, at first sight, of the motives generally alleged for the imprisonment and murder of Overbury, particularly as they regard Somerset himself, may certainly lead to a suspicion that there were others working more secretly. As far as the Countess is concerned, there is nothing extravagant in supposing that a woman of strong passion and violent temper should be ready to resort to any extremities against a man who had threatened to defeat her favourite schemes, and who had spoken of her in terms of unmeasured insult and abuse. And it may perhaps be thought that the part taken by the earl in the business is no more than may be explained by the well-known fact, that her influence over him was unbounded, and more than sufficient to secure such co-operation. That a woman should be abetted by her paramour in an act of sanguinary revenge against a man who had offended them both, is not very strange. Still the question will recur, Why were such extraordinary means employed? Surely, at the beginning of the seventeenth century, a nobleman could get rid of a troublesome confidant, or a fractious counsellor, without having recourse to such a complication of intrigues. And even if nothing short of his death would expiate his offences, it could hardly have been necessary to bring this about in the Tower, and by means of the king's lieutenant; a circumstance which was actually pressed on the trial as a great aggravation of the murder. If Overbury did really threaten to stop the marriage, it may be said that he must have had possession of some secret to reveal which would have been Somerset's ruin; for the supposition of Dr. Lingard, that this referred merely to his power of exposing the previous criminality of the parties, is quite improbable. There can be no doubt but that the lady's friends, and the king, and all in fact who were interested in the matter, were already pretty well aware of the antecedent circumstances, which were not likely to be scrutinized with any rigid severity. Nor was it probable that Overbury's single testimony to this effect, when opposed by all the weight of the other side, would have been allowed such consideration as to impede the marriage. Still we may conceive, without much difficulty, that an overbearing favourite, who presumed that all his master's past successes and future hopes were alike attributable to his counsels, might, in a fit of exasperation, use big words and threatening language, without any such definite meaning as in this case has been inferred. For it is impossible to doubt that in the state affairs which Somerset and Overbury had transacted together for the twelve months previous, many confidential communications must have taken place; nor is it unlikely, considering the times and the reign, that some of these involved subjects never intended to be made public. Bacon, in his speech for the prosecution, pressed this point strongly, but that was merely to prove malice in Somerset. And if his instructions were to mislead the court (as Mr. Hallam supposes), this would go to show the contrary. Yet, on the whole, we think that the first of the four conclusions which Mr. Hallam lays down as established, viz. that Overbury's death was occasioned not merely by Lady Somerset's revenge, but by his possession of important secrets, which he had threatened to divulge—remains still uncertain.

Even less are we inclined to conclude that James was a consenting party to this murder. The Secret Histories give us very little insight into the real state of things at Court, and we have few means of learning how Overbury was regarded by James, and whether the king's feelings towards him underwent any change, and if so, at what period. That Overbury was obnoxious to the queen and prince Henry, as Bacon averred in his speech, is probable enough, but we have found no good authority for Dr. Lingard's statement, that he could never obtain the favour of the king. Sir Henry Wotton's letter, before quoted, observes that James had a good while been disgusted with the said gentleman, but this is mere gossip, told without much information, as the rest of the letter shows. That James proposed to send him on an embassy, with a full knowledge that Somerset wished to be rid of him, is no doubt true, and perhaps he not unreluctantly punished his refusal by sending him to the Tower; but it is easy to see that Somerset could have procured the king's co-operation thus far upon very ordinary pretences. Our best evidence is to be drawn from the conduct of James at the disclosures. The first hint of the murder, and the first clue to the conviction of the parties concerned, was given privately to the king by Winwood, and it was then clearly in his power to have stifled the inquiry. Instead of doing so, he at once put himself in communication with the original informant, then committed the investigation of the business to Coke, the most intractable as well as the keenest of his judges, and afterwards took extraordinary pains in charging them all to omit no point whatever in the thorough sifting of the business. These circumstances we think irreconcilable with the supposition that the king himself was a party to the murder.

The question of Somerset's hold upon the king is a more intricate one, and its decision may in some degree affect that above discussed, since if there were any momentous secret between the earl and James, it is highly probable that Overbury also shared it. Of the transactions concerning Somerset's trial, which gave rise to these suspicions, we collect a most curious record from the State Trials, and from Bacon's letters. The minor criminals were no sooner despatched, than the case of Somerset and his lady was taken into consideration. Four months were spent in private examinations and in negotiations, the management of which was entrusted to Bacon. The first of his letters—some of which are addressed to the king, and some to Buckingham—is dated Jan. 22, 1616, and refers to a conversation just had with his Majesty on the matter. They are continued down to the trial in May. From these documents it may be inferred, first, that James was anxious to procure a conviction, and somewhat doubtful of such an issue. For, however little question may now be made about the guilty consent (to say the least) of Somerset, yet such was not the universal opinion then, nor afterwards. Even Weldon gives as his own belief, and that of most others, that the earl's part in the deed went no further than the imprisonment. Nor do we think it certain that the evidence on which he was found guilty would procure his conviction in a court of justice at the present day. Bacon tells the king that this evidence, though of a "good strong thread," needs to be well woven and spun together. He proposed also that the Countess should be tried last, lest she should say any thing towards clearing her husband, and that any digression of hers to this effect should be silenced. And in a very remarkable letter of April 28th, he discusses what plans would be best in the various events of the trial. To this are affixed the king's marginal notes, or apostilles. If Somerset should make a clean conscience and confess beforehand, James still wishes that the public trial should be gone through. If the lady confesses, and the earl pleads not guilty, and is found guilty, (as Bacon "thinks likeliest," and as really happened,) James wishes for stay of judgment. If he refuses to plead at all, time is to be given him to change his mind; and if he be acquitted (which Bacon "should be very sorry it should happen") the lord steward is to remand him to the Tower, to be questioned further in the Star-chamber, on other high and heinous offences, though not capital. Now from all this it may be inferred, secondly, that James had no wish to stop a public trial, nor any desire to remove or silence Somerset by death; though he wished him to owe his safety not to a public acquittal, but to such an exercise of the royal mercy as would secure his future dependence and respect.

It becomes then a question for decision, whether all this postponement of the trial and packing of the evidence, and previous negotiations with the prisoner, does not evince a consciousness that the earl could, if he so pleased, have made disclosures prejudicial to the king's credit; or whether such passages may not be explained by the customs of the times in such matters, by the peculiar fondness of James for searching out causes and trying conclusions, and by his anxiety to show that his justice could reach the highest head in the land, coupled with his reluctance to proceed rigorously against an old favourite, with whom he was perhaps not very grievously, and certainly not implacably, offended. That he did entertain serious apprehensions of what Somerset might say is beyond a doubt. Independently of the testimony of Weldon—now confirmed—as to his restlessness pending the trial, we collect that the instructions given privately to Bacon by the king were, to prevent him from becoming desperate, and to persuade him that his fair treatment in the Tower, and the lenient handling of his case before the peers, were the result of his Majesty's intercession; while Bacon suggests that when he is actually on his trial, he should be reminded that any attempt to tax the king would be followed by his being immediately removed from the bar, and deprived of his chance of pardon⁶. The question is, not whether James was alarmed at Somerset's menaces—for that is clear enough—but whether what he feared was the publication of some great and horrible state-secret, or merely such a general exposure as six years' unreserved intimacy would enable any favourite to make, and James, least of all monarchs, was of a character to sustain. On the whole, we are inclined to think the latter supposition the less improbable.

The opinions of contemporaries, and of older writers, especially of the Secret Histories, were certainly the other way. But their suspicions pointed in a direction which we know to be false. It was then rumoured that prince Henry was carried off by poison, administered by Somerset, with the connivance of James. We happen to have the best evidence possible in such a case that he died of a malignant fever, but it is not very consolatory to the student of history to observe that if we had not, fortunately, got this conclusive authority, we should have been inevitably led to an opposite determination, by an accumulation of testimony on the other side. So strange is the concurrence of evidence, both direct and indirect, to this point, and so conveniently would the hypothesis explain much of what we have now been so unsatisfactorily discussing, that we have at times been tempted to suppose that Somerset and his miserable quacksalvers, who were clearly quite ignorant of the power of poisons, had perhaps been tampering, though ineffectually, with the prince's life; that the will was theirs, though the deed was not; and that they at last attributed to their spells and powders a death which came by the visitation of God. But we cannot discover any considerations to explain such an atrocious attempt. Though no congeniality of temper or habit made the young prince a companion for his father, yet no serious quarrel between them is related, and it is hardly credible that we should be without record of any such differences as would make a proverbially kind-hearted monarch devise the murder of his eldest son. And if Henry had no high place in his father's every-day affections, yet this very circumstance would remove the rivalry and disarm the jealousy of the favourite. Birch showed great judgment in selecting the biography of this young prince as a subject for his pen, for he was a very remarkable person, and perhaps even the death of prince Arthur, a century before him, had hardly more effect than his on the fortunes of the English people and the English Church. But though he showed abundant indications of his spirit, yet there is not evidence that he formed any party, or that any party was formed against him, or that he raised any enemies of such power and malice as to bring about his destruction.

Some writers, in relating the particulars of this catastrophe, without precisely denying the consent of Somerset to the murder, have insinuated their belief, that the arrest and prosecution of the Earl were owing mainly to court factions and intrigues; that he had disgusted, by the haughtiness of his demeanour, a powerful party, who eagerly seized this opportunity of effecting his ruin; and that the king was no ways unwilling to be rid of an old favourite, and make room for a new one. Dr. Lingard evidently inclines to such an opinion, and Bishop Goodman expresses it without hesitation. It is evident, too, that some such conclusion was commonly accepted at the time. When the first criminal suffered, who was Weston, five gentlemen rode up to the gallows, and endeavoured to draw from him, in his last moments, an avowal of the truth or falsehood of the charge; a proceeding which was afterwards punished as an "attempt to slander the king's justice." It may be noticed too, that all accounts of the discovery of the murder concur in giving the chief credit of it to Winwood, a bitter enemy of Somerset's. And it is clear, from Bacon's Correspondence, that Buckingham was actively interfering in the matter, either by conveying the king's wishes, or suggesting his own; an influence which Somerset himself alludes to with obvious apprehension, in the least obscure part of his famous letter to the king. It would be absurd to deny that much of the zeal displayed in these transactions, arose from other motives than a love of justice, but we hardly think that any desire to be rid of a discarded favourite, can be shown to have had much influence upon James. The Secret Histories, with all their scandal, do not tell us precisely when the king first saw Buckingham, or when Somerset's splendour was first observed to wane. But it is clear, that even after Buckingham's establishment in the royal favour, Somerset had still considerable power and place, nor do we think it unlikely that James would willingly have kept them both about him. It is even alleged, though on no good authority, that he did desire his favourites to be good friends to each other, but that Somerset repelled the advances which Villiers made⁷. There is, however, quite enough in the king's conduct at the trial, to show that Somerset had not lost favour as well as credit. Though James perhaps was less scrupulous on these points than Henry the Eighth, and might not have thought it the necessary duty of a Christian man to kill one favourite before he took another; yet if his friendship had been altogether gone, there would have been no reason why he should step out of his path to save him from a just death, or restore him his forfeit inheritance. It is now well known too, that at a later period of his life, he made overtures towards reinstating him completely at court, and superseding Buckingham in his favour.

The reader has probably, by this time, looked long enough at this atrocious crime, and he will readily conceive what a boundless source of libel and scandal it afterwards proved. The proceedings of the divorce, the complication of the plot, the details of the crime, the accident of the discovery, all combined to make it one of the most popular illustrations of God's revenge against Murder; while the mystery hanging over it, and implicating the king's own person, supplied the Puritans and Republicans with a never-failing topic against courts and sovereigns. Never was a murder attended with circumstances so extraordinary, or so marvellously attractive to the vulgar. For five months, seven persons were incessantly engaged in poisoning one man. They were not adepts in toxicology it is clear, yet their efforts were reasonably vigorous. They gave him big spiders, cantharides, white arsenic, mercury sublimate, and rosalgar. These they administered uninterruptedly—Weston in his daily food, the Countess in tarts and jellies, which she sent from her own house. One day a servant was entrusted with a great pie to take down to the Tower. With the irrepressible instinct of his class, the wretch stuck his thumb through the crust, and sucked it. The treat cost him his nails, but saved him his life. At the examinations, Coke, who was bullying every body, came in turn to him ; “ And you too had a hand in this poisoning business,” said he ; “ If it please you, my Lord,” replied the fellow, “ I only had a finger, and for that I lost my nails and my hair ! ” The answer was so decisive that he was no more troubled. The extraordinary aspect of the facts alleged for the prosecution, that a man should be gorged with venom for twenty weeks, and live, did not escape the searching eye of Bacon in conducting the case. He thought it necessary to offer some explanation. He said that the first poisons being ineffectual, became antidotes ; that as they did not kill, they saved ; and rendered the body, like that of Mithridates, impervious to all that were subsequently administered ; an argument which, perhaps, in the days of homœopathy, will not be considered altogether vain. After all, Franklin declared on his trial, that they could not poison Overbury, and that he was smothered.

King James’s contemporaries might have engaged themselves in chronicling more important matters than such tales as these. One of the earliest of the Secret Histories, that bearing the name of Fulke Greville, does purport to be a memorial of the Condition of the State of England, and the Relation it had to other Provinces, but its contents display not the slightest warrant for this promising title. There was impending at this period a great change in the relations of the states of Europe to each other. A century had elapsed since Ferdinand the Catholic, profiting by the lessons of his crafty father, John of Aragon, had substituted accredited and formal representatives at foreign courts, for the secret agents employed by Louis XI., and had thus laid the foundation of that regular diplomatic intercourse between states, which becomes a distinguishing feature in history, immediately after the middle ages. But though embassies abounded in the sixteenth century, yet international politics did not at once make any great advance. States had not yet fully learnt to act in concert. And it may, we think, be doubted, whether the opponents of the Austro-Spanish, and Spanish monarchies, under Charles V. and Philip II., possessed clear ideas concerning a balance of power, or whether they were actuated by the same motives which guided the adversaries of the Emperor Ferdinand II. Still less do we think it can be shown that the supremacy of Spain was wrested from her, like that of Austria and France subsequently, by any external powers combined for that purpose. Philip was not arrested, like Ferdinand or Louis XIV., in a victorious career. Spain had already, in the middle of the sixteenth century, put the coping-stone to the huge fabric of her empire, and it soon began to crumble of itself. A handful of her subjects revolted against her oppressive rule, and revolted successfully, owing to the aid which the provoked and angry powers of England and France were ready to bestow, though they could attempt nothing of themselves. The vain efforts of Spain against these intrepid rebels exposed her weakness, but can hardly be said to have caused it. It could not have checked the growth of her power, for it had already finished growing. Her rapid decline has always been considered an historical problem, though one which, we think, it would not be very difficult to solve. But the causes were internal. The mischief was visible even under Philip II.⁸, and at the accession of Philip IV., forty years before the peace of the Pyrenees, had already been done. And so completely was this fact recognized, that one of the first acts of Olivarez, was to collect from the magistracy of each district of the country, a report of affairs in their particular locality, accompanied by such explanations of the general decline, and such suggestions for future improvement, as they might feel able to offer.

The change that was now impending was brought about by the famous Thirty Years' War, of which James saw the commencement, and might perhaps have accelerated the issue. In this desperate struggle the states of Europe learnt first the advantage of acting in concert, a lesson which became the more important, as the great game of war was played with more pieces than before. Europe was no longer represented by "the two crowns." Holland had gained, Portugal regained, an independent existence, and the powers of the North were now first brought into action.

The point about which these new allies were rallied, was at first nominally that of religion, and we think, with more sincerity on the Papist than on the Protestant side, but the contest quickly assumed its aspect of a struggle strictly for the balance of power, and religious wars were never seen again in Europe. At the end of the century Louis XIV. attempted to disperse the allies, and advance his own interests, by making it a war of religion, but in vain⁹.

Now let us see if we can briefly supply what King James's scandal-monger has omitted, and show something of the state of England, and the relation it had to other provinces in these times. Holland was the spot to which all eyes were turned. The struggle there was rapidly approaching a termination, and it was clear that the result would leave a new state, capable hereafter of being an unpleasant enemy, or a serviceable ally. Their successful stand had been owing to England and France, the first of which sympathized with them as Protestants, the last as rebels. But from the beginning the co-operation of France had been more cordial and more generous, and excited warmer feelings of gratitude amongst the people. The demeanour of Elizabeth had been both uncertain and ungracious, and James, with a sad lack of king-craft, made matters worse than they were before. In his heart he thought the cause of the Dutch a bad one, and that they were unjustifiably resisting their rightful sovereign. And this he disclosed so clearly that it was never forgotten. The disposition of the English people generally towards the Dutch appears to have been good, though arising more perhaps from religious sympathies, than those political considerations which should have been obvious to both states. It was not very permanently affected even by the atrocious massacre of Amboyna. The Dutch, however, did not return the friendship. In their eyes France had been their truest friend. This power they had not yet learnt to fear, while they regarded us with a dislike and suspicion, which the natural rivalship of commerce continually exasperated. In 1668, only four years before Louis marched his army to the gates of Amsterdam, De Witt told Temple that he could not help hesitating at the idea that Holland should forsake France, her ancient and faithful ally, and league with England, her inveterate foe. It was not till after the peace of Nimeguen, and the accession of William, that the Dutch and English understood their real interests, and contracted that alliance which remained for near a century unbroken.

If there was any person in these times who regarded the international relations of Europe with any thing like the judgment of after generations, it may be said to have been Henry the Fourth. Yet he seems to have confined his view chiefly to France and Spain, and to have considered other kingdoms merely as affecting the preponderance of one or other of the two crowns. These he thought were the two scales. If one went down, the other must necessarily go up ; and therefore he aimed at the aggrandizement of his own country through the depression of the house of Austria. But nothing can be more certain than that, at the period of his mighty preparations for this purpose, Europe was menaced with no danger whatever from this quarter. Austria and Spain were equally feeble : their united powers were hardly sufficient to rule the dependencies of either. Henry, however, did pretend to fear the overgrowth of Spain ; and he directed Sully to frighten James with the prospect of a universal monarchy to be centred in that sinking house. And either he or his minister anticipated the idea of effectually combining one half of Europe in the cause of Protestantism, and of enlisting in the fight the hitherto secluded powers of Old Scandinavia. The republics of Switzerland and Holland ; that of Venice, which at this period was on the very point of openly embracing the reformed faith ; the Protestant princes of the empire ; and the kingdom of Great Britain ;—these were the allies which Henry IV. purposed to join to the whole strength of France, for the execution of his projects. What these projects were, or in what they would have resulted, it may be difficult to say. The king probably looked at nothing but the debasement of the Austrian house. He is reported to have been quite ignorant himself of the geography, history, and constitutions of other countries, and, therefore, unlikely to have devised any such scheme as that famous plan of dividing all Europe anew into fifteen states¹. It signifies little who was the author of this extraordinary conception ; but it is remarkable, as showing how comprehensively politics must have been viewed before any such idea could have been arrived at, as the reorganization of the continent, and also as indicating what centres of union were thought fittest for the new kingdoms. Towards England, the feeling of France was tolerably friendly, and it was reciprocated. The English people respected Henry as the champion of the reformed faith ; a title which he affected long after joining the opposite communion. They sympathized with him as the enemy of Spain, the ally of Holland, and the friend of their late queen. Nor do we doubt but they would willingly have fought under his banner, if James had been willing, and if a religious aspect had been given to the war. In fact, France at this time stood well in the eyes of Europe, and was generally considered as the protector of the oppressed, or, in other words, of the Protestants,—a character which, notwithstanding her persecutions at home, she contrived to assume in the Thirty Years' War, and to sustain at the peace of Westphalia. Louis XIV., when he commenced his subsequent designs against Germany and Holland,—designs more formidable than any entertained by Spain,—found no little advantage in this character. It disarmed the suspicion of the Dutch, and gave him a party in the very heart of the Empire.

Spain, though, as we have before observed, it had ceased to be an object of serious dread to the people, was still regarded with undiminished hate. The failure of the Spanish expeditions against this country, and the effectual resistance of the Dutch, revealed the weakness of Philip's monarchy; while the successful reprisals of Elizabeth had taught the English to look on a Spanish war as a source of boundless profit. It was therefore against the will of many that the treaty with Philip was concluded at the commencement of this reign. But to Spain it was absolutely necessary. This power, still nominally possessing the supremacy of Europe, was compelled to purchase peace from a state so much below it in resources and extent. "One Spaniard told us," says Bishop Goodman, "that he himself had paid three thousand pounds to one man for furthering the peace." The chief ground of the national aversion to Spain was no doubt its identification with the cause of the Papists. In the late reign, the Roman Catholic party and the Spanish party were one and the same thing. The armada was believed by the vulgar to have been fitted out at least as much for the conversion as the conquest of the island; and the unsightly instruments of torture found on board were exhibited as engines to be employed for the same purpose as the fires of Queen Mary. Such conclusions as these directed full against Spain the machine by which popular feelings were then mainly moved. France was not equally liable to the attack: for though Henry called himself a Papist, he was still in league with all the Protestant powers; and a large portion of his subjects were open and courageous professors of the reformed faith. Yet it is certain, for all this, that throughout these times a greater influence was exerted on the mind of the English nation by Spain than by France. It was the Spanish literature, with its affectation, its conceits, and its obscurity, which gave the tone to ours ; a result perhaps partly owing to the fortunate enterprises of our mariners, and partly to the prepossessions of James and the connexions of the court.

The conduct and temper of James the First materially affected the position of England amongst the other powers of Europe. At the opening of that new intercourse between states, which followed upon their general consolidation after the middle ages, the pride of Henry VIII., and the ambition of Wolsey, had given considerable prominence to this island. "There was no treaty," says Herbert, "and almost conventicle in Christendom, in which Henry had not his particular interest." He retired, however, about the middle of his reign, a scena in secreta ; to enjoy that contemplative tranquillity prescribed by ancient philosophy for the close of a public life ; to guard more parentally and apply more judiciously the resources of his people ; and to relieve the pomp of royal duties by the calm quietude of domestic harmony. The brief and troubled reign of his feeble successors left them but little influence on continental politics, and the loss of Calais seemed to mark the determination of England's foreign power. The vigorous mind and sagacious ministry of Elizabeth again raised her country in the scale of nations, and both England and Holland soon gained that respect which is always commanded by successful resistance to superior strength. The queen's intervention was sought and obtained by the most powerful belligerents, and though her aid was scantily measured and ungraciously bestowed, yet its effect was decisive, and her position was little less commanding than that of her father. All this James lost. With opportunities far greater than that of his predecessor, he did not even retain the ground she had won, either with his allies or with his subjects. Unfortunately his predilections ran exactly counter to those of his people, and this was an age when the predilection of a sovereign had some weight in his council. He regarded the Dutch with an aversion which seems to have become hereditary in his family, and he looked up to Spain with the most profound respect. In James's eye the greatest of beings was a king, and the greatest of kings was the king of Spain. Philip was the incarnation of kingship. The speculative absolutism of James turned with veneration to a monarch of such vast dominions and such oriental state, whose uncontrolled power was not more owing to divine right than to the willing loyalty of his devoted subjects. No sooner was he on the throne of Britain than he anticipated the requisitions of Spain, and disclosed his desire for peace. It is impossible to blame his abstract preference of peace to war, but had he carried himself with greater dignity, he might have reigned in peace all his days, and yet retained the respect of France, and commanded the gratitude of Holland.

England thus played no part worth mention in that protracted struggle, which changed entirely the relations of European states; and the great treaty of Westphalia, the base of the modern system of European politics, was settled without her voice. Nor did she quickly reappear on the stage in her proper character. Incidental and isolated actions, it is true, showed that the national spirit was still the same. At the battle of the Dunes, Morgan's English regiments gave Turenne the victory over Condé, and decided the forty years' quarrel between France and Spain. At the battle of Estremos the English troops defeated Don John of Austria, and secured the house of Braganza on the throne of Portugal². But neither Cromwell nor his legitimate successors advanced England to her place. Thirty years later, when the designs of Louis XIV. had thrown all Europe into combination, it is remarkable how little effect was at first produced by the accession of this country to the league. The abdication of James and the recognition of William, deprived Louis of the only alliance he could possibly hope for, and threw into the scale against him the only first-rate power that remained. Men thought that the game was up. Bets were laid that William would be in Paris before Christmas. Yet the events of the campaigns were very little changed. The Buffs beat the French guards, and the Royal Irish took Namur, but on the whole the superiority of Louis was as decided as before. He never changed his tone or his position. He dictated the same terms with the same haughtiness; and after seven years' fighting he hardly lost ground. Louis at Ryswic was much the same person as Louis at Nimeguen. At each of these treaties he made nearly the same demands, and obtained the same concessions, and in the days of his after humiliations, he was almost as eager to refer to one as to the other for the preliminaries of a new arrangement. It was Marlborough that did all for us. The twenty years between 1690 and 1710, effected almost as great a change in our position as a similar interval has ever done for Spain.

To say that James was lightly esteemed by contemporary sovereigns is probably correct. Yet such statement does not necessarily imply any great censure. He might be as much above as below them. Henry IV. had formed his estimate of James's character before he succeeded to the British throne, and it seems from Sully's Memoirs that he expected to have little difficulty in bending him to his purposes. In this, at all events, he was disappointed. And we think that the conduct of James in his negotiations with Henry is not altogether to be blamed. At the age of fifty-eight, on a trifling pretext, and probably with no more definite motive than a wish to abase his rival, Henry was prepared to plunge all Europe into war. James refused him any cordial co-operation. It may be too much to say that he foresaw that the balance of power would hereafter be liable to more disturbance from France than from Spain, and that he was loth to aid in the aggrandizement of a formidable foe. Yet it required no great stretch of sagacity to discern that Henry's allies were always expected to give more than they got, and that the intended expedition promised little benefit to Europe, and less to England. The mistakes of James were oftener in modo than in re. The craft on which he so peculiarly prided himself was the point of his chief deficiency. If he preferred peace, it was with the air of a man afraid of war. He was overreached in every negotiation. If he wanted any thing, he disclosed his eagerness so precipitately, that the price of the commodity was sure to be raised. If others wanted any thing, they contrived to make the proposal come from him, and managed to be bribed into their own interests. With his parliament he was equally unfortunate. They knew that his purse was empty, and his purpose infirm; and they played with his necessities, and laughed at his rage.

His sagacity was at fault even in forming advantageous matches for his children, a business not requiring, nor often employing, a very high order of intellect. The heir apparent to the crown of Great Britain could only get a wife after much demur, and on hard conditions. His daughter's marriage—a marriage which was to furnish England with her sovereigns in after ages—was popular for the sole reason that the bridegroom was a Protestant³. In its immediate results a most unhappy match it proved, though it is absurd to say that it had any share in bringing on the Thirty Years' War. The unsettled state of ecclesiastical matters in the empire, and the disputes arising daily in such affairs from the incompleteness of former treaties and transactions, rendered it quite certain that war must occur before the political and ecclesiastical rights of the multifarious Germanic powers could be arranged. Accident produced the first explosion in Bohemia, and when the sword was once drawn, perhaps a confidence in his father-in-law's aid induced the unlucky Palatine to accept a more prominent position in the tumult than he would otherwise have dreamt of. This aid was not forthcoming; not, at least, to such extent as was anticipated, and the backwardness of James in this matter is one of the points in his conduct most frequently attacked. His son-in-law, without his advice, had accepted a crown with an unjust title, and most precarious tenure. He was forced to relinquish it to its former possessor, who proceeded in retaliation to amerce him also of his hereditary dominions. That James was bound to aid him in his aggressions is not often pretended, but even Bolingbroke, amongst others, contends that he should have been effectually supported in defence of his patrimony—that he should have been screened from just punishment, if not abetted in wrong. The excitement of the English people was outrageous. They insisted that Britain, without the co-operation of France, should recover a district in Germany from the combined powers of Austria and Spain, commanded by Spinola. A barrister was overheard to say that he was glad “Goodman Palsgrave and his good wife” (Frederick and Elizabeth) had been driven from Prague. The remark was pronounced a treasonable offence against the nation. The House of Commons decreed that the culprit should be carried on horseback, with his face to the horse's tail, to the pillory, that he should there stand three several times, and that he should pay a fine of a thousand pounds. On legal grounds an appeal was made; and the case was transferred to the lords. The Upper House corrected the judgment of the lower, and ordered that the criminal should stand three times in the pillory, should be degraded from the estate of a gentleman, be declared infamous, be whipped from Westminster to the Fleet, be fined five thousand pounds, and be imprisoned for life.

To understand these times aright, it is necessary to keep constantly in view, without a moment's oversight, one particular fact. The bulk of the middle classes hated Popery more than they feared the devil, or loved their money, or cared for themselves. This passion overwhelmed every other, even that of self-interest. The ruin of the Romish worship was an object compared with which the security of their own was insignificant. They spurned indulgences extended to Papists, and hugged persecutions which Papists shared. Bolingbroke says that

James made a great mistake in not acting decisively against the Roman Catholics at his accession, and throwing himself at once into the arms of the opposite party. There can be no doubt but this was the way to win. If the king had opened parliament by burning four papists in Palace-Yard, he might have browbeaten Yelverton, and imprisoned Digges, and obtained money enough to surfeit all Scotland. Coupled with penalties against recusants, proclamations might have been issued without remonstrance, and impositions levied without a murmur. For a marriage of his son with a princess of Brandenburg, James might have taken half the plate in the kingdom. And if Prince Henry had lived to reign, and had answered the expectations of his people; if he had abolished the surplice and seized the chapter-lands; if he had joined hands with Gustavus Adolphus, and marched twenty thousand men into Pomerania, we see no reason for doubting that he might have rivalled the authority as well as the renown of Louis XIV.

Burnet somewhere makes a remark, that all the periodical outbreaks against the Roman Catholics were owing to the horror with which the nation had been inspired by the cruelties under Mary, and Mr. Hallam has implied his concurrence in the observation. No doubt these traditional stories were told with effect, but other circumstances must have conspired to keep these feelings in such undiminished force. The puritanical doctrines, which many now openly professed, and perhaps more preferred, prescribed the most active hostility to the tenets of Rome, and from this source flowed most of the opposition in the House of Commons⁴. And though the lower and less educated people had welcomed the reformation less willingly, and lingered amongst the ancient forms more longingly than those of better understanding; yet they had now for many years been taught to associate this faith with all that was wicked and cruel. "The common people," says Goodman, "did hate them above measure, for they must ever have an object to their hate. Heretofore the Welsh, the Scot, or the Spaniard, and the French upon occasion ; but now in these later times only the Papists." When Bacon wanted to characterize the poisoning of Overbury, he called it a Popish crime. When the prisons were opened at a jubilee, those confined for murder and Popery were exempted from the general release. And it cannot be denied that such incidents as the Gunpowder Treason and the assassination of Henry IV. were not ill calculated to illustrate such teaching, and confirm the impressions produced by it.

If by designs against the people be meant a deliberate scheme to extend the prerogative at the expense of the acknowledged rights of the subject, such designs are not to be attributed to James. His idea of a king was formed on the definition of Rex given by civilians. Whatever he saw wrong he thought himself called on to amend. That there were no laws against extravagance and folly was the greater reason, in his eyes, why he should act without them. His proclamations were illegal ; but they were illegal proclamations against vice. The crown cannot interfere with the elections ; but this James never considered. He thought himself bound by his station to give good advice to his subjects ; and he issued an order that they should choose members of parliament neither bankrupts nor outlaws, but good men from their own country⁵. He wanted to unite England with Scotland and to leave them at peace ; but he imagined that both these events were attached to his person, and not determinable elsewhere. From beginning to end he was wretchedly deficient in all the points of his study and his pride. His scholastic learning taught him neither international law nor constitutional history. His philosophy never enabled him to understand the most comprehensible of people. His king-craft failed him in the commonest negotiation. His astuteness was all against himself. His best contrivances issued in gaining him credit for mischief which he never intended, and in misrepresenting good which he really meant. With much learning and some sagaciousness, he displayed the manners of an idiot, and fell into the blunders of a dunce. With great kindness, good intentions, and large professions, he injured his kingdom and provoked his subjects ; he was bullied and plundered during his life, and left an ill-favoured name behind him.

No one, we conceive, is satisfied with the state of Church music. Viewed in a mere artistical light, it is commonly either bad in itself; or, if not abstractedly bad, inappropriate; or, if suitable in style, badly performed. Viewed in a higher light, as something offered to God, as the supposed dedication of certain powers, as the devotional and solemn use of a great gift, we are apt to be pained by want of a devotional and holy tone either in the music itself, or in the singers. In short, whether viewed artistically or religiously, the state of our Church music provokes our grief or our censure, being either debased in style, theatrical, and undevotional, or drawled over, or hurried over, or sung mechanically, or bombastically by a self-complacent “choir.” That which is capable in the highest degree of quickening, sustaining, deepening, or elevating religious feeling, which, by its most penetrating influences can either rouse the soul, or soothe or melt it, is most times a disappointment or an annoyance. We either wince, or are weary; we are either indifferent, or distressed. It is the exception to be satisfied, to feel that music has done its work as a consecrated instrument, that it has been duly used as a help to godliness, that its utmost powers have been piously developed, that our natural notions of its impressiveness have been fulfilled, that our sober dreams of its capacities as a spiritual agency have been realized. We are bold enough to say, that in the majority of cathedrals, where of course we look for the nearest approach to perfection on this matter, the music is positively bad ; that is, the whole service is bad ; there is either bad music, or unskilful singing, or visible slovenliness, marked and open irreverence in those that take part in the service. And if cathedrals are in such a state, we can hardly be surprised at the wretchedness of parochial music ; a pilgrimage through parish churches would be a pilgrimage indeed to acute and sensitive ears and souls.

And, what is the worst feature of the case, as regards parochial music, it does not come from the people ; it is not in any sense congregational ; it is something exclusively appropriated to a few, peculiar to the gallery ; and when we speak of desiring congregational singing, or lament the want of it, we do not understand the well-meant, but excruciating and inconsiderate efforts of those to whom God has denied the gift of ear or voice, or both ; as it is, however, the congregation does but listen and look on ; and thus there is a notion of exhibition or display in the whole concern, as though the two parties, the congregation and the choir, occupied the relative position of "audience" and "performers." "The choir," in most cases, is an exalted body, pewed up, and curtained round, a small oligarchy, a distinct order, not to be meddled with, who "do" the music. Though we desire to retain "choirs," that is, a body of well-trained persons duly qualified to lead, not to represent or supersede, the musical part of the congregation, yet as long as they are separated in position from the main body of the congregation, and raised like ball-room musicians into an orchestra by themselves, so long shall we have to complain of the utterly uncongregational character of our parochial music ; and the more it loses its congregational character, the more it becomes a merely professional affair, the less will it partake of that style which is suited to parochial service.

And yet, while so seldom satisfied, so often wearied or distressed, we are ever expecting great things from the powers of music ; we all turn to it in the hope that it will give warmth, life, variety, spirit to our service, and help to bring back our wandering thoughts, and lessen our weariness or our coldness in the acts of prayer and praise. We have all our ideal of the power of our Liturgy, as musically expressed. Those on whom the privilege of feeling music has been bestowed, have the liveliest, we might say the most enthusiastic notions of its capabilities as an aid to devotion in its sublimest exercise. We raise before our imagination some service, as it might be in a cathedral, where a multitude of fervent and tuneful worshippers tossed, as it were, in holy rivalry the waves of praise from side to side; nay, even the present weak and emaciated state of cathedral service suggests our ideal, and gives a glimpse of possible excellence, were the cathedral system faithfully, vigorously, energetically worked out, and the ample endowments turned to the best account.

And while we have imaginary pictures of the grandeur of our musical Liturgy before our minds, we can see no reason why they should continue to be but dreams and holy fancies. While our hearts quite burn within us, as we contemplate the effectiveness of a service so performed, a Liturgy so illustrated and expressed, we can see no reason why the actual state of Church music should be so very far behind the ideal. Is it impossible ever to obtain one or two hundred devout persons skilled in singing to take part in the cathedral service? Or, taking a lower standard of hope, is it impossible to see, what has been seen in the Chapel Royal, "when the choir," we quote from the pamphlet entitled "The English Cathedral Service," at the head of our article, "consisted of twenty-four chaplains, thirty-two lay clerks, and twelve boys, all of whom were required to be well skilled in music, clear-voiced, and the men to be sufficient in organ-playing?"

Now, as music must be ever reckoned among the mysteries of the world, the mysteries of the spiritual world, coming we know not whence, and acting we know not how, so does it seem the duty of the Church, its proper work and office, as a body designed to incorporate into itself all influences capable of good, to develop, as far as may be, such a mystical power, to use an influence, so subtle, so unsearchable, so strong, so quick in operation. We can never, indeed, understand or analyze the action of this mystery; it seems so direct an agent, and yet unseen, penetrating like the wind, creeping and piercing into the very innermost heart, making, with its invisible touch, the whole system to vibrate. And while thus so forcibly working on some men, it is absolutely nothing to others; it is but empty, unmeaning sound; the sweetest air is no more than the rustling of dry leaves; while we see one set of men melted in a moment, or excited or depressed, we see another set of men, whose ears receive the same sounds, and yet the sounds have neither speech nor language, raise no emotions, pass over them without effect; their blood runs as evenly as before; their nerves are not touched; their whole system is wholly unconscious of the presence of an influence so strong in others, and they are themselves wholly unable to understand what others say of it.

But as the greater part of men are so strongly affected by the power of music, it would seem more peculiarly the duty of the Church to use such a mystery for good, because it is capable of abuse; it can be desecrated as well as consecrated; it can speak with an evil tongue as well as with a divine; it can act as a sensual, as well as a devotional stimulant; it can sweeten sin, or melt the soul and deepen its remorse; it can stir up the flame of carnal passion, or provoke to prayer. It is little likely that Satan should have set such an influence at nought; he knows too well its value as a means to excitement. How many scenes of worldly pleasure would pall, would grow insipid, flat, and wearisome, if there were not something floating in the air, if there were not music to quicken the pleasure-seeker's flagging pulse, to enliven, to inspirit, to brighten with artificial fire, to infuse its indescribable fascination! We must remember how it is said, "The harp, and the viol, the tabret and pipe, are in their feasts; but they regard not the work of the Lord." The world has not changed. What would be theatres, all manner of spectacles, ball-rooms, the infamous ballet, or, in lower life, the alehouse and its revels, if they were without sound, if they were scenes of mute dissipation, if the half-dressed ballet-dancer went through her shameless contortions of form without any music to stir the blood, by its excitement to drive off reflection, and to make the vicious entertainment more pleasurable by the addition of its magical influence?

It is, then, hardly left to the Church to choose whether or not she will employ this agency, whether she will leave it unused or not. If she has wisdom as well as faith, she must see that unless she would contend with the world at a disadvantage, she must try to use music as a persuasive to devotion and prayer. As the tabret, and the harp, and the viol are in the feasts of the world, giving the most forcible expression to worldly feeling, and making "the mystery of iniquity" work more successfully; so must the Church, that she may give the most forcible expression to religious feeling, cry out, like David, "Take the psalm, bring hither the tabret; the merry harp with the lute!"

How exquisitely has Hooker, as quoted by the author of the "English Cathedral," spoken of the power of music, when he says, "Harmony delighteth all ages, and beseemeth all states. It is as seasonable in grief as in joy, as decent when added unto things of greatest weight and solemnity as in cheerful and becoming festivity. . . . So that even if we lay aside the consideration of ditty or matter, the very harmony of sounds, being framed in due sort, and carried from the ear to the spiritual faculties of our souls, is by a native puissance and efficacy greatly available to bring to a perfect temper whatsoever is there troubled ; apt as well to quicken as to allay the spirit ; sovereign against melancholy and despair ; forcible to draw forth tears of devotion ; able both to move and moderate all affections. Therefore doth the Church, at this present day, retain it as an ornament to God's service and a help to our devotion.

“ In Church music, wanton, light, or unsuitable melody, such as only pleaseth the ear, and serveth not the matter that goeth with it, doth rather blemish and disgrace what we do, than add either beauty or furtherance to it. On the other hand, such faults prevented, music, when fitly suited with matter sounding to the praise of God, is in truth most admirable, and doth much edify, if not the understanding, yet surely the affection, because there it worketh much. They must have hearts very dry and tough, from whom such melody and harmony doth not sometime draw that wherein a mind religiously affected doth delight.”

We must, however, confess, that whatever are our theories, or dreams, or hopes, we are at present, and have been for many generations, leaving a great “help to devotion” unused ; or so abusing it, that it were as well not used at all. How different the conduct of the Romish Church abroad, and the Dissenters at home, both more wisely alive to the efficacy of this mystery ! The Dissenter uses it for its binding, uniting qualities, as a help to the preservation of the congregational feeling, by bringing a large body of the people into active and sensible co-operation. Though it is used coarsely, because of the coarseness of the hand that touches it, it does its work in this respect ; it binds, it cements : the congregational hymns create congregational sympathy ; singing together tightens the cord of fellowship, and helps greatly to associate souls. It is also no mean medium for the circulation of particular doctrine, and the more successful, because it acts somewhat imperceptibly ; it fastens certain words and phrases in the memory : particular tunes recall particular words ; they serve also to make the phrases palatable ; and many, we believe, have sung themselves into Calvinism, whom a more naked exhibition of such doctrine little affected. We know full well with what zeal and wisdom the Romish Church has seized upon the powers of music to affect her people, and to add to the impressiveness of her various services. Far, indeed, has she strayed from ancient purity of style ; and acting too much on the desire to produce effect, she has been drawn into the adoption of a somewhat theatrical and showy style ; there is a want of severity and grandeur in her modern compositions. “ The modern writers of the (Roman) Catholic Church," observes the writer already quoted, "among whom we include Nasse, Jomelli, and their contemporaries, too frequently regard words as the mere vehicle of sound; and whether the music, written to the same words, be grave or gay, seems the mere effect of caprice or chance. The solemn invocation with which the mass opens is, by the same composer, set to music of a totally opposite character; at one time with becoming gravity and solemnity, at another with a sole desire to make the movement sparkling and showy. The words implore the mercy of God and of Christ, while the music affords, and is designed to afford, to the prima donna of the choir the welcome opportunity of displaying her agilità di voce. 'The peace of God' is supplicated at the close of the mass by the rapid and noisy reiteration of a hackneyed operatic cadence, to the words 'Dona nobis,' a dozen times repeated with intervening symphonies. The grand crash is reserved for the 'pacem,' which is shouted to the full roar and din of the orchestra, 'the brass band' being at this point let loose, and the enraptured drummers enjoying the licence and luxury of a fortissimo."

The later Roman music is characteristic of the later Roman mind: it is without Gregorian chasteness or holiness. What greater contrast can be conceived than between the Gregorian chants and Mozart's masses? And it was well observed by one who is both a good Churchman and a good musician, that at Milan, where the Gregorian tones continue to be used with a laudable tenacity, they seemed too stern for the services; they seemed like a piece of grand and awful Norman amidst the elaborate delicate fretwork of a florid perpendicular chapel.

But still, whatever the peculiar merits or demerits of Romish or dissenting music, they both have music; they both cultivate it; they both recognize it as a weapon that may be used on God's side, that may be made as easily to heighten or revive religious emotions, as to fascinate in the service of the world. We alone have been careless; we alone have been letting a great power slip from our hands through indifference and neglect.

And yet there is nothing in the spirit of the English Church which would lead to this neglect of music. On the contrary, the English Church would encourage its cultivation; she would blend it with all her services; she would take it as a handmaid into all her holy places. If we have her spirit, if we breathe and taste her mind, if we try to work according to her mind, or make the working of the Church according to her spirit, we shall not fail to restore music to its proper place. How completely, for instance, is the whole cathedral system interwoven with music! it seems the very breath of cathedrals, the sweet breath that should always issue from them. When indeed weakness, and inefficiency, and scanty attendance of the members, and irreverence and want of heart were, through many generations, manifest in cathedrals; when the vast cathedral system had dwindled down into a mere shadow and mockery of its grand design; when the service had become unmusical or badly musical, then at last a great portion of the endowments was swept away. "The visible rhetoric" of a daily service, well attended by priests and lay clerks, was wanting to stay the spoliation when spoliation was desired. Cathedral bodies could only appeal to their theories for their defence; and theories, after years of practical neglect, speak with a faint voice. The systematic absence of the higher clergy from their stalls, that they might keep other preferment, furnished the Ecclesiastical Commissioners with the idea of a superfluity of members; virtual non-existence for the greater part of the year, or such partial cathedral life as was lived in three months, suggested the actual annihilation of a portion of the body. The practical misrepresentation of the cathedral system for two centuries has been the chief spoiler of cathedrals. Thus the Church has suffered a lasting loss, because her musical spirit was not rightly felt, or her notions of a grand sublime musical service forgotten or despised. If the service had been conducted in cathedrals with all that richness and reverence which they were designed to show, we should have seen no seizure of their revenues.

But while our Liturgy is designed to be musical throughout; while, as in cathedrals, that is considered to be the most perfect development of the Liturgy which is musical throughout, there is nothing in the English capacity that unfits them for excelling either in the composition or the practice of Church music. Indeed, the voices of the English are, as we conceive, peculiarly suited to the graver and more solemn styles of composition. They have little flexibility, but they have great sweetness of tone, with considerable power of sustaining the longer notes; whereas, with a rash and sad contradiction, it has been the fashionable humour to addict ourselves to the Italian school, which we literally "execute." Requiring, as it does, great flexibility but little modulation of tone, the qualifications which we possess are wasted, and those we have not are in demand. There is plenty of power in the English both to compose and to sing if the power were used. We firmly believe in the possibility of a general cultivation of music for Church purposes; and our belief springs from the sober contemplation of by-gone times. We have but to go back to the Elizabethan age, to be convinced of the power and strength of English musical faculty when duly trained. We have been a musical people; and as what has been may be again, we

We know that it has been the fashion to believe that we are not a musical people; that we have it not in us to be musical; that we are wanting both in power and conception, and in practical skill, in mind and in ear. Mawkish effeminate ballads are put forth as the representatives and samples of English capacity, and the want of modern compositions of a higher cast is supposed to prove that we cannot rise beyond such trashy productions. Now if St. James's church in Piccadilly, or the church in Langham-place, or the thousand thin and contemptible structures of modern date that disgrace the land, are fair specimens of English architectural capacity, we will freely confess, without further argument, that "The Bay of Biscay, O," "I'd be a Butterfly," and "Cherry Ripe," are the noblest possible developments of the English musical mind. As we go back to vindicate our architectural capacity, we may as reasonably go back to vindicate our musical capacity. It is true that the Romanist may maintain that the great triumphs in architecture were achieved previous to the Reformation; that we then rose above our own natural powers by the inspiring influence of the Church; by the possession of that mind, that spirit, which has all the elements of grandeur in every art, and has now departed from us. But while we allow that Church feeling did dignify our natural powers, we are slow to admit that the Romish branch of the Church has exclusively this dignifying and ennobling principle, for we would point to the present architectural spirit, which, it is true, the Church, but not the Romish Church, has quickened. But the case of music is entirely different. We vindicate the English from the popular and ignorant charge of musical incapacity, not by going back to times previous to the Reformation, but to those succeeding it. It is since the Reformation that we have excelled both as composers and as singers.

To speak first of our compositions; we point with devout exultation to the great body of Cathedral music. When we are asked "Where is your English school?" we lead the inquirer into the temple of God, and say, "Here is our English school; here in our Cathedral music; here in our holy anthems; here in our rich moving services; here in our expressive solemn chants is our English mind, as trained by the Church, as exercised in so devout and ennobling a cause." Here is abundant proof that we are not wanting in natural power, or taste or skill, if we will but cultivate our natural gifts. Where, we would ask, is there any school of music more exalted, more chaste, more full of science, more sublime in conception, and yet withal having a character of its own, marked with a national peculiarity, expressive of the English mind, trained and rightly disciplined by the Church? Truly has Mr. Jebb observed, "I am sure I am not going too far in maintaining that our Cathedral music has a substantive excellence unknown to any other Church upon earth." And the writer of "The English Cathedral Service" observes, in the same strain, "Our Church writers, from Tallis to Battishall, may be regarded as the best models of vocal part-writing; and in all the characteristics of ecclesiastical composition which the English school shares in common with those of Italy and Germany, it holds no second place." Just let us call to mind the names of our greater composers, which will immediately suggest so many grand and moving productions left for our use. The writer just quoted, in speaking of the Elizabethan age, when the full vigour of the English genius was put forth, furnishes us with a list of glorious names: "To Tallis and Tye, the English fathers of the art, were speedily and successfully added Byrd, Farrant, Morley, Bull, Weelkes, Kirby, Fanner, Dowland, Bateson, Gibbons." After this we have Hawes, Hooke, Child, Rogers, Weldon, Aldrich, and others. These are the greater lights which still continue to shine in their works, while there were doubtless a host of lesser constellations partaking somewhat of their spirit. In the writers we have mentioned, we have the combination of all those qualities which constitute them great musicians; vigour of invention, science, knowledge of their subject, and true discernment of the style befitting it, are manifest in their work. Indeed, in devotional harmony, which is, after all, music's chief strength, they may be said to excel the writers of any other school in the world. The earlier anthems and services are rich in continued harmony; harmony is their forte, and ought to be the forte of musicians who devote their genius to the Church; they at once felt the choral and congregational character of the Church service; they understood what was meant by "Common Prayer;" they gave themselves accordingly to the production of essentially choral music; they wrote for a large body of voices; nor was it till degenerate times came on that the harmony of the English school declined.

It is true that in appealing to this class of composers as mainly constituting "The English School," we prove in fact that ours has been chiefly a Church school. Our cathedral music is our English music; we have, if we except madrigals and some glees, no other compositions of a high order. Of the madrigals, many certainly have a highly ecclesiastical character; the fair Oriana was panegyrised with many most psalmlike strains, and wakened from her sleep by serenades grave and lugubrious. Though we like each separate subject to have its own distinct and separate style, it is better that the worldly music should partake of the Church than, as is now too common, that Church music should partake of the world. We had better have solemn madrigals than operatic hymns. It is, however, this very fact, that we have more clearly excelled in Church music than in that of any other sort, which prevents us from hopelessly yielding to the trash with which the Church is now inundated, as though improvement were impossible.

But not only have we abundant proof of our capacity for compositions of the highest class, but we have also testimony of a considerable cultivation and practice of music among the people. A few master minds might have risen as composers, and yet there would have been no evidence of a general appreciation of their works; they might have been handed to us as wonders, never enjoyed or felt, but only wondered at. But if we have a large body of composers, a thick phalanx, a rich cluster of writers, rising in quick succession the one after the other, we have strong presumption that there was much music among the people, much love for it, much knowledge, and much perception of what was good. And this view is still further strengthened by considering that this multitude of composers wrote in an essentially choral style. Would they have all continued writing chorally, if there had been no chance of getting their music performed, of obtaining a body of voice that would do justice to their music, and give it its designed effects? When at last a less choral style was adopted, it was probably the decay of musical knowledge among the people that threw the composers upon a less choral system, that forced them to seek their effects from solos and duets, and trios; to attend more to air and less to harmony.

But the madrigal music is, from its very nature, strong evidence in support of our belief that music was once widely and popularly known: for here is a kind of music wholly depending on a large body of voice. It wants numbers. Duly to perform a madrigal there should be some thirty or forty voices. And this was the popular music of the Elizabethan age, as popular as ballads are amongst ourselves. As to Church music, we have but to take up an old Prayer-book, where we find the tunes printed with the metrical psalms, to obtain another argument in support of our opinion. To have had the tunes printed as well as the words, would have been a most superfluous work, a mere waste of type, and unreasonable expense, if congregations had no musical portion to whom they were of use. The custom implies knowledge on the part of the people, and though it ceased with the neglect of music, we must return to this plan of the old Prayer-books should we ever regain our knowledge.

The English school was, however, of no long continuance ; vigorous for a time, it lost the source of its strength when the piety of the Church waxed cold. The writer of "the English Cathedral Service," dates its decline from the reign of James I., admitting at the same time that there were yet gleams of olden excellence, that many great geniuses rose, and caused a sort of twilight to precede the darkness of the last century. The decline was gradual, we did not at once become unmusical: we did not at once descend from Tallis to Kent, or from Gibbons to Jackson. We had our steps and stages of deterioration. Harmony gradually gave way to naked melody, the tone of the Church to the tone of the theatre, or the drawing-room. We see in the descent that the composers, besides losing grandeur of mind, science, true pathos, devout feeling, felt the loss of a full choir. Increasing weakness on their part was accompanied by increasing ignorance on the part of the people. The composers, therefore, were compelled to trust to single voices or a few voices, and not to a body of voices ; to trust to air not to harmony. As time went on, they were constrained to depend on a celebrated bass, or a celebrated tenor, to a capricious few, who felt the importance of their voices or knowledge amid the general scarcity. The full anthems were succeeded by verse anthems, in which the celebrated bass and tenor showed off their voices or their skill. The full "Te Deum," lost its chant-like character, and became more like a series of airs ; it ceased to be like a varied chant, which would seem to be the perfect mode of expressing it. The chants too as gradually assumed a lighter character, and the double chant, only tolerable when it preserves something of the antiphonal effect of the single chant, was almost exclusively used ; whereas, as the author of "the Apology" has so well said, "a chant should be all compact ;" it may easily be too tuneful. The psalms for either morning or evening contain sentiments so various, that by a very striking air some of them must be ill expressed ; to say nothing of the wearisomeness of thirty or forty repetitions of a remarkable phrase in a short air, in the course of a quarter of an hour.

Not only did the music lose its choral character, but, as a natural consequence, it lost its religious and ecclesiastical tone. When a few men sang, it began to be considered that they were singing to the congregation. From the Restoration downwards, we must note an increasing secularity. All distinctness of style disappeared. Even Purcell's most brilliant mind was infected by the age. One of the most vigorous and original minds was unable to stem the tide. Much as we owe him, and deeply as we admire his works, we had almost wished that he had lived in less vicious and secular times. He was tempted to divide his affections between the theatre and the Church; we know not what the theatre gained, but we know what the Church lost; a great light was clouded. Later still, as though cathedrals were waste places which no one entered, where good music was not, or could not be sung, for which it was not worth writing, the composers of sacred music took refuge in the concert-room, by the invention of the oratorio, an invention which unhappily attracted the mighty genius of Handel, and was highly characteristic of a secular age, being little more than a sort of sacred opera, in which great singers stand up before an admiring audience, and sing not to the glory of God, but to the satisfaction of the audience, and their own temporal profit. Alas! that the daily prayer even of cathedrals should be disturbed by the occasional intrusion of oratorios, at what are called "Festivals." At last we reach the wretched undevotional, but popular Jackson, who effectually extinguished the last glimmer of good taste and devout feeling in Church Music. Such was the decline into which our music gradually fell, after years of vigour, and its vigour has been popularly forgotten in the contemplation of the shrunken and sickly features of its later years.

But without going farther into the proof of the English musical capacity (and we will admit that our genius is not of that exuberant kind, that it will grow and ripen without culture), we think it sufficiently clear that we have been a musical people. And if we have once been musical, are we never to hope or never to strive for the revival of a dormant and neglected gift, that can be brought so powerfully to bear on our spiritual state? Happily there are gleams in the sky at this present time, many cheerful signs of awakening zeal, longings of heart for the old songs of the temple, and the old skill in singing them. The increasing piety of the age is itself likely to lead to the ardent cultivation of all powers that can help to greater devotionality of mind. Among the more direct signs of the times, we may notice the multitude of recent publications on Church music. Ten years ago scarcely a work of the kind appeared; a provincial volume of old psalm-tunes spoilt, or of new psalm-tunes of the Rossini school, or of solemn variations of the popular air of the last opera, was occasionally put forth by some country-town organist, of ambitious mind. As for any other works of thought or true feeling, really ecclesiastical or sound, investigating the theory, or helping the right practice of Church music, there were none such to be found. But now we cannot glance at any page of advertisements, at the upper strata of any bookseller's shop, without seeing almost countless works grappling with every branch of the subject, some practical, others theoretical; some giving notes, others principles; some entering into the whole choral system, others digging up the Gregorian tones; and all betraying something better than merely a professional or scientific view of the matter, and entering on the subject with that devout enthusiasm which seems necessary for success. It would be endless to enumerate much more, to enter into the details of the works recently issued. We can but mention the most important. Foremost in rank comes Mr. Jebb's excellent and elaborate work. Such a work is itself enough to give us hopes of the age. It is earnest, true-hearted, and, what is more, fearless in its rebukes of present errors and neglect. We sincerely wish that Mr. Jebb could be induced to issue it in an abridged and more moderate form, that it might obtain as wide a circulation as it deserves. Its present size and cost prevent its usefulness, by putting it beyond the reach of any, who are not already somewhat of enthusiasts in the cause; whereas, we want to raise a true spirit among those as yet but slightly affected. Another thoughtful work has appeared by a gentle enthusiast, entitled "the Apology for the Cathedral Service." The writer feels every word he speaks; his book is a true book; we see a true mind talking in its leaves. There is a warm sorrow for the present weakness of the cathedral service, which, when duly performed, he so beautifully calls "a celestial service," while his strictures are mixed with a grave playfulness, the lightness of a mind that keeps its youth even in its maturity. We must also mention an able volume, entitled, "The English Cathedral Service." We hope the writer, clearly an ardent and discerning lover of true Church music, takes a too desponding view of our condition, or rather of our prospects. It is, however, a work of great power, full of melancholy truth and facts, and taking a true view of the cathedral system and cathedral duties. Nor must we fail to speak of the magnificent and costly reprint of ancient Merbecke, which has issued from the press of the enterprising and tasteful Mr. Pickering. As for editions of Tallis and of Gregorian tones, they increase daily. We rejoice at the sight of all these publications. Much writing and reading must precede any general cultivation of Church music; and the more minds are working upon the subject, the more likely is the foundation to be rightly and deliberately laid. Not that we are altogether without deeds as well as words. We need only allude to the service at St. Mark's college, at the parish church, Leeds, at St. Paul's, Knightsbridge, and at many other churches both in town and country. And what gives stronger substance to our hopes is the fact, that these and such-like efforts have risen from a more devout contemplation of the Church and its offices. The movement has begun in the right place ; the Church movement has preceded, and has caused the musical movement ; a merely musical movement would be disappointing ; but when the Liturgy is studied by pious minds, and it becomes the desire of the Church to glorify God with the best exercise of his gifts, then we see the subject entered upon in a right spirit ; there is less danger of music becoming a mere taste or an amusement.

But, at this stage of advancement, we think it time to be directing men's minds especially to practical results, that is, to the practical improvement of Church music ; we shall make no apology for offering, as our contribution to the cause, a few remarks of a practical character. And, first of all, we must express our strong conviction, that there can be no permanent improvement unless the clergy are once more skilled in music, unless it is made a necessary and essential part of clerical education. Here and there a temporary improvement may be seen, where some particular clergyman is something of an enthusiast ; but enthusiasts are scarce ; we must not trust to be lighted by comets ; we want continual, even light. The present rising tide will most surely ebb after a time, unless it is kept up and directed by the clergy, unless they acquire more knowledge of music as well as interest ; for interest without knowledge is fitful and capricious. The present feeling will either decline, or degenerate into a mere abstract study and admiration of music, unless the clergy keep the devotional feeling alive as well as the music, and the music alive as well as the devotional feeling. A sort of patronage of music, with a notorious ignorance of that which they patronise, a standing by and approving, or censuring, where the censure or praise are equally without discrimination, is not the part which the clergy must play, if they desire to make music, what in God's service it might and ought to be made ; undiscerning admiration is worse than none ; the affectation of interest is without influence ; and the learned archdeacon who praised a service in K., would have been more wise by being mute.

Now, if music ought to be made a part of clerical education, it ought, at least, to form a part of University education, even if its principles are not instilled at the public schools. The University authorities could not do better at this present day than show their readiness practically to meet the wants of their times. Thus they might wisely introduce the study both of architecture and music, under proper rules and restrictions ; they would be gaining the management of tastes which will be pursued, and which by a wise, and prompt, and cautious interference, may be pursued with profit. By allotting stated times to such studies, they may prevent them either being followed in a desultory way, or absorbing all the time of those who keenly feel their attraction. Music is, of course, the most important study, as its knowledge is of daily use and daily application. Churches may be built or restored, or increased with skill and taste, though the incumbents themselves are blind to all architectural proprieties, if they resign themselves wholly into the hands of discerning men; but music is not so advantageously handed over to others; it wants constant interest, attention, criticism, control, watchfulness.

Now, besides the advantages which must arise, if the great body of the clergy were skilled in music, in that which, whether ill done or well done, is a part of Divine Service, we see many other considerations that seem to invite the University authorities to make some efforts in such a cause. We would appeal to the more selfish principle, venturing to suggest whether it is not possible that the encouragement of studies which partake so much of a relaxation may not help to make a University career more satisfactory even at the time, apart from after results. Surely it would be no unwise step to furnish the young men with good relaxations, and to oppose hurtful or foolish pleasures by a prudent provision of such as are harmless. Viewing music simply as a good relaxation, or a good excitement to certain minds when duly controlled, we think it might be made to fill up many idle and wasted hours, to prove a successful rival to many questionable pursuits in hours of idleness, and as a counter-attraction to exceed in interest. And what material is there in the Universities for showing the power of music! With what strength it might be endued! What stirring sounds might be made to swell from a multitude of voices, now either ignorant of their powers, or wasting them apart from one another in childish and foolish songs! Two or three hundred voices joining in one of the fine old anthems of the Church would soon make an interest in the cause; the young men would soon grow warm with such holy harmony, and covet to take part; while we need not say how gladly such a recreation would be accepted by that more thoughtful portion of undergraduates which is now happily springing up. If the minds of many young men had been lately engaged in pursuits serviceable to the English Church, and admitting some measure of enthusiasm common to youth, they might have been contented with the food provided them by their own Mother, instead of seeking to satisfy the cravings of their eager spirit with Romish theories. We want the wisdom rightly to employ, to busy, to interest ardent spirits; we seem so afraid of a little enthusiasm that we take no pains to direct it. We should like to see in the Universities something besides a "chair" attached to the Professorship of Music; we should like to see it made a practical and useful office, and the instruction of the young men intrusted to the professors (none more qualified than those who now hold the empty recompense of a chair), and those professors bound, not to deliver a terminal lecture to an empty room, but with proper assistants, throughout every term to carry on a system of education.

But we commend this subject to the University authorities, not simply because of the benefit which would in all likelihood accrue to the Universities themselves, but because the introduction of such a study would be of the highest practical service to the Church. A clergy well trained in music would go forth well prepared to render every part of Divine Service as far as possible worthy of its end. They would be able at least to superintend the instruction of their flocks; and knowledge on their part would provoke knowledge on the part of their congregations. Parishes would cease to have fits of music and fits of unmusicalness; such fits depending on the accidental absence or presence of some musical or unmusical clergyman for the time. There would be a continued system at work, varying only in intensity or in degree of excellence, according to the keener or less lively love of music in the clergy for the time.

It may, however, be asked whether we can make all the clergy musical. Without going so far as a modern notion, that every body can sing if they are taught, we are ready to believe that but few are so disqualified by nature as to make the study of music in early life a hopeless or useless task. But of the vast class who can acquire considerable knowledge, a still smaller class, it is true, will be found able to sing; but in the clergy we do not want so much the power of singing, as of criticising; we want knowledge more than voice, though of course it gives additional impulse to congregational singing where the clergy are able actively to take part. We believe that by cultivation the clergy on the whole would be filled with such an amount of knowledge as would fit them to be good judges of the music that ought to be performed, the portion of the service that ought to be musical, and the manner of the performance. They would at least learn to have a reverence for certain names, and a just horror of certain other names; they would know that Jackson is bad and Gibbons is good; they would have their "Fathers" in music; and by sticking even mechanically to their musical calendar, we should have a defence against the invasion of quavering lackadaisical hymns and sing-song jig-like chants; we should be sure of pure, and chaste, and ecclesiastical compositions.

And what is the result of present clerical ignorance on this matter? Take first the present condition of the cathedral service in the majority of cathedrals. Mr. Jebb has truly called it "a niggardly service." We have majestic temples, that make one's very souls bow themselves and feel the presence of God more sensibly; we have rich revenues that the service may be proportioned to the temple in grandeur, in magnificence, in holy richness; and yet we must feel in most cases that we have nothing to meet our expectations, to carry on the enthusiasm or the warm feelings of devotion that the outward building excites; we must feel that the ten or twelve thousand a-year or more does yield but "a niggardly service," that the cathedral does not have its own priests, that its stalls are empty or but partly filled, that its revenues are not returned into its own bosom. When we see the thin scanty body of ministering persons, lay and clerical, half of whom are incompetent to do the service, we instinctively exclaim, "What would the Romish Church do if the cathedrals were in its possession now! What instant increase of ministering persons would be made: all these empty stalls would be filled!" In short, we cannot say that cathedrals are in a satisfactory state; that they fulfil, or are felt to fulfil their purpose; that they are the glorious patterns to which all other Churches should wisely look. We cannot say that we have in most cathedrals the greatest possible effect given to the Liturgy, that our ideal, or any ideal, of the real beauty of our service is daily realized. On the contrary, the service in most cases, to use the mildest term, disappoints us; it is notoriously disappointing, and most disappointing to those who, like ourselves, are the most ardent admirers, the most hearty lovers of the cathedral system. When we are awed and almost overpowered, as at Lincoln or York, by the outward and inward sublimity of the building, we undergo a positive reaction as the service begins. We expect we hardly know what as we enter,—something very solemn, very rich, very touching and soul-stirring; we are in a mood to feel deeply the sweet solemn sounds of musical praise, or the penitential tones of confession; but we have certainly just what we did not expect. If it is not a hasty slovenly service, it is weak and ineffective; fine music perhaps attempted, but not performed for want of a sufficient number to fill up the parts; no basses on this side or no tenors on that, so that it becomes, if we may so speak, a lop-sided service. The cathedral system, the theory, is not carried out; and thus the cathedral service has ceased to retain the love of the best part of the people. Here and there exceptions may be found, as at Exeter, Durham, and Canterbury. We see more reverence, more marks of zeal and care, a greater and more punctilious attendance of ministering persons at daily prayer, a greater air of interest and of heart in the service; the boys are not laughing and cracking nuts. And what is the consequence? There are larger congregations; more interest in the cathedral on the part of the laity. The greater zeal of the cathedral body is instantly met by greater appreciation of the privileges of such places of daily prayer by the people. At the same time, we must not be supposed to say that even these cathedrals are in the state in which they ought to be.

But, in other cases, place the actual state of the cathedral opposite the theory; where is the "full-voiced choir," where the college of resident priests, chanting the service daily, assisted by a considerable body of lay clerks? Putting Sundays out of the question, (which, as they are too often looked upon as "show days," and made, in some measure, to atone for week-day neglect, are no tests whatever of the ordinary or real state of a cathedral,) a single canon, a single minor canon, four or five lay clerks¹, or less, and a few boys, represent the whole energy of the system. In order that the nakedness of things, the inefficiency or insufficiency of the staff may be less discerned, the organ is made to act as a noisy proxy for the absent priests and laymen; the great body of sound proceeds from that which can neither praise nor pray; and thus even prayer and praise, in these days, seems resigned in a great measure to machinery. If organs had not been invented, we know not what would have been done.

Of course the first act of amendment must consist in the permanent residence of the capitular body in their cathedral town; residence is now the exception, absence the rule. The income of chapters is evidently assigned them, not for living away from their cathedrals², but for living near them. Who would have been so absurd as to have left 1000*l.* per annum to a presbyter, for three months' residence? Or who will be so mad as to dream of endowing honorary canonries, when the endowment would be spent at a country living? But this is not all: we do not conceive that such a change as would recommend the modern cathedral system to the admiration of the more thoughtful part of the people, would be effected solely by increased attendance of the members, however excellent in itself. The whole body of officiating priests, both canons and minor canons, must take a part in Divine Service, that Service being musical throughout. This would be a fulfilment of the cathedral theory; for the service was not designed to be left chiefly to laymen, while the priests did but listen or join in spirit; the priests were to lead, to perform the service, while richness and fulness of sound were to be attained by the assistance of lay clerks. As it is, canons' do not, or cannot, intone the prayers; even at Durham, among the best of cathedrals, the Sunday morning prayers are completely spoilt by the unmusical tones of the canons, whose part it is to intone the prayers, while they will not make the effort. "For the sake of truth we must observe," says Brown, in his Dissertation on Poetry and Music, "that in the performance of cathedral music, a separation has taken place fatal to its true utility. The higher ranks of the Church do not think themselves concerned in its performance. It were devoutly to be wished that their musical education were so general, as to enable the clergy, of whatever rank, to join the choir in the celebration of their Creator in all its appointed forms;" the author of "the Apology," having these words before him, proceeds to say, "This passage was printed in the year 1763, when it may be presumed the declension which it deploras had been very rapid; for at the coronation of George the First, the Litany was chanted by two bishops, a precedent which the well-known taste of George the Third assures us would not have been departed from at his accession, if the episcopal bench had enabled him to follow it. Cathedral statutes take for granted that capitulars have a knowledge of music, or appointments to musical stations in the Church would not have been left in their hands; but if they should not have enough, the statutes still provide against the want of it being very mischievous, by enjoining 'that the minor canons, and lay clerks, be men whose skill in singing shall be acknowledged by the judgment of those who are cunning in the art of music in the same.' . . . The same inference, as to the acquaintance of the higher clergy with music, may be drawn from the statutes of collegiate foundations; e.g. at the royal chapel of St. George, the dean and canons of Windsor may command the teachers to bring the boys before them, that they may be heard and tried whether they profit in grammar and music, as they ought to do.' We smile without scruple at the ignorance of ecclesiastics in the dark ages ; but the general unacquaintance of the clergy of our own times with that ‘ only science, besides divinity, which is suffered to enter the Church,’ might abate our contempt for their ignorance who built our cathedrals, and were qualified to take a due share in the worship enjoined to be performed in them.”

² We wish it were not the fashion to build or buy episcopal houses in the country apart from the cathedrals, whereby a bishop's attendance at daily prayer becomes an impossibility. It is doubtless pleasanter to live in the country, but we want bishops in towns.

We have, indeed, a painful instance of the injury which cathedrals have received through the ignorance of music amongst their members. The Ecclesiastical Commissioners, having in their minds the one great object of capitular spoliation, hit upon certain officers called Precentors. In a certain number of cathedrals, those of the later foundation, they found the Precentors poor enough, and, though poor, having some knowledge of their duties, and trying in some measure to fulfil them. But they came to another class of Precentors, who ranked as Canons, who had good houses, good incomes, good offices altogether. When this booty was beheld, it was quickly asked, “Of what use are Precentors?” “What is it that they do?” The question was repeated, and no commissioner could reply. “Destroy the Precentors,” was then the universal cry. “It is now an useless office ; they do but live three months in the cathedral town ; they cannot sing ; they cannot chant ; they cannot criticise ; in short they cannot do the Precentors’ work.” There was no pointing out Canonical Precentors who were doing their work, who were skilled in music, who were superintending the performances of the choir ; and so the last century of Precentorial ignorance and incompetency was in this practical age the argument for their virtual extinction. The office was made honorary, and honorary it will remain. It is true that the commissioners ought not so much to have asked, what is it that the Precentors do, as, what have they to do ? What ought they to do ? What is their work ? What is the theory concerning them ? What part have they in the system ? They would have found abundant cause for retaining these officers with untouched incomes, if they had revered the system and theory of cathedrals ; but in this short-sighted age, when men are found filling offices ill, the office is to be reckoned as an ill thing or an useless one. Let us hear what Mr. Jebb says of the duties of those whom the Ecclesiastical Commission supposes to have no duties worth paying for, and whose perpetual absence they have accordingly provided for. “To the Precentor the superintendence of the principal part of the Church Service belonged. He examined and superintended the chanters, fixed the services and anthems for the week, and was responsible for the appointment of the choir-boys. On the greater feasts he intoned and commenced the Church-hymns. Thus that most important and religious office of regulating the Church music was regarded as it ought to be, worthy the personal superintendence of one of the chief dignitaries, who himself took part in its performance."

We do not, however, for a moment cast the slightest shadow of blame upon canonical bodies because they are ignorant of music ; it would be the height of injustice to visit upon them the blame which lies equally at the door of all the clergy. They are but priests, taken out of the great body of priests, and cannot be supposed to have other or higher qualifications than those commonly possessed by the body ; if the clergy are ignorant of music, how can we expect canons to be skilled in music ? The fault lies with the clergy at large, to whom the ordering of the music, whether in cathedrals or parish churches, is intrusted, while they are at this present time quite incompetent to order it. Till the clergy have a musical education, we must bear with the present weak, and languid, and imperfect representation of the cathedral service.

When we turn from cathedrals to parish churches we find like traces of the evil results of the clergy's ignorance of music. First of all, the whole ordering of the music, so properly vested in the clergy, is really resigned to the organist, and, where there is no organist, to the choir. The style of music chosen by these persons, who in many cases have received little of an education in music, none in ecclesiastical music, is naturally often most uneclesiastical. Hence we have the drawing-room chants and melodramatic Te Deums we have spoken of, adapted from profane airs, and ever associated with words profane, with wondrous organ accompaniments, in which the organist celebrates himself, and ingeniously makes his Sunday "execution," an economical advertisement for pianoforte pupils in the week. And not only is the music debased and bad, but, what is worse than any mere deficiency in knowledge, the coterie in the gallery is not always celebrated for reverent demeanour in church ; being packed up out of the sight of the clergy, there is often a shuffling over of books, a skurrying into church just before the Te Deum, and inattention to every thing but the music. Such conduct (no rare thing in parish churches) brings the whole musical portion of the service into disrepute ; it is connected with irreverence and irreverent persons ; it gives the congregation a distaste for music, and disposes them to think that there must be something radically wrong in its tendencies, because it is abused. And this indifference or distaste is still further heightened by the style of the music itself, which is commonly so wholly uncongregational in its character, full of trios and solos, that those who wish to join in it are positively repelled ; and, more than this, parts of the service are sung to which the choir is not equal, which are quite above their powers; difficult music is presumptuously preferred to simpler; intricate anthems are mangled, when easier ones might have been attempted, and a miserable caricature of the cathedral service is the result of all this pretending ignorance of half-trained choirs. And what can the clergy do? Their ignorance of music is known; they cannot choose good music; or if they stumble on it by chance, they cannot criticise its performance; they have no weight with the organist and the choir; they must leave the matter with those into whose hands it has unfitly fallen; they half hate, half dread "the gallery;" they cannot see what goes on; the congregation complain of the music; the gallery (for musical skins are ever thin), are touchy and threaten to depart. Music is the apple of discord; they want congregational singing, but cannot get it; they dislike the gallery, but they cannot defy it, for they have no confidence in their own powers, no knowledge how to set to work and provide a new and more teachable substitute.

Now, if the clergy were skilled in music, they would be able to choose good ecclesiastical music, suited to the powers of their choir and congregation; they would hinder musical ambition from over-singing itself; they would bring the choir into the midst of the congregation, and rend the miserable curtain that but half hides so much irreverence; their authority as ministers would be supported by their knowledge as musicians; their known interest in the music would act in time on the congregation; they would be able to induce many persons, especially the more devout, to join in the singing, to practise either at home or in a parochial class; they might increase or form their choirs by the aid of volunteers, who now shrink from the gallery system.

We may observe, by the way, that open seats, all looking one way, seem likely to give the greatest encouragement to congregational singing; those who sing do not feel the eyes of their neighbours fixed upon them; they can sing without observation, and it requires more than common powers of abstraction, especially in timid persons, to be faced and not to feel or think about it.

But we believe that not only the choir and the congregation, but that that most important body, the organists, would in time be acted upon by the cultivation of music among the clergy. The organists have now to make their own way towards the ecclesiastical style; no wonder if, among other employments, they sometimes miss it; but when once the clergy were interested in the organist's business, the organists, happy in such new and cheerful sympathy, would be apt to catch from them something of an ecclesiastical mind; the organists of our cathedrals, justly observes the author of "The Apology," are in general men of great professional knowledge; yet the statutes, with much wisdom have assigned the chief direction of the music to the precentor, who will often be swayed by nice considerations, to which a layman might be less sensitive, and he will constantly have the advantage of consulting his colleague. That an ecclesiastic placed in such a post as this should himself be skilled in music, is a truth which cannot need enforcement." We agree entirely with these remarks; but we would make them of more general application, and not confine them to the precentors and organists of cathedrals; for we hold that every clergyman is the precentor of his parish church, and ought to be qualified for the post. He ought to be a more discerning critic than the organist of the spirit, the tone, the fitness of the music, more skilled in the ἡθός, less skilled in the service. Let us suppose a clergy thus skilled; must it not follow that their intercourse with the organists, their co-operation, their sympathy, will help to convey to them a portion of their spirit, a portion of the ecclesiastical mind, which is now so often wanting, and the want of which is manifested in the flimsy unchurch-like secular airs, with which the metrical psalms and other hymns of the Church are now dressed out.

As in these last remarks we have been gliding from the clergy to the laity, by considering the condition of the organists, we cannot but express a wish that at St. Mark's College, or other institutions, there were a department devoted to the instruction of organists, where young churchmen of musical promise might be duly trained for their important work, and enabled to add with advantage the office of organist to that of schoolmaster. The cathedrals are now the only schools for organists; they must always be the best places of instruction; but those only are educated therein who are likely to make music their sole profession, while the lesser parish churches are left to those who have not made music their profession, and have only managed to pick up some scraps of knowledge.

As to cathedrals, where the service is musical throughout, and ought daily to be performed with the utmost skill, we would wish to see the organist put in a higher position altogether. In the cathedrals of the older foundation, he virtually occupies the precentor's post, and adds the precentor's duties to his own. The whole burden and responsibility of the music rests upon him. He must be a scientific and a practical man; he must know what to teach and how to teach; he must have the highest class of musical knowledge, combined with sound Church feeling, and pure Church taste. He must read and work; he must have knowledge, and the power of imparting it. With all these labours laid upon him, he ought to receive higher remuneration than some 100%. or 200%. per annum, if the cathedral, as it undoubtedly should, claim all his energies and his time. What is the result of the wretched remuneration which he now receives? He cannot give his whole time and mind to that which deserves it all. He cannot consecrate all his powers to the cathedral. He must be a pianoforte teacher. What drudgery for a man of high musical powers, of great knowledge, of warm feeling and imagination, of acute and delicate ears! He must pass from fantasia to fantasia, from ballad to ballad, wearying himself with dull pupils, and music equally dull, having his ear and mind ever set on edge, and exhausted by these most secular labours, when he should be fresh for the cathedral.

We cannot expect the cathedral service to be what it ought to be till it engages all the time of the organist, till he is present at daily prayer, till he can afford to dethrone the raw aspiring deputy who now occupies his post in the week, and gives exaggerated and clumsy imitations of his master's style, while the choir smile at his crude performances, and mock his authority. At Exeter cathedral the organist attends morning and evening prayer every day, and does not skip "in hot haste" up the organ-loft stairs in time for the anthem; we need hardly stop to describe the effect of this daily attendance.

But not only is this piano forte-teaching life of cathedral organists drudgery, in the truest sense, to men of sensitive minds, as musicians generally are, but it is hard drudgery; it is secularising drudgery; it is a fantasia-ising and variation-ising of the mind; it is drawing it away from the nobler and severer school of study; and he who has an office and ministration in the Church is doomed to be infected and blown upon by the music of the world. And, what is an important question, if the higher class of musicians have not time to give themselves to thought and study, what are we to do for any race of new Church composers of like spirit with the old? Whence are they to come? Are we never to add to our store of Church music? Are all original minds to be seized upon and monopolised by the world? Not indeed that we yearn after mere novelty, or such novelty as contradicts the tone of what is old. "We want," to use Dr. Crotch's words, "new music, but no new style." We cannot expect to have new music of the olden style, to enjoy any great increase of grand and chaste compositions, till the organist pokes his Rossini into the fire, burns all his fantasias, makes his children's kites of his ballads, leaves young ladies to learn "execution " as they may, and concentrates all his powers on that which alone is worthy of the entire energy of a great musical mind. Till he can afford to do this, he must almost unconsciously get somewhat secularized by the daily and hourly sound of secular music. Yet, what more important than to preserve in Church compositions distinctness of style, to retain strong and marked peculiarities of feature and expression, to maintain the boundaries between the Church and the world? What more wretched than when airs from overtures and operas are transferred to the Church by organists of secular mind, who plume themselves on the adaptation?

Where is the force of association stronger than in music? A tune heard in a theatre is always the theatre's; it always reminds of scenes and footlamps, and paint and tinsel, and actors and actresses. However grave a livery of solemn words it may be made to wear, our mind is transported from the church; the tune cannot become a psalm to us; it wheels us back in spite of ourselves from Sunday thoughts to week-day dissipations; it is but week-day folly starched into a prim Sunday look, and through the grave disguise we cannot but remember the original occasion of the air. Nor shall we be freed from such adaptations, or from a mixed character in Church music, until we cut off the organist from secular employments altogether, until we give him an income sufficient to support him in his sacred office. We know not, indeed, how this is to be done, or how far the Ecclesiastical Commissioners can reconsider their acts; but the thing ought to be done, and an office, not provided for in the older statutes, when organs were not, should not be left, as it often is, to the voluntary contributions of the canons. The canons ought not to be required to expend their income in such a way, but every officer should have his own income, his own position recognised by the statutes, and duly recompensed. We should like to see cathedral organists in Deacon's Orders, that the sacredness of their functions might at once be recognised. We wish, indeed, that choirs also could obtain higher remuneration. In some instances they are sufficiently paid; in others the recompense is most wretched. The Ecclesiastical Commission might have found enough to be done in the cathedrals themselves with cathedral revenues, without appropriating them to purposes foreign both to the letter and the spirit of the endowment, if they had entered into the cathedral system. Subdean Bayley's words ought to have been weighed, "Be it remembered," he says, "that services and anthems cannot be performed, to have their due effect, without two contratenors, two tenors, and two basses, that the verses may be sung alternately, and choruses in eight parts." Thus we see what a

We have spoken chiefly of cathedral organists, from the importance of their posts; but it would be a great matter if proper culture and proper discipline of mind and taste could be given to all who take upon them this sacred office. Among the first consequences of such an education would be the subdued tone in which the choir or congregation would be accompanied. Organists would learn to tame their instruments, to consider them strictly as accompaniments; it is ignorance of the proper office of the organ that causes us now to hear those thunderings, and storms, and crashings, which hasten deafness, or make it desirable. In the smaller churches we desire no organs at all, as we cannot hope for the remarkable coincidence of good instruments and persons competent to play them. When will those instruments of acute and ingenious torture, appropriately called "grinders," be abolished by so humane an age?

But what can be done for the great body of the laity? How can we act on them so as to revive in some degree congregational singing? Even here we need not work without hope. We find that their musical impulses have been already stirred, and that these impulses have taken, if not a Church, at any rate a sacred direction. The middling classes (and we always consider the most hearty love of music is to be found in the middling classes) are already seizing upon every means of instruction. The Exeter Hall concerts are no slight evidence of the growth and increase of a musical spirit. Who would have thought a few years ago of hearing some hundreds of tradesmen performing oratorios, and delighting in Handel? And these efforts owe nothing to fashion; we might otherwise be slow to accept them as signs of any real or lasting concern, for fashion coins new idols every year for its fickle idolaters. It is no proof that people enjoy the opera because they go there; but the Exeter Hall concerts, with all their faults, were begun, and have been carried on, by a more sober class of persons, who unaffectedly enjoy the music. If, then, we have these and other evidences of a rising taste, what are we to do? New means of instruction are of course within the reach of the higher classes; they can obtain the best teachers, they have time to practise; they can learn the appointed music of the Church in their own homes, if they know what is to be sung on the Sunday, if a scheme of the music is fixed up in some part of the Church. We cannot conceive a more delightful occupation for those who have leisure on their hand, than to set apart one evening, at least, in the week, for the practice of the music designed for the Sunday following. If, too, selections of sound, well-arranged music were printed for the use of congregations, we should avoid those extemporary alto and tenor parts, which are now invented on the spot, and are somewhat painful in their effects.

But for the middling classes, who cannot easily learn or practise at home, nor afford separate instruction, some sort of class-singing, parochial or otherwise, must be used. In small country parishes the music must be always a difficulty, from the lack of teachers and of opportunities of receiving instruction, and from the coarseness of rustic tones; but all amendment is not hopeless. Those wondrous anthems, manufactured by inglorious Handels, might at once be stopped; the gruntings of the gruff bassoon, the pantings of the asthmatic flute, and the sharp whine of the piercing violin, may well be exchanged for the voices of the more promising children, who can be kept to the old psalm-tunes, and their country tones refined by careful teaching. But in towns (and of towns we more particularly speak throughout), class-singing seems the easiest means of obtaining the best instruction on moderate terms. In some places excellent institutions have been already formed that promise great results, if there is as much perseverance in conducting as there has been zeal in establishing them. At Exeter, a "School of Church Music" has been set on foot under the immediate direction of the cathedral organist, who labours in the true spirit. Persons of all ranks,—clergy, gentry, clerks, shopkeepers,—attend its meetings; and at the recent consecration of a church in that city, about sixty of its members in the midst of the congregation took part in the service. And how seldom have sixty voices been heard to sing the praise of God in his temple! In the important town of Manchester a "Church Music Society" has arisen, and we have heard of other similar institutions in various parts. We prefer the appellation of "School" rather than "Society," as seeming to imply that it is a place of discipline and training for the Church, not ending in itself, or in the exclusive gratification and profit of its own members; it is a musical nursery for the Church.

But whatever form class-singing may take, we regard it as the most likely means of promoting a general cultivation of music. In our larger towns, where able musicians are to be found, and some of them lovers of the temple as well as of the sweet songs of the temple, ready, for little worldly remuneration, to do what they can in their sphere for the Church's good, some such machinery might advantageously be set on foot. And we may well consider, for a moment, the great work which Church music may help to carry out among the middling classes. It may be made the means of increasing an attachment to the Church which is at present but faintly felt among these classes ; it may revive or deepen a sense of Church-membership ; it may save a portion of the younger men from the hurtful pleasures of large towns. And we may well begin to do something indirectly as well as directly to recover the affections of the middling classes, to create among them an interest in the Church and Church objects. While the higher orders and the poor are mostly attached members of the Church, we have our doubts whether the middling classes are well affected ; and the Church has been herself somewhat to blame for their lukewarmness. What has she done to keep their love ? What has been done to guide their desires for knowledge, or to provide them with elevating relaxations, or to direct their tastes ? Take, for instance, the host of young men who serve in shops and offices, who are at their desks and counters all the day ; they have been left to pick up their principles as they may, to scramble towards their knowledge without direction. They have got their education without the help of the Church ; their seminaries have been without clerical superintendence. Now, may not music be made to convey some notion of Church-fellowship to such as these ? If we at all consider the mysteriously-associative principle in music, we see its peculiar fitness and capacity for acting upon the middling classes, for giving them some sense of Christian fellowship through a common taste dedicated to the Church. The very associative or social principle we allude to seems to point out its value as a spiritual agency ; such a mysterious power of attracting men towards each other, of creating fellowships, as if by some secret charm, seems designed to forward the object of the one great Fellowship. It must be the duty of the Church, in striving to promote a corporate life and feeling, to use all incorporating influences. If the stones that lie in the fields may be gathered up and raised into temples of God, and fashioned into most harmonious forms, how much more may sounds that are in the world, that touch like lightning a vast multitude of souls, be made to bind that multitude together in a holy brotherhood through a common sense holily used. Indeed we might extend this view, and see the value of this associativeness in music among all classes, if it were felt and used by the Church, instead of its being resigned, as it is, to the world, and abused by it. We are accustomed to hear complaints of the associative power of music ; and parents are apt to regret the gift of music in their children, because it mates them with unsuitable or dissolute friends, because it brings them into unequal friendships, into company unfitted for their rank, and only likely to lead them into vicious ways. We hear daily of men of the highest rank consorting with opera-singers and the like, being drawn by the common love of music into a hurtful and degrading familiarity with a class of persons commonly so dissolute in their lives ; and in people of less exalted rank we see friendships formed through music of an equally hurtful character. How many are ruined, both in their temporal and spiritual state, through the agency of tavern glee-clubs and suchlike meetings ! Such spectacles cause men to grieve over the very gift of music ; and, seeing the associative principle turned to evil, they forget, in its perversion, that it may be made as powerfully to bind men into good brotherhoods. This associativeness must be meant for good ; and if the Church sought to develope it in her own great cause, if she might, in schools and societies of Church music, give vent to the passion for music which now breaks out in wrong directions, we might have to glory in a gift capable of uniting us together to our edification.

A happy thing it would be for the Church if, by any means, by any system of instruction a general knowledge of music could be diffused, and that knowledge dedicated to the glory of God. Our whole Church service, whether in cathedrals or parish churches, would be invested with a warmth, a sublimity, an impressiveness now unknown to it, for the capacities of the liturgy are hardly known. Then the choirs might be filled with devout and serious men, and we should have devotion and reverence combined with musical skill and knowledge. It is now difficult to obtain this combination—to find good men who are good singers. We suffer daily from this difficulty ; even cathedrals, which give the highest remuneration, suffer from the presence of undevotional lay clerks, who have skill in singing, or from devotional lay clerks who are musically incompetent. Often indeed are musical qualifications more inquired into than moral fitness ; at best, from the scarcity of knowledge, and the little room for selection, the alternative lies between a musical service ill performed by good men, or well performed by careless ones. If there were more knowledge, there would be more room for selection. Serious persons would be found who would glory in having such a ministration in the Church, and would bring devoutness of mind, without diminishing the musical excellence of the service. And besides the regular choirs being composed of serious men, it would be possible to increase them, at any rate on Sundays, and other holy days, by a large body of volunteers. This is what we want ; we want numbers in our cathedrals and larger churches to give due effect to the service, and to have a sufficient number we must have volunteers. What are twenty voices in a chorus in a cathedral ? We want a hundred at least. And why should not a hundred voluntary singers be found in our large towns, ready to submit themselves to the organist's control. At Leeds we believe a considerable portion of the choir is composed of volunteers, and these of different ranks in life. Sublime beyond all expression would be our liturgy if it were illustrated by the combined melody of heart and voice, issuing from a multitude of devout worshippers. We should soon cease to complain of the length of the service. Many parts would be sung that are now unsung, and that lose in impressiveness from the want of music; thus the psalms, designed for music (where there was daily prayer), might be chanted in all the larger churches. With a more general knowledge of music we might hope to hear the hymns in the Communion Service sung, at any rate in all cathedrals. At present they are either not sung at all, or are sung only by the non-communicants, that is, by the boys; and thus we have but the treble part; we have never seen, as we ought to have seen, the whole body of lay clerks communicating; and when one or two have occasionally shown their seriousness, they have disrobed themselves of their surplices, and neglected to glorify God in the most holy of all services, with the offering of their voice. Imperfectly, however, as these hymns are sung, they are even now intensely affecting, and we have seen many melted into tears as the music sounded through the church.

We might hope, too, occasionally to hear portions of the Burial Service sung. He who has once heard the effect of music at such a time, will never forget it. We once saw the member of a cathedral laid in his grave. When the music rose, a holy awe instantly filled and almost overpowered the congregation.

We have not entered into the question of plain-tune, but have left that gradually to work its own way; neither have we ventured to draw distinctions between cathedral and parochial service, to point out the proprieties in each, to say what ought to be sung in the one, and not sung in the other. We have left such subjects to abler hands, and have contented ourselves with a few plain and practical remarks, in the fervent hope that they may contribute, in their degree, to the great cause of Church music, which is no less a thing than the glorifying of God in the church with one of his own choice and most mysterious gifts.

P.S. Since these pages were written we have been glad to find that in the new theological department of King's College, London, where students are to be prepared for holy orders, the study of music is expressly insisted on. In our National Schools also, in many districts, the same study has been already introduced, and we saw the following paragraph in a recent number of "The Times.” “It is stated that under the authority of some of the heads of two of the Hon. Societies of the inns of court, a system of class-singing is about to be introduced amongst members of the Inner and Middle Temple, under the guidance of the organist and others of the Temple church, with a view to enable them to ‘thoroughly understand and be able to take part in the choral service of the Church, whereby the ~~amens~~, responses, versicles, psalms, and portions of the services, ~~and~~ even of the anthems, would be performed in a ~~manner~~ more consistent with the true character of public worship.’ During the series of meetings of the classes, it is proposed that there shall be given a thorough course of instruction in the ‘elements of music, management of the voice, art of reading music, and singing at sight.’ It is also proposed that the method of chanting the services and anthems of the Church shall be fully explained, and the compositions of the first masters, ancient and modern, practised, including madrigals, choruses, glees,” &c. This is indeed a cheerful paragraph ; surely we may hope.

3. Report of Secret Committee in Ireland, 1798.

A document of a very unusual character appeared in a recent number of the "Times." It was an address from magistrates residing in an Irish district, the North Riding of Tipperary, complaining of the state of lawless crime to which their country was reduced, and calling on their fellow-subjects in Great Britain to aid them in obtaining from the legislature and government such remedial measures as the circumstances seemed imperatively to demand. The document was subscribed by fifty-one justices of the peace, including Lord Dunally, chairman of the meeting from which it issued, and the Custos Rotulorum of the county, the Honourable Francis Aldborough Prittie. The subscribers differed materially from each other in their views, political and religious; but there was one particular in which they agreed—they were all, we believe, without exception, resident landlords. The remonstrance of such a body of men came before the public with authority.

In addressing such an appeal to the public it might be said that the subscribers committed a violation of official etiquette. They passed over the Lieutenant of their own county, a long tried and able governor, the Earl of Donoughmore. They passed by the nobleman who holds the name, if he do not wield the power, of Her Majesty's Lieutenant in Ireland. And they passed over the British cabinet, and Sir Robert Peel. It is, however, to be remembered, that this somewhat irregular and democratic procedure was not adopted, until applications sanctioned by usage had proved unsuccessful. The Tipperary magistrates had solicited aid and redress in the proper form, and from the constituted authorities; and it was not until the exactments of decorum had been duly and fruitlessly complied with, that, in the last instance, they appealed to the people. They did not show that they had lost confidence in the government, until it had become manifest that government wanted either the will or the power to help them.

They had another excuse for their public appeal, if, after their previous procedures, excuse was necessary. Within the limits of the North Riding of Tipperary, and in the space of six months, there had been sixteen murders perpetrated, sixteen murders attempted, and fifty-two cases of what might well be termed murderous assaults, such as firing into dwelling-houses, forcible attempts to take arms, &c. &c. A catalogue of crime like this furnishes ample excuse for some want of ceremony.

But it must be admitted that the subscribing Tipperary magistrates have exposed themselves to an imputation more grave than that of an offence against etiquette. They appear unable to discern, or unwilling to acknowledge, the merit of the policy against which they have been so daring as to remonstrate. They have asked for protection against the incendiary and assassin, and have presumed to think that the government and legislature could ensure what they ask for, by adopting measures wise and benevolent, suited to the emergency, and conceived in the spirit of the constitution: they were not to be taught that the measures they proposed were repugnant to the policy of Sir Robert Peel's administration, and were, accordingly, objectionable. It had been gravely propounded in various discussions with functionaries under the right honourable Baronet, that protection was not to be attained in Ireland by any practicable change in the existing laws. Where a people have a bias in favour of assassination, law cannot afford security. In an extreme case of this nature, loyal men must have patience. As soon as the character of the Celts in Ireland has undergone the beneficial change to be wrought in it by the policy which is now providing for them colleges and priests, they will have recourse to activities less pernicious than those in which their energies are now exerted; meanwhile, they must not be rudely interfered with. It might abate the graciousness of the Peel policy to proceed vigorously against an offence to which certain of the tribes of Munster seem to have a constitutional proneness. Such, in substance, appears to be the explanation of that policy of forbearance under which crime so banefully flourishes. The Tipperary magistrates appear not to have been convinced by this reasoning, or satisfied with the decision recommended by it. They have appealed to the common sense of mankind, and to the true hearts of the British people. How their appeal may speed, is yet to be seen; it does not appear that they have been punished for contumacy in making it. They retain still the commissions of the peace; nor does it appear to be the intention of Government to displace them.

In the north of Ireland, too, it would seem as if the power to dismiss and insult upright and independent magistrates were to be henceforth less capriciously exercised. The dismissal of Mr. Watson has not been followed up; and yet his advice—the advice for which he was superseded—has been extensively adopted. Because that gentleman recommended the reorganization of the Orange Society in his own county, he was deprived of the commission of the peace, and accused of an endeavour to revive an illegal confederation. Since the day on which this severity was inflicted on Mr. Watson, his advice has been repeated by other magistrates—other magistrates have acted upon it—the Orange Society has been reorganized, or is in progress of reorganization, in Down, in Antrim, in Derry, in Armagh, in Tyrone, in Fermanagh, in Monaghan, in Cavan—and although many justices of the peace have taken active part in this vast movement, and although the Irish Government has been fully apprised of their exertions to revive the “illegal society,” we hear no more of dismissals. Why is this? Does the Government persist in thinking the society what Lord Heytesbury was indiscreet enough to pronounce it? Why not persevere in its career of dismissals? Has it learned to correct its rash and mistaken judgment? Has it learned that the Orange Society is strictly legal? Why not avow that it is better advised, and add graciousness to the avowal, by restoring the excellent magistrate whom it had “ignorantly” superseded?

We must not look for too much. It is something to see the Irish government halt in “the road to ruin,” even though they do not yet seem preparing to retrace their steps. The dismissal of Mr. Watson was, manifestly, a notice that the Orange confederation was not to be revived. In the non-interference with Lord Enniskillen, and the many who have acted with him, this injudicious or inopportune notice seems to have been withdrawn. Lord Heytesbury has, perhaps, by this time, consulted history for impartial testimony respecting the confederation he too rashly condemned, and has acquired a knowledge of his error. He has, probably, reflected that the Government which cannot venture upon measures for checking the activities, or arresting the progress of that baleful confederacy, which would make the land he is appointed to rule over, a wilderness, ought not to be rashly precipitate in destroying a society, which has true conservatism as the great end of its organization. He cannot abridge the assassins’ vocation—he cannot break up the conspiracy which works out its ends by murder—and, conscious of his impotency for good, perhaps he has arrived at the conclusion, that to persevere in a blind hostility against the Orange institution, might possibly be to abuse his power for evil.

The truth is, that where such confederacies as the Repeal Association are openly permitted, and conspiracies like the Ribbon Society evade the law, it should be regarded as a natural and necessary compensation, that associations for good should also be organized. The rule by which other countries may be judged is wholly inapplicable to Ireland. Where there is correspondence and harmony between opinion and law, law should be supreme,—the whole people should constitute one society,—and he who attempted to divide them into adverse knots and parties should suffer the punishment of an incendiary. It is otherwise where a law, conceived in the spirit of indulgence, which good subjects may claim, is extended also to those who yield to it only a prudential and reluctant submission; where the people to be governed consists of two classes widely discriminated, the one composed of those who wish well to existing institutions, the other of those who desire that the institutions of the country be overturned. In such a state of things, a free constitution, and an indulgent administration of its laws, enable and encourage the disaffected to conspire, and thus, it may be said, compel the loyal to associate. The government which would interdict such association, while refusing to adapt the laws to the emergency, makes itself a partisan, and chooses its side, in opposition to good subjects, in alliance with adversaries to them and to the state. This desperate alliance the Irish government has narrowly escaped the guilt of forming; we hope it may escape the evil consequences of having appeared to contemplate the formation of it; and we would gladly offer any information in our power which might have the effect of a warning against the fatal error of thinking to compensate supineness or timidity towards enterprises which cover with flimsy pretexts purposes of massacre and treason, by exercising a most unconstitutional severity towards an association censurable, if it were censurable, in the judgment of the impartial and unprejudiced, for nothing worse than “exuberance of loyalty.”

It has been very usual of late years to describe the Protestants of Ireland as persons possessed by a spirit of intolerance; and, whenever it was designed to render them especially odious, to describe them as an Orange faction. It is sufficiently intelligible that such a name should harm them in the judgment or opinion of enemies to British connexion; but that it would have prejudiced them in the esteem of England, was a result which could not so readily be anticipated. That result, however, has followed; and such has been the success of persevering and unscrupulous calumny, that the mass of Englishmen, even of English readers, have been influenced to regard the Orange Association of Ireland as only one of the many intemperate and intolerant factions, by which that unhappy country has been afflicted. But this is a favourable judgment. Many there are who affect to pronounce the Orange Society the worst, pre-eminently, of all the Irish factions,—the one, indeed, which should be responsible for the mal-practices of all the others, whom its insolent and menacing demeanour has called into existence.

The Orangemen of Ireland may have been, on various occasions, provoked into intemperance and indiscretion; but they have been almost uniformly chargeable with one great error, of which they are now paying the penalty,—they were never industrious in disabusing the public mind of false impressions. Had they been careful for their reputation, as they should have been, with such a cause as theirs, and with such testimony as truth enabled them to command, slander would not have triumphed over them. They thought they could have lived calumny down,—it has brought them low, and has rendered it a matter of no common difficulty for those who would befriend them, as persons wronged and oppressed, to distinguish their case, as it should really be stated, from the malevolent misrepresentations of their adversaries.

The first Orange Lodge in Ireland was formed on September the 21st, in the year 1795, and was a sequel to a rude but sanguinary encounter between a Roman Catholic party, organized under the name of Defenders, and a body of Protestants, whom they assailed under exceedingly discreditable circumstances. Our account of this affair we shall take from historians whose bias cannot be a matter of doubt. The subjoined passage is extracted from the “Pieces of Irish History,” published in New York, in the year 1807, by William James M’Nevin, a Roman Catholic and a United Irishman. The account is chargeable with inaccuracies, which we shall find it necessary to correct; but we give it, in the first instance, in the words of the writer.

“In the province of Ulster, the county of Armagh and its borders exhibited a scene of more melancholy disturbances and more abominable oppressions than had afflicted or disgraced the rest of Ireland. The religious animosities that had raged so violently in 1793, appeared to have been subdued by the combined efforts of *liberal Catholics and dissenters, by the unremitting exertions of the United Irishmen of that day, and by the conciliatory sentiments which flowed from the press, as far as it was in the same interests*¹. The press, however, was subsequently reduced almost to silence; and the recent coercive statutes had nearly annihilated all public efforts by united, or even liberal Irishmen, on any subject of general politics, except during the transitory administration of Lord Fitzwilliam. The barriers to the revival of those animosities being thus broken down, they again desolated the country with augmented fury. The Peep-o'-Day Boys, who originally pretended only to enforce the popery laws, by depriving Catholics of their arms, now affected more important objects. They claimed to be associated for the support of a Protestant government, and a Protestant succession, which they said were endangered by the increased power of the Catholics in the state, and they therefore adopted the name of Orangemen, to express their attachment to the memory of that prince to whom they owed those blessings. With this change of name, they asserted they had also gained an accession of strength; for the Peep-o'-Day Boys only imagined they were supported by the law of the land, in their depredations on their Catholic neighbours; but the Orangemen boasted a protection greater than even that of law—the connivance and concealed support of those who were bound to see it fairly administered. Thus emboldened, and as they alleged, reinforced, they renewed their ancient persecutions; but not content with stripping Catholics of arms, they now went greater lengths than they had ever done before, in adding insult to injury, sometimes by mocking the solemnities of their worship, and at others, even by firing into the coffins of the dead on their way to sepulture.

“ The Catholics were by no means inclined to submit with tameness to these outrages. The Defender system had included nearly all of that persuasion in the lower ranks, and scarcely any others were to be found in the neighbourhood. They seized some opportunities of retaliating, and thus restored to Defenderism in that part of the country its original character of a religious feud. These mutual irritations still increasing, at length produced open hostilities. An affray near Lough-Brickland, on the borders of the counties of Down and Armagh, and another at the fair of Lough-Gall, preceded and led to a more general engagement, in the month of August, at a place called the Diamond, near Portadown, in the county of Armagh. For some days previous to this, both parties had been preparing and collecting their forces; they seized the different passes and roads; had their advanced posts, and were in some measure encamped and hutted. No steps, however, were taken by the magistrates of the country; nor, as far as can be inferred from any visible circumstances, even by government itself, to prevent this religious war, publicly levied and carried on, in one of the most populous, cultivated and highly improved parts of the kingdom; nay, more, the party which provoked the hostilities, and which the event has proved to have been the strongest, boasted of being connived at, for its well-known loyalty and attachment to the constitution.

“ Whatever may have been the motives for this inaction, certain it is, that both parties assembled at the Diamond, to the amount of several thousands. The Defenders were the most numerous, but the Orangemen had immense advantage in point of preparation and skill, many of them having been members of the old volunteer corps, whose arms and discipline they still retained, and perverted to very different purposes, from those that have immortalized that body. The contest, therefore, was not long or doubtful; the Defenders were speedily defeated, with the loss of some few killed and left on the field of battle, besides the wounded, whom they carried away.

"After this, in consequence of the interference of a Catholic priest and of a country gentleman, a truce between both parties was agreed upon, which was unfortunately violated in less than twenty-four hours. The two bodies that had consented to it for the most part dispersed; the district, however, in which the battle was fought being entirely filled with Orangemen, some of them remained embodied, but the Catholics returned home. In the course of next day, about seven hundred Defenders from Keady, in a remote part of the county, came to the succour of their friends, and, ignorant of the armistice, attacked the Orangemen, who were still assembled. The associates of the latter being on the spot, quickly collected again, and the Defenders were once more routed. Perhaps this mistake might have been cleared up, and the treaty renewed, if the resentment of the Orangemen had not been fomented and cherished by persons to whom reconciliation of any kind was hateful. The Catholics, after this transaction, never attempted to make a stand, but the Orangemen commenced a persecution of the blackest dye. They would no longer permit a Catholic to exist in the county. They posted up on the cabins of those unfortunate victims this pithy notice, 'To hell or Connaught,' and appointed a limited time in which the necessary removal of persons and property was to be made. If after the expiration of that period the notice had not been entirely complied with, the Orangemen assembled, destroyed their furniture, burnt their habitations, and forced the ruined family to fly elsewhere for shelter. So punctual were they in executing their threats, that after some experiments, none were found rash enough to abide the event of non-compliance. In this way, upwards of seven hundred Catholic families in one county were forced to abandon their farms, their dwellings, and their properties, without any process of law, and even without any alleged crime, except their religious belief be one²."

In the above passage, there are some scattered fragments of truth; and there are falsehoods so daring, that we would gladly believe them unconscious. There is something like truth in the account of the Diamond fight, and an air of frankness in recording the truce-breaking by which it was signalized. We cannot give similar praise to the vain attempt at excusing it. To imagine it possible that seven hundred men could march from a distance of twelve or fourteen miles, through the county of Armagh, without receiving an intimation that a truce had been made, transcends ordinary credulity, and could hardly be expected to find entertainment at this side of the Atlantic. The excuse, it is not uncharitable to surmise, was designed to take effect where the "Pieces of Irish History" was published. There is something of truth, too, in the description of the state of Armagh; and there was a foundation for the report of cruelties perpetrated against Roman Catholics; but there is much exaggeration in the description and the report, and there is utter falsehood in the imputations cast upon the Orangemen. They neither were, nor could they have been, concerned in the perpetration of the outrages thus attributed to them.

The first Orange Lodge was formed on September 21, 1795, in consequence of that breach of faith or truce which caused the "battle of the Diamond." The "great increase and establishment" of the body "happened," as Mr. Plowden informs us, "in the year after." The outrages complained of had become so flagrant, or at least had been so loudly complained of in the preceding year, that a meeting of the magistrates was held in Armagh with a view to their suppression, in December, 1795. At that meeting several of the Orange body attended and subscribed resolutions, offering rewards for information against disturbers, and pledging themselves, to the utmost of their power, to punish and put them down. It is to confound two classes of persons altogether distinct, the Peep-o'-Day Boys and the original Orangemen, to suppose that the latter had any share in the excesses to which the disappearance of some Roman Catholic families from Armagh was attributed by Lord Gosford and the magistrates who subscribed his well-known resolutions³. The Peep-o'-Day Boys, should be regarded as distinct and separate, if not in some respects adverse, parties. The battle of the Diamond brought together into one body the classes of which the two were composed. Protestants of all descriptions took part in that engagement. A Protestant gentleman belonging to the Church of England had assisted at the treaty by which mutual hostilities were suspended, and was fired upon from an ambuscade of Defenders when returning to his home. When the second attack was made on the village, the minds of all Protestants were prepared to repel force by force, and it was after the successful issue

³ "The Orange Association should not be confounded, as it has often invidiously been, with the mutual and disgraceful outrages which prevailed in the county Armagh many years preceding, between the lowest class of Presbyterians, under the denomination of Peep-of-Day Boys, and the Roman Catholics as Defenders."—Musgrave's Irish Rebellion, 79.

39. "The Orange Society did not commence till 1795? No.

43. "Did it spring out of the Peep-of-Day Boys? No.

47. "Did you consider the Orange Society as a continuation of these societies? No.

48. "They were opposed both to the Peep-of-Day Boys and the Defenders. They were opposed to all the disturbers of peace in the country. I never conceived them to be connected with any other society."—Lieut.-Col. Verner, M.P., Select Com. on Orange Lodges, p. 5.

of the struggle, that Protestants of the Church of England determined to form that union which has since subsisted with very great benefit to the country, and through much evil repute, it must be confessed, to the members of the association. That they are not to be regarded as the authors or instruments of the persecution with which the Protestants of Armagh have been charged, is plain from the facts of the case, no less than from the principles of the Orange institution. There was no evidence against them. They were in numbers too limited to have the force requisite for persecution. The gentlemen of influence who assisted in forming the Orange Society, or who joined it while yet feeble and immature, exerted themselves to the uttermost to detect the evil-doers and bring them to punishment. Mr. Plowden, however, has furnished, in the form of a condemnation, a testimony to the Orange system, which, offered by a writer of his principles and bias, may well be regarded as decisive. We give it in his own words:—

“ It is unquestionable, that the Presbyterians generally abhorred the principles of the Orangemen; but it is also certain that many of them were sworn into these societies. They were however chiefly of the lower orders, who depended for their subsistence upon their landlords. Several persons of great landed interest in those parts insisted upon their Protestant tenants and labourers becoming Yeomen and Orangemen. Such were the Marquiss of Hertford, Marquiss of Abercorn, Lord Northland, the Earl of Londonderry, Mr. Cope, Messrs. Brownlow and Richardson, Members for the County of Armagh, and other possessors of great landed estates in Ulster.”

Such patronage is inexplicable on an hypothesis less favourable to the Orange Society, than one which acquits it of all participation in these nocturnal outrages and disorders, by which, the magistrates assembled in December 1795, declared that the county of Armagh had been convulsed and dishonoured, and by which, they affirmed, a very great number of innocent persons had most grievously suffered.

But whoever were the actors in this dreadful persecution, is it not, at all events, clear that Roman Catholics were punished for the cause of their religion? By no means. There was a crime of a far different description for which they have suffered, and in the consciousness of which they may have perhaps inflicted punishment upon themselves. To form a right judgment upon this matter, it will be necessary to understand the character and principles of one of the parties engaged in the battle of the Diamond, and we shall cite, as witnesses and authorities in the case, writers whose opportunities of knowledge cannot be denied, and whose testimony will not be rejected on account of their prejudices. We shall cite Theobald Wolfe Tone, and one who laboured not less zealously, although perhaps more obscurely, in the same cause, Denis Taaffe.

“For the Catholics, from what has been said of their situation, it will appear that little previous arrangement would be necessary to ensure their unanimous support of any measure which held out to them a chance of bettering their condition; yet they also have an organization, commencing about the same time (A.D. 1791) with the clubs last mentioned, but composing Catholics only. Until within these few months, this organization baffled the most active vigilance of the Irish government, unsuccessfully employed to discover its principles, and, to this hour, they are, I believe, unapprised of its extent. The fact is, that in June last it embraced the whole peasantry of the provinces of Ulster, Leinster, and Connaught, threefourths of the nation; and I have little doubt but it has since extended into Munster, the remaining province. These men, who are called Defenders, are completely organized on a military plan, divided according to their respective districts, and officered by men chosen by themselves; the principle of their union is implicit obedience to the orders of those whom they have elected for their generals, and whose object is the emancipation of their country, the subversion of English usurpation, and bettering the condition of the wretched peasantry of Ireland. The eyes of this whole body, which may be said, almost without a figure, to be the people of Ireland, are turned, with the most anxious expectation, to France for assistance and support. The oath of their union recites, ‘That they will be faithful to the united nations of France and Ireland,’ and several of them have already sealed it with their blood. I suppose there is no instance of a conspiracy, if a whole people can be said to conspire, which has continued for so many years as this has done, where the secret has been so religiously kept, and where, in so vast a number, so few traitors have been found.

“This organization of the Defenders embraces the whole peasantry of Ireland, being Catholics. There is also a further organization of the Catholics, which is called the General Committee, and to which I have already alluded. This was a representative body chosen by the Catholics at large, and consisting of the principal merchants and traders, the members of professions, and a few of the remaining Catholic gentry of Ireland⁴.”

“The Defenders after their association had changed its type, were bound together by oaths, obviously drawn up by illiterate men, different in various places, all promising secrecy, and specifying whatever grievance was in such place most felt, and best understood. Tithes, therefore, were in all of them very prominent. The views of these men were far from being distinct; although they had a national notion, that 'something ought to be done for Ireland,' yet they were all agreed, that whatever was to be done should be accomplished by force of arms. They, therefore, formed themselves upon a military system, and, in order to procure arms, assembled by night, to take them from the houses of those who they conceived would be eventually their enemies.

"These disturbances attracted the attention of the House of Lords early in 1793, and a secret committee was appointed to inquire into their causes, to endeavour to discover their promoters, and to prevent their extension³."

Thus, it would appear, that the battle of the Diamond was not an engagement between two classes of disorderly subjects of the British crown, but between subjects, such as they were, on the one hand, and sworn traitors to the British crown, on the other. The Defenders were persons who contemplated an insurrection in which something was to be done for Ireland "by force," and, to entitle themselves to foreign aid in this anticipated struggle they had sworn fidelity to France. Such, on testimony not to be gainsaid, were the Defenders, and such, on the testimony of the same witness, were all the Roman Catholics of Armagh, those upon whom the process of extermination is said to have taken effect, as well as those who, notwithstanding the lawlessness of the times, and the treasonable engagements in which they had become implicated, still abode in their possessions. Now it has ever appeared to us, we confess, a very remarkable peculiarity in that well-known address, and those resolutions of Lord Gosford's to which we have alluded, that while they tell of threatenings and expulsions, they do not describe a single case in which an injured individual is named, nor do they afford the slightest reason for believing that the dreadful persecution of which they speak had been rendered more odious even by a single instance of murder. The Tipperary magistrates affirm, that in one half year, and within the limits of half their county, sixteen murders have been perpetrated, and sixteen more have been attempted; and this frightful sacrifice of life has been caused by the desire to recover or to retain possession of some portion of land, or else to revenge the loss of it. Such are the sacrifices offered up in Munster to the agrarian principle, while we are given to understand that some hundred families in Armagh could quietly go forth from their possessions, because threatenings were uttered against them if they dared to remain. They could boldly meet their adversaries in arms whenever an occasion for fighting offered, from January 1791 to September 1795; and after the disastrous autumnal equinox of that year, they became changed into so lamb-like a timidity, that persecution had only to dictate what it desired; they who, of late, were forward to take the field, and dare all hazards to achieve the liberation and aggrandizement of Ireland, were now ready, at the word of command, to fly from their homes, because a ruffian menace (of some dastard, perhaps, like themselves) had power to quell them. We are not disposed to believe in such a change of character, especially as there is a simpler mode of explaining the change of conduct. The Roman Catholics who left their homes in the county of Armagh, fled from justice, not from the persecution of a wild rabble. They knew themselves to have been implicated in a treasonable conspiracy, and had reason to fear that their guilt would speedily be discovered. That they had rendered themselves liable to the severest penalties of the law, is plain from the testimonies we have already cited; that the secrets of their conspiracy had transpired, and were in the possession of government, is manifest from the fact, that the trials of the Defenders commenced in December 1795. Is it not, therefore, natural to conclude that the bloodless withdrawal of numbers from the county of Armagh should be ascribed rather to the necessities caused by the anticipated pursuit of justice, than to the persecutions of a "lawless rabble?"

The oath taken by Defenders to be true to the united nations of Ireland and France, we have already noticed. A more odious obligation of this conspiracy became revealed during the progress of the State Trials. It was an engagement to massacre or exterminate the whole Protestant population of Ireland. To this there was, unhappily, too conclusive evidence given on the trials. In one instance, it appeared, that the design was imprudently disclosed, and that it influenced one of the conspirators to denounce the projects of his associates. There was a young man, a mechanic, who had been brought up as a Protestant, but had become infected with the revolutionary and infidel principles of republican France. In his estate of unbelief, he was practised upon by an emissary of the Defenders, who introduced him into the society as a Roman Catholic, the new recruit consenting to adopt the name, inasmuch as he had an equal indifference towards all religions. He was not prepared, however, for a disclosure that all Protestants were to be massacred, and as soon as that wicked purpose was made known to him, he gave secret information of it to a friend, through whose instrumentality he was finally produced as a witness against the conspirators. A passage or two from the examination of this witness will be sufficient as evidence on this painful subject.

“ After the conversation with Hart, you told Mr. Cowan? Yes. Was that not a conversation in which he communicated to you the bad purposes of the meetings? I did not like the idea of massacring all the Protestants.

“ When was the first time you knew of their bad designs? I knew if they were to rise that some persons were to be destroyed, but I did not think that they would destroy all the Protestants⁶.

“ Examined by Mr. Saurin.

“ Witness asked Mr. Weldon, was he not afraid to carry those papers about him; he said no, for he was never searched, and did not care who saw the large one, the small one was the principal, the other was only a test on account of swearing the soldiers. Brady asked if there was any one to lead them? Weldon said there was one in the north, but did not mention his name⁷.

“ He said, he met the prisoner at Nowlan's, in Drury-lane; it was on Sunday, the 23rd of August, after the meeting at Stoneybatter; it was a society of Defenders; there were more than twelve at the meeting; it was about seven in the evening. The prisoner asked witness if Coffey and Dry were not Protestants. Witness answered, he believed they were; the prisoner said he would not sit in company with them; the reason the prisoner asked him was, because he was acquainted with them both. The prisoner asked witness what religion he was of? Witness answered he was a Roman; the reason he said so was, because Brady told him when he went to be sworn, to say he was a Roman, for that they had an objection to admit Protestants. Witness asked the prisoner his reason for asking the question so many times; prisoner said because he would not sit in company with a Protestant; that the night before the Defenders were to have risen, but on account of the harvest not being got in it was deferred; for if the harvest should be destroyed, they would be starved, but as soon as it was got in, they would rise upon the Protestants, and put them to death; and that the forts would be attacked at the same time; he meant by the forts the different garrisons in Ireland. The prisoner said he would call a committee of twelve men, and that Lockington should be made a prisoner, and they would then consult *what death they should put him to, for having brought Protestants among them*⁸.”

The state of alarm in which Protestants of the humbler classes lived, if it could be called to live, at this time, may be judged of from evidence given by Thomas Smith, who had enlisted into the artillery to escape danger, after he had been influenced, by his fears, to enter into the conspiracy of the Defenders, and to conceal his religion :—

“ Thomas Smith cross-examined by Mr. Kells.

“ How long have you been in the artillery? Since the 15th of April, 1795.

“ Was it before or after you were enlisted you were sworn a Defender? Before.

“ Were you intimately acquainted with Glennan before you went into the artillery? I was.

“ Did Glennan hold any communication with you about going into the artillery? I will tell you the reason I went in. I was a Protestant all my life, and so was my father, and grandfather, since King William's time. I was obliged to hide my Bible and Prayer-book, and I consulted with my wife, and determined to go into the army to practise my profession as usual. I was obliged to make my daughter deny that she was a Protestant born, and make her say she went to mass.”

“ When did you hear of their intentions? In February 1795. What did you hear? They were talking in Connor's house—we expected every day a massacre and rebellion was to break out—no Protestant was to be left alive They were to have no king, they said—we will recover our estates, sweep clean the Protestants, kill the lord lieutenant, and leave none alive⁹.”

Such were the purposes of the Defenders, a body who embraced in their organization the mass of the Roman Catholic peasantry in at least the province of Ulster. They were formidable, too, from the compactness of their organization as well as for their evil designs and principles :—

“ Their measures appear to have been concerted and conducted with the utmost secrecy, and a degree of regularity and system not usual in persons of such mean condition, and as if directed by men of a superior rank¹.”

But it is to be borne in mind that the Defenders constituted only one of the bodies organized for treasonable purposes in Ireland. In that memoir of T. W. Tone, from which we have already given an extract, we find the following summary :—

" 1. The Dissenters, with some of the most spirited and enlightened of the Catholics, under the name of United Irishmen, whose central point is Belfast, the capital of Ulster.

" 2. The Defenders, forming the great body of the Catholic peasantry, amounting to 3,000,000 of people, and who cover the entire face of the country.

" 3. The General Committee of the Catholics, representing the talents and property of that body, possessing a very great influence every where in Ireland, and especially deciding the movements of the capital.

" I hazard nothing in asserting that these three bodies are alike animated with an ardent desire for the independence of Ireland, an abhorrence of British tyranny, and a sincere attachment to the cause of the French Republic; and, what is of very great consequence, they have a perfect good understanding and communication with each other, (that is to say, the leaders,) so that, on any great emergency, there would be no possible doubt of their mutual co-operation. Many of the most active members of the General Committee, for example, are also in the clubs of the United Irishmen; many of the officers of the Defenders, particularly those at the head of their affairs, are also either members of those clubs, or in unreserved confidence and communication with those who regulate and guide them. The central point of all this is undoubtedly Belfast, which influences, and which deserves to influence, the measures of all the others; and what I consider extremely singular, the leaders of the Defenders in Ulster, who are all Catholics, are in more regular habits of communication, and are more determined by the Dissenters of Belfast, than by their Catholic brethren of Dublin, with whom they hold much less intercourse²."

The opinion thus expressed by Tone seems to be countenanced by a letter addressed to him while he was in America, being dated Belfast, September 18, 1795, and signed R. S., the initials of Robert Simms mentioned in Tone's journal as one of the leaders of the United Irishmen. R. S., or Mr. Simms writes:—

" It is evident, from the general sentiments of the lower classes of the people, that it will be impossible Ireland can long remain in her present condition. They all look to the French, and consider them as fighting their battles. The organization which you were made acquainted with amongst the Catholics in this neighbourhood continues to increase, and has spread as far as Meath, and will, probably, go much further, which will certainly produce powerful means, if properly applied, but it will require great exertions to keep this organization from producing feuds among the different sects, for the Presbyterians in general, knowing nothing of their views and plans, look on them with great jealousy. These exertions shall not be wanting, and let us hope the best³."

The spread of Defenderism in the army is alluded to in another letter, received also from a "United Irish leader in Belfast:"—

"R. is just returned from Dublin, where it is currently reported and generally believed that five or six thousand of the militia have taken the Defenders' oath. It is certain that a great many have⁴."

A letter "from one of the chief Catholic leaders in Dublin," now known to be the celebrated John Keogh, confirms the intelligence sent from Belfast as to the activity of the Defenders:—

"I saw our friend, P. Burrowes about an hour since; he was just returned from Naas, where he was employed by the Crown in prosecuting Defenders. Two of them are condemned to death; one, whose name is O'Connor, made a speech in defence of the people. Counsellor Burrowes considers these infatuated people as having enlisted men for the French, in expectation of an invasion. It was found that O'Connor swore many to be true to the French. This now appears to be the oath taken by all the Defenders⁵."

The oath to which allusion is here made was produced on the trials of the Defenders, in December 1795. It was as follows:—

"I, A. B., do, in presence of God, swear, of my own free will and accord, that I will be true to the present united states of F—— and I——, and every other kingdom, now in Christianity, as far as in my power lies, without hurting my soul or body, as long as they prove so to me. And more I do swear, that I will not go with any robber or thief, or any person who is suspected to defame our society in character whatsoever, or keep such people company, if to my knowledge I know it. And more I do swear, that I will be true to my committee and brothers; that is to say, in supporting the rights and privileges of the united states of the kingdom, now in brotherhood, or may be hereafter; and that I will not wrong any of my brothers to the value of twopence sterling, to my knowledge. And more I do swear, that I will not come as an evidence against any of my brothers in any cause whatsoever, except on a court-martial held by our committees, on pain of exclusion or death, whichever is deserving. And more I do swear, that I will not strike or ill-use a brother in any respect; and that if I see a brother struck or ill-used, I will aid and assist him as far as in my power lies, if in a just cause, if to my knowledge he is a brother; and all brothers is to live lovingly and friendly together, and to have no quarrels or disputes whatsoever, and he that does, is to be excluded as long as the committee thinks proper; and to avoid such things, you are not to play at any sort of gaming with any of your brothers for more than sixpence at one time. And more I do swear, that I will help to support a lawful well-inclined brother in all distresses whatsoever, as far as in my power lies, without hurting myself or my family; and that I will meet when and where my committee thinks proper, and spend what is agreeable to my committee and company, and that monthly, or as the committee thinks proper: and this article is according to the united states of the kingdom.

“ F. & J. ”

Although the language of this oath may not seem that of an accomplished writer, the substance of the engagement shows that it was contrived by persons of much prudence and information. In truth, it is the same in character and spirit (although more minute in detail) with the oaths in use among the various insurrectionary societies of the south of Ireland, from the time of the Whiteboy rising, in 1759, to that of this new type of Defenderism, commencing with the year 1790. It might not be without its use, if space permitted, to examine the various engagements taken by disturbers in Ireland, beginning with the accession of George III., and to show the leading principle in which they all unite. Those writers who argue that the disorders of that country are principally agrarian, would find little countenance for their opinion in the sworn obligations of the insurgents; and would, perhaps, if they reflected on such evidence, be brought to admit that the silence which almost universally prevails as to the grievances from which the various tumults are supposed to have arisen, is, to say the least of it, an incident which ought not to have been overlooked. We cannot afford to dwell upon it now, but think it not amiss to have bestowed on it this brief notice.

It will be felt that the state of Ireland was one of more than ordinary peril, when elements, thus various in their character, were combined for its destruction. The whole mass of the Roman Catholic population, the great majority of the Dissenters,—heads to plan treason and to direct insurrection on a scale which befitted war,—hearts and hands to carry out the preliminaries of rebellion by murder, “foul and unnatural,”—the terrors of Defenderism compelling peaceful subjects to seek shelter under the United Irish system,—the Government, by its long-continued inaction, almost excusing loyal men for thinking that it had betrayed them. And these evils, which may well seem sufficiently menacing, had many aggravations; among them these two, the secrets of government were continually betrayed, and the army was subjected to influences so very seductive, that it could scarcely be depended on.

“It was at one of those meetings,” writes Mr. Madden, “that the sergeants of two regiments then stationed in Dublin attended, the men of one of which were then on duty at the Castle, waiting the decision of the Committee; and, after a long debate, the decision was come to, to postpone the rising. One of the members, on whose authority the preceding account is given, conveyed the decision of the Committee to the persons in attendance at the door of the place of meeting; and the emphatic reply of the latter was (with the addition of an oath), ‘Then all is lost ⁶.’”

“It was no uncommon thing, in 1796, to meet General Lake at the parties of the prime mover of the United System, Mr. Wm. Sinclair, and at a later period, Col. Barber, and Lieut.-Gen. Nugent. There was a policy, it is said, in maintaining this kind of intercourse, as not a single movement of the troops, or an iota of information communicated by government to General Lake, but a sister of the Sinclairs, a young woman of considerable personal attractions and intelligence, was not ⁸ able to obtain from the General,—an officer more remarkable for his vanity and incapacity, than for any qualities or acquirements of another kind ⁹.”

Such was the state of parties in Ireland towards the close of the last century, and such, we would remind the reader, was the state, emphatically, of Ulster; the United Irish system embracing a majority of the Presbyterians; Defenderism numbering as its adherents almost the whole Roman Catholic population; spies upon the functionaries of government, both civil and military, in their offices as well as in society; and fear acting upon such hearts as it could quell among the well affected to make them

And here we feel that our duty would not be faithfully discharged, if we did not enable the reader to form some notion of the atrocities by which this reign of terror was established and extended. We shall not pain him or ourselves by making numerous citations, but limit our extracts to two,—one from the evidence of a distinguished and upright member of parliament, Lieut.-Col. Verner, and the second from Mr. Madden's "Lives of the United Irishmen;" the former containing details of an inhuman outrage perpetrated by the Defenders; the other tending to show with what Draconic indifference offences against the Union were visited with treason's extremest rigour.

"Select Committee on Orange Lodges, April 7, 1835.

(Lieut.-Col. Verner, M.P.)

30.—"A gentleman of the name of Jackson died and demised his property to religious and charitable purposes, and required by his will that a Protestant colony should be established upon his property¹ in that part of the country; it adjoins the county of Louth. In attempting to do so, his agent was frequently shot at, and upon one occasion had a horse killed under him. Mr. Jackson required, by will, that there should be four schools established for the purpose of the education of the children of all denominations and persuasions. In the attempt to establish this colony, the persons who came to reside there were frequently threatened by the Roman Catholics, and told that they should not come into that part of the country. One of the schoolmasters had also been frequently threatened. One evening his house was entered; I am not sure whether the door was forced, or if he opened it at the persuasion of a neighbour²; a body of men came in. The man, aware from their threats what their object was, concealed his wife in the bed-curtains. They threw him down, put a cord round his neck, and forced his tongue out, which they cut off, and then cut off the joints of his fingers, joint by joint. His unfortunate wife screamed out; they took her, and cut off, with a blunt instrument, the joints of her fingers; they then cut off her breasts, seized her son³, a boy of thirteen years old, cut out his tongue, and cut the calves off his legs. The unfortunate man asked if he had ever injured them; they replied no, but that this was the beginning of what all his sort might expect."

The statement of Lieut.-Col. Verner corresponds with the more detailed account, published at the time, of the dreadful occurrence, by the trustees to the charity. They add, however, one circumstance which should not be overlooked.

“ Shocking as this account is to human nature, it is publicly exulted at in the parish; and no person seems to think that any punishment will follow the commission of this most atrocious wickedness. So far were they from wishing to conceal it, that they proceeded on the road with torches, publicly, and in defiance of every body.

“ There is every reason to dread the most alarming consequences from the effects of this transaction. The Protestants are every where in the greatest terror; and unless government affords them assistance, must leave the country, as this recent instance of inhumanity, and the threatenings thrown out against them, leave no doubt upon their minds of what the intentions must be against them ‘.’”

We should apologize for submitting to the reader a statement such as this, (one which we admit is too shocking to be produced on an ordinary occasion,) or rather, we should have spared the reader and ourselves the pain of producing it, if it were not of paramount necessity to show the nature of the influences by which Defenderism extended its empire.

The judicial inflictions of the United Irishmen had less, perhaps, of barbarism in their cruelty, but were not without their due share of terror. Their influence was upon witnesses, jurors, magistrates, people at large, and was made manifest in courts of justice as well as over the whole face of the country. We shall quote but a single passage to show the indifference with which the taking away of human life appears to have been contemplated; and this we shall borrow, not from the appalling statements of the Lord Chancellor Clare, or from any of the historians, whose bias is supposed not to have been favourable to the conspirators, but from Mr. Madden, the apologist, rather than the historian, of the United Irishmen. Mr. Madden, in defence of the parties accused of an organized system of assassination, cites the information he received from one of those parties, whose individual experience was, certainly, somewhat more than ordinarily suspicious:—

“ James Hope, on the subject of the assassinations ascribed to the United Irishmen, informs me, that at the Society established at Craigurogan, they came to a resolution to the following effect: ‘ That any man who recommended or practised assassination of any person whomsoever, or however hostile to the Society, should be expelled⁵.’ ”

⁵ United Irishmen, Second Series, vol. i. 356.

At a Baronial Committee, held at Ballyclare, near Carrickfergus, James Hope and Joseph Williamson, proposed the resolution above named; it was seconded by William Orr (who was executed at Carrickfergus), who said on that occasion, a man who would recommend the killing of another was a coward, as well as a murderer.

“The resolution, however, was opposed by some of the Belfast men, and it did not pass at that meeting. But no Society or Committee gave a sanction to the practice of assassination⁶. The only persons Hope knew to have been assassinated, were M'Bride, an informer of Donegore, shot in North-street, Belfast, at Saw's Entry, in 1797; M'Clure, of Craighally, supposed to be made away with in 1796, who suddenly disappeared, and was never more heard of; Harper, of the county Down, suspected to be an informer, shot at a bridge near Ballygowan, about three miles from Belfast; Newell, from Dublin, an informer, who was traced as far as Doah, about ten miles from Belfast; Philips, an excommunicated priest, from French Park, county Roscommon, who had sworn in a number of Defenders, had received a shilling a head from them, and subsequently had given information to Colonel King and Lord Dillon, and had several of the men thus sworn arrested. He then came to Belfast, but his character came before him; he was taken by a party of Defenders, about 1794; one of them (it was said) confessed he was present when they seized Philips, tried him on the spot, and condemned him,—they gave him time to pray,—then put leaden weights into his pockets, and drowned him at the paper-mill stream, close to the town. Henry Caghally, of county Derry, suspected of being an informer (but no proof of the fact); he got money to take him to America, but spent the money, and remained at home; he was then seized, brought to Templepatrick by a party who gave him drink, and then stabbed him in the breast and killed him. This was two miles from Templepatrick, on the Antrim road. Hope knows of no other instances of assassination ascribed, with any probability of truth, to the United Irishmen.”

“Hope knows of no other instances.” The instances, it may be said, are sufficiently numerous. They serve abundantly to explain some of those scenes in courts of justice, where faltering witnesses belied their examinations, and shrunk from identifying the accused. The Union had other resources, too, in the perjuries it exacted, when perjury could serve its turn.

“The following information, in connexion with this subject,” writes Mr. Madden⁷, “was given to me by a man, whose honesty and truth have a sort of proverbial currency in Belfast; by Israel Milliken, a man not unacquainted with the 'full troubles' of that time, nor a mere spectator in that struggle. Milliken's statement gives an insight into the crimes to which men were driven in those times; men meeting perjury with perjury, and attempts on life, in the arrangement of the panel, and the drilling of the witnesses, with the taking of life by other modes and weapons.

⁷ United Irishmen, vol. i. p. 355.

"Joseph Cuthbert and John Boyce, and four other prisoners, in 1797, confined in Carrickfergus gaol, were put on their trial. The witness against them was one Lee, a pensioner, and also a pedlar, who had lodged the original information against this man before the trial came on, and who was drowned at Dunederry bridge, three miles from Antrim. Lee was then brought forward as a substitute for the pedlar, to swear against them; and prior to the trial, an attempt was also made on the life of Lee, who swore that Cuthbert and some others had fired at him. Lee had been set on by a captain, (M'Nevin.) The attorney for the prisoners was James M'Guiken. It was determined to get two alibis, to prove that the prisoners were of a masons' lodge, and had been at it all that evening on which the murder was said to have taken place. These two witnesses were sent to confer with M'Guiken before the trial; and on leaving him, one of them said it was evident that he (M'Guiken) was giving them advice that would cause them to break down. They, however, and all the prisoners' friends, thought that M'Guiken did this from stupidity, and not from dishonesty. The two witnesses were one John Sayers, a farmer, and the other was William M'Coe, a publican. Some years after, Sayers became dispirited, and repented of what he had done; he came to Israel Milliken, and told him he had no peace or comfort; that he had consulted several clergymen, but they gave no ease of mind. A person present, a friend of Israel's, recommended the man to take comfort; and inasmuch as he had not borne false witness against his neighbour, but for his neighbour, instead of causing the death, he had saved the lives of six men. These witnesses, on their examination, gave so circumstantial an account of the masonic toasts, songs, and proceedings, which they described on this occasion, that the witnesses quite carried the judge with them, and the prisoners were acquitted."

The machinery of the malcontents would not have been complete without a press, and accordingly a press was provided. Of this there were three principal organs; the Northern Star, published in Belfast, which had among its objects, as Tone avers, "to give a fair statement of what passed in France, whither every one turned his eyes"; the Press, printed in Dublin, and conducted by A. O'Connor, a member of the executive directory of the Irish Union, having for its object to vilify government, &c. &c., and the Union Star, of which we find the following notice in the Report of the Secret Committee, 1798⁹.

“The Union Star appeared at irregular periods, was printed on one side of the paper to fit it for being pasted on walls, and frequently second editions were published of the same numbers. It chiefly consisted of names, and abusive characters of persons supposed to have been informers against United Irishmen, or active opposers of their designs; and to such lists were generally added the most furious exhortations to the populace to rise and take vengeance on their oppressors. Each number commences with the following words:—

“As the Union Star is an official paper, the managers promise the public that no characters shall be hazarded but such as are denounced by authority, as being the partners and creatures of Pitt, and his sanguinary journeyman, Luttrell.

“Perhaps some arm more lucky than the rest may reach his heart, and free the world from bondage¹.”

Such is an incomplete outline of the machinery of disaffection in Ireland at the close of the last century, previously to the outbreak of insurrection in the year 1798. It will be admitted that the instrumentality was very formidable; a pestilent press, assassins, false witnesses, spies in the government offices, and upon the movements, out of their houses, and in their houses, of all official persons, emissaries to corrupt the army,—and all these agencies at the command of a Directory engaged in treasonable correspondence with a foreign enemy; the United Irish system completed, having for its purpose to effect a separation from Great Britain, and establish a republic in Ireland; Defenderism completed, proposing a similar purpose, but holding as its own secret, (until events made it known,) utterly to exterminate Protestants from the country; all the members of these treasonable societies known to each other by secret signs and pass words, and all but those who were capable of thus making themselves known, exposed incessantly to systematic intimidation and outrage. Such a state of things demanded a wise and vigorous government, and such was the engrossing anxiety with which the British cabinet devoted itself to foreign affairs, that for a great length of time Ireland was abandoned to the care of official persons who were grossly incompetent to the emergency.

the first organized society within the century (the Peep-of-day Boys had no settled organization), which was, at the same time, political and exclusively Protestant. It was in its principle, as inquiry has by this time abundantly established, purely defensive, enjoining upon its members to respect the religious opinions of all men, and to protect, so far as their power should extend, all who were upright and loyal. Its progress at first was slow, few or none but members of the Church of England giving in their adhesion; but when it was found, that wherever a lodge was formed, loyal men were able to protect themselves, and the lawless became more cautious, and crime less frequent, the Orange Society grew in favour, and extended itself. After some time, persons who had sworn to the engagements of the United Irishmen, because their crime promised them protection, learning that they could ensure a more honest defence, renounced their old associates, and entered into the Orange body². In the year 1796, the new institution spread into the counties adjacent to, and surrounding Armagh, and the number of its sworn members became considerable. With increasing strength, a higher ambition developed itself, and Orangeism, which had at first sought nothing further than to be suffered to exist, boldly offered its services to the Irish Government. In consequence of this gallant offer, the yeomanry corps of Ireland was formed, while, at the same time, Orangemen, as Orangemen, were permitted to act in connexion with the royal forces, and against the insurgents. We find, in the general orders of the time, evidence in proof of this truth; we find further, that thirty thousand Orangemen, as such, were reviewed by General Lord Lake and General Knox, at Lurgan; and we have on record from the latter gallant officer—one whose tolerant and liberal principles and character have never been impugned—a testimonial in praise of his Orange volunteers, which, coming from one under whom they had served in the most trying times, must be regarded as of the very highest importance³.

² At a later period this was done dishonestly, and it became necessary by the Orange test to exclude all who had been engaged in any treasonable conspiracy.

“Dungannon, June 27, 1799.

“SIR,—I have had the honour to receive the address of the Grand Orange Lodge of the county Tyrone.

“Nothing can be more satisfactory to me than to know that my conduct while in command of this district met with the approbation of so loyal a body as the Orangemen of Tyrone.

“I can with the greatest sincerity declare, that should this country be again disturbed by foreign or domestic enemies, it would be my ambition to serve with the yeomanry and Orangemen of the North.

They may boast, however, a testimonial of still more convincing authority—the state of Ulster previously to, and after, their organization. How the Orange institution found that province the reader has seen. He need not be told, that for a space of nearly half a century, indeed until within the last two years, when, during the suspension of Orangeism, and under the supine sway of the existing government, its peace has been invaded, the condition of Ulster has been, in order, tranquillity, and freedom from crime, in no respect inferior to that of England. It is not amiss to add, that the Orange system has had its alternations of war and peace establishments, according as the troubled or tranquil state of the country demanded exertion or admitted of repose. “When the danger ceased,” said Lieut.-Col. Verner, “I conceived that the Orange societies ceased also; for instance, about the year 1814 the society had in a great measure died away⁴.” Outrage in that year, as well as alarming indications of worse evils to come, caused the society to revive. It was so in the year 1821, also in 1826, in 1830; and now again we see that the disorganization into which society in Ireland seems breaking up has called it into renewed action.

It will not surprise the reader to learn that Orange Societies should have been what, in his well-known speech of 1814, Sir Robert Peel said of them, “from the loyal principles which they professed, and their firm and determined hostility to the factious and disloyal,” “peculiarly obnoxious, and objects of marked hostility” “to that class of persons.” This hostility began early to show itself. The following extract we have taken from the report of the Secret Committee, 1798:—

“As an instance of the arts used to make the Orange Association an occasion of exciting in the breasts of the lower class of Catholics the most malignant and vindictive passions, the following series of fabricated rules and regulations, intended to be considered as those of the Orangemen, are here inserted. The copy from which they are transcribed was found in the house of Maclery, a tailor; but similar copies were frequently found, both on the persons, and in the houses, of United Irishmen.

“ ‘ 1st. Resolved unanimously, that each and every member be furnished with a case of horse pistols and a sword; also, that every member shall have twelve rounds of ball cartridges.

“ ‘ 3rd. Resolved, that no member is to introduce a Papist or Presbyterian, Quaker or Methodist, or any persuasion but a Protestant.

your address, but one that I have long entertained, and have been forward to acknowledge.” &c. &c. &c.

“ ‘5th. Resolved, that every man shall be ready at a moment’s warning to burn all the chapels and meeting-houses in the city and county of Dublin.

“ ‘6th. Resolved, that any man that will give information of any house he suspects to be a United Irishman’s, will receive the sum of £5, and his name kept private.’ ”

The tactique of misrepresentation thus early adopted against the Orange societies has been up to this hour persevered in, and has often been most virulent and unscrupulous at the time when the efforts of the factious and disloyal were most to be dreaded.

The following passages from a speech delivered by Mr. O’Connell, and from evidence given in by him before a parliamentary committee, will show how the tactique of invective was still pursued against the Orange body, and will show also the stuff the current inventions were made of.

“ I had from a militia officer, a friend of mine, the detail of the initiation of an Orangeman. The gentleman I allude to was allowed by mistake to be present in an Orange Lodge, in the county of Wexford, when two Orangemen were made. The ceremony contained an analogy to the facts related in the seventh and eighth chapters of Judges; and the pass-word was, ‘the Sword of the Lord and of Gideon!’ The Orangemen were the 300 selected by Divine inspiration from the immense multitude; the 32,000 who originally formed the camp of the Israelites; and as these 300 were composed, by the directions of the Most High, of the men who lapped water out of their hands, without kneeling to drink at the running stream, this chosen few of the Orangemen were designated as ‘the men who lap and do not kneel!’ And distinct allusions were made to a different liquor for Orangemen than water; a liquor to be furnished by the kneeling and superstitious Papists. The oaths were administered with much solemnity, and the secret signs communicated; and the newly initiated were reminded that, with so small a number, Gideon had brought confusion and destruction on the numerous host of the Midianites! The Orangemen became thus the chosen of the Lord, and the Papists were the Midianites doomed to destruction!”

This was spoken by Mr. O’Connell the year in which Dr. Drumgoole made his memorable and menacing speech, and in which the Ribbon Societies began openly to show themselves. In the year 1825, the learned Agitator was examined before a parliamentary committee as to the source whence he derived some very false information of a similar character.

“ Was your informant an Orangeman? Yes, my informant was a person who was stated to me to be an Orangeman.

"Your informant was stated to you to be an Orangeman? To have been an Orangeman.

"Your informant did not give that account of himself, did he? I got in writing from the informant upon that particular subject the information; I refused to see him, because, circumstanced as I am in Ireland, I do not like to hold personal intercourse.

"Do you believe he is an Orangeman? I do.

"What was his name? I should certainly wish not to mention that; I pledged my sacred word of honour, that I would not mention the name of a person who came to me on this subject; a most solemn pledge as a gentleman that I would not give his name. I gave money to my informer; I was also to give more money, after giving as solemn a pledge as a gentleman could that I would not mention the name; but at the time I made the pledge, that he should come forward by summons in a court of justice, for I would not give any pledge that should exclude evidence from a court of justice

"In making this information public respecting the Orangemen, which certainly reflects very much upon their character, do you not think it would have been as well if you had published the terms on which the information had been procured, as far as regards the Orange Association? Certainly, if it had lain in my way, I would; I would not do any thing derogatory to any human being, without giving him perfectly fair notice at the time; I originally published that in the Catholic Association which has been mentioned; I also distinctly mentioned that I had given money for the information, and that I was to give more⁵."

A few days after he had given this evidence, Mr. O'Connell was re-examined. We subjoin a passage from the report of his testimony, delivered March 4.

"I give up my informer entirely; and may I be allowed to say, that the gentleman to whom I gave my honour not to mention his name, though he knew me well, as I understood, was a student of Trinity College; but I could not tell his name precisely,—I only conjecture his name; I consider him, therefore, and the person who informed me for money, as certainly persons on whom no faith can be distinctly relied; that I think right to say now⁶."

Better, in our judgment, had he said so before; but even so late, it is of some value to have it shown that the charges against the Orange Society were baseless and untenable.

Our space draws to a close; but we must advert briefly to the present state of the land. We see by the public prints that the Orangemen are again reviving and reconstructing their association; and whatever we may think of the expediency of such a movement at such a time, we must confess that it is in harmony with what has been uniformly alleged on the part of that loyal body. If the emergency of 1814, when Ribbon societies showed themselves, and Romish intolerance was more than ordinarily menacing, and Sir Robert Peel informed the House of Commons that convictions had been had before the judge of assize in Ireland for the crime of swearing allegiance to Buonaparte (then, we believe, in Elba); or the perils of 1821, when Lord Plunkett had the painful duty of prosecuting a traitorous body, whose purposes had become known, for a conspiracy to massacre or exterminate Protestants; or the dangers of 1831-32, when the new Irish volunteers arose, and the Protestant clergy were so cruelly persecuted, and the mission of the lighted turf seemed designed to mark out Protestant victims, and to telegraph signals to their adversaries;—excused the drawing closer the bonds of union between those who were set in imminent and manifest danger; the existing state of Ireland, we contend, will afford an equal justification, at least, for the projected reorganization of Orange Societies.

Do we advise this measure? No; but we affirm that the emergency which suggests it to loyal men, warns England that her laws and her mild administration of them require alteration to render them meet for Ireland. We counsel such alteration, and confidently affirm, that if Irish Protestants can find protection for life, liberty, and property, within the law, they will not seek for protection in any form of society which shall not be conceived in the spirit of our constitution.

- 1.—Essays on Subjects connected with the Literature, Popular Superstitions, and History of England in the Middle Ages. By THOMAS WRIGHT, M.A. F.S.A. In 2 vols. London: J. R. Smith.

THESE volumes, interesting as they will doubtless be to the antiquarian, are not less deserving of the attention of the student of history, and even of the reader who is in search of amusement rather than of instruction. They relate, as a whole, to the literature, history, manners, and customs of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, and the information which they convey is of a description which at once attests its own fidelity; being, in fact, chiefly comprised in translations from the works of contemporary authors, accompanied by the originals, in many cases. The copious citations which illustrate the pages of this work, and the careful analyses with which it abounds, contribute largely to its interest as well as its value. The first chapter includes a clear and brief account of the progress of the study of Anglo Saxon Literature, from the time of Queen Elizabeth to the recent labours of Rask and Grimm, and of Thorpe, Kemble, Bosworth, and other English writers. This is followed by an analysis of the poem of Beowulf—the only complete monument of the compositions of the Saxon bards while their countrymen still retained their paganism. Mr. Kemble, who has published an edition of this curious relic, fixes the date of the hero of this poem, in the fifth century; and Mr. Wright observes, that there are many reasons for believing that it was brought here by our first Anglo Saxon settlers. The poem itself consists of a description of the exploits of a chieftain of the Angles of Sleswick and Jutland, in his contest with an unearthly monster, “the Grendel,” who regularly made his supper, each night, on some of the guards of the king of Denmark.

An essay on Anglo Norman poetry and romance, introduces us to the minstrels, jongleurs, and troubadours, and their writings. The specimens which are given convey the notion of a strange mixture of generosity and devotion, with gross immorality and obscenity.

The “Chansons de geste,” or historical romances of the middle ages, form the subject of an amusing chapter: proverbs, popular sayings, and nursery rhymes are also considered at length; after which, we have disquisitions on the Anglo Latin poetry of the twelfth century; the scholastic philosophy as taught by Abelard, and the German mythology as illustrated by the researches of Grimm.

“The National Fairy Mythology of England” supplies to the author a rich fund of singular and wild adventure. Much of the fanciful and supernatural in the ecclesiastical mythology of these ages is attributed, and apparently with some reason, to a wish on the part of the monks to Christianize the floating traditions which had been derived from heathenism; and the result was, that saints and devils were clothed with the legendary attributes, which in former ages had gathered themselves round the fairies and elves.

“St. Guthlac built him a mud-cot in the isle of Croyland, a wild spot, then covered with woods, and pools, and sedgy marshes. The isle had hitherto been uninhabited by men; but many a goblin played among its solitudes, and very unwilling were they to be driven out. They came upon him in a body, dragged him from his cell, sometimes tossed him in the air, at others dipped him over head in the bogs, and then tore him through the midst of the brambles; but their efforts were vain against one who was armed like Guthlac, for he carried to the combat ‘scutum fidei, lorica spei, galeam castitatis, arcum poenitentiae, sagittas psalmodiae.’”—i. 263.

There is an essay on a very curious subject; “The Popular Superstitions of Modern Greece," which is illustrated from the writings of Leo Allatius, Michael Psellus, &c. The αροισία or river spirits, the vapayίδαι or spirits of the waters and of the mountains, the witches, changlings, vampires, and other objects of Greek superstition, are described in a very amusing way. Leo Allatius relates a story of his recovery from illness at seven years of age, which is wonderful enough :—

"Three days I had not been able to speak, and had not tasted food, and I lay in a state of insensibility. My mother went to the church of the Virgin of Loretto, who at Chios is held in great veneration, and returned with a sprig of myrtle, with which she had touched the image. Plucking a leaf, she rubbed it over every part of my face and breast, and, strange to relate, I immediately recovered my senses, opened my eyes, and I saw and knew my mother."

After this, the branch of myrtle was put in a cupboard where are paintings of the saints, and in the evening the lamps were lighted on the images, so that the myrtle could be seen. In the night, Allatius saw two beautiful women come, and each take a leaf from the myrtle, and afterwards others came, two at a time, and imitated their example :—

"Presently came one woman much taller, more elegantly dressed, and more beautiful than the others, as if she were the mistress of them all; and, not content with a leaf, she took the whole branch. In an agony of grief I shouted out aloud, 'Madame! Madame!' for so children in our country call their mothers."

The mother assures her son that the myrtle is safe and sound in the cupboard, and, to reassure him, touches his head and breast with it, on which he demands something to eat, falls asleep, and next morning awakes in perfect health. Allatius of course attributes his cure to the Virgin.

We are next introduced to those mirthful beings Puck, Robin Goodfellow, Friar Rush, &c., and to some account of their mischievous dealing with monks and friars, whom they seem to have had a particular pleasure in intoxicating and setting together by the ears. The essay on "Popular Stories," which succeeds, traces a large portion of the fabliaux to Eastern originals—in fact, to the Thousand and One Nights. The well-known story of the Hunchback, for instance, appears in several forms in the romance literature. Several collections of stories directly translated from the Eastern languages, made their appearance in the twelfth century.

A very interesting tale forms the subject of one of these essays. The Adventures of Hereward the Saxon. This tale, which is chiefly a translation from a Latin manuscript of the twelfth century, was originally published in Ainsworth's Magazine. It records the bold achievements of an Anglo Saxon noble, in resistance to the Norman invaders of England, and to William the Conqueror, which eventually win the favour and admiration of the Norman.

The story of "Eustace the Monk" affords another series of adventures which, if they do not equal those of Hereward in historical interest, exceed them in grotesque variety. Eustace, who had studied the occult sciences at Toledo, afterwards becomes a monk, and on his father's death is unjustly deprived by the Count of Boulogne of the lands which ought to have been his by right of inheritance. The uncle on this becomes a sort of Robin Hood, and takes his revenge in a series of pranks, which throw those of that celebrated outlaw quite into the shade. We must give a specimen or two.

"Many a trick did Eustace play upon his enemies. One day, as the count, with nine attendants, was riding to Hendelot, Eustace, with ten companions, followed him in the garb of pilgrims. When the count descended from his horse, Eustace came to him and said, 'Sire, we are penitents from the apostle of Rome: many injuries we have done to man, of which, by God's grace, we have repented. We are now in great need.' The count gave him three pence, and entered the castle with his followers, leaving the ten horses without. Eustace took them all, set fire to the town, and fled, leaving a serjeant to tell the count that this had been all done by the penitent on whom he had bestowed his three pence. 'By my faith,' said the count, 'I was a fool not to seize those rascals! those vagabonds! those false pilgrims! If I desired to leave the castle I have not a horse to mount. This monk is truly a devil. If I had him, he should rue it, I warrant me.' Eustace met with a merchant, and sent him with one of the horses to the count, telling him that it was the tithe of his gains."—ii. 133.

On another occasion, Eustace, being pursued by the count, had recourse to the following stratagem:—

"He equipped himself as a leper, with cap, crutch, and clapper; and when the count passed he began to rattle his clapper, by which he gained in charity from the count and his knights twenty-eight pence. At a short distance in the rear, a boy was leading one of the count's finest horses. Eustace knocked him down, mounted the saddle, and galloped away, leaving the lad to tell it to the count, who, almost mad with rage, turned again to pursue him."

These adventures frequently issue in the capture of the count's horses by this successful depredator. Another illustration of the manners and habits of these times is supplied by the interesting adventures of Fulk Fitzwarrine, a baron who had been deprived of his lands by King John, and who, in consequence, adopts a system of reprisals, which at length have the effect of compelling the king to do him justice, and restore his possessions. Strange and evidently fabulous as are many of the incidents recorded in these biographies, they throw light on the feelings and habits of the age, and the general outline is strictly historical.

There is a curious disquisition on the tales and traditions of Robin Hood, whom, we are sorry to see, our author regards as an imaginary character; and also on the conquest of Ireland in the reign of King Henry II. On the whole, we are bound to say that these volumes present an interesting outline of the manners and ideas of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries.

THIS portable and convenient edition of Venerable Bede's Ecclesiastical History is printed from the text of Smith, with corrections and various readings selected from versions, manuscripts, and other editions of the work. From what we have observed, the learned editor appears to have performed his part most satisfactorily, and we have no doubt that, from the mass of information which he has brought to bear on the subject, considerable light will be thrown on many passages in this most precious monument. We observe that the Irish Annals, published by Dr. O'Connor, have been extensively employed for the purpose of illustration, and that even such recent works as Mr. Petrie's Essay on Round Towers have supplied materials. The erudition displayed in the annotations is altogether very striking, and the gratification of the reader is increased by the very modest manner in which the Editor alludes in the preface to his own labours. We can have no hesitation in recommending this edition of Bede to all students of Ecclesiastical history.

III.—Biographia Britannica Literaria; or, Biography of Literary Characters of Great Britain and Ireland, arranged in Chronological Order. By THOMAS WRIGHT, M.A. London: Parker.

THE volume before us is the second of a series which is being published under the superintendence of the Royal Society of Literature. It includes brief memoirs of the writers who flourished from the conquest to the end of the reign of King John, with catalogues of their works. To the historian, and generally to all who are engaged in researches into the condition of society in those ages, this volume cannot fail to be of great value.

IV.—History of the Reformation of the Sixteenth Century. Vol. IV. By J. H. MERLE D'AUBIGNE, D.D., &c. Edinburgh: Oliver and Boyd.

THE popularity which the former volumes of this history have acquired in England and America, has induced the author to publish the continuation of it in England and in the English language, instead of in France. The circulation of the volumes already published amounts, as the author informs us, to 150,000 or 200,000 in the English language, while in France the number hardly exceeds 4,000. What proportion of the larger number has been sold in England we are not informed; we apprehend that the American sale must account for the immense difference between the circulation of the original and the translation. We have known of instances in which works which have attracted interest in this country, and of which a few thousand copies have been sold here, have been reprinted in America, and sold to the extent of 100,000 copies and upwards. Of course such reprints can be sold at a much cheaper rate than the original works printed in this country; but still the extreme avidity for such publications is a very interesting phenomenon, and evinces tendencies in the American mind, which bid fair to create an independent literature at no distant period.

The present volume of M. D'Aubigné's history commences with a narrative of the events in Germany, which took place from 1526 to 1530, including the history of the Diet of Spiers, and of the Diet of Augsburg. It also details the progress of the Swiss Reformation from 1526 till the death of Zuinglius. To those who are acquainted with the literary merits and the principles of M. D'Aubigné, it must be wholly superfluous to offer any observations on the peculiar characteristics of the work before us. For ourselves, we must profess, that while sensible of the beauty of the composition, and the great research evidently employed in every part, and while sympathizing with the affectionate feeling with which the author regards the cause of the Reformation in general, we cannot enter into his views in many places on questions of Church government. We must say, however, that bearing in mind the actual position of the author, and of the community of which he is a member, and the associations into which that position have brought him, there is quite as much of moderation and impartiality in his pages, as it would have been reasonable to expect. Of course, in speaking of impartiality, we do not allude to the questions in debate between Rome and the Reformation, in which M. D'Aubigné is decidedly and openly opposed on principle to the former.

From the preface to the present volume we learn that the English Reformation is to occupy the historian's attention in the next.

"It is not, however, without some portion of fear that I approach the History of the Reformation in England; it is perhaps more difficult than elsewhere. I have received communications from some of the most respectable men of the different ecclesiastical parties, who, each feeling convinced that their own point of view is the true one, desire me to present the history in this light. I hope to execute my task with impartiality and truth. But I thought it would be advantageous to study for some time longer the principles and the facts. I am at present occupied in this task, and shall consecrate to it, with God's assistance, the first part of my next volume."

We shall look with considerable interest for the appearance of the next volume of this history.

v.—Coniston Hall; or the Jacobites. A Historical Tale. By the Rev. W. GRESLEY, M.A., Prebendary of Lichfield. London: Burns.

THE interesting tale before us is in illustration of one of the principal epochs of modern English history,—the revolution of 1688; or rather of the consequences and results of that measure. The narrative itself relates to the ill-fated insurrection in 1715, under the Earl of Mar, in Scotland, and under the Earl of Derwentwater and Mr. Forster in England. The earlier part of the story brings us acquainted with two branches of an ancient Cumbrian family, one of which is of the Jacobite, and the other of the Whig or Hanoverian party. A visit from Colonel Dalton and his family to their relatives, Sir Charles Dalton and his son Edward, leads to the incidents on which the tale chiefly turns; while in the intercourse which takes place between these relations, all the leading opinions, principles, and arguments of both parties are brought out. Edward, who, as in duty bound, falls in love with his cousin Clara, is deeply involved in the conspiracy with Lord Derwentwater, and is actually arrested on a charge of treason, but makes his escape, and joins the insurrectionary movement. We shall not proceed further with the story, of which enough has been said to convey some idea of its general character, but proceed to select a few passages as illustrative of the way in which the subject has been treated.

Edward and Clara, in one of their excursions in the neighbourhood of Coniston Hall, are obliged to take shelter at the mansion of the Earl of Derwentwater. They find the countess in the deepest distress, her lord having been that morning compelled to fly on the approach of a king's messenger with a party of soldiers, who had come to arrest the earl on a charge of high treason. The family had retired to rest, when Edward found himself suddenly surrounded by a body of armed men, and arrested on the same charge. He was allowed to retire to his bedroom under guard.

"The officer went with him to see that all was safe. He searched carefully to discover if there was no secret door through which he might escape; threw up the window, and seeing that it looked down into the deep water of the lake, observed jocosely, 'You may jump out there if you like, young sir.' So saying, he left the room, bolting and barring the room after him, and leaving Edward again to the train of his meditations.

"These were now diverted into a different channel. His career seemed at once checked. The crisis of his fate seemed suspended. The struggle is about to take place, and he no longer allowed to take part in it. Now that he was likely to be kept a close prisoner, shut up probably in Lancaster Castle, his spirit chafed against the restraint, and he determined, if possible, to escape. The door was firmly fastened, so that there was no hope of making his escape in that direction. Chimney there was none. The window was his only chance. But to throw himself thence into the lake seemed certain death. . . . As Edward watched the scene with mingled feelings, he fancied that he heard the splash of an oar in the water, and soon after another, as of a person cautiously rowing on the lake. Presently a boat was seen cautiously creeping round the headland at some fifty yards' distance, in which Edward could distinguish a single figure. Slowly and silently it approached until it arrived underneath his window. The rower paused for a moment, and then said in a suppressed voice, 'Mr. Dalton, are you there?' 'Yes,' said Edward; 'is it Robin?' 'It is: all is right, then. Are you ready to escape from the window?' 'If you can tell me how to get down without breaking my neck.' 'I have a rope; you must let something down to draw it up.' Edward immediately thought of his fishing-tackle, which he had brought with him, little thinking of the use it would be; and speedily unrolling a line, he let it down from the window. Robin attached the hook to the rope that he had brought with him, and Edward drew it up in safety. It was a good stout rope, knotted at regular intervals in order to prevent the hands from slipping. It was soon fastened to the iron stanchion of the window, and Edward ascended the window-sill. He was active and muscular, not unused to feats of the sort; so that he had little difficulty in letting himself down to the rock on which the castle was built, and thence to the boat.

“ ‘Thank God, we are safe so far!’ said Robin. ‘Now we must make as little noise as possible. I must first go to the landing.’ ‘Would it not be better to go straight to the opposite shore?’ ‘No; we had better take the other boats along with us, to prevent pursuit.’ Robin quickly attached the other boats to the stern of that in which he was sitting; and the castle being separated from the shore by scarcely a stone’s throw, it did not take long to place Edward in safety on the other side.”—pp. 139, 140.

“The body of non-jurors, though weakened by this and other causes, continued to exist for more than a century. They might have been called the unestablished Church of England; and however we may judge of their ‘position,’ whether before or after the death of the first non-juring bishops, their case presents a valuable example of the inherent independence of the Church on the State; a reversion, so to speak, to the state of things which existed before the days of Constantine, when the Christian Church existed in its purity, without the aid of kings or governments. They were, in fact, forced back on the primitive model, and many of them imbibed a truly primitive spirit. Those who least admire their principles cannot refuse them the praise of piety and learning. One result was, that being debarred from all prospect of rising in their profession, and from exerting themselves in ordinary duties, many of them devoted their time to literary pursuits; and many excellent volumes of divinity were the result of their labours. They depended for their maintenance on the contributions of their small flocks, and some of them were reduced to great poverty. Bishop Wagstaffe was obliged to practise as a physician in order to obtain a living; Bishop Blackburne supported himself by correcting the press in a printer’s office; to so low a degree in worldly circumstances were they reduced.”—p. 109.

VI.—S. Justini Philosophi et Martyris Apologia Prima. Edited by the Rev. W. TROLLOPE, M.A., Pembroke College, Cambridge. Cambridge: Macmillan, Barclay, and Macmillan.

SEVERAL editions of works of the Fathers have recently made their appearance at Cambridge, which evince the growing interest in such studies, while they reflect considerable credit on the writers who have so carefully edited them. Amongst them we must assign the first place to the important and admirably executed edition of Chrysostom on St. Matthew, by Mr. Field; the valuable collection of tracts, published by Mr. Harvey, in illustration of the thirty-nine Articles; and Mr. Woodham's edition of Tertullian's Apologeticus, with critical and explanatory notes, which evince the most perfect scholarship, and a thorough knowledge of his subject. Mr. Woodham's work, which is further enriched by a preface containing much valuable matter on the early Christian apologists generally, seems to have formed the model to a certain degree, which has been followed in the well-executed edition of Justin Martyr's Apology now before us. We wish that the learned Editor would confer an additional favour on the student by continuing his labours on this ancient writer, and presenting to the world a complete edition of his works. For the portion, however, which has now been so carefully and judiciously executed, we are bound to offer our thanks to Mr. Trollope.

VII.—The Sayings of the Great Forty Days, &c., with an Examination of Mr. Newman's Doctrine of Development. By GEORGE MOBERLY, D.C.L., Head Master of Winchester College. Second Edition. London: Rivingtons.

WE have great pleasure in seeing a second edition of Dr. Moberly's excellent volume, enriched by an elaborate preface, comprising an examination of Mr. Newman's theory of Development. The firm and decided tone in which Dr. Moberly speaks on this important subject is very gratifying. The following passages are well worthy of attention:—

“It is as inconceivable that other minds have been swayed to take the same step on the same argumentative ground, as it is that the authorities of the Romish Church should sanction and approve those argumentative grounds. The book is an idiosyncrasy. It contains Mr. Newman's intellectual confessions; but those confessions cannot conceivably depict the state of other minds, or at least not of many besides his own. . . . Earnestly convinced, a few years since, that the English Church held a true, independent, Catholic position, he has been distressed and shaken by the ‘fertility of thought,’ the many theories, the ‘more hopeful position of infidelity’ in these days. He has sighed for an infallible guide; he has felt the absolute need of a living governor, from whose lips he might receive the full detailed rule of faith and practice without doubt or question. He has been disposed to hope that the absolute necessity which he felt of such spiritual supremacy formed a good argument to prove that it was actually given. And then a passage or phrase of M. Guizot has fallen as a spark upon this prepared state of mind and feeling, and produced this melancholy explosion. No matter if the very thing itself is unknown to the Romish controversialists. The theory itself may be applied to heal its own defects. Implicit tenets may well have been defended by implicit arguments.

“But where shall there be found another mind which has known all this experience and traversed all this course; a mind which, having been originally attached to the low or evangelical view of doctrine, was afterwards so lucidly and learnedly convinced of the soundness of the Anglican theory, [we cannot acquiesce in the correctness of this statement;] a mind so distressed and agitated in its intellectual depths by the aggression of infidel dangers; a mind so yearning for a position of spiritual slavery, as the only intellectual dry land out of the flood of unbelief; a mind so stored with learning, able to press to its purpose so vast a variety of illustrative matter, and to urge an argument with so lucid and forcible a logic; a mind capable of reading history all of a sudden with new eyes, and representing facts and statements distantly relevant to its point, in the very light which it has itself recognized and described as uncandid and untrue before?”—p. lv. lvi.

The preface, as far as it goes, will be found of considerable value, as an antidote to the theory of development; but the limited space allotted to the discussion, of course prevents it from assuming the character of a formal refutation of the argument of Mr. Newman's book.

VIII.—Notes on the Miracles of our Lord. By RICHARD CHENEVIX TRENCH, M.A. Vicar of Itchen Stoke, Hants, Professor of Divinity, King's College, London, &c. London: Parker.

MR. Trench has brought to the illustration of his subject powers and attainments which are seldom found in combination; an accurate criticism, a varied reading, a subtle and philosophical ingenuity, under the guidance of a reverential spirit, which render this volume one of the most interesting and valuable which has recently come under our notice. One of the especial objects of this work evidently is, to furnish a reply to the objections which rationalism and infidelity have raised on the subject of the miracles, and to expose the folly and absurdity of those who have, in various instances, endeavoured to explain them away, or to resolve them into the operation of natural causes. And this seems to us, as far as we have had an opportunity of observing, to have been very successfully done. The moral instruction derivable from the miracles and their attendant circumstances, is very thoughtfully and beautifully brought out. As an instance of Mr. Trench's mode of treating his subject, we would refer to his notes on the demoniacs in the country of the Gadarenes. He begins by offering some prefatory remarks on the subject of the demoniacs of Scripture.

"It is of course," says Mr. Trench, "easy enough to cut short the whole enquiry, and to leave no question at all, by saying these demoniacs were insane persons,—epileptic, maniac, melancholic, and there is essential truth in the view that these possessions are bodily maladies. There was, no doubt, a substratum of disease, which may have helped to lay open to the deeper evil, and upon which it was superinduced: and, in agreement with this view, we may observe that cases of possession are at once classed with those of various sicknesses, and at the same time distinguished from them, by the Evangelists; who thus at once mark the relation and the difference (Matt. iv. 24; viii. 16; Mark i. 33). But the scheme which confounds these cases with those of disease, does not, as I think every reverent handler of God's word must own, exhaust the matter; it cannot be taken as a satisfactory solution; and this for more reasons than one.

"And first, our Lord himself uses language which is not reconcilable with such a theory; He every where speaks of demoniacs, not as persons merely of disordered intellects but as subjects, and thralls of spiritual might; He addresses the evil spirit as a person different from the man; 'Hold thy peace and come out of him,' (Mark i. 25.) And the poor reply, that He fell into and humoured the notions of the afflicted, in order to facilitate their cure, is cut off by the fact, that in his next confidential discourse with his disciples, He uses exactly the same language (Matt. x. 8; and especially xvii. 21, 'This kind goeth not forth but by prayer and fasting.')

Then follow some judicious remarks on the impossibility of our Saviour's having thus deceived his disciples; after which the writer proceeds thus:—

"And then besides this, the phenomena themselves are such as no theory of the kind avails to explain, and they then bid us to seek for some more satisfying solution. For that madness was not the constituent element in the demoniac state is clear, since not only we have not the slightest ground for supposing that the Jews would have considered all maniacs, epileptic, or melancholic persons, to be under the power of evil spirits; but we have distinct evidence that the same disease they did sometimes attribute to an evil spirit, and sometimes not . . . Thus on two occasions they bring to the Lord those that were dumb; (Matt. ix. 32; xii. 22; on the second occasion it is one dumb and blind;) and in each of these cases, the dumbness is traced to an evil spirit: yet it is plain that they did not consider all dumbness as having the same root; for in the history given by Mark (vii. 32.) of one deaf and dumb that was the subject of Christ's healing power, it is the evident intention of the Evangelist to describe one labouring only under natural defects."

After this the writer discusses the question of what demoniacal possession really was. He rejects the notion of Heiroth, who traces up insanity, in every case, to foregoing sin, and he equally rejects the idea that the demoniacs are necessarily the worst of men, and that their possession was a plague for sin which had surpassed that of their fellows; nevertheless, he connects it with the commission of sin, and makes its peculiarity to consist in a sense of misery.

"This sense of misery, this yearning after deliverance, seems in fact what made these demoniacs objects and subjects for Christ's healing power. Without it, they would have been as little objects of this as the devils, who are complete and circular in evil, in whom there is nothing for the Divine power to take hold of; so that even in their case, as in every other, faith was the condition of healing. There was a spark of higher life not yet trodden out in them, which, indeed, as long as they were alone, was but light enough to reveal to them all their darkness; yet was it that which Christ took hold of, to fan again into a flame."

This may, perhaps, afford some slight idea of the way in which Mr. Trench has treated his subject. We regret that space does not permit us to enter at length on the discussion of the interesting topic which has just been considered, but the remainder of his essay is well worthy of an attentive perusal. We should add, that a very interesting and thoughtful essay on the miracles in general is prefixed to the work.

THIS summary of the Councils seems to be very well executed, as far as we can judge; and as it seems that there is no other manual in the English language which comprises an account of all the Councils, both general and provincial, the work before us will probably be very acceptable to students. It is arranged in alphabetical order, and references are in all cases appended to the collections of Labbe, Wilkins, or other authentic sources of information.

x.—Modern Hagiology ; an Examination of the Nature and Tendency of some Legendary and Devotional Works, &c. By the Rev. J. C. CROSTHWAITE, M.A. London : Parker.

CONCURRING, as we do, in the truth of much which Mr. Crosthwaite has urged in this work against the series of Lives of English Saints originally devised by Mr. Newman, and at first authorized by him, and against various publications of Mr. Oakley, Mr. Ward, and Dr. Pusey, we were by no means convinced of the expediency of thus directing attention to theories which were so evidently mistaken, and so inconsistent with common sense, that their speedy downfall might have been anticipated ; nor did it seem that Mr. Crosthwaite had treated the subject in such a spirit as was likely to be productive of good. On these accounts we cannot say that we regard with any satisfaction the republication of this series of papers in their present form. We do not think that the cause of truth can be promoted by bitterness and acrimony of tone, or by personalities.

THIS abridgment of the history of the Old Testament extends to the death of Joshua ; and its peculiarity seems to consist in its interweaving of moral instruction in the thread of the narrative. There is of course some risk in constructing a history which substitutes for the simple language of Scripture something still simpler and more adapted to the use of children ; and we do not hesitate to say that such a task is amongst the most difficult which can be proposed ; but the little volume before us proves that it can be accomplished. In a work of the kind the great point is, that it should be free from error, or from what is too much in the nature of a human commentary on the Word of God ; and as far as we have observed, such a condition is fulfilled in this abridgment. An appendix comprises copious sets of questions on each chapter of the work. The illustrations are numerous, and in many instances very well conceived and executed.

xII.—1. Lives of English Poets, from Johnson to Kirke White, designed as a continuation of Johnson's Lives. By the late Rev. HENRY FRANCIS CARY, M.A., Translator of Dante. London : Bohn.

2. The Early French Poets, a Series of Notices and Translations.

By the late Rev. HENRY FRANCIS CARY, M.A. London: Bohn.

THESE volumes comprise two series of papers contributed by the well-known translator of Dante to the London Magazine at various times from 1821 to 1825, "at which time," as the later of these works informs us, "that periodical could reckon among its contributors names of no less note than those of Charles Lamb, Hazlitt, De Quincy, Allan Cunningham, Thomas Hood, Thomas Carlyle, and the author's highly valued friend George Darley." The first of these publications is a series of lives of our English poets, from Johnson to Kirke White, with criticisms of their works. The reader will, of course, be familiar with the incidents of the memoirs of some of these writers, and others are perhaps of no great interest in themselves. But this may be said to a certain extent even of Johnson's Lives. The subject of the second publication is less familiar to the English reader; and it therefore takes the more interesting shape of translations from the works referred to, which are executed with the fidelity, spirit, and poetical taste which might have been anticipated. We select this little piece by Charles, Duke of Orleans, who lived in the fifteenth century:—

"The Time hath laid his mantle by,
Of wind, and rain, and icy chill;
And closes a rich embroidery
Of sun-light poured on lake and hill.

"No beast or bird in eastern sky,
Whose voice doth not in gladness thrill;
For Time hath laid his mantle by,
Of wind, and rain, and icy chill.

"River and fountain, brook and rill,
Bespangled o'er with livery gay
Of silver droplets, wind their way;
So all their new apparel vie;

XIII.—Bohn's Standard Library.

WE have seen several volumes of Mr. Bohn's "Library," which are very neatly executed, and are published at so moderate a price as to be within the reach of all purchasers. The first of these volumes is Robert Hall's Miscellaneous Works and Remains, with a memoir of his life by Dr. Olinthus Gregory, and a critical estimate of his character and writings by John Foster, author of "Essays on Decision of Character." The memoir is amusing enough, and the criticisms on Mr. Hall's style of preaching show much discrimination. It is curious enough, however, to find Robert Hall, amidst all the popularity which his writings acquired amongst Churchmen, holding the principles of a decided radical and democrat, and denouncing the very notion of an Established Church. "The Life of Leo the Tenth," by Roscoe, in two volumes, forms another portion of this series. This elegant work has been so long and so favourably known to the public, that it seems almost needless to recommend it to perusal; yet it may be as well to say to our younger readers, that they will here find the history of Europe generally, and of Italy in particular, at the period of the Reformation, including the state of literature and the fine arts, handled with a thorough knowledge of the various subjects which are brought under view.

"The Philosophy of History," by Frederick Von Schlegel, translated by J. B. Robertson, is another interesting volume in this series; it includes a well-written memoir of the author by the translator, who being a Romanist, writes con amore on the subject. Von Schlegel's conversion to Romanism has left pretty strong traces in the volume before us.

On the whole, if this series proceeds as it has begun, there seems to be a fair prospect of interest for readers of all classes and "denominations," and at a very cheap rate. We need not say that the works are selected without any reference to their religious or political views.

XIV.—The Poetical Works of HENRY ALFORD. In 2 Vols.
London: Burns.

MR. ALFORD's poetry is pervaded throughout with an individuality and a unity of character, which forms one of its peculiar characteristics. All his poems bear the impress, or convey the expression of the same tender, affectionate, and thoughtful spirit. It is impossible to read them without becoming acquainted with the character of his mind and heart, and feeling ourselves drawn towards the writer by many bonds of sympathy. This it is which constitutes the charm of Mr. Alford's poetry. It is the outpouring of a heart with which our best feelings and affections are in unison; and this natural poetry finds vent and expression in song, which in its various modulations, conveys with perfect truth the idea of the spirit which has informed it.

These volumes comprise two poems of some length, "The Abbot of Muchelnaye," and "The School of the Heart," besides a number of ballads, sonnets, and short poems. The first of these compositions is a very mournful tale of true love crossed; and we could only wish that its details had been more brought out. The second is a didactic poem, which, in a strain of pious and thoughtful feeling, aims at elevating the heart above the things of this world. Many of the sonnets in these volumes are pleasingly written. We must find space for one or two.

EASTER EVE.

“I saw two women weeping by the tomb
Of one new buried, in a fair green place,
Bower'd with shrubs; the eve retained no trace
Of aught that day performed, but the faint gloom
Of dying day was spread upon the sky;
The moon was broad and bright above the wood;
The breeze brought tokens of a multitude,
Music and shout, and mingled revelry.
At length came gleaming through the thickest shade
Helmet and casque, and steel-armed band,
Watched round the sepulchre in solemn stand;
The night word past, from man to man conveyed;
And I could see those women rise and go
Under the dark trees, moving sad and slow.”

BRUGES.

“Wouldst thou behold, not the ensnaring blaze
Of earthly grandeur in its envious noon,
But the calm majesty of other days
Reposing, as beneath the summer moon
Rests the laid ocean—hie thee to the streets
Of ancient Bruges: temple, dome, and tower,
Or pathside dwelling—whatsoever meets
Thy roving sight, bears record of a power
Long since departed: surely not so fair
When pomp and pride are tenants here, as now,
When solitary forms with pious care,
Or thankful haply for some granted vow,
Stately and dark these vistas churchward tread, Fit habitants for her whose form is with the dead.”

xv.—1. Sermons by CHARLES JOHN VAUGHAN, D.D., Head Master of Harrow School. London: Murray.

2. Justification. Eight Sermons preached before the University of Oxford, &c. By CHARLES N. HEURTLEY, B.D. Oxford: Parker.

3. Sermons on the Privileges, Responsibilities, and Duties of Members of the Gospel Covenant. Vol. II. By the Rev. T. BOWDLER, M.A. London: T. B. Sharpe.
4. Expository Discourses on the Rod of Moses. By the Rev. B. ADDISON, M.A. Edinburgh: Grants.
5. Sermons on the Evangelical Doctrines of the Apostolic Church. By the Rev. T. D. GREGG, M.A. Dublin: Curry.

OF these volumes of sermons, the first and third are plain and practical sets of discourses, intended for ordinary congregations, and without much ornament, setting forth the duties of Christians. The fourth connects the history of the children of Israel with the miracles wrought by means of the rod of Moses and, as far as we can see, it exhibits more than ordinary care and ability. The fifth volume is chiefly "evangelical" in its theological views, though we apprehend that there is much in it which is not very consistent with those views. Mr. Gregg is a supporter of the doctrine of the Apostolical Succession, though he considers that the validity of the sacraments does not depend on this succession, and he holds that though "the Spirit of God may find his abode in individuals or in bodies who are outside the boundaries of the Apostolic Church" (which he connects with the episcopal succession) he is "compelled to believe that such cases are exceptions to the general rule; that such bodies are irregular; that they are only warranted temporarily; and that they will disappear immediately after the Church gathers from them the lesson which their existence is calculated to teach, and applies it to herself." These discourses are written with vigour and nerve. The second volume of sermons mentioned above, are the Bampton Lectures for last year. They appear to be solid and well-considered discourses, and sound in their theological views.

XVI.—Light in the Dwelling; or a Harmony of the Four Gospels, with very short and simple Remarks, adapted to Reading at Family Prayers, &c. London: Hatchards.

THIS work, which is a production of the author of "The Peep of Day," &c., and which professes to have been "revised and corrected by a Clergyman of the Church of England," is moderately "Evangelical" as regards its doctrine; and we doubt not, that from its pious and devotional tone, and from the simplicity of language which characterizes it throughout, it will obtain extensive circulation amongst those who approve of the general character of its theological views.

London: Burns.

THE preface to this volume informs us that its contents "will be found to indicate a mind saddened by the present state of things in the Church of England, but not therefore inclined to join the Church of Rome. It appears to the Author, indeed, that English divines have been uncharitable in their language towards Rome, and that as Christians we ought to seek more earnestly than we do a reunion with her; but he is not disposed to conceal or explain away her corruptions." The poems are on such subjects as the following:—Praying towards the East—Flowers on the Altar—Lights on the Altar—The Fire of the Last Day—The White Robes of Baptism—The Sign of the Cross—Trine Immersion—Milk and Honey given to Infants at Baptism—Birthdays of Martyrs, &c. We cannot say that the poetry is such as to require any particular notice.

xviii.—A Practical Comment on the Ordination Services. By the Rev. JOHN JAMES, D.D., Canon of Peterborough. London: Rivingtons.

THIS commentary on the offices for the ordinations of priests and deacons is intended by its author not only for the use of candidates for orders and the younger clergy, but also for the laity. We have been very favourably impressed by such parts of this work as we have perused, and it seems well calculated to promote an intelligent appreciation of the responsibilities of the ministerial office, and of the relations subsisting between the clergy and the laity.

xix.—Sacred Poems for Mourners. With an Introduction. By the Rev. R. C. TRENCH, M.A. London: Rivingtons.

THE plan of this work is formed on the Burial Service; it is, in fact, a commentary on that office, consisting of a selection of short poetical pieces by various authors on its several parts. The selection of poetry seems to be good; and we doubt not that to some minds the perusal of this little volume will prove consolatory under circumstances of affliction.

xx.—Verses for Holy Seasons; with Questions for Examination, by C. F. H. Edited by WALTER FARQUHAR HOOK, D.D. London: Rivingtons.

THIS little volume comprises a series of hymns for children, adapted to all the Sundays and Holydays in the year. The auspices under which it is ushered into the world speak sufficiently for the pious and devotional character of the work ; and as regards its general execution, some notion may be derived from the following stanzas from the hymn for the first Sunday in Advent :—

“ When first our Lord came down on earth,
He did not scorn like us to be ;
For He was born of mortal birth,
A simple child of low degree.

“ Where Syrian waves are bright and clear,
Where Judah’s grapes grow large and red,
He walked below ; and men drew near,
And heard the holy words He said.

“ But when the Lord shall come again,
With angel hosts encircled round,
All earth and heaven shall hail Him then,
With thunder-peal and trumpet-sound.”

XXI.—The Druidess ; a Tale of the Fourth Century. Translated from the German. London : T. B. Sharpe.

A PLEASING little tale, narrating the conversion of a Druidess to Christianity. It is evidently the production of a Roman Catholic.

XXII.—She Loved Much : and The Hem of His Garment. Two Sermons. By W. F. Hook, D.D., Vicar of Leeds. London : Rivingtons.

THE preface to these sermons, which were preached at the re-opening of two churches, is remarkable as conveying the sentiments of their eminent author on recent occurrences. We shall offer no apology for making the following extracts :—

“ The author has the more readily complied with the request that these sermons shall be published, because in a time of much public offence and suspicion, it seems incumbent upon those whose attachment to the distinctive principles of the Reformed Church of England is unalterable, to take every public opportunity of making their sentiments known. . . . We have lived to see men quitting without compunction that branch of the Catholic Church which God has planted in their native land, and betaking themselves to the schismatic sect intruded by the Bishop of Rome, with as little scruple or hesitation, as a man might feel in vacating one post of duty or preferment for another to which he had been lawfully called. And such grievous and sinful acts are palliated by being styled by the milder term of secession, and not schism; a going forth to labour in another portion of the same vineyard, rather than a breaking down of the hedge of our own sacred enclosure. . . . There is another way of accounting for these secessions as they are called, which is still more shocking: it is said that the Church of Rome has gained possession of the perverted ones, in answer to the prayers which we have seen so often advertised as offered by persons and societies in that communion for the reduction of England to the Romish faith."

"I state these facts broadly, in the hope that on either side it may startle some, and lead the orthodox as well as the evangelical to ask themselves what is likely to be the end of this mutual hatred. I am myself as much convinced that there are among the evangelicals persons led by other feelings than self-indulgence and party spleen, as I am that there are multitudes of orthodox Churchmen, whose life is a pattern of self-denial, reverential fear, and love. The difference lies for the most part not in doctrine, but in different modes of applying the same doctrine; and this difference can soon be satisfactorily explained, if a spirit of love shall bring together those whom party leaders for their selfish ends labour to keep apart."

XXIII.—The Statutes relating to the Ecclesiastical and Eleemosynary Institutions of England and Wales, Ireland, India, and the Colonies; with the decisions thereon. By ARCHIBALD JOHN STEPHENS, Esq. Barrister at Law. In 2 vols. London: Parker.

THE object of this elaborate work, is to supply, in a convenient form for reference, a complete collection of the Statutes relating to Ecclesiastical and Eleemosynary Institutions. The statutes are arranged in chronological order, beginning with 9th Hen. III. c. 1., and terminating with the 7th and 8th Vict. c. 108. Repealed statutes affecting existing interests are printed at full length. The titles of statutes affecting the Presbyterian establishment in Scotland have been introduced. The whole work is illustrated by elaborate notes, containing cases and references, and furnished with copious indices. Considering that the work extends to about 2,300 pages royal 8vo., printed in a very small type, the price seems to us very moderate. A supplement will be published each year, comprising the statutes and cases enacted and decided in the preceding year.

XXIV.—Ecclesiastical Records of England, Ireland, and Scotland, from the Fifth Century to the Reformation, &c. By the Rev. RICHARD HART, B.A. Vicar of Catton. Cambridge: Macmillan.

THIS work is a digest of the contents of Wilkin's and Spelman's Concilia, arranged under various hands, and illustrated with notes exhibiting considerable research. The divisions are as follows: a discourse on the religion of the ancient Britons, Irish, and Scots.—On the mode of celebrating synods.—The origin and progress of the Papal power in England.—The hierarchy and clergy. The seven sacraments, and other ceremonies.—Liturgical and architectural antiquities.—Penance, indulgence, &c.; and civil laws.—Real or reputed heretics. There are also three well-executed plates, representing ecclesiastical vestments, Gothic tracery, ecclesiastical miscellaneous utensils, &c.

XXV.—The Influence of Christianity in Promoting the Abolition of Slavery in Europe. By CHURCHILL BABINGTON, B.A. Cambridge: Deighton.

THIS dissertation obtained the Hulsean Prize for the year 1845. The author has bestowed great pains on his subject, as is evident from the copious citations and references with which his pages abound. He admits that slavery is not inconsistent with the letter of Scripture, but argues that it is inconsistent with its spirit.

XXVI.—Burns' Fireside Library.

THE last volumes of this amusing and cheap miscellany that we have seen, are the romantic story of "The Magic Ring," by La Motte Fouqué, "Marco Visconti," by Grossi, "The Maid of Orleans," translated from Schiller, and "William Tell," by the same author. The first of these tales abounds in knightly adventures, witches, enchanters, Moors, &c., to the fullest limit of the requirements of romance. The translations from Schiller will be perused with pleasure by those who have made any acquaintance with the works of this eminent writer.

XXVII.—Thirty-six Non-conformist Sonnets. By A YOUNG ENGLANDER. London: Aylott and Jones.

WE apprehend that "Young England" will not be much gratified at the adoption of its name by the author of the sonnets before us, who is a Dissenter. We must really find room for a specimen : it is warlike enough.

HEART OF OAK.

“ Are we not English ! Is it not enough
 To prove we ne’er shall cringe beneath the sway
 Of a smoll’n priesthood ? Proudly do they say
 They are ordained of God, with loud rebuff
 To follow all who dare to disobey
 Their lordly mandates, and with sternly rough Unbending mien, they stand ready to cuff
 Christ’s heritage, and blast it, if they may.
 Ye carnal ! vainly do ye wait the day
 For which so rancorous ye fume and puff ;
 Our swords are ready and our shields are tough,
 And on our Lord we lean for all our stay.
 Wherefore come on, in all your armed array,
 And ye shall find that we are solid stuff ! ”

We are afraid there is a good deal of “ solid stuff ” in this “ heart of oak.” It would be desirable that the “ Young Eng-lander ” should attend to his own lines on “ Moderation and Firmness.”

“ Not with the bitterness of party zeal,
 May we advance our hallow’d Lord’s commands.
 Stigmatizing brand
 Of Schism and Faction, and whatever stands
 Across our steps to make our spirits reel
 And stagger from their coolness, we must use
 But as incentives to such worthy deeds
 In our great cause,” &c.

XXVIII.—PAMPHLETS, &c.

We have read with interest and pleasure the Charge delivered to the candidates for ordination, and a Sermon preached at the General Ordination by the Lord Bishop of Oxford. Two excellent sermons on “ Parochial Subdivision ” (Rivingtons) have been published, which were delivered by the Rev. Dr. Hook and the Rev. W. Dodsworth, at St. Paul’s Church, Leeds, in aid of a fund for constituting that church a separate parish, under the Leeds Vicarage Act. We have also to notice, as deserving of attention, “ The Church of England, Catholic and Apostolic in her doctrine and practice,” a sermon by the Rev. A. Sayers, M.A., Rector of St. Mary de Crypt, Gloucester (Rivingtons); “ The Corruptions and Idolatry of the Church of Rome,” by the Rev.

J. Burwell, M.A., Incumbent of St. Philip's, Stepney (Bell), an able and sound discourse ; "The Scriptural doctrine of the Holy Sacrament opposed to Transubstantiation," by the Rev. T. Robertson, A.M., late Senior Presidency Chaplain of Calcutta (Hatchards).

Mr. Gresley's pamphlet, "The real danger of the Church of England" (Burns), has attracted much attention, and deserves to be carefully examined. Mr. Gresley states it as his opinion, that the ultra-evangelical party are obtaining an influence in the Church which is calculated to be most injurious to her, and even to lead to the exclusion of persons of different theological tenets from her communion. Mr. Gresley enters into details on this subject, which are of great interest and importance.

A "Letter on the recent Schisms in Scotland," by the Rev. R. Montgomery, M.A. (Lendrum), and a "Letter to the Lord Bishop of Cashel," by Francis Gordon, M.A., Incumbent of St. Paul's Chapel, Edinburgh, both refer to the distressing divisions in Scotland, and are written with much force and ability. A second edition of "A few words on the Athanasian Creed, Justification by Faith, and the 9th and 17th Articles, by a Bishop's Chaplain," (London: Parker), has made its appearance. This pamphlet will be useful to candidates for orders. Mr. James, Vicar of Cobham, has published "A Vindication of the usage of closing the morning service with the Sermon" (Rivingtons), in reply to Archdeacon Harrison.

The Rev. John Miller, M.A., has published four Sermons, entitled "A Plain Christian's View of Fundamental Church Principles" (Rivingtons). They comprise a clear and satisfactory view of the position of the English Church, as it stands distinguished from Romanism and Dissent. "The Theory of Development examined," by the Rev. W. J. Irons, B.D. (Rivingtons), is an able and thoughtful treatise on the subject of Mr. Newman's recent publication. "A Postscript" to "The English Church not in Schism," by the Rev. W. Brudenell Barter, M.A. (Rivingtons), relates to the same subject, and enters a vigorous protest against Mr. Newman's views. "A Few Words addressed to the Author of 'An Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine,' by an Anglican Priest" (Hatchards), is written in an earnest and religious tone. The Rev. A. G. H. Hollingsworth has published two excellent letters on "The Folly of going to Rome for a Religion" (Hatchards). Amongst the most pleasing and valuable of all the publications which have appeared in reference to this subject is, "An Earnest Dissuasive from joining the Communion of the Church of Rome," by the Rev. H. Alford.

(Burns). We have perused this excellent pamphlet with unmingled pleasure, and recommend it strongly to our readers. "A Plea for the Church of England," &c. (Newcastle: Richardson), contains a selection of passages from our most eminent theologians, expressive of their attachment to the Church. The Rev. F. Merewether, M.A., has published a "Letter to Lord Charles S. Manners, M.P." (Rivingtons), which treats on the Maynooth Grant and cognate subjects, with clearness, elegance, and Christian principle and feeling.

"Parish Churches," by Raphael and Arthur Brandon, Architects (Bell), of which some numbers have appeared, comprises plans and elevations of ancient parish churches, with admeasurements, and, from the judicious selection which has been made of examples, bids fair to be a very useful publication to the architect and the parish priest.

"Sharpe's London Magazine" continues to maintain its character of being the cheapest and most entertaining of our minor periodicals.

We have much pleasure in directing attention to a very well-managed penny journal, "The Church Sunday School Magazine" (Leeds: Harrison. London: Rivingtons), which commenced in January, and is published monthly. It has already reached a third edition, and seems admirably fitted for circulation amongst Sunday schools and the poorer classes.

GENERAL COLONIAL CHURCH STATISTICS.—Comparative Table of the Episcopate of the English Church and of the Romish Episcopate, in the Colonies and Foreign Dependencies of the British Empire.—The following Table, compiled from authentic sources, showing the extent to which the papal jurisdiction is exercised within the colonies and foreign dependencies of the British Empire, will not be without interest, nor, we trust, without its use. Where the date of the erection of the bishoprics could be ascertained, it has been added :—

FRANCE.—The Church and the University.—The French Government is making strenuous efforts to bring about an amicable adjustment of the vexata quæstio of education. Soon after it became known that, by the negotiation of M. Rossi at Rome, the voluntary dissolution of the Jesuit congregations established in France had been obtained¹, it became evident that the Government must, in some manner or other, which did not meet the eye, have succeeded in satisfying the Ultramontane party. The communications which passed between the Minister of Public Instruction and the *Collège de France*², indicated a disposition to curb the aggressive spirit of the parti universitaire; and what has since occurred, can leave no doubt as to the determination of the ministry of Louis Philippe to keep on fair terms with the Romish clergy, even at the risk of affronting and alienating the philosophical oligarchy which, till very lately, presided over the University. Considering the violence of the outcry which the former had raised with reference to the proposed expulsion of the Jesuits, and the hostile attitude which, on more than one previous occasion, the episcopate had assumed, the sudden lulling of the storm, and the comparatively peaceable language adopted by the Church party, betokened some great change in the political atmosphere; while, at the same time, the uneasy and irritable temper of mind betrayed by the great luminaries of the philosophical school showed that they had no longer the same confidence in the identity of the cause of the University with that of the State. Several occurrences, in themselves of no very great importance, threw light on the new situation in which the different parties stood to each other. First came a foolish quarrel, which M. Libri contrived to pick with the Minister of Public Instruction. He was in ill health, and wished to lecture by deputy; he applied for leave to do so, and as the answer did not arrive as quickly as he expected, he paraded himself in the public journals as an ill-used man, the victim of the animosity and secret influence of the Romish party. It turned out that the document granting him the required leave had actually been made out, and that some luckless clerk was the only person to blame for the delay; M. Libri therefore, having received a rebuff from the minister, and some rough handling in the ministerial journals, was allowed to retire from the stage.

The next prelude was enacted by M. Quinet, in a style somewhat more dignified. When the time arrived for the re-opening of the courses at the Collège de France, M. Quinet handed in a programme, in which he announced his intention of lecturing on "the literature and the institutions, compared with each other, of the nations of Southern Europe." M. de Salvandy, remembering the geographical position of the eternal city, did not think that there was much of the sound of peace in the programme, and accordingly suggested, that as M. Quinet was properly speaking professor of literature, he had better keep to his department, and, after the fashion of his colleagues, lecture on the language and the literature of the nations of Southern Europe. With this suggestion M. Quinet refused to comply, and as M. de Salvandy was equally positive, and the day for publicly notifying the courses had arrived, the announcement was reduced to the simplest possible form, viz. that M. Quinet would deliver his course, without specifying on what subject. Thus ended, for the present, the official conflict: the college youths, however, were not satisfied with so lame a termination of the exciting incident; they assembled to the number, some say of 300, others of 2000, for the purpose of making a "demonstration." They first proceeded to M. Quinet's residence, where one of them made a speech, assuring the professor, that in their opinion he had always strictly adhered to his subject, and that if he was opposed by a few 'obscurantistes en retard,' he had the sympathies of the universal youth of France on his side. In his reply M. Quinet boasted that he had convicted his religious enemies that they did not wish for Christianity, and driven his political opponents to the strange avowal, that they could no longer tolerate, even in a programme, the word "institutions." He therefore thought the day was his own, and advised his young friends to go home peaceably. They, however, very undutifully thought fit to go round by the rue Cassette, and vociferate, A bas les Jésuites! Vive Quinet! for the special benefit of M. de Salvandy, who lives in that street; and having given some further indications of a riotous mood in the Place de l'École de Médecine, they were ultimately dispersed by the police, who committed some of the most noisy to duration vile. The journals protracted the feud for a little while longer; the liberal prints bespattered M. de Salvandy with their abuse, the Journal des Débats insinuated that possibly M. Quinet might find it easier to fling out a few clap-trap phrases on the glories of the French revolution, and the iniquities of popery, than set forth, which was his proper business, the beauties of Dante or Calderon; and the Univers laughed, and declared that the worst that could befall M. Quinet, if he would not lecture upon a curtailed programme, would be to draw his salary for nothing, and eat the bread of idleness.

While, however, these skirmishes were in progress, M. de Salvandy came down upon the refractory men of literature with artillery of a very different calibre, which he had silently prepared. On the 7th of December a royal ordinance put an end to the existence of the council of the University, and reconstructed it, under the name of Conseil royal de l'Université, on an entirely new basis. The ordinance is preceded in the Moniteur by a report of M. de Salvandy to the king, which, as it contains a brief history of the University from its first foundation by Napoleon, and explains the nature of the present alteration, will be read with interest:

“Sire,—The events of 1815 threatened the existence of the University; they deranged every part of the institution to an extent which is felt to the present time; and they moreover altered essentially the legal constitution of the council placed at its head. They struck at its organization, at its rules, and at its very name. They cut off from it the aid of a numerous representation of all the branches of its instruction, and all the departments of its service. In fact, they gave it only a provisional existence, and stamped that character upon it so strongly, that all its deliberations necessarily bear the impress of it to this day. I ask your Majesty to put an end to this state of things. It is important, before any discussion on the conditions of freedom of teaching shall take place, that the constitution of the public system of teaching should be settled upon a perfectly certain basis.

“The University was established on the principle of two distinct powers: a Grand Master, whose business it is, in the words of the organic decree, to govern and to rule the whole (art. 50); and a Council, instituted to watch over the improvement of the studies, the police of the schools, the financial concerns, and the discipline (art. 75).

“The Grand Master appoints to all the offices, dispenses all the distinctions, and effects all the promotions in the body of the instructors (art. 51). He exercises a limited portion of the disciplinary jurisdiction (art. 57). He convokes and presides over the Council (art. 61). He appoints to the presidency two eminent dignitaries, the chancellor of the University, and the Treasurer who superintends all its financial concerns (art. 66). He divides the counsellors into sections, and refers to the several sections the matters on which he wishes them to report (art. 75). He proposes to the general assembly all the drafts of regulations and statutes intended to be enacted for different degrees of schools (art. 60).

“The Council, on the other hand, attends to whatever concerns the improvement of the studies (art. 75). It takes cognizance of all the questions relative to the police and the general administration of the schools (art. 77). It alone can inflict severe punishments, especially that of expulsion (art. 79). It admits or rejects the works that are to be put into the hands of the young (art. 80). It decides upon all contentious questions, whether relating to the establishments of the University, or to its members (art. 81). As it deliberates upon all the regulations which emanate from the Grand Master, and never exercises administrative powers, it is the guardian of all rights as well as of all traditions; and its constitution requires that it should be sufficiently numerous, and undergo sufficient renovation, to insure its efficiency in promoting every kind of improvement.

“In reality, the Council is to be composed of thirty members, to admit of their being distributed into sections for the despatch of minor matters, and for the preparation of more important business, with a view to decision in a general assembly and after real debates. This organization comprises titular or life counsellors, and ordinary counsellors; the former constitute the permanent representation of the University; the twenty ordinary counsellors, appointed annually by the Grand Master, but chosen by him in certain definite and often unchangeable categories, cost the state nothing in their capacity as members of the council, because this title is conferred on them as the complement and the reward of their labours, and they have the advantage of being in the daily practice of applying, as inspectors general, as rectors, as deans of faculties, or as masters of royal colleges, the regulations on which they are called upon to deliberate. In this system of inspection, that useful service which causes the central authority to be present every where, brings to bear upon every matter knowledge gained on the spot. The University knows that every order of studies is represented, and that by several organs. There are conflicting debates and an efficient control.

“This Constitution, so perfectly balanced that it seems as if established in anticipation of the wants and maxims of a free government, had been founded by the law of May the 5th, 1806, and organized by the special decree of March the 17th, 1808, which by the terms of the constitutional acts of the empire has force of law, and has been so recognised by the decisions of the courts and tribunals, both before and since 1830. A royal ordinance of Feb. 15th, 1815, on the eve of the 20th of March, declared all the existing institutions having reference to instruction abolished, in order to substitute, for the principle of one central authority, the principle of local authorities, and to create seventeen provincial Universities, independent of each other, and connected with the State only by the medium of a Royal Council of Public Instruction, which was to have been established for superintending both the discipline and the teaching. The 20th of March cut all these plans short before they could be carried into effect. All that remained of this attempt was a long-continued subversion of the established order.

“ After the hundred days, indeed, an ordinance of August the 15th, 1815, willing to forbear from all important innovations until a definitive system might be established, decided that all the Academies were to be PROVISIONALLY MAINTAINED. The name of the University continued abrogated. A Commission of Public Instruction, consisting of five, and afterwards of seven members, was to combine in its hands the powers formerly committed both to the Grand Master and to the Council of the University; powers of so different a nature, as to render it impossible to unite and to amalgamate them, without removing all guarantees; because all control and all responsibility was thus at once abolished. The number of royal commissioners being so small, and the ordinary counsellors having been suppressed, the attributes of the Council and of the Grand Master became alike extinct. A kind of Directoire was substituted for this twofold authority.

“ The president of the Commission was M. Royer Collard; its members were M. Cuvier, M. de Sacy, M. de Frayssinous, M. Gueneau de Mussy. It happened to these men, of minds so differently constituted, as it has ever since happened to all who have reflected upon these important questions; they comprehended that in the actual state of France, considering all that time has destroyed, and all that it has founded, the magistracy of public instruction, called the University, is necessary for ensuring the essential conditions of order, maintaining the unity of the French mind, and by degrees raising the standard of instruction. They applied themselves to the gradual preservation of the institution, for the overthrow of which they had been called in. They succeeded. After five years appeared the ordinance of November the 1st, 1820, by which the royal authority, willing to establish the direction and administration of the body of instructors upon a more settled basis, and to PAVE THE WAY FOR A DEFINITIVE ORGANIZATION, authorized the commission, in testimony of the satisfactory nature of its services, to RESUME the rank and the costume of the council of the University; it conferred on it the title of ROYAL COUNCIL OF PUBLIC INSTRUCTION; for the name ‘University,’ though admitted in the transaction of current business, was not yet reinstated at the head of the institution. The counsellors were to exercise, ad interim, the functions of chancellor, treasurer, secretary-general, which had constituted part of the attributes of the real council. At the same time they continued to exercise together the functions of Grand Master; only, instead of exercising them conjointly, they distributed them among themselves. Each administered a branch of the service, and had thus a separate, independent, and irresponsible department in the general department of the University.

“ This organization, Sire, still continues to exist, although the restoration shortly after took another step, that of formally recognizing the University by the ordinance of June the 1st, 1822, which re-established the office of Grand Master, but without restoring to the council its rules or its name, or to the Grand Master his regular attributes and his indispensable supports. At a later period the head of the University united with this title that of minister of public instruction (August

the 26th, 1824), but still the administration of the University was not brought into harmony with the principles of constitutional responsibility. In order to make some approach to this, it became necessary for M. Vatimesnil to provide, by an ordinance (of March 26th, 1829), which bears his name in the University, that a part of the deliberations of the Council, those of an administrative character, should require the approbation of the responsible minister. While the royal authority had prevailed on itself to rest its acts upon the decrees by which the University was constituted, the royal council still sprang from the ordinances which had abrogated those decrees. It had, in fact, a twofold origin: it was the council of the University, forasmuch as it enjoyed the rights and prerogatives attached to this title, and at the same time, notwithstanding the existence of the Grand Master, it was the royal commission, forasmuch as it took part in the management of the personnel and in the administration, and continued limited in the number of its members.

“This state of things has since the year 1830 given rise to constant protests in the Chambers; session after session it has been brought under discussion. Legislative commissions have, in special reports, called for the legal reconstitution of the council, and the recomposition, around the eminent men which compose it, of that useful assembly, which together with them ought to form the regular representation of the body of instructors. The administration of 1838 announced its intention to comply with this wish, in a general circular of July the 17th, 1838.

“‘I shall,’ said the minister, ‘in performance of the duty imposed upon me by the seventy-first article of the decree, which constitutes the University, make out the list of ordinary counsellors therein prescribed. It will be the complement and the sequel to the act by which I have restored to the inspectors general the right of taking their seat in the royal council, in order to receive their instructions, and to render an account of their mission, in the presence of the permanent chiefs of the University. The last traces of the long-continued derangement, occasioned by the ordinances of 1815, will thus be effaced. We shall have returned to the regular course prescribed by the constitution of the University. Considering the general state of our institutions, and the principle inscribed in the charter of 1830, nothing could be more urgent than its restoration in all those points in which any departure from it still remained.’

“A report to the king, laid on the table of the Chambers, on the 31st December, 1838, at the head of the law on finance, announced the same intentions, and developed the same ideas:

“‘When your Majesty did me the honour of calling me to the head of this department, I professed the principle, that public instruction is actually established; that the freedom of instruction, required by the charter, is not only compatible with the maintenance of the body of the University, but is practicable only by means of it; owing to its constitution, which is framed with sufficient strength to preserve to the State, amidst all possible competition, its legitimate ascendancy in matters of education and instruction. Before establishing that system, it was necessary to resettle in all its parts the University, shaken as it was by so many irregularities and uncertainties. One point alone requires to be set in order; which is, the completion and regulation of the Council, in order to put an end to constantly repeated protests, beyond the reach of which it is time that the Council should be placed. The traces of the unconstitutional acts of 1815 will thus be definitively effaced.'

"Sire, all that has taken place during the six years since elapsed, has only tended to justify and to strengthen these views. Your Majesty will judge that the moment has arrived for completing your work, and for causing the last traces of derangements of a now distant date to vanish. The legal constitution of the University must be unquestionable in the debates by which our public laws on the subject of instruction are to be determined.

"I maintain, Sire, that the first organization of the Council is not only regular, but excellent. It has the special merit of being adapted to our present circumstances. We behold our nation, which has undergone so much agitation of principles and discussion of its institutions, fall back upon itself in the midst of its immense prosperity and freedom, and consider, and that justly, all those questions of paternal right, the questions of instruction, of education, of methods and degrees, as involving the first interests of the State. The most complicated and most serious problems are proposed to us. In the midst of a new order of things, in an entirely new state of society, we are to determine what, under the influence of so many changes, public education ought to be, in its relation to the interests of civilization, to the rights of the State, and those of the family. Several commissions have already under consideration essential questions, which ought to be discussed and resolved by the Council of the University. In order to enter upon them, the Council needs all the strength promised to it by the law of its organization.

"The actual council of public instruction consists of only eight members, and several are wanting to its labours. A less indefatigable devotion would succumb to the distracting effect of the daily labour of their administrative functions, and of that constant personal superintendence of the studies, which constitutes their essential mission. Every one is aware that names of greater distinction are not known to literature and science; but even if they were all present, numerous branches of instruction and service would be unrepresented⁶. Those which are represented, are so by one person only ; of such high eminence, it is true, that his authority is surely sufficient to resolve all difficulties, but without that control and debate between equals, which is one of the guarantees required in every thing by our present institutions, and provided for by anticipation in the constitution of the University. Under our constitutional system, all interests are entitled to the benefit of conflicting debates, and every body is bound to submit to these.

“ I said in 1838, and have pleasure in repeating it, that the royal council, with the light and the zeal which shine at its head, has rendered immense services : it has saved the University under the Restoration ; since 1830, it has maintained and strengthened it. To seek for the re-establishment of its regular state, is to render it homage, Sire, because it is to accomplish its task ; a complete return to the legal order of things is agreeable to the nature of our government ; it will give additional guarantees both for persons and things, for the security of the families, and for the power and dignity of the institution.

“ With these views, Sire, I have the honour to propose to your Majesty a second ordinance, which has for its object, to restore the academic councils, those tribunals of the twenty-seven jurisdictions of the University, to that state of permanency which is agreeable to the spirit of their institution, setting to their number a uniform and definite limit. The instability to which they have, subsequently to the organic decree, been reduced, has often been the subject of impeachment in both the chambers. It is in the nature of our institutions, and in the spirit of our government, that all interests and rights should be duly guaranteed.

“ Thus, Sire, your Majesty will have accomplished your work of restoration completely. Always liable to reform by regulation or by law, our vast system of public instruction will have recovered its rules, its strength, and its stability. The head of a department of the public service which presses so heavily upon the mind and conscience, will be supported in his endeavours to carry that burden, by numerous representatives of the University, men of special information, as well as men of illustrious name. Aided by every kind of knowledge, and invested with all his attributes, he may with justice be made constitutionally answerable for all the acts which he may order, and all the directions which he may give ; and happy will he be, to whom such mighty powers are committed, if the institution thus reduced to rule and stability, shall under his care become strong in the public esteem and confidence, by greater and greater efficiency in training up sound and enlightened generations, worthy of the past recollections of France, nurtured in the spirit of her present institutions, and giving fair promise for her future material and moral greatness !”

The royal ordinances which followed this report, provided for the complete execution of the views developed in it ; the staff of the council was put upon an effective footing ; and on the 16th of December M. de Salvandy presided over its first session. There was an end at once of the exclusive and irresponsible power of the eight (or rather, by reason of absence and illness, only five or six) oligarchs of the University, who had divided the different departments between them, and exercised, each in his own, the most despotic sway over their subordinates, while in their corporate capacity they were determined to maintain, and to diffuse all over France by means of the immense machinery of tuition at their command, the anti-christian spirit which, in the person of the eclectic philosopher M. Cousin, presided over their deliberations.

Considered merely as a step towards the improvement of the notoriously defective system of public instruction in France, the measure of M. de Salvandy is one of great consequence and of high promise; but its chief importance consists in the greater facility which it gives to the government in controlling the action of the University, and, as the government seems to hope, adapting it to the requirements of a religious as well as literary and scientific education. As might be supposed, an act of power so unexpected and so decisive was not allowed to pass unnoticed by those with whose prerogatives it interfered, when the opportunity of canvassing it had arrived. No sooner was the debate on the address commenced in the Chamber of Peers, than M. Cousin mounted the tribune, and attacked the ordinances in a speech of great animation and power. He designated them as "an act prepared by the minister in the dark," which, he added, "he considered fatal to a great institution which he had served for thirty-five years, and was determined to defend to the last extremity;" lastly, he called in question the legality of the proceeding of M. de Salvandy, and maintained that the legislative power of the Chambers alone could alter the organization of the council of the University. In the Chamber of Deputies the onset was still more violent; M. Thiers brought all his eloquence to bear against the ministerial measure, which was defended not only by M. de Salvandy himself, but by M. Guizot, who took a most comprehensive view of the present situation of France in reference to the momentous question of education. This was the point on which he chiefly relied for the justification of the course pursued by his colleague. He insisted strongly on the despotic origin of the University, and on its essentially despotic character, claiming for the State an absolute control over the education of the rising generations, in violation of what he maintained to be the prior rights of the parents, and the distinct rights of religious belief. After passing in review the history of the University, he adverted to the conflict between the Church and the University, by which France had for several years been distracted, and revealed the mainspring of the ministerial policy in these remarkable words:—

"Gentlemen,—It is the duty of the government, as it is for the interest of society at large, when such a conflict arises, to put an end to it as speedily as possible; it is the duty of the government not to take part in the conflict, but to rise above it, to dominate and to pacify; this is the true task which the government has to perform. The government is not to raise one of these two great moral forces above the other, or to sacrifice one to the other; it is not to give to the University a victory over the clergy, or to the clergy a victory over the University; no, its duty is to rise above them both, to dominate and to pacify them." This he announced to be the determination of the present government of France to do ; and he gave, as to its intentions on the general question of education, the following pledge :—

" The king's government is firmly resolved upon three points. The government is firmly resolved to execute sincerely the promises of the Charter. It is firmly resolved to maintain the rights of the State in regard to public instruction. It is firmly resolved also to maintain religious peace, together with religious liberty and freedom of thought, the combination of which is the glory of our social condition. The king's government will not suffer religious liberty or the freedom of thought to be violated, it will not suffer the religious peace to be disturbed."

That these intentions are both upright and sincere, no one can doubt ; but it may be permitted to ask, considering the character of the parties with whom it has to deal, whether the king's government will be able to accomplish all that it is so firmly resolved to do, and to prevent all that it is so firmly resolved to eschew. It has obtained a truce ; but will it succeed in establishing peace ? " The position which the government means to assume," says the Espérance, " is full of difficulty and of danger. The government cannot reconcile things in their nature irreconcilable ; the task which it has undertaken is beside its duty, and beyond its power."

State Support of the Romish Church.—The ecclesiastical budget of the present year makes considerable additions to that of the preceding year. An increase of 20,000 francs is appropriated to the Protestant communion ; and an increase of 289,800 francs to the Romish Church, distributed among the following objects ; 14,000 francs for raising 35 succursales into cures ; 240,000 francs for the erection of 300 new succursales ; 35,800 francs for the employment of additional vicaires or assistant ministers. The number of students at the ecclesiastical seminary of the diocese of Paris has been raised from 250 to 450 ; a proportionate reduction has been directed in the numbers of several provincial seminaries. The missionary seminary of the "Saint-Esprit" has undergone a complete reformation, with a view to its greater efficiency ; it contains at present 46 students maintained by the state ; and in addition to this a novitiate has been established for the reception of priests who desire to devote themselves to the missionary work, and who have the opportunity afforded them of passing through a preparatory course. A comprehensive ecclesiastical organization of the colonies of France is said to be under the consideration of government.

GERMANY.—Menacing attitude of the Romish Church. In Germany, as elsewhere, it is becoming daily more evident that the Romish Church entertains the most sanguine hopes of restoration to her former condition of power and ascendancy. No opportunity of asserting the claims of Rome against the existing laws and governments is lost sight of by the Romish hierarchy, which not only does not shrink from open conflict with the temporal powers, but appears to court that conflict, and to exult in the embarrassments which it produces. In Rhenish Prussia, the flame kindled under the late reign by the recently (October 19, 1845) deceased Archbishop of Cologne, Baron Clement Augustus Droste Vischering, has broken out afresh, and is fanned in the diocese of Münster by the brother, and in the diocese of Cologne by the successor, of that haughty prelate, whose boldness and constancy in the maintenance of the principles of his Church gained for him during his lifetime such flattering distinction from the Roman Pontiff, and after his death a commemorative allocution to the Sacred College⁷. In Münster the quarrel turns upon that fruitful source of litigation between Church and State, the education question. In opposition to the order established throughout Prussia, according to which the state has the superintendence of public education, and the appointment of the teachers, the Bishop of Münster, Baron Maximilian Droste Vischering, claimed the right of appointment, and exercised it with regard to several schools for children of both sexes. The provincial government disputed his competency, and as the bishop persisted in his claim, closed the schools in question. The bishop thereupon issued injunctions to his clergy, in support of his episcopal right of superintendence over the education of the people; to which the provincial government replied by a circular addressed to the clergy, who are thus placed between the conflicting mandates of the spiritual and the temporal authority. The schools which gave rise to the dispute still remain shut up, as the government cannot find competent Roman Catholic teachers for them, six out of seven who were nominated having refused to accept the office otherwise than at the bishop's hands. The bishop has appealed against the acts of the provincial government to the king in council.

While this is going on in Westphalia, another quarrel of a similar nature has been fastened upon the government by Mgr. Johann von Geissel, formerly coadjutor, and since successor of the late Archbishop of Cologne. Here the question turns, not upon the education of the people, but upon that of the clergy. Not satisfied with the extent of the power hitherto exercised by the diocesan over the theological faculty of Bonn, and the Convictorium, or ecclesiastical seminary established in that University for the education of the Romish priesthood, Mgr. von Geissel refused to recognize them as diocesan institutions, and consequently to accept the students prepared by them as candidates for the priesthood. This measure, besides answering the purpose of a practical protest against what the archbishop considers an encroachment upon his diocesan rights, was intended to serve as an excuse for introducing into the diocese young men educated at Rome, whose ultra-montane principles, it was hoped, might counteract and in course of time expel the Hermesian school, which has still a strong hold upon the University of Bonn, and the clergy educated there. By way of reprisals, and to prevent the expatriation of young men for the purpose of receiving a clerical education at Rome, the Prussian government refused to acknowledge the status ecclesiasticus conferred at Rome, as the archbishop repudiated that conferred at Bonn. A cabinet order was issued, declaring all ecclesiastics educated abroad disentitled to the exemption from military service, which young men in holy orders, or in course of preparation for them, enjoy. The result of this order, if carried into execution, would be, that on their return from Rome, if drawn according to the Prussian law of conscription, the young ecclesiastics would have to shoulder the musket, and to serve in the ranks of the army, instead of those of the Church militant. Beaten from his position by this extra-ecclesiastic move of the government, yet unshaken as to his main purpose, the archbishop has in his Lent pastoral made an appeal to the liberality of his flock, calling on them to raise funds for the erection of four ecclesiastical seminaries, which he proposes to found with a view to a sufficient supply of clergy educated within the diocese. So much for the deference shown to the royal rights of Frederick William, in return for the good-natured concessions, and the liberal support lavished by him upon his Roman Catholic subjects, and more particularly upon those of the archdiocese of Cologne, and the Rhenish provinces generally.

Not less determined is the stand which ultra-montanism is making in the south of Germany, for that which is in fact its ultimate object, the substantial establishment of the supremacy of Rome, to the subversion of all national legislation, and of the authority of temporal princes. In the kingdom of Würtemberg there is a feud of long standing between the government and the Romish hierarchy. The head of the hierarchy in that country is the Bishop of Rothenburg, whose advanced age and great bodily infirmity, (he was blind, and at the time of his death, October 17, 1845, only two days before that of the Archbishop of Cologne, had completed his 81st year,) afforded the government of Würtemberg for some years past an opportunity of fortifying its position against Rome. Under these circumstances the appointment of a coadjutor had been repeatedly urged, but to this the government would not consent, unless the choice fell upon a person of moderate views. The death of the bishop has at length brought the matter to a decisive issue. In the election of a successor, the influence of the government prevailed; the Diocesan Chapter put in nomination one of its own canons, Von Ströbele, the author of two publications by which he rendered himself obnoxious to the ultra-montane party. The first of these is a pamphlet on mixed marriages, which he published anonymously in the year 1842, recommending a moderate course, with a view to an amicable adjustment of that difficult question, which was then, as it still is, in dispute; the second is a Catholic Manual of chants and prayers in the German language, for the use of the diocese, which has in a great measure already superseded the Romish ritual with its Latin text. No sooner was his election made known, than the ultra-montane party got up "petitions against his return," addressed to the Pope, entreating him to refuse canonical institution to the bishop elect. These petitions were circulated among the people, for the purpose of obtaining signatures to them; a course which afforded the government an excellent opportunity of interfering for the protection of canonical order, and the rights of the chapter, by directing the civil authorities to seize the petitions, wherever they made their appearance. The contemplated demonstration will therefore be a failure; and the remonstrants will have to seek the private ear of his Holiness, for the purpose of pouring their complaints into it. The result is looked for with great anxiety; but in whichever way the Pope may decide, the ultra-montane party will scarcely be a gainer; for, as the Univers justly sums up the dilemma, if M. Von Ströbele is confirmed, he will use his then unquestionable authority in support of the views of the government, and the liberal portion of the Romish clergy; if he is not confirmed, the government will have sufficient ground of complaint to push matters, if necessary, to an open rupture, the consequences of which, at this critical moment, it is impossible to calculate.

Rather better success than that which the ultra-montane party has thus had in Würtemberg, through the great disadvantage entailed upon it by the incapacity of the late bishop, has attended the endeavours of the Archbishop of Freiburg to engage the grand ducal government of Baden in what he hoped would prove an unequal conflict. Here the quarrel is of comparatively recent origin. Regardless of the legal provisions respecting the education of the issue of marriages between Roman Catholics and Protestants, the archbishop sent forth a circular to his clergy, dated January 3rd, 1845, in which he directed them, in every case of mixed marriages, to apply for special directions to the ordinariat of the archdiocese. The animus of this order soon became manifest, inasmuch as, in every case so submitted to the diocesan authority, the order was given to refuse the sacerdotal benediction, unless the parties wishing to contract marriage agreed to bring up all the children in the Romish faith. The government of Baden forbore at first to interfere with the archiepiscopal circular, in order, no doubt, to watch the practical working of the reference to the ordinariat enjoined by it; but on the 3rd of June a government order was issued, pronouncing the archiepiscopal circular invalid, on the ground that it had not been submitted, as by the law of the land it ought to have been, to the government previous to its publication. This decision was notified to the archbishop, and, at the same time, the government expressed its readiness to confer with him, as to any modifications of the existing law of mixed marriages which might be desirable. The only answer which the archbishop condescended to make, was a repetition of his former illegal proceeding, by the issue of another circular to the clergy on the 10th of August, in which he went still further, and, without circumlocution, directed the clergy to apply, in all cases, the rules laid down by the ordinariat in the individual cases referred to it in pursuance of the circular of the 3rd of January. Of the issue of this document the archbishop gave the government official notice, stating the grounds on which he rested his proceedings, and declared that he was quite prepared to follow the example of the Archbishop of Cologne, if the government would imitate that of the late King of Prussia. The rules laid down by the archbishop being directly opposed to the law of the land, which prohibits all pre-contracts on the subject, and more particularly all clerical interference with a view to obtain such pre-contracts, and the promulgation of them by the archbishop being, on the same grounds as the previous circular, illegal, the government issued another order, by which the clergy are warned of the illegality of the archbishop's injunctions, and, under reference to the law of the land, directed to obey the latter, and to disregard the former, under pain of incurring the penalties provided in such cases. Against this ministerial decree the archbishop protested in the strongest terms, declaring that he should hold no further communication with the government on the subject, but that he had laid the whole case before the court of Rome. He has since followed up his previous mandates to his clergy by a new set of injunctions, strictly prohibiting his clergy from admitting, as has long been the practice, Protestants as sponsors; a prohibition which, however justifiable in itself, indicates, by the moment chosen for issuing it, the spirit by which the archbishop is animated, and must necessarily tend to increase the irritation already existing between the Protestants and the Roman Catholics. The practical result of the conflicting orders issued by their temporal and their spiritual rulers is, that a great number, the Romish papers assert a vast majority, of the clergy, violate the law of the land, in obedience to the archbishop ; while the government, naturally reluctant to visit them for an offence committed under a sense of duty, and, no doubt, unwilling to push matters to an extremity, looks on inactive and irresolute. The difficulty in which the government has thus been placed has been greatly aggravated by the attempt of the liberal party in the chambers to force upon the government the recognition of the German Catholics of the Ronge school ; a measure to which the government itself was averse, but which, being strongly supported in the lower chambers, called forth a reaction in favour of Church principles, sufficiently decisive to induce the government to dissolve the chambers, and appeal by a new election to the sense of the people. The prospect of the embarrassments likely to ensue on the meeting of the new chambers, and of a renewal of hostilities between the government and the archbishop, has since occasioned the dissolution of the ministry also.

An imitation on a small scale of the ecclesiastico-political dramas thus enacted in the more considerable states of Germany, has been got up in the free city of Frankfort, the seat of the Germanic diet. A Roman Catholic lady who is married to a Protestant, having been urged by her confessor to have her children educated in the Romish faith, and having pleaded her duty of conjugal obedience as her reason for non-compliance with his demand, was refused absolution by him. The affair was, through the influence of her husband, brought before the senate ; the clergyman being called on for an explanation of his conduct, declined giving any, under shelter of the sanctity of the confessional. Thereupon the senate addressed to the Bishop of Limburg, the diocesan, a request for the removal of the confessor ; but to this the bishop refused to accede, as he had not contravened his ecclesiastical duty. The matter was next referred by the senate to the Great Council, which decreed the forcible expulsion of the clergyman from the territory of Frankfort. The latter, acting under the direction of his bishop, declared that he would only yield to actual force, and was accordingly transported in the custody of the police beyond the frontier. This incident, in itself insignificant, derives considerable importance from the fact, that an appeal to the Germanic Diet is in contemplation, which will probably compel that assembly to enter upon the consideration of the many knotty questions which arise out of the juxtaposition of Roman Catholics and Protestants all over Germany.

Symptoms of an Ecclesiastical Reform among the Roman Catholics of Southern Germany.—High as the Archbishop of Freiburg carries his head in his opposition to the grand ducal government of Baden, he has within the extent of his province, which includes the bishopric of Rothenburg, abundant cause for misgivings as to the success of his ultra-montane aspirations. We have already noticed in a former Number of our Review¹ the prevalence, among the clergy of the southwest of Germany, of the views and principles of Baron Von Wessenberg, formerly administrator of the diocese of Constance, who contemplated the foundation of a national Catholic Church, not in the sense of Ronge, but in the spirit of true, orthodox, and ecclesiastical reform, and who, but for the strenuous exertions of Austria and Bavaria, and the consummate ability of Cardinal Gonsalvi, would probably have carried his point at the Congress of Vienna. How averse the feelings of this large portion of the clergy of the province of Freiburg are to the tendencies and proceedings dictated by the ultra-montane spirit which presides over the metropolitan councils, may easily be imagined. The replies of the Ruri-decanal chapters to the archbishop's pastoral on the subject of the "German Catholic" schism sufficiently indicated those feelings; and a further and stronger manifestation has since taken place, in the shape of a petition to the archbishop, which has been put into extensive circulation, to the amount of thousands of copies, and is receiving numerous signatures from both clergy and laity. The petition is as follows:—

"The present movements in the Church in Germany claim the attention of every thoughtful and well-intentioned person. They have attracted our attention, too, more particularly since we have had an opportunity of observing their phenomena in this diocese. We have had our minds directed to them by your Excellency's own pastoral on the subject, addressed to the faithful of the archdiocese of Freiburg.

"It is a fact which, however differently viewed and judged, is universally admitted, that there exists in the Catholic Church in Germany an antinational party, that this party is daily increasing in number and extent, that it displays daily greater boldness and power in the pursuit of its aim, and that the disastrous consequences of its tendencies have already variously taken effect throughout Germany, and in particular in our grand duchy of Baden. What this party aims at, and what its tendencies will lead to, cannot be doubtful to any one who has attentively observed it and its movements, and is familiar with the history of the last three centuries. It is with deep pain that those who love our German fatherland witness the rekindling of the ancient ruinous Church feud, which provoked the Thirty Years' War, and inflicted on our common country wounds which to this hour are not yet healed. The fact is, that the party in question professes antinational principles, that is to say, principles not only incompatible with, but directly hostile to the social condition and wants of the German people, as well as to the fundamental laws of the political state of Germany, whether general or local, of older or of more recent date. No less antinational are its tendencies; they are opposed to the legally established order of things in Germany, they violate and destroy the rights of the temporal power of the State in its relation to the Church, and the rights and the existence of other recognized communions in their relation to the Catholic communion. Again, no less antinational is its aim; this is no other than to bring back in Germany the mediæval condition of the Church, in manifest contradiction, not only to the rights of the nation and of the government, but to the whole character of modern civilization. The inevitable consequence of all which is, the disturbance and ultimate destruction of religious peace, both private and public, in our German fatherland,—a consequence which is already heavily felt, to the great grief of all good men.

“Another fact which, however differently viewed and judged, is no less universally admitted, is that a schism has actually taken place in the Catholic Church, and has, we can only lament it, produced a formal separation which threatens to become more and more extensive. Into an examination of the character of this separation we do not wish here to enter. An attentive and impartial observer cannot, however, help perceiving what, indeed, the very name of ‘German Catholics,’ assumed by the separatists, indicates, that the above-named anti-national party is in a very great measure to blame for this separation; and that the schism and separation increases in proportion as that party gains greater ascendancy in the Catholic Church; for besides the separatists, there are opposed to that party all those Catholics who profess the ecclesiastical principles of the Emperor Joseph II., whose premature death is much to be deplored; principles which guided the universally revered Baron Von Wessenberg, in his well-known and highly honoured episcopal administration down to the dissolution of the diocese of Constance, and the excellency of which has been proved by the fruits which they have already borne, in the mutual toleration of the different communions, in the peaceable and friendly intercourse of the members of the different Churches, in the accordance of the position of the Church with the laws of the State, in many essential improvements of the internal condition of the Catholic Church, and more particularly of clerical education, and, generally speaking, in the visible progress of the popular mind under the influence of a spirit of true Christian love.

“To this class of Catholics it is well known that the majority of the faithful in the archdiocese of Freiburg belong. Our determined opposition to the antinational party in our Church, and our profound regret at the separation which has taken place, arise entirely from our sincere devotion to the country to which we belong, and to the Church whose members we profess to be. The welfare of both is alike dear to our hearts; and we wish for nothing more anxiously, than that both may be preserved from the injuries with which they are threatened by the present movements in the Catholic Church. From the warm interest which we thus take in our fatherland and our Church, springs likewise our present humble request to your Excellency, that you may be pleased to convoke a diocesan synod. In making this request, we have recourse to that remedy which the Church has ever applied, in circumstances of peculiar consequence or danger, and generally upon all important occasions, and which, in the present excited state of the Church, can alone bring about those results which the country and the Church at this time require, and which have been already suggested to your Excellency, in accordance with public opinion, by several ruri-decanal chapters.

“All our hopes for the country's and the Church's weal in the present state of affairs rest solely on the convocation of a diocesan synod, composed, according to the ancient and primitive constitution of the Christian Church, of both clerical and lay members. From the very first the Catholic Church has set a high value on synodical assemblies, and assigned to them the first and highest rank in the ecclesiastical constitution. Not only has she convoked synods on extraordinary emergencies like the present, but she has made the regular and periodical convocation both of general and of provincial and diocesan synods a matter of universal obligation. She has even threatened the rulers of the Church with severe punishments, for instance, with sequestration, and even with deprivation, in the event of their neglecting, or still more their refusing, to convoke them. Deeply sensible of the high value and the absolute necessity of synods, the Church has provided by particular and universally valid enactments for the convocation and the holding of synods, even in case the bishop to whom immediately it belongs to convoke them, should fail to do so.

“If these enactments are applicable to the convocation of settled and periodically repeated synods of the Church, how much more applicable are they to the convocation of extraordinary synods, rendered indispensably necessary by events so pregnant with consequences and so full of danger to the country and the Church, as those which present themselves at the present juncture. Considering how manifestly necessary an ecclesiastical synod is at this moment, so much so, that the peace of the country and the Church which is evidently endangered, can be maintained by no other means; considering that the great majority of the faithful of the diocese are, as unquestionably they are at this present time, sensible of this necessity; considering moreover that the convocation of such a synod is a measure which the law of the Church gives them a perfect right to demand, and which has for its object simply the maintenance and security of order and peace in Church and State, it is not to be imagined that the authorities either of Church or State would wish or venture to refuse their co-operation. Our view is more immediately directed upon the significant indications in the aspect of the Church in our grand duchy of Baden, and upon the threatening consequences likely to ensue; and we are desirous of meeting the emergency in good earnest, in the first place in our own country, by the most appropriate means, a diocesan synod, which according to ecclesiastical law has full power to apply a remedy. Our example will, without fail, be followed in other dioceses; and the diocesan synods will thus pave the way for the final settlement, in a national synod, of a question which has long been, and has recently again become, a matter of the utmost importance to Germany. Upon these grounds we prefer to our Most Reverend Archbishop the humble request, that your Excellency may be pleased, in consideration of the urgency of the case, to convoke a diocesan synod with as little delay as possible.”

Neo-Catholicism.—The hollow and unsound character of this movement becomes more and more apparent. The published reports of the

"Synods," held during the course of last autumn, contain the most melancholy evidence of the absence of all fixed principles, both of doctrine and of Church constitution. At the Breslau "Synod," held in the middle of August, one speaker, after premising that he himself had these forty years been quite clear (i. e. quite an unbeliever) on the subject, suggested that, in tenderness to popular prejudice, the words "the Son of God," should be re-inserted in the creed; he was told that such a course would defeat the object he had in view, the Leipzig confession, to which it was determined to adhere, being expressly so framed that both the assertors and the deniers of the divinity of Christ should be comprehended. With regard to their ministers, it was settled that they should not be considered as a distinct order, but should in all respects, except their appointment to preside over the worship of the congregation, be viewed in the same light as laymen; they should be called preachers, not pastors; a suggestion to connect cure of souls with their office, was universally scouted. It was also determined that all members of a certain age, not dependent by relationship on other members of the congregation, as, for instance, widows, single women, and women married to husbands not belonging to the German Catholic body, should enjoy all the privileges of membership, and have votes on all matters of faith and discipline. At the "synod," of Marienwerder, held immediately after the Breslau meeting, the principal topic of discussion was the absence of Czerski, who had given a distinct promise to appear and give explanations respecting his letters and manifestoes on behalf of orthodoxy. The culprit not making his appearance, his conduct was freely canvassed in his absence, and a reprimand, with an exhortation to more peaceable conduct for the future, was forwarded to him from the assembly. The "synod" at Stuttgardt, in the middle of September, was remarkable chiefly for its conviviality, and produced more toasts than resolutions. The Berlin "synod," held in the latter part of October, was opened by Brauner, the preacher of the Berlin congregation, with a speech in which he reminded the assembled representatives of the Neo-Catholic Churches, that in opposition to the antiquated dogmas of all existing communions, they looked to "that Eternal Spirit who reveals himself to man through the light of his reason." In the discussion on the days of religious observance, Ascension-day was strongly objected to as being calculated to induce misconceptions; viz., the belief in the personal ascension of Christ, and his personal reign in glory; the question of the days to be observed was, in the end, left an open question, so that each congregation might suit its own taste. Lastly, it was determined, touching the position of the "preachers," that they are liable to be suspended and dismissed by their congregations. The foregoing are the most important results of these four "Synods;" the history of the different sections into which the original schism has split, is not worth recording; mutual animosities and jealousies, accusations and recriminations of congregations and sections of congregations, as well as of individuals against each other, are becoming more frequent and more disgusting.

ITALY.—Consistorial Appointments.—During the year 1845, the pope has appointed three patriarchs, one for Lisbon, the other two schismatical, i. e. for Antioch and Constantinople, "in partibus infidelium;"—two metropolitans, one for Gnesen and Posen (Mgr. Léon de Przyluski), the other for Lima, in South America;—twelve archbishops, one for Camerino, in the Pontifical States; three for Naples, Syracuse, and Monreale, in the kingdom of the two Sicilies; one for Lucca; one for Evora, in Portugal; one for Colocza and Bachia, in Hungary; and five more "in partibus infidelium;"—and thirty-three bishops, viz., for the Pontifical States 7; the kingdom of Naples 10; Sardinia 2; France 3; Hungary 2; Bohemia 1; Prussia, the sees of Breslau (Dr. Diepenbrock), and Paderborn (Dr. Drepper), 2; Cape Verd, in Africa, 1; and "in partibus infidelium" 5. Four cardinal priests and two cardinal deacons were created, and the pall was conferred upon one patriarch, one metropolitan, and eight archbishops.

Saint and Relic Worship.—Six cases of aspirants (a term incongruous enough when applied to dead men and women) to a place in the Romish calendar, have been brought before the congregation of rites during the year 1845, and more or less advanced. Among the names are those of the famous mendicant Bénédict-Joseph Labre, and of the infamous Margaret Mary Alacoque, the confederate of the Jesuit Colombière in setting on foot the superstition blasphemously entitled, "The Worship of the Sacred Heart of Jesus." Collections to defray the cost of the proceedings in the former case have been ordered by the bishops of several dioceses in France; and for the promotion of the latter, special prayers have been offered, and neuvaines held, in the nunneries of the order of the Visitation. In the circular of the Bishop of Marseilles, ordering collections on three consecutive Sundays in all the churches of his diocese, in aid of the beatification of Labre, the following passage occurs, which throws considerable light upon the practical use of these proceedings in the Romish chancery:—"By a decree of the year 1842, His Holiness Gregory XVI., gloriously reigning, has declared that the virtues of that venerable servant of God, Bénédict-Joseph Labre had risen to an 'heroical degree.' Nothing therefore remains, but to proceed legally to the recognition of the miracles attributed to his intercession; but the forms required for this purpose are extremely severe, in the investigation of the truth and of the nature of the facts. They are exceedingly lengthy and multifarious. The grave nature of the consequences to be deduced from them imperatively demands their employment, as indispensable safeguards for ascertaining, so as not to leave any room for doubt, the circumstances brought under the strict investigation of the sacred congregation of rites. These forms take place by way of contest between two parties charged with the maintenance of opposite theses. They are accomplished by protracted debates, and by the printing and publication of a great mass of documentary evidence, attested by all the characteristics of truth and authenticity. Besides, a great number of memoirs and other writings of the theologians and consultors of the congregation of rites are printed and published, which memoirs and writings are exceedingly voluminous, the questions contained in them being minutely discussed, examined under every aspect, and sifted to the very last depth. In short, the holy see never pronounces till the most complete and incontrovertible certainty has been attained by human means, independently of the supernatural assistance which it obtains from on high. Now, rev. sir, in order to arrive at this result, considerable expenditure is necessary. The funds destined to defray the costs of the cause of the venerable Bénédict-Joseph Labre are by this time exhausted, and I have been requested by the postulator in this cause, and by a consultor of the sacred congregation of rites, in the name of His Excellency the Cardinal Vicar of His Holiness, to make an appeal to the generosity of the faithful of my diocese, that they may contribute by their alms to the continuance of a proceeding so truly interesting to France(!), the country which has given to the Church THE HOLY PERSONAGE WHOM IT IS INTENDED TO PLACE UPON THE ALTARS" (!!)

The relics of another recently canonized saint, St. Alphonso de Liguori⁹, were carried in procession through the streets of Naples in April last, enclosed, according to the practice now adopted in Italy, in a wax figure, representing the saint, and dressed up in gorgeous pontifical array. The royal family, the civil and military authorities, and an immense concourse of people, attended the ceremony.

Centenary of the Council of Trent.—The third centenary of the Tridentine Council was celebrated with great pomp in the city of Trent, on the 12th, 13th, and 14th of December last. The prince bishop caused on this occasion the side chapel of his cathedral to be restored, before the crucifix of which the acts of the Council were signed; and the municipality caused a lofty marble column with the statue of the virgin, the "exterminatrix of heresies," to be erected in front of the church of Sta. Maria Maggiore, in which the Council held its sittings. The celebration itself was a singular mixture of religious solemnities, for which a number of "Princes of the Church," cardinals, bishops, and abbots, had assembled; and of worldly amusements, such as concerts, fireworks, fire-balloons, discharges of artillery, illuminations, and the like.

NEWFOUNDLAND.—Local Support of the Church.—A plan has been devised by the Bishop, in conjunction with the Church Society, which has for its object the collection of Church money from all the members, at the rate of one penny a head per week, for the support of the clergy and schoolmasters, so as to relieve the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, by whose exertions chiefly the Church has been planted in Newfoundland, from this burden, within, it is hoped, the space of a few years. It is calculated that the annual revenue of the Church Society raised by this means, when the plan shall have been brought into full operation, will not only be sufficient for the maintenance of the clergy now employed in the diocese, but will admit of an addition of seventeen to their number. The working of the plan has been committed by the Bishop to the clergy themselves, to whom he has addressed a circular on the subject, directing them how to proceed, and exhorting them to enforce on their flocks the positive Christian duty, according to the rule of the Gospel, to provide for the maintenance of the Christian ministry. All the monies so collected are to be remitted to the central fund, from which the stipends of the clergy, equalized throughout the diocese, will be paid; the only room left for inequality in the incomes of different clergy, being those arising from the enjoyment of parsonages and glebes, and the varying amount of surplice fees. This contribution, the failure of which in some few instances will, it is hoped, be more than compensated by the excess of the more liberal contributions of the wealthier Church members, will include all and every demand made upon the people on account of the Church or of public education, saving only that the repair of the buildings, and the current expenses for the performance of Divine worship, will have to be met by local collection or assessment.

"I have now only to entreat you," the Bishop adds, at the conclusion of his circular, "for Christ's and the Church's sake, to use your endeavours, with prayers for God's help and blessing, to render this plan as general and effective as possible. You cannot feel more strongly than I do, that a very laborious and irksome service will be superadded to duties already sufficiently onerous and ill requited; but if it be, as indeed it is, for the honour of God and his Church, and the maintenance of Scriptural truth and Apostolic order in this country, I confidently expect you will not shrink from performing or attempting it. Gratitude indeed to that noble society—which, when we devoted ourselves to the service of God in this ministry, came forward to supply us with things necessary and convenient for this present life, and has encouraged and supported us in all our trials and privations—gratitude for such benefits will constrain us to be diligent and self-denying in this emergency. As far as possible, I am prepared to share with you all the unpopularity or other pain which may at first attach to this new and unexpected demand; and as you will ground your application upon the sacred principle of your duty both to God and his people, so you will warn and admonish your flocks that it is their duty cheerfully to allow the application and answer your call; and that for the neglect of this duty, as surely as of any other, they will bring on themselves Divine displeasure, with all its inevitable consequences; while, on the other hand, God Himself has said by his prophet, "Prove me now herewith (i. e. with tithes and offerings), if I will not open you the windows of heaven, and pour you out a blessing, that there shall not be room enough to receive it."

TUNIS.—Abolition of Slavery.—While slave-dealing in its most offensive form is carried on under the eyes of the French and "catholic" conquerors of Algeria, and while in America Christian sectarians are advocating the consistency of slave-holding with the profession of Christianity, the Mahommedan Bey of Tunis has abolished slavery within his regency. The following is the letter by which the Bey notifies this act of his government to the foreign consuls:—

“Praise be to God! The Muschir Ahmet-Pacha-Bey, Prince of the regency of Tunis, to our ally N. N., consul-general of N. N., resident at Tunis.

“The object of this letter is to let you know, that that kind of property consisting of human beings, towards whom God (be He praised for it!) has been so generous, is most unjust, and absolutely repugnant to our feelings. This matter has occupied us all the years during which, as you are aware, we have been endeavouring to put an end to it.

“We are happy to be able now to declare to you, that we abolish in all our dominions this property in slaves. Henceforth every slave in our regency is to be considered free, and verily we shall no longer consider him as property.

“We have given notice of this to all the governors of our regency of Tunis. We hereby give you notice also, that whatever slave shall enter our dominions, by land or by sea, will immediately be declared free.

“The protection of God be ever upon you!

It is gratifying to know that the execution of this decree, which took effect immediately, was not attended by any kind of disturbance. By far the largest number of slaves determined on remaining with their Arab masters (who, indeed, generally treat their slaves kindly) in the capacity of hired servants. The French Society for the Abolition of Slavery has decreed a medal to the Bey. “This,” as the Espérance observes, “is well done; but something more remains to be done.”

TURKEY.—The Patriarchate of Constantinople. The patriarch of Constantinople, Meletius, died lately, at the age of 70, after a short illness. He had occupied the patriarchal see only seven months. The Bishop of Ephesus has been elected to succeed him. At his death no less than five of his predecessors, summarily deprived, according to Turkish practice, were living; viz. 1. Constantine, formerly Bishop of Sinai, who occupied the see upwards of four years, and was banished to the isle of Antigone; 2. Constantine, surnamed, by way of distinction from the former, the Ignorant, banished, within less than a year after his elevation, to Arnautkeui, a village on the Bosphorus; 3. Gregory, formerly Bishop of Serres, in Macedonia, banished after three or four years' occupation of the see to the same place as his predecessor; 4. Anthimos, formerly Bishop of Nicomedia, banished after a short tenure to the Princes' Islands, at the entrance of the Bosphorus. Between him and Gregory, another Anthimos, formerly Bishop of Cyzicum, intervened, who died in possession of the patriarchate; 5. Germanos, who also did not occupy the see more than three years.

WHATEVER may be the inconveniences which have of late years arisen from the public and warm discussions of subjects relating to the Church, too important for the columns of a newspaper, and too profound for the comprehension of the majority of even well educated men,—one consequence of this collision of opinions and these tumultuous discussions may be valuable and produce excellent effects. It is this: people have begun to feel that there is something very unsatisfactory in the grounds and reasons advanced by the organs and champions of public opinion on both sides, in almost every instance in which matters of ecclesiastical polity have been discussed. They have begun to suspect that these matters are not quite so easy and obvious as they had been used to believe,—that what is called common sense affords no solution of their difficulties, and that many things which have passed for principles are little more than received common-places quite inapplicable to practical purposes. Those who are not mere declainers and party men, or shallow thinkers, have perceived more or less clearly that there is somewhere an unexplored or imperfectly known region where certain truths are treasured up, the fundamental principles whereon the whole machine and economy of Church government are grounded; and that those principles are required to infuse life into our ecclesiastical constitution, as well as to settle the doubts and disputes

Let us suppose a great empire in which there is indeed a regularly constituted administration, with a multitude of offices subservient in various departments to the public welfare, but wherein no one cares to investigate the spirit of those institutions, their relation to each other and to the Commonwealth, and the benefits which ought to accrue from each, and from the combination of all for the happiness and honour of the body politic. What would be the consequence of such a state of things? Such a government would be like a man possessing a precious scientific instrument but wanting the knowledge to use it, otherwise than by a species of imitation and the force of mere mechanical habit. Some advantage he may derive from it, but its more recondite and important uses are utterly lost to him. He can do nothing beyond his usual practice. If he is required to deal with any uncommon difficulty, he stands amazed and embarrassed. Such a government as we have supposed must moreover be liable to decay. Many things therein will become obsolete and suffer a change, because no one knows what they really are, and what they ought to be. The system may go on quietly and apparently well in good times, but let a difficulty arise, and confusion must ensue. Then the want of some things will begin to be perceived which had been forgotten and despised. But ruined institutions are not so easily restored as ruined buildings. They cannot be recalled into existence full of life and vigour, at the very time when they are wanted. The process of revival requires time. Principles must be drawn out of obscurity, prejudices and habits must be overcome, and a new system must be understood and acted upon.

So we see in the Church of England, that difficulties and dangers arising out of altered circumstances have shown the imperfect state of the internal economy of that Church, and the want not of institutions themselves, but of fundamental principles which are the life of institutions. Thus, in several instances where churchmen thought that they were debating matters of discipline and practice, they have in reality been at cross purposes with each other about first principles. If this had not been so, we should not have heard so much strife about matters in themselves unimportant, and which have no value beyond their connexion with fundamental principles. We should not have seen these things made matter of obstinate and violent contention, apparently for their own sakes, while the disputants on both sides felt a secret consciousness more or less distinct that the real merits of the question were out of sight.

Reflecting carefully and somewhat painfully on these things, we have been strongly impressed with the feeling that the constitutional law of the Church has become almost unknown among us, and that it is very necessary, and ought to be revived, especially in the present time. The Church of England is indeed very much in the condition of the supposed commonwealth described above. It has a variety of institutions, and a great apparatus of offices and dignities, but no one cares to study their spirit and uses except for the most obvious and strictly necessary purposes,—for the purposes of mere administration and government. The arcana of ecclesiastical public law are neglected and unknown. Churchmen are satisfied with the status quo and the mere rudiments, the bare essentials, the mere daily bread of Church government. And yet what system of polity requires and deserves more profound meditation? Its objects extend beyond the existence of the world. How is the law of the Church defined? Est jus canonicum quod civium actiones ad finem æternæ beatitudinis dirigit. That grand purpose is the end to which the whole economy of the polity of the Church is directed, as the visible and practical means of accomplishing the purpose for which the Church was instituted by the Divine will. These principles are essential to the very notion and purpose of a Church visible, which is a community or corporate society having a certain commission, and founded for the fulfilment of a purpose by means defined by Divine authority¹.

“Ecclesiam visibilem esse societatem, et ideo visibili regendam esse gubernatione, sine qua nulla hominum societas diu stare et conservari potest, superiori loco demonstratum est. . . . Christus ecclesiam constituit ad instar reipublicæ a civile distinctæ, eique dedit magistratus, qui huic hominum societati cum imperio præessent. Quare in hos magistratus omnem contulit potestatem, qua opus est ut recte administretur regaturque respublica atque ut optimis abundet legibus, quibus cuncti pareant, ut repugnantes etiam in officio pœnis coerceantur. Nam quomodo stabit respublica sine magistratibus aut cum magistratibus otiosis et inanibus qui jurisdictione imperioque careant?”

The office of the spiritual magistrate is an essential part of the constitution of the visible Church, which must have a visible government. It follows thence that the institution and nature of that office in all its parts must be the object of most studious investigation and profound meditation to all those who have any concern in ecclesiastical affairs. Unless this be so,—unless the very spirit of the visible government of the Church be thoroughly understood,—and every object for which each portion of the office of the spiritual magistrate is intended be realized,—there is manifest danger that that spirit and those objects will in some particular become forgotten, and that the machine of the Church's constitution will be more or less paralysed.

A churchman who contemplates being invested with ecclesiastical jurisdiction or authority, ought by study and meditation to form in his own mind, an abstract notion—an ideal perfection of every office and every function in the hierarchy of the Church's constitution, and of the way in which each contributes to the great purpose for which the Church is founded. He ought to carry his idea of that perfection even beyond the limits of human possibility. Like the great Roman orator, he ought to conceive something which perhaps never existed !

So the contemplation of the office of the spiritual magistrate, ought to produce a conception of a degree of perfection, quo nihil potest esse præstantius,—and that abstract image of perfection should become the standard of the true nature and scope of that office. How much more this should be so in the administration of the Church than in the cultivation of art ! If Phidias could not form a master-piece of art without previously conceiving a supreme beauty beyond the reach of his skill to represent,—can the spiritual functions of ecclesiastical power and jurisdiction be realized and worthily exercised, unless by the conception of a degree of perfection most absolutely excellent and transcendent ? And when we speak of perfection, we do not refer only to the qualities of the person, but we also include the perfection of the office itself in all its parts,—its adaptation to every purpose for which it was instituted, and to the furtherance of the great scheme, for the accomplishment of which the Church was founded. We mean not only the sanctity and greatness of the person, but also the excellence of the office in all the fulness of its spirit.

The churchman is, moreover, powerfully supported in his endeavours to appreciate and realize in his own mind the ideal perfection of the spiritual and ecclesiastical commission. He is not left to rely on his own genius and imagination. However great they may be, they must fall short of the vastness, the comprehensiveness, and the exquisite completeness of the sacred commonwealth. But in the principles of the ecclesiastical public law he will find a prototype—species pulcritudinis eximia—surpassing all that man can attain without Divine assistance. Such is the nature and genius of the Christian religion, whereof the public law of the Church is the practical application.

These reflections will perhaps seem overstrained, and wanting in practical sense. It is indeed the spirit of this time and country, to look on every thing in a somewhat confined way, with reference not to principles of truth determined, à priori, but to some present object or convenience—often temporary—but always suggested by present circumstances. This may be well in finance and commerce, and sometimes even in politics,—but it is utterly inapplicable to the government of the Church. We will therefore pursue our course, disregarding these objections.

It is manifestly impossible here to give even a sketch of the application of these principles to the whole system of the Church's polity; or indeed to do more than touch upon a few points which especially require our attention, having regard to the present position of the Anglican Church. We refer particularly to certain matters relating to the episcopal office. We have already said that the contemplation and study of the nature and all the attributes of the office of the spiritual magistrate, are of the utmost importance to the churchman, and that he ought to form in his mind a conception of the ideal perfection of every office in the hierarchy of the visible Church. But he ought especially to study and meditate upon the episcopal office, for it is the plenitude of the sacerdotal character and commission, the supreme depository of spiritual jurisdiction,—the very corner-stone of the Church visible on earth. If that office is not understood in its real spirit, if any part of its functions is allowed to fall into neglect, the whole commonwealth of the Church must suffer detriment. It must be realized in the most absolute and transcendent perfection. It must not be brought down to the standard of practice and customs in our times, nor adapted to the mediocrity of the world, and the demands of what is called society. It must stand alone as an institution belonging to no time, to no country, and to no portion of society, immutable, conceding nothing except for charity's sake, and displaying all the functions of the vicar of Christ on earth.

The subject is vast,—but we will confine ourselves for the present to the pastoral functions of the bishop, endeavouring to describe that portion of those functions which seems to be imperfectly understood in this country, if not almost obsolete. Many of the greatest divines of the Church of England have lamented the dormant state of the ecclesiastical discipline which consists in the moral government of the people,—the want of some means to influence the mass of the population, beyond the routine of parochial preaching and teaching. The jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts is manifestly inadequate for so great a purpose. The penitential character of that jurisdiction is quite extinct, and it is almost entirely secular in its spirit and unedifying in its operation. Yet the exercise of spiritual censures is in practice confined to those courts. We may assume then, without any undutifulness or irreverence towards the bishops, that there is some defect,—something wanting in our ecclesiastical administration.

In truth, instead of the Church keeping a control over society,—society has influenced the Church. The Church has adapted itself in its practice to the temper and spirit of the times. The spirit of society is above all things independence. It will not be interfered with. It will not submit to hear any thing displeasing except with its own consent. A man who goes to church must hear what the parson says to him though it be disagreeable, but if he is displeased he stays away,—and then he will brook no interference except from the civil magistrate. So long as he does not offend against the law of the land, or rather, so long as he is not detected in any offence against the law, he claims absolute sovereign supremacy on earth, and boasts that he is accountable to no one but God and his own conscience. But he says with Tartuffe, “Il y a avec le Ciel des accommodements.” His sense of responsibility to God is somewhat vague, and as for his conscience, he scorns the idea that any man can exercise jurisdiction over it, but he administers absolution to himself. The tribunal of public opinion requires certain outward observances, and from time to time makes an example of some offender, who has had the imprudence or the misfortune to be detected; but it has too great a regard for talent, riches, or success, to be very hard on one who possesses any of those titles to indulgence. Besides, how can commerce, manufactures, and the railroad system flourish,—how can the prosperity of the country increase, if people are so scrupulous as to the means of making money and promoting great public undertakings? With all these things, therefore, the Church ought not to interfere!

The Church has given way to this spirit of the times. It has reluctantly indulged the pride and independence of the people, by submitting to abstain from interfering with them unless and so far as they voluntarily put themselves in the way of, and invite its interference. There is a sort of prudence in this adaptation of the Church's discipline to the state of society and the genius of the age, but at the same time it abandons the species pulcritudinis ævimia, the abstract and transcendent perfection of the Church's office.

The consequence of this departure from ideal and abstract perfection is, that the episcopal office—the fountain of jurisdiction and discipline—has suffered a diminution of its functions. Its standard is no longer that perfection springing from the rules of ecclesiastical public law, but a sort of convenience and adaptation to the present state of society and the habits of our times, and thus its functions are narrowed, and its vigour and life much impaired. But all this will more clearly appear when we have carried our disquisitions further.

Let us look, in the first place, at the constitution of episcopacy as it existed in the Church of the first centuries, according to the testimony of the fathers and of all the canonists. It was always the general doctrine of the Church that bishops were successors of the Apostles, and therefore supreme in the Church⁴. And the episcopal office is, and always has been, identical in kind if not in largeness with that of the Apostles⁵. In accordance with these undoubted principles, as ecclesiastical authority and jurisdiction were primarily given by Christ to the Apostles, so the bishop, the successor of the Apostles, and possessing the plenitude and perfection of the priesthood, was the immediate pastor and governor of the whole Church submitted to his care. He did nothing without the consent of his clergy, who assisted him in his duties, but still he was the supreme priest as well as the bishop of the whole diocese. He had in practice as well as in principle the cure of souls of the whole diocese. Thus the 28th apostolic canon describes the bishop as him, cujus fidei populus est creditus et a quo pro animabus ratio exigitur, and the 24th canon of the Council of Antioch, desires all things appertaining to the Church to be in the power of the bishop : *cui est omnis populus creditus, et eorum animæ, quæ in ecclesiam conveniunt*⁶.

This is strictly in accordance with the words and spirit of holy writ. What was the commission under which the Apostles derived their spiritual powers? Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them, &c.; and again, Receive ye the Holy Ghost; whosoever sins ye remit they are remitted, &c. Under this commission their successors must exercise the episcopal functions, for they have no other commission. That commission is manifestly pastoral and sacerdotal, not confined to superintendence and the administration of the rites of ordination and confirmation, but embracing the pastoral functions of the priesthood, preaching and teaching, and the administration of the sacraments. And this is further shown by the directions given to Timothy and Titus, and by the constant practice of the Apostles.

In the process of time, when Christianity was extended throughout a large population, spread over great tracts of country, it became impossible for the bishop to exercise the same personal care of souls at all times over his entire flock. It consequently became necessary that a portion of those functions should be entrusted to his clergy, and smaller districts were therefore parceled out, over which an ecclesiastic was placed as ordinary pastor. But did this work any change in the office of the bishop? undoubtedly not. It left the apostolic office precisely what it was before. Let us see the words of the great canonist Van Espen.

The bishop still remains the supreme pastor, and teacher, and priest, with cure of souls of the whole diocese. He is relieved by the assistance of his clergy from those functions which he cannot possibly perform, but his duty and responsibility remain precisely what they were in the first years of the Church. Above all, his duty of preaching and teaching remains, which is an essential part of the sacerdotal office, and indeed no one can preach but by the bishop's authority.

teaching is not to be exercised by mere instruction. It is teaching with authority as a superior, having spiritual jurisdiction. It extends not merely to the imparting of knowledge and to persuasion, but also to censure and positive injunction. It is a means not only of instruction but of discipline. This ought to be kept in mind.

One effect of the extension of the Church over great districts beyond the local sphere of the bishop's constant and immediate care, was to render his visitations more and more important and necessary. In the life of St. Paul we find many instances of episcopal visitations⁸, and they were continued from the apostolic times. In the first age, when the people constituted one flock, subject to the bishop and presbytery of the city as their immediate pastors, visitations were within a small compass, and from house to house. But as the Church extended, visitations extended also, and thus Bingham refers to the obligation of the bishop to visit his diocese as a proof of the antiquity of parish churches:—

“For this is a necessary consequent of having several churches at a distance under his jurisdiction, such as he could not personally attend himself, he was obliged to visit and see that they were provided with a proper incumbent, and that every thing was performed in due order. St. Austin and St. Basil, who had pretty large dioceses, speak often upon this account of their being employed in their visitations. And the rule in some places was to visit, ordinarily, once a year, as appears, from the council of Terraco in Spain, which lays this injunction on bishops, because it was found by experience that many churches in their dioceses were left destitute and neglected, therefore they were obliged to visit them once a year. And if a diocese was so large that a bishop could not perform this duty annually, that was thought a reasonable cause to divide the diocese, and lay some part of the burthen on a new bishop; which was the reason assigned in the council of Lugo for dividing the large diocese of Gallicia⁹.”

Visitations thus became a necessary means for the exercise of the bishop's pastoral functions as the successor of the Apostles, having the cure of souls of the whole diocese, and the sole ordinary judge of all spiritual affairs arising therein. In his visitations especially, the bishop exercised his pastoral function of teaching his people, and all his apostolical authority. It may, indeed, be called the chief point of his pastoral office. To show what is the extent and importance of this duty, we beg permission to cite a canon, which may perhaps at first sight be liable to objection, but we cite it only as a declaration touching a matter of undisputed discipline, made by a synod of upwards of 300 bishops, and comprising all the most learned ecclesiastics of the Roman Church. We mean the chap. 3, de Reformat. Sess. 24, of the Council of Trent, which is as follows :—

This description, which is undeniably in accordance with the practice of the Church from the apostolic times, comprises the entire matter over which the moral and religious discipline of the Church extends. It comprehends the whole moral and religious government of the clergy and people within the bishop's jurisdiction. It suggests to the mind a splendid portraiture of an apostolic prelate, the father of his people, not satisfied with the superintendence of the clergy and the administration of his Church's temporal affairs, but incessantly devoting himself to the moral and religious government of his entire flock as the supreme judge and ruler over them in all that regards their spiritual welfare. So that great canonist, Fleury, says :—

But all these things are comprehended in the character of the bishop as the successor of the apostles, and therefore, Christ's vicegerent and representative on earth.

Such are the leading principles of the ecclesiastical public law respecting the office of the bishop. It is by profound meditation on them,—by studying their real spirit drawn from holy writ,—that the ideal perfection of a bishop can be realized and portrayed in the mind of the churchman. The contemplation of that ideal perfection is essential to maintain the Divine institution of episcopacy in its full vigour and efficacy, and to protect it from the debilitating influences of the world and of human frailty. Without some standard of absolute and transcendent perfection, the episcopal office will be brought down to an inferior standard, taken from the habits of society and the mediocrity of the world, and thereby suffer diminution, to the injury of the whole system of the

Church. It may still be respectable, but it will cease to be truly apostolical; and its mediocrity will necessarily affect the moral and religious condition of the whole community.

Perhaps it may be said that heroic virtues are required to enable any man to act up to the perfection of the bishop's office, that they belong to the apostolic ages, and that they are scarcely to be hoped for in modern times. But a very high degree of perfection in the functions of the office is attainable, though the person performing them has no heroic qualities. A good Christian, enlightened by the full knowledge and contemplation of his episcopal functions, and acting to the best of his power, looking up to the highest standard of the perfection of those functions, cannot fail to obtain that assistance whereby he must become an apostolic bishop. It is the knowledge of the greatness and extent of those functions,—it is the contemplation of them in their most absolute completeness and perfection that forms such a bishop, under Divine assistance.

But there have been examples of a perfection of the episcopal character in modern times equal to antiquity; and again, there have been many bishops who, though not themselves faultless, have realized the character of their office in a very splendid manner. Let us now examine, somewhat at leisure, three great prelates of modern times, who may be taken as good representatives of those two classes, namely—Francis de Sales, bishop of Geneva; Wilson, bishop of Sodor and Man; and Fenelon, archbishop of Cambray. Much valuable information may be derived from the lives of those admirable men.

Francis de Sales was a man really born for the episcopal office. He certainly did not take orders from motives of ambition. His birth was illustrious, and his position in the world was as advantageous as rank, beauty, talent, eloquence, high connexions, learning, wealth, and accomplishments could make it. These worldly advantages he sacrificed. He did not become an ecclesiastic in order to withdraw himself from trouble and the turmoil of the world, for he lived immediately after the council of Trent, when ecclesiastical affairs were most stormy and dangerous, and his life was one of constant and laborious activity. He did not take orders in disappointment at want of worldly success, for he dedicated himself to the priesthood in early youth, when all his prospects were fair and brilliant. He sought holy orders from the greatest motives alone, and for the most excellent purposes.

Such was his humility, that it was with the utmost difficulty that he was persuaded at the commencement of his career to accept the deanery of the Church of Geneva; and we find him in after life absolutely refusing a cardinal's hat, repeatedly pressed on his acceptance by the pope and the king of France; and the coadjutorship of the Archbishop of Paris, which the Cardinal de Retz offered in the most honourable and flattering manner possible. He preferred to leave Paris, where a wide and splendid field was open to his talents, renouncing the coadjutorship with the succession to the archbishopric of that great city, and to return to his poor and troublesome diocese of Geneva. It is not surprising that with so much humility, and so little taste for high honours, he should have been unwilling to undertake the arduous charge of a bishopric. Accordingly, when the Bishop of Geneva, whose age and infirmities rendered some repose necessary, begged Francis de Sales to be his coadjutor, though he for some time refused the office, saying, "that it was a load sufficient to make an angel tremble;" and he only at last gave way to the entreaties of his parents and the bishop's injunctions, as an act of obedience to his superior. So high was his idea of what God and his Church would require of him, that his mind was harrowed with anxiety. He could take no rest, and fell into a violent fever². On recovering from this sickness, he endeavoured to persuade the bishop to receive his resignation, but finding this impossible, and being convinced by the exhortations of that good prelate that he ought to submit to God's will with resignation in that particular, he betook himself with activity and vigour to the performance of his new duties, which were at that time peculiarly difficult and important, on account of the war then prevailing between King Henry IV. of France and the Duke of Savoy. A part of the diocese was invaded by the French king, and great confusion was occasioned thereby, owing to the Calvinists taking advantage of the circumstances to attack the established Church. In consequence of these events Francis was obliged to go to Paris, where his extraordinary qualities astonished the king and his court, and obtained for him a great reputation for eloquence, learning, and piety throughout that kingdom. The ability of Francis triumphed over every difficulty, and having successfully concluded his affairs, he was on his return home when he heard of the death of the venerable Bishop of Geneva³.

Francis, who always honoured him as a father, and loved him as his benefactor, now with unfeigned tears mourned for his loss. He had not quite recovered from the terror which episcopacy had struck into him; the nearer he saw it approach, the more he was persuaded of his own unworthiness; and had it been in his power to make his predecessor immortal, he would have done it merely upon this motive, that he might not have succeeded him. But he had no choice. He must fill the vacant see, so he went with all speed to Savoy. Then, avoiding the tumultuous rejoicings of the people, he betook himself to the Castle of Sales, an ancestral seat of his house, near Annecy, his episcopal city, for the sake of enjoying as much retirement as the discharge of his duty would permit, and then preparing himself for his consecration. As soon as the unavoidable pomp and pageantry of addresses and congratulations were over, he made a retreat of twenty days, with constant prayer, meditation, and fasting, as a preparation for that holy rite ; and with the assistance of a pious and learned ecclesiastic, he drew up those rules which he determined to observe during the remainder of his life. Those rules are so interesting that we will not omit them here. And first of those rules which regard the exterior⁴.

“ He made it a law with him never to wear silk, nor any thing else that conveyed too great lustre, as camblets or the like stuff, but always to be clothed in woollen, and that no finer than what he wore before he was a bishop ; the magnificence of dress not being in his opinion the true mark of distinction between a prelate and other priests. He resolved never to appear in churches nor in public without the rochet and camail, and to wear them in his own house likewise as much as he could ; this habit being, as it were, a continual remembrance of the decency, modesty, and reserve a bishop ought to show as well at home as abroad. And here we may take notice of that other rule that he prescribed to himself,—never to speak without somebody being present with persons of the other sex.

“ His palace was to be neat, but plain, without paintings, or any pictures but those of devotion, and those not many, nor above the common price. He banished all magnificent furniture, and would hardly suffer two rooms to be hung, the one for strangers, and the other for receiving visits.

“ He allowed himself neither coach, nor chaise, nor litter ; resolving always to walk on foot, even when he visited his diocese, though the ways were never so bad, unless the badness of the weather obliged him to take horse.

“ His family consisted of two priests, the one to be his chaplain, and to attend him wherever he went ; the other to take care of the temporalities, and to have an eye to the behaviour of the servants. To this he added two valet-de-chambres, one to wait on strangers, and the other on himself ; one only footman, and two men servants for the kitchen. They were forbidden to wear swords, or any other clothes than a dark grey. They were all to be regular, serious, and of an edifying behaviour, and frequently to go to the sacraments. No sort of gaming was allowed them, but care was taken that they should be constantly so profitably employed as to leave no time to be thrown away in gaming.

“ They were strictly commanded to pay great respect to all ecclesiastics, and to priests especially, and himself was to give them an example. His palace was always open to them, and such priests as came from abroad, and had not houses in town, were forbid to lodge any where else but in the episcopal palace.

“ It is easy to believe that 1000 crowns per annum, or thereabouts, which was then the revenue of the bishopric of Geneva, would not allow him any great expense, but besides that it is perhaps the cheapest country in the world, as he was the eldest of his family, and the Count de Sales his father would never allow him to give up his right, he had wherewithal to make a greater figure, had not his modesty and love for the poor determined him to the contrary.

“ As to the treatment of his own person, and the regulation of his table, he judged it his duty exactly to observe the orders of former councils touching the temperance and frugality of bishops. He suffered nothing but common meats to be served to his table, unless some persons of distinction happened to dine with him; for it was a rule with him never to appear singular, but even then, affectation apart, he only admitted some of the most common dishes; and as to those that were best served up, he so managed himself as to abstain from tasting them, without being taken notice of. The priests, as far as it could be done, were to sit the highest at his table; some good book was to be read for half the time he sat at table; and for the remainder, it was allowed to talk of such matters as tended to edification.

“ In a word, as he had learnt from St. Paul, ‘ that he that knows not how to govern his own family, is by no means fit to govern the Church of God,’ 1 Tim. iii. 5, he left nothing undone towards the regulating of his family in such a manner as to make it a fit model for those of his flock. So that having chosen domestics with all possible exactness, he made it his endeavour to render their lives and piety exemplary. For this reason, though there was a priest appointed to watch over them, he did not think himself dispensed from that personal care he ought in his own particular to take of them. He conversed with them, as a father with his children, and was used to say one could not be too good to them; that it was a duty to comfort them by all the most tender methods in their low condition, and that if Providence had otherwise ordained, they might have been our superiors as we are theirs.

“ But he knew how to keep good nature within reasonable limits; for if any of the domestics happened to be less regular than might be expected in a well-governed family, he was reprehended immediately, or put away if the fault deserved it.

“ He would have the like indulgence shown to his farmers and debtors; and this now and then to his own loss and inconvenience, insomuch that his steward frequently complained of it: but he usually answered, ‘ that it was not for a bishop to be rigorous in exacting his rents, and that nothing was more becoming his character, than now and then to recede from his just rights.'

“Over and above his particular and private alms, which must needs amount to a considerable sum, seeing he never refused any; he had others publicly distributed at the palace gate,—in the hospital, to the Friar-minors and to the nuns of St. Clare. ‘For it is not lawful for a bishop,’ said he on these occasions, ‘to conceal all his good works, especially such as are of obligation, of which number is that of giving alms, because one of his greatest duties is to give a good example to his people.’

“For the same reason of his neighbours’ edification, he obliged himself to be present at all the feasts of devotion which were kept in any church of the town; and in effect, he was always seen assisting there at the divine office and sermon; it being a maxim with him, that in things relating to God’s or our neighbours’ service, a bishop ought always to appear the first at the head of his people.

“But what above all things he enjoined himself, was not to put off to others the care of the poor and sick, but to visit them himself, to provide in person for their comfort and necessities; and this he afterwards performed with so much exactness, that it was matter of admiration how he could possibly with so little means answer so many exigencies. Indeed, in pressing occasions he even intrenched on his own chapel. But upon the main, his example shows evidently that when a man is resolved to cut off from luxury and appetite whatever it craves beyond necessities, he will always be in a condition to give alms.

“In fine, he made a firm resolution never to go to law, but rather to suffer injuries than to prosecute any for his right. He used to say as to this point, that if St. Paul forbade law-suits to all Christians in general, by a stronger reason he forbade them to bishops; that one of the principal qualifications this Apostle required in them was that they should not love to wrangle at the bar; and he added what is known to all the world for one of his maxims, that in a hundred pounds of law-suits, there is never one ounce of charity.

“Francis having thus regulated the exterior, and, if I may use the expression, the outside of the bishop: see now the directions he made for his person and his interior.

“He was to rise every day at four in the morning, to make an hour’s meditation, to say lauds and prime,—and then morning prayer with his family; and this done, to read the holy Scriptures till seven. He studied till nine; then he quitted his study to go to say mass; and it was his rule to say it every day. After mass, he was to be employed in the affairs of his diocese till dinner time. After dinner he allowed an hour for conversation, and then returned to the business of the diocese till the evening; and what time there was to spare he spent in study and prayer. At night after supper, some book of devotion was to be read for an hour, which furnished him with the subject of meditation for the next day. Then followed night-prayers with his family, after which, all retiring, he was to say matins for the next day. This was the distribution of the day he prescribed to himself.

“Beside the fasts commanded by the Church, he made it his rule to fast Fridays and Saturdays, and the vigils of the feast of Our Lady.

“On solemn feasts he obliged himself to assist with his family at all the offices in the cathedral. On Sundays and common holydays, he contented himself with being present at the high mass and vespers. He resolved to make every year a retreat of ten days. For this he chose the carnival time, that he might prepare himself as he said for the better spending of the Lent, and in some sort make atonement for the disorders which are committed in those days of dissipation.

“As he was fully persuaded, what the council of Trent teaches, that *preaching is the principal function of bishops*⁵; that to give an example, Jesus Christ their model had said, *He was obliged to announce the Gospel because He was sent for that end*⁶, and St. Paul, that *Christ had not sent him to baptize but to preach the word*⁷; he obliged himself to preach to his people as often as he could. Neither did the catechizing and instructing the poor and children seem to him a lessening of himself; and the reader will find hereafter, that he often discharged this function in public, and oftener still in his own palace.

“As to residence, a point of great importance, though little practised in his days, he found it too necessary, and too much recommended to bishops by the councils to dispense himself from it; he therefore proposed never to go out of his diocese without evident necessity, or at least without very cogent reasons, and those too fetched from the Church's or his neighbours' advantage⁸.”

This is a beautiful plan of episcopal life and conduct, and it has the more practical value because it was drawn by one who himself really acted up to every word which it contains. The chief feature of these rules deserves to be particularly noticed. It is this: Francis de Sales gives the most prominent place to the pastoral part of the bishop's office,—the functions of the plenitude of the priesthood with relation to the cure of souls. His chief object seems to have been to hold the moral and religious government not only of the clergy but of the whole people, and by instruction, by fatherly care and charity, and by example, to lead them and rule them as his children. Hence his constant personal intercourse with the clergy and laity, his strict residence, his regular attendance on public worship, his frequent preaching and catechizing, and his careful economy of time. All this is in accordance with the principles of ecclesiastical law which we have endeavoured to explain and enforce.

He was consecrated on the 8th of December, 1602, in the Church of Thorens, a large and handsome town belonging to the house of Sales. We will not dwell on the solemnity and magnificence of the ceremony, the concourse of eminent people who attended, and the rejoicings of the multitude, nor the extraordinary honours and the universal joy with which his public entrance into his episcopal town of Annecy was celebrated.

His first public act after taking possession of his see was to address his people from the pulpit, and then he proceeded to arrange all the details of his government with studious attention, and consummate ability. He next directed his care to the instruction of the youth of his diocese. He ordered catechizing to be performed on Feasts and Sundays at Annecy and throughout his diocese; and to show the esteem he had for this function he would begin it himself, and he continued it afterwards so far as his other business would permit.

He next prepared for his visitation by writing to all the rural deans of his diocese, requiring them to report exactly the state of every parish, and the behaviour and capacity of all candidates for holy orders, and in the meanwhile he made it his business to regulate the city and the neighbouring places. He was always employed either in preaching, or instructing, or prayer, or study, or some other functions of a bishop. When he was able to do so, he went to the hospitals or private houses to visit the sick. He frequently went to the houses of tradesmen and poor people, inquired into their wants, heard their complaints, and gave them comfort and relief. He carried peace on all sides. So soon as he heard of any dissension in a family, thither he went, and came not back till he had made a reconciliation. Thus we see that he was very far from contenting himself with superintendence and direction. He relied greatly on personal intercourse with his people. He considered them as his children, and took a lively interest in all that affected their peace and welfare. He was their arbiter and peacemaker in cases of difficulty and discord, and no doubt many instances occurred where all the laws and magistrates in the world could not effect what the bishop was able by his sacred character and paternal authority to accomplish.

A circumstance which took place at the commencement of his administration, shows what a correct and enlarged view this learned prelate took of the office of a bishop. While preparing to set out on his visitation, he was pressingly invited to go to preach at Dijon, out of his diocese. The mere common-place view of this matter suggests that he should have declined the invitation. But he no doubt remembered that in a certain sense every bishop is bishop of the whole Church, and that when charity and the good of the Church requires, he is bound to extend his solicitude beyond his own flock¹. Knowing then that his authority and ability were greatly required at Dijon, he deferred his visitation, and as soon as certain political difficulties had been overcome, he went to that city, where his apostolic labours produced most extraordinary fruits. And even there, out of his own diocese, he constantly visited the sick and distressed, and gave advice to all who chose to consult him.

On his return to Annecy, he resumed his purpose of visiting his diocese, being sensible, as his biographer informs us, that it was one of the principal obligations of a bishop, and he had constantly under his eyes that advice of the Apostle, Acts xx. 28, Take heed unto yourselves, and to all the flock over which the Holy Ghost hath made you bishops: and having collected and maturely considered all the reports of the rural deans, and drawn up memorials thereon, he set out for that great work on the 15th of October, 1605.

Here we must pause for a moment, and briefly delineate the scheme of episcopal visitations according to the canon law. We have shown that visitations are the chief means whereby the bishop exercises his pastoral functions over his entire flock both clergy and laity, especially as regards teaching and discipline, both moral and religious. Van Espen lays it down that visitation is absolutely necessary for the bishop's cure of souls, which is the chief point of his office, and that nothing is more strongly inculcated to bishops by the fathers and the canons than the duty of constantly visiting and travelling about their dioceses.

The canon law requires that they should be visitations not of the clergy only, but of the whole people. Thus the bishop ought to send an archdeacon or rural dean a day or two before his arrival in each parish, who is to assemble the people, announce the bishop's coming, command and require them to attend him, and then arrange with the clergy any minor affairs which may require to be despatched before the visitation. Charlton

Borromeo, archbishop of Milan, required his bishops to issue their pastoral letters to every parish priest before their visitation, containing the object and other matters regarding it, which were to be read during divine service on some day of festival, when the church was full; and the clergy were also required on those occasions to prepare, stir up, and exhort the people both in public and in private to receive the episcopal office of visitation².

The legal theory of episcopal visitation is this. He is to do nothing therein which belongs to contentious jurisdiction and judicial procedure. He is to proceed summarily and de plano. He may inquire into charges brought against a clerk, and direct further proceedings, but he cannot give a judicial sentence. Thus all summary affairs may be despatched during the visitation, and those things which cannot be so disposed of, must be reserved for the bishop's return to his city, to be then determined by him or by his officers. The visitation is thus relieved from all that might interfere with its character, as the exercise of the bishop's paternal and purely spiritual functions³.

Let us now return to Francis de Sales. His diocese did not present any of those facilities for travelling with which our bishops are favoured by nature and art. It was indeed very populous, full of towns, boroughs, and villages,—but its extent, the want of roads and means of conveyance,—and the wildness of the country, part of which consisted in almost inaccessible mountains covered with snow, rendered the mere mechanical part of the bishop's task very arduous. Yet this bishop visited each parish separately, giving a day to each. In every parish he administered the sacrament, preached, confirmed, catechized the children himself, and received the confession of all that desired to confess to him.

“This variety of employments,” says the canon Marsollier, “did not hinder him from taking diligent information of all the disorders that reigned in families. Then he laboured to settle peace between parents and their children, masters and their servants; and to reconcile such as had given public scandal by their public enmities; his admirable meekness was a key that let him into every heart, and nothing could escape his charity; the poor, the sick, the prisoners, all were the better for it; some he relieved by his alms, others by his solicitude, and some again by his credit.

“But his principal care was to have a full account, and to regulate the behaviour of the pastors of all the Churches he visited; and here he found the advantages of the memorials he had drawn up, which he constantly read upon entering the places he was going to visit. He treated with honour such of the curates as led an irreproachable life, and discharged their ministry with a suitable devotion; he encouraged the good, he strengthened the weak, and, his meekness notwithstanding, he threatened to treat severely those that gave scandal, and of whom any just complaints had been made to him. Then he drew up new memorials of what he had found by his own experience, and consulted them on all occasions to prevent mistakes⁴."

Francis de Sales interrupted these functions to preach during Lent at Chambéry, and to take some rest; and after his return from thence he was detained at Annecy by the outbreak of the war between the Dukes of Nemours and Savoy, and other arduous affairs: but he resumed his visitation in July, 1606, when he availed himself of the season to visit the poorest and most inaccessible places of the diocese. He had always travelled on foot, but here that practice which he had adopted through humility was by nature rendered no matter of choice. Yet he was not to be daunted, nor overcome by any difficulties and hardships. He finished at last this laborious visitation, and returned to Annecy, where he preached during the following Lent with his accustomed zeal and ability. After the Feast of Easter was passed, he, together with his friend the celebrated Favre, president of the senate of Savoy, founded and constituted the university of Annecy. The Duke of Savoy endowed that institution with abundant privileges, and the bishop opened its first convocation with a most eloquent discourse: and here we cannot but admire the thorough knowledge which this great prelate showed of every part of a bishop's office. He was indeed not only a learned divine, but also accomplished in the civil and canon law, which he had studied at Padua with so much success, that he was presented to his doctor's degree by the famous civilian Pancirolus, who in an eloquent eulogium, held him up as an example to the whole university. There, no doubt, he acquired that judicial mind, that vigorous and clear perception of justice, which are essential to the character of a perfect bishop. And thus we find that whenever he was called upon, either as bishop of the diocese or as apostolical commissioner, to decide on any differences among the clergy, he always acquitted himself in such a manner that no one ventured to question the validity and equity of his decrees, except in one instance, in which his judgment was affirmed on appeal.

He was not discouraged by the labours and hardships of his primary visitation, for after two years had elapsed since its conclusion, he began another visitation, for the sake of parts of his diocese which seemed to need his further care. He was persuaded that a first visit would hardly give him a general superficial knowledge of his people's necessities, that it was not enough to make a few useful ordinances, but care ought to be taken to see them executed. Experience had likewise shown him the necessity there was sometimes of adding to them, and at other times abridging them; and there are few general laws but that now and then stand in need of being adapted to the circumstances of the times and the exigences of particulars. And we find that in subsequent years, as the important and arduous affairs which were thrown on him by events, or entrusted to him by the Pope and the Duke of Savoy, as well as his care of his city and its neighbouring district allowed, he continued from time to time to visit parts of his diocese. His industry and zeal were indeed extraordinary. When we look at the multitude of weighty affairs which passed through his hands, his labour in writing, and the difficulties which political events cast in his way, we cannot but wonder that he should have been able to devote so much of his solicitude to the immediate personal care of the souls of his people. He did not lack good excuses and justifications for confining himself to superintendence and direction. But he would leave undone no part of the duty of a bishop, least of all the part which concerns the cure of souls. Thus he took no account of the habits of the world, but aimed at nothing short of the absolute perfection of his office, its thorough completeness in every branch, and the execution of every part, so far as the physical laws of nature permitted.

So high a degree of sanctity and such great self-denial are to be attained by very few. How few bishops, if any, in our times have to encounter such difficulties as he overcame! He was comparatively poor; he lived in the midst of war and political discord; his diocese was disturbed by violent religious controversy, and its extent and the ruggedness of its country rendered communications difficult and even dangerous. All these obstacles he vanquished. What would he not have done in this favoured country, with all the appliances of advanced civilization! His life would in all probability have been prolonged, for with an excellent constitution he died in his 56th year, worn out by his sacred duties, and his apostolical labours would, therefore, have been so much the more extensive and fruitful.

But our object has been to set forth by his example, rather the nature and extent of his episcopal actions, the spirit of the apostolical functions which he performed, than his own holiness and self-denial. We have endeavoured to present to our readers the ideal of the office of a bishop in the person of Francis de Sales, more than the character of Francis de Sales himself.

We will now proceed to lay before our readers a sketch of a prelate of our own Church and country, who not a little resembles the Bishop of Geneva,—Bishop Wilson.

“Having,” says his biographer, “the precepts of his Divine Master constantly before him, with the lives and writings of the Apostles and primitive Christian fathers, he from them laid down his plan of life, and steadily copied their example.

“There is scarcely a part of human science that could be valuable and serviceable to his diocese, which he did not understand. He was well acquainted with the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages. . . .

“He had studied and he practised physic with success. For some time after he settled there, he was the only physician of the island, keeping a shop of drugs for general use, which he distributed, as well as his advice, gratis; but when some gentlemen of the faculty came to settle on the island, he gave up to them that part of the practice which alone could conduce to their emolument—attending on the rich, but the poor he kept always to himself.

“He instructed young candidates for orders, and maintained them in his house, under his own immediate care; nor did he ordain them until he found, on a strict and careful examination, that they were perfectly qualified.

“He was an able mathematician, an excellent botanist; and if we view him as a farmer, we find that by a judicious and successful cultivation, from the ecclesiastical demesnes (which before his coming to the island produced little or nothing) he in a few years fed and clothed the poor of his diocese. The whole was a sheepwalk, but by tillage and manure, it bore excellent corn.

“He was so charitable, that it was not unaptly observed by a gentleman of the island, that he kept beggars from everybody’s door but his own.

“He always kept an open hospitable table, covered with the produce of his own demesnes, in a plentiful, not extravagant manner. As the friendly host, or master of that table, he was the most entertaining and agreeable, as well as instructive, of men. His manners, though always consistently adorned with Christian gravity, were ever gentle and polite; and from his natural sagacity and distinguished erudition, he seemed to have the world in his possession. He was the divine, the scholar, and the gentleman.

“Cardinal Fleury wanted much to see him, and sent over on purpose to inquire after his health, his age, and the date of his consecration, as they were the two oldest bishops, and he believed the poorest, in Europe; at the same time inviting him to France. The Bishop sent the Cardinal an answer which gave him so high an opinion of him, that he obtained an order that no French privateer should ravage the Isle of Man.

“ He often on Sunday visited the different parishes of his diocese, without giving them any notice ; and after doing the duty of the day, returned to Bishops-Court to dinner, and this after he was eighty years of age, on horseback. This was a constant obligation on the clergy and the people to be mindful of their duty. And four times in every year he made a general visitation, inquiring into the behaviour and conduct of all the parishioners, and exhorting them to the practice of religion and virtue : and at his annual convocations he delivered his charges with the divine pathos, grace, and dignity of an inspired apostle.

“ He was so great a friend to toleration, that the papists who resided in the island loved and esteemed him, and not unfrequently attended his sermons and his prayers. The dissenters, too, attended even the Communion Service, as he had allowed them a liberty to sit or stand ; which however they did not make use of, but behaved in the same manner with those of the Established Church. A few Quakers, who resided on the island, loved and respected him.

“ He was so fond of his flock, and so attached to his diocese, that no temptations could seduce him from their service, no offers could remove him.

“ I have already mentioned that Queen Anne would have given him an English bishopric ; King George the First made him the same offer ; and, in the year 1735, Queen Caroline was very desirous of keeping him in England ; but though he was much bound to her Majesty's goodness, he would not be persuaded. One day, as he was coming to pay his usual duty to the Queen, when she had several prelates with her, she turned round to her levee, and said, ‘ See here, my Lords, is a Bishop who does not come for a translation.’ ‘ No, indeed, please your Majesty,’ said our good Bishop, ‘ I will not leave my wife in my old age because she is poor.’

“ He never interfered in temporal or political concerns, unless when called upon at the request of the inhabitants to serve them on particular occasions. The whole conduct and every action of his life showed him to be no otherwise a man of this world, than as a minister to do good to his fellow-creatures while living in it ; and the people of the island were so thoroughly persuaded of his receiving a larger portion of God's blessing, that they seldom began harvest till he did ; and if he passed along by the field, they would leave their work to ask his blessing, assured that that day would be propitious. Nor was this opinion confined to the obscure corner of the world where he resided : in Warrington, nay in London, there are those now living who can remember crowds of people flocking round him with the cry of ‘ Bless me too, my lord !’ ”

It is interesting to observe that Bishop Wilson seems to have taken the same view of the episcopal office as Francis de Sales. In both we find the same pastoral care of the laity, the same indefatigable zeal in visitation, in preaching, and in personal works of charity, and the same attachment to his diocese.

Bishop Wilson did not confine himself to administration and the government of the clergy. He showed an active and personal solicitude in every thing that concerned the people. Thus, when a criminal was condemned and executed in his diocese for a very cruel murder⁶, the Bishop addressed a pastoral letter to his clergy, the very first paragraph of which shows how strongly he felt that his office involved the supreme pastoral care of the people. It is as follows:—

“ We having at this time a mournful instance before us of an unhappy man under the righteous sentence of condemnation for the dreadful sin of murder, attended with uncommon circumstances of the most barbarous cruelty, let us consider, I beseech you, what God will expect especially of us his ministers upon this occasion ; what good we may probably do, and what future evils we may hope, through the grace of God, to prevent, by plainly and affectionately laying before our people the true causes which lead to such dreadful sins.”

And then the Bishop goes on to point out and enforce various matters most apposite and valuable, and ends with a prayer for the prisoner under sentence, which he desires may be read in every church in the diocese. Thus he adopted means to direct what is called public opinion into the right channel, exerting at the same time his paternal solicitude for the unhappy criminal, by calling for the prayers of the Church on his behalf. He did not stand aloof, as though this were a matter only concerning the civil government, because he felt that every thing that related to the moral condition and discipline of the people was properly within the sphere of the bishop's duty. On another similar occasion the Bishop not only wrote to his clergy, and ordered prayers in all the churches for the condemned prisoners, but he himself from the pulpit called on the people to join him in prayer for those miserable men, concluding with a most impressive exhortation. He felt that all the people were his children, and required his immediate, direct, and personal care. He was the bishop not of the clergy only, but of all the people,—their supreme pastor, their friend and their father.

Let us now turn to the contemplation of another great prelate, differing much from Francis de Sales and from Bishop Wilson, and combining the qualities of an apostolic bishop with those of a courtier and a statesman ; namely, Fenelon, archbishop of Cambray. His defect was, that he valued greatness and power, and the applause of the world, too highly. He was indeed well qualified for ambition. He was clothed with all the grace and brilliancy of the most magnificent court in the world; he was witty, accomplished, splendid, and majestic. These things were a snare to him, and yet he understood and thoroughly realized the episcopal character. There is much to be learned from his life, and especially it is very interesting to see how he was rendered a great bishop by the influence of his office, the spirit of which he undoubtedly studied and understood in all its details.

The excellent and admirable Duke de St. Simon has given us a delineation of Fenelon with all the richness and breadth of colouring, and reality of a grand full-length portrait by Vandyke or Rubens. We will not attempt to translate the first part at least of this master-piece of biographical writing, which is not surpassed by any thing in Lord Clarendon, but faithfully present it to the reader.

attend et soupire après le Messie. C'est aussi par cette autorité de prophète qu'il s'était acquise sur les siens, qu'il s'était accoutumé à une domination, qui dans sa douceur ne voulait point de résistance. Aussi n'aurait-il pas longtemps souffert de compagnon s'il fût revenu à la cour, et entré dans le conseil, qui fut toujours son grand but ; et une fois ancré et hors des besoins des autres, il eût été bien dangereux non-seulement de lui résister, mais de n'être pas toujours pour lui dans la souplesse et dans l'admiration."

Here is a description of a splendid court prelate,—a finished gentleman, and a person admirably calculated to be the leader of a party. The latter is a very dangerous qualification for a churchman, and it might have been the destruction of Fenelon. But he was also a good and devout Christian,—a learned divine ; and those apparently merely worldly qualities contributed to make him a great bishop, notwithstanding the unfortunate mixture of ambition, which gave him a worldly tendency. They made him the apostle of the great and brilliant, and endowed him with an extraordinary power of governing mankind, especially men of the world, courtiers, and soldiers. Without his truly episcopal spirit, his thorough knowledge of the nature of his sacred office, he would have been a mere worldly prelate. These qualities became the more conspicuous in the latter years of his life, when the disfavour of Louis XIV. excluded him from the court. Living without interval in his diocese, his episcopal qualities shone forth with extraordinary splendour.

"Retired in his diocese, he lived there with the piety and application of a pastor, and the art and magnificence of a man who has renounced nothing, and who looks to every thing and every person. Never did any man more desire to please—and to please the servant as well as the master ; no man carried that desire further, nor succeeded more entirely in so doing. Cambray is a place of general resort and passage ; and nothing can equal the politeness, the discernment, and the agreeable manner in which he received all who came there. At first he was avoided : he ran after no one ; but by degrees the charm of his manners drew to him a certain number. Under the countenance of that little multitude, many of those whom fear had kept away, but who wished to sow seeds for other times, were happy to have opportunities of passing through Cambray. One after the other all rushed there. When the Duke of Burgundy seemed to be important, the court of the prelate increased ; and it became a real court as soon as his pupil succeeded to the title of Dauphin. He had gained the hearts of the army by the number of persons whom he had received, and of those whom he had lodged in his palace during their passage through Cambray ; and by his care of the sick and the wounded who had been brought to his city on different occasions. Assiduous at the hospitals, and with the humblest, and attentive to the principal officers, keeping many of them under his roof for months together, and until their perfect recovery, watching like a true pastor over the weal of their souls, with that knowledge of the world which enabled him to gain them over, and induced many others to address themselves to him, not refusing himself to the meanest person in the hospitals who wished to see him, and whom he would attend to as if he had nothing else to do; he was not less solicitous for their corporeal relief. Broth, nourishment, consolations in times of sorrow, and very frequently remedies, came in abundance from his palace; and notwithstanding this number of things, an inconceivable degree of care that every thing might be of the best quality. He himself presided at the most important medical consultations. It is astonishing to what a degree he became the idol of the army, and how loudly his name echoed even in the midst of the court."

Fenelon was thoroughly imbued with the principles touching his office, which we have endeavoured to sketch above. He was well aware of the importance of the pastoral character of that office, and of the supreme cure of souls which essentially belongs to it. He was accordingly not satisfied with general superintendence, government, and direction, but he maintained a personal care of the people, and intercourse with them. Thus we shall see that he attached great importance to visitation, and to paternal intercourse with the people in every village, and that though a great personage, he did not keep his clergy at a distance.

"His charities, his episcopal visitations repeated several times in the year, and which made him thoroughly acquainted with every part of his diocese, the wisdom and mildness of his government, his frequent preaching in the city and in the villages, his facility of access, his humanity with the small, his politeness with others, and his natural graces, which increased the value of all that he did and said, made the people adore him; and the clergy, of whom he declared himself to be the brother and the father, all carried him in their hearts. In the midst of all this art and desire to please, and to please so generally, there was nothing mean, nor common, nor affected, nor out of place; and every thing was according to the most exquisite fitness. He was easily approached, and he despatched business with promptness and the utmost disinterestedness. One spirit, inspired by his own, prevailed among all who were employed under him in that great diocese; never was there any scandal nor any thing violent done against any one; and every thing in him and belonging to him was regulated by the most perfect propriety."

The conduct of the Archbishop of Cambray to his clergy is in accordance with the principles of the canon law. Thus we find in the decree of Gratian these words of St. Jerome. "Esto subiectus Pontifici tuo, et quasi animæ parentem suscipe, Sed episcopi sacerdotes se esse noverint, non dominos, honorent clericos quasi clericos, ut et ipsis a clericis quasi episcopis honor deferatur. Scitum est illud oratoris Domitii: Cur ego te, inquit, habeam ut principem, cum tu me non habeas ut senatorem? Quod Aaron et filios ejus, hoc episcopum et presbyteros esse novimus⁸." And again the council of Carthage says, "episcopum non dominum, sed collegam presbyterorum cognoscat⁹." And again the same council says, "Episcopus in ecclesia et in consessu presbyterorum sublimior sedeat. Intra domum vero collegam se presbyterorum esse cognoscat¹." It is indeed most pernicious for a bishop to act as if he were a lord over his clergy and not their colleague, a lord and not a priest. But let us see how Fenelon managed the business of his diocese.

"His mornings were passed in the midst of the business of his diocese. As his genius was elevated and penetrating, and his residence constant, and as no day passed without his settling whatever affairs presented themselves, this was every day a brief and light occupation."

That great churchman knew that the mind of a bishop should not be engrossed with the business of administration, of which the greater part may by activity and method be despatched speedily, or left, under proper superintendence, to the bishop's officers. No doubt the affairs of his extensive diocese might have taken up the greater portion of every day, but this would have interfered with his pastoral functions, his study, and his devotions, and made him almost inaccessible to his clergy and people over whom he would have had little or no influence. How did the archbishop spend the remainder of his day after the hours of business?

"He afterwards received those who wished to see him; then he said mass, and he was not long in doing so. It was always in his own chapel, excepting on the days on which he officiated episcopally, or when some particular reason made him perform divine service elsewhere. On his return he dined with the company, which was always numerous; ate little, and not solidly, but sat long at table for the sake of others, and charmed them with the ease, the variety, and the natural tone and the cheerfulness of his conversation, but without ever descending to any thing not worthy of a bishop and a grand seigneur. After rising from table he remained but a short time with his guests. He had accustomed them to live in his house without constraint, and to give himself none for them. He then went into his study, and worked some hours; prolonging his labours if the weather was bad, and if he had nothing to do elsewhere."

Fenelon knew that there should be in the bishop nothing harsh, nor repulsive, nor pedantic, nor pompous², no official stiffness, nor any want of that excellent polish which results from benevolence, Christian charity, and humility, mingled with the dignity of highmindedness and refinement. He was hospitable as St. Paul requires that a bishop should be³; but his hospitality was that of a prelate and a person of the highest station and breeding. It had all the amenity of the best and most polished society,—and at the same time the strict correctness and the scrupulous morality of a conscientious and irreproachable ecclesiastic.

“ On quitting his study he used to pay visits or walk out of town. He was very fond of that kind of exercise, and liked to prolong it; and if there were none of those whom he lodged, or some distinguished person with him, he was accompanied by a vicar-general or some other ecclesiastic, and conversed with them about the diocese and about matters of piety or learning. He passed his evenings with the guests who lived in his house, supped with the principal officers when troops were passing through, and then his table was served as at dinner. He ate still less than at dinner, and went to bed before midnight. Although his table was handsome and delicate, and every thing about him was according to the condition of a grand seigneur, there was nothing which did not savour of episcopacy, and the most scrupulous rule amidst the politest and mildest freedom. He was himself an ever-present example, but one which it was impossible to reach. He was ever a true prelate, ever a grand seigneur, and ever the author of Telemachus. Never did he utter a word regarding the court, or politics, whatever it was, which could be found fault with, nor which savoured in the slightest degree of meanness, regrets, or flattery, and never any thing which could even hint what he had been nor what he might still become. In the midst of so many great engagements there was the utmost order in his domestic affairs, and the greatest discipline in the whole diocese; but without littleness, without pedantry, and without any one ever having been importuned about doctrine.”

It is impossible to read this account of the great Archbishop of Cambray without admiring the high standard by which he regulated his episcopal life. He had the largest and most comprehensive idea of the bishop's office and duties. He did not look on the bishop as a governor of the clergy, nor as an administrator of property only. He considered the bishop according to the principles of Scripture and ecclesiastical law, as the supreme pastor with cure of souls of the whole diocese, and in one sense, of the whole universal Church,—the father of his people,—the successor of the apostles,—the necessary imitator of their pastoral solicitude, and Christ's representative on earth. Thus no one was so humble as to be below his affectionate care,—and no one so great as to be above his apostolical authority and influence. To all he was accessible, to all a friend, to all equally a father. In the city, great nobles and commanders of armies courted his approbation; in the villages and the remote parts of his diocese, the poor flocked to see him, to receive his blessing and hear his instructions. He was essentially the bishop of the laity of all classes and conditions, as well as of the clergy; and to the clergy he was a brother and a colleague, as well as a spiritual father and governor. What may not be done by such a bishop!

The contemplation of Francis de Sales, of Bishop Wilson, and of Archbishop Fenelon, suggests to the mind of an English churchman matters of profound importance, bearing on the present condition of discipline in this country, so far as it regards the great body of the laity. We have already referred to the difficulties which stand in the way of the revival of that discipline. How far it may be possible gradually to carry it we cannot determine; but it is evident where this great work of restoration must begin. It must begin from the exercise of the direct influence of the pastoral office of the bishop over the laity. It must begin by the bishop, as the successor of the apostles, exerting that kind of immediate personal influence and authority over the laity of all classes, which is so beautifully shown in the lives of Francis de Sales, Bishop Wilson, and Fenelon. The bishop must assume, by virtue of his office, to be the centre of the whole moral and religious government and discipline of the people; not merely by superintendence and direction of the clergy, but in his own person—directly—immediately,—by constant intercourse with the people as their spiritual judge and adviser, by his presence in each parish, by teaching, by the frequent administration of divine service in all parts of his diocese, and by preaching, not only in towns, but in obscure villages, not only to the rich and educated, but to the poor and ignorant. His visitation must be the great tribunal of morals for those purposes which no laws and no magistrates can accomplish. The whole population must look forward to the bishop's visitation as a great festivity, as a joyful event, as the coming of their spiritual father to instruct them, to bless them, to heal their dissensions, and to exercise over them a paternal censorship and solicitude. The people will be easily accustomed to feel and realize the episcopal office. They will soon learn to appreciate the benefits which they will derive therefrom. There is now a strong feeling in the minds of thoughtful men, who stand away from the turmoil of party and the struggles of commercial speculation, that some new element of government is needed to stem the torrent of mean ambition and covetousness, which threatens to overwhelm all honour and justice in this nation. If, indeed, wealth and industry constitute happiness and greatness, then is this country happy and great; but of all servitudes, that is the most miserable which renders man a mere instrument for the accumulation of treasure. Such is the condition, not of the working population alone, who can barely support life by incessant toil, which without the instinct of self-preservation would render life a burthen, but of thousands who think themselves powerful and fortunate, whose souls are bowed down to the abject worship of riches, until they even sacrifice their lives, after destroying their consciences, to obtain the means of gratifying unbounded luxury, and insatiable love of ostentatious power. In the midst of this general demoralization, which daily shows itself in folly, excess, baseness, and crime, and more or less affects every class of the community, the moral discipline of the Church is the great remedy to which honest men look with anxiety and hope. They look to the Divine institution of the episcopal office and polity as the means of reviving justice, honour, and religion, which no laws, no magistrate, and no systems of national education can do. In that office there is a latent force, which only requires to be called forth, fully sufficient for this magnificent task of reformation. It is the great talisman of the Church's power, the great secret of spiritual government, without which ecclesiastical polity becomes a mere form of administration and outward discipline. But the glorious institution of apostolical authority cannot shine forth in all its splendour until it is fully understood and appreciated. Its true spirit and extent must first be realized by profound and enlarged study of principles drawn from the public law of the Church. Then nothing more will be required than to substitute those principles for the routine of modern practice and the prejudices of modern society.

ART. II.—The Theogony of the Hindoos; with their systems of Philosophy and Cosmogony. An Essay. By COUNT M. BJÖRNSTJERNA, Author of “The British Empire in the East.”
London: Murray.

THE religion of the Hindus has been the subject of much able illustration and of much profound research, but of those writers who have engaged in the inquiry, few have prosecuted it in all its extent, or upon a sufficiently comprehensive plan, and many have been misled by partial and imperfect information, by enthusiastic and misplaced admiration, or by interested and malignant prejudices. We have consequently yet to learn, if not what the religion of the Hindus actually is, yet what it was, when, according to Creuzer, “its naive and sublime forms, its simple and profound conceptions, its bold and extensive system, constituted the foundation and explained the meaning of the dogmas and religious symbols of most of the nations of antiquity.”

In the first contemplation of a subject of this vast and interesting nature, we are liable to be distracted by the novelty and number of details yet indistinct, and behold them through a mist in which the most prominent particulars are alone discernible; and when they are magnified beyond their due dimensions, displaced from their proper positions, and distorted in their relative bearings and proportions. It is only as time advances and the vapours clear away, that the several parts are reduced to their natural size and shape, and are capable of combination as a regular and coherent whole.

It rarely happens, however, that the ardour of inquiry can be taught to await for the gradual withdrawal of the veil which clouds the first glimmerings of truth. Strongly impressed by the exaggerated outline of what is dimly visible, a ready belief is entertained that all is fully and distinctly beheld, and particulars are generalised and systems are compounded long before the materials have been adequately collected or suitably prepared; the fabric presently falls to pieces, but the result affords no instruction, and speculation is speedily “at its idle work again.”

The history of the researches of European orientalists regarding the Hindu religion, remarkably illustrates this tendency to hasty and premature conclusions. When the pretensions of the Hindus to high antiquity, and their supposed possession of written authorities much more ancient than the Pentateuch, were first made known, they found a ready acceptance with those who were incredulous of the credibilities of Scripture, and were confidently wielded as weapons fatal to the veracity of the inspired record. Further acquaintance with them revealed their true character, and proved them to be either astronomical computations based on data only partially true, or mythological fictions, having but an imperfect and erroneous connexion with actual chronology. Opinion, indeed, then became liable to a violent reaction, and the whole Hindu system was affirmed to be but a few centuries remote. The juste milieu has not yet been agreed upon; and notwithstanding that great names are enrolled on either part, the antiquity and authenticity of the astronomy of the Hindus, the basis of their whole scheme of chronology, have yet to be ascertained.

In like manner, our first impressions of the mythology of the Hindus were strong in favour of its remote date, and of its relationship to the superstitions of the most celebrated nations of the ancient world. Sir William Jones found obvious analogies between the gods of Egypt, Greece, Italy, and India; Paolino and Wilford followed in the same track; and both the author of the "Religions de l'Antiquité" and his translator and annotator, intimate a perfect conviction of both the antiquity and affinity of the principal features of the Hindu mythology with those of Egypt and of Greece. Although, however, these assertions may be admitted in a general sense, yet it is now certain that the points of resemblance upon which greatest stress has been laid are in many instances fallacious, and that much which is incontestably of comparatively recent date has been so blended and confounded with what is probably old, that it is difficult to draw a line between them. The Puranas, which furnish many of the most characteristic legends of Hinduism as it is, and which were long spoken of as authorities whose origin was lost in the depth of ages, are now, thanks to the industry of M. Burnouf and Prof. Wilson, presented to us in their true character, and the Bhagavat and Vishnu Puranas are shown to be compilations, of which the latter cannot be older than the tenth century of the Christian era, while the former is as late as the twelfth. That they embody traditions of a much greater antiquity is undoubtedly true, but even of them how much is to be regarded as archaic is yet to be determined. In the mean time, some of the most fundamental dogmas have been rudely assailed, and it has been denied that the indication of the triad of gods, Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva, as the personified creative, preserving, and destroying powers of one supreme god, can be traced in the primitive doctrines of the Brahmans. However this may be, it is now generally admitted that the worship of Siva, especially as le grand symbole de la Trinité qui a fait le tour du monde comme celui du Phallus ou Lingam, derives no countenance from the ritual of the Vedas, and is consequently no part of the primary and unadulterated scheme of Hinduism. The periods to be ascribed to these hitherto considered essential and primitive articles of the old Hindu faith are subjects for further investigation; and there are various other debateable matters which sufficiently show, that we are not yet out of the fog,—that we have much still to learn before we can presume to assign to the mythological fictions of the Hindus the order they should follow in the development of the Hindu religion, the place which they are entitled to occupy in the history of the religions of mankind.

The work which has suggested these remarks, “The Theogony of the Hindoos,” by Count M. Björnstjerna, is not calculated, we fear, to dissipate our perplexities, or to throw any light upon the true history and real character of that which it professes to describe. The noble author deserves every possible commendation for so laudable an employment of his time and talents, and for patriotic anxiety to communicate to his countrymen in Sweden a share of that acquaintance with India, both ancient and modern, which is so perseveringly sought for and so successfully attained in Germany and France. Unfortunately his purposes are better entitled to commendation than their execution. The Count is a statesman and a politician: he is not an orientalist nor an antiquarian. In his “History of India,” a work published some time ago, he is most at home in statistical details, and his work may be consulted with advantage for particulars relating to the government of the East India Company, and the financial and military resources of their dominions. When he is among the people and princes of India he is in an unknown world, and hits upon extraordinary discoveries. As one instance of this, we may notice his proof of an affinity between the swarthy races of India and the blue-eyed warriors of Scandinavia,—a discovery to which he reverts in his Theogony. The proof is the name of Uddin, or Odin, borne, as he affirms, by a dynasty of kings of Delhi. He is apparently unaware that ud-din is only part of a title very commonly assumed by Mohammedan sovereigns, implying their devotion to the religion, al-din, of their prophet; as Ghias-ad-din, Shems-ad-din, the defender—the sun—of the faith, and the like, and no more of kin to the Hindus than to the Scandinavians, to Odin than to Brahma, to the language of the Edda than to that of the Vedas, unless it could be established that both were but transcripts of the Koran.

The whole title of the present work is, “The Theogony of the Hindoos, with their systems of Philosophy and Cosmogony: an Essay :” the latter qualification is intended apparently to qualify expectation, and prepare us for a conciseness of description wholly disproportioned to the extent and importance of the subjects. We had no right to look for any novelty in a work avowedly made up from other authorities, but we had hoped that the compilation would have supplied a want which still prevails even in English literature,—a general but comprehensive account of the whole Hindu system, compiled from the authentic materials which now abound. We have not, in fact, any available authority to which to apply promptly and commodiously for information regarding the religion and institutions of India. Moor’s “Hindu Pantheon” was compiled at an early date, almost exclusively from the first volumes of the “Asiatic Researches of Bengal,” from the papers of Sir Wm. Jones and Major Wilford. It is a serviceable work as far as it goes, but is in arrear of our present knowledge. Ward’s “Hindus” is liable to a similar objection, and is also exceptionable as attempting too much with inadequate materials. It is rather an account of the Hindus of Bengal than of the Hindus of India, and is often deficient in candour and good taste. We have still therefore to seek for a competent guide to a knowledge of the Hindus, and we shall not find it in this “Essay,” although, in addition to the important topics specified above, it comprises a variety of others, and devotes a few pages to the laws and institutions of the Hindus, the distinctions of caste, the chief literary compositions, the Buddhists and other religious divisions of the people, the Fire-worshippers, Syro-Christians, and Mohammedans of India. The accounts are necessarily concise and meagre, and yet they offer no inconsiderable number of unauthorized statements and palpable mistakes.

The very desultory nature of Count Björnstjerna’s descriptions renders it impossible to adopt any connected and methodical examination of his work ; we shall therefore confine our observations to the subjects announced in the title-page, “The Theogony, Philosophy, and Cosmogony of the Hindus.”

Upon the first of these topics, notwithstanding the prominent place it takes in the designation of the book, little or nothing is to be found. We are told, indeed, that the religion of the Hindus as it appears in the Vedas, is “a monotheism encompassed by or founded on a Sabæistic form ;” that after some ten or eleven centuries a new commentator of the Vedas, Menu, in a great measure altered the contents of the sacred scripture, and that the Brahmanical religion received a still further development by means of the Puranas, which bring the doctrine from the principle of the Unity to that of the Triad or Trimurthi, or rather combine the principle of the Triad with that of the Unity. The origin of the Brahmanical Trinity is conjectured to have originated in the following manner: "The Vedas represent the Almighty as creator, preserver, and destroyer, and in the last character in respect to the four great periods of the world, or Yugs, which, according to the Vedas, are separated from each other by means of great universal destructions. From these three attributes the Puranas form three distinct deities under the names of Brahmá (the Creator), Vishnu (the Preserver), and Siva (the Destroyer)." Allusion is then made to the Avatáras, saints or incarnations of Vishnu and Siva upon earth in a human form, of which it is stated there have been nine of the former and two of the latter; and it is then affirmed that the Hindus are divided into three sects, as followers of Vedantism, Vishnuism, and Sivism, worshipping respectively Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva. Brief mention is made of two of Vishnu's Avataras, Ráma and Krishna; and Siva, it is said, is worshipped under "two symbolical forms," and this is all that we have upon the subject of the Hindu Pantheon; no allusion being made to any of the multitudinous array of divinities, which form in various degrees essential parts of the system, nor to their origin, history, or functions: even what is said abounds with misconception.

The religion of the Hindus, we are told, as it appears in the Vedas, is "a monotheism founded upon Sabæism." Before this can be admitted, it must be asked, how much do we know of the doctrine of the Vedas? and how far does that knowledge justify the unqualified assertion that they teach the worship of one god, distinguishable as a trinity by his attributes, as creator, preserver, and destroyer of the universe.

To the first of these questions we shall look in vain to our author for a reply. He tells us, indeed, that the Vedas form the basis of the religion of the Hindoos, that they consist of four distinct parts or books, and that each is composed of three divisions,—the Mantra, which contains hymns and prayers to the Almighty; the second, Brahmana, which consists "of the precepts of religion and theological arguments;" and the third, which is termed Upanishad, forming "an abstract of the other two;" that they are written in a metaphorical style, are not clear, and are often contradictory; and that an abridgment of them, called Vedanta, was made by Vyasa 2000 years before Christ; that only small portions have been translated into the European languages; that Colebrooke's English versions are most to be depended upon; and that although the translated portions are insufficient to enable one to form a right judgment of the actual contents of the doctrine exhibited, it is evident that it was a monotheism encompassed by a Sabæistic form or founded upon it.

Although reference is here made to the means we possess of knowing what the Vedas contain, it may be doubted if the writer has taken much trouble to become fully acquainted with them. The manner in which Colebrooke's "versions" are mentioned is a sufficient justification of the doubt. Mr. Colebrooke's "Essay on the Vedas," first published in the "Asiatic Researches," and since incorporated in his "Miscellaneous Essays," is not a mere series of translations: it is a general description of the Vedas, an account of their origin, arrangement, composition, and doctrines, illustrated by occasional translations, forming an invaluable introduction to the study of the Vedas, but necessarily leaving very much to be determined beyond the limits of the Essay. The want is still very imperfectly supplied, but there were other materials within his reach, which might have enabled the Count to have been more precise and accurate in his statements. The first book of the Rig-veda, with a Latin translation by the late learned and estimable Dr. Rosen, published by the Oriental Translation Fund, has been some years before the public, and the text and translation of the ritual portion of the Sâma-veda, by Mr. Stevenson of Bombay, published by the same fund in conjunction with the Oriental Text Society, had preceded the "Theogony of the Hindus" long enough to have been consulted by its author, and to have suggested to him the propriety of speaking with more hesitation of the doctrine of the Vedas, and with more reserve of their monotheism.

The specimens we have now within our reach enable us to conceive a tolerably correct notion of the character of the practical, which is no doubt the archaic form of the Vedas. This consists not of a uniform and systematic body of writings, composed upon a definite plan, and for a single and determinate purpose, but of a number of separate and detached hymns, the work of various hands and of evidently different periods,—the spontaneous effusions of venerable men, in harmony with the prevailing belief and practices of their time, and intended chiefly, if not solely, for the use of their own families and disciples. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, of these canticles were scattered among the people, or preserved traditionally in different households, in a more or less isolated state, until the age of generalization and system had arrived, when the disjecta membra were collected, studied, and taught, and schools were formed for their preservation, classification, and use, as a universal and popular liturgy. This classification, according to our author, occurred two thousand years before our era, but upon what grounds he assigns to the aggregation of the hymns of the Vedas such an antiquity he has not informed us. The data furnished us by Mr. Colebrooke, and they are the best we yet have, carry the collection and arrangement of the Vedas no higher than the fourteenth century before Christianity, an antiquity sufficiently remote when the progressive and accumulative character of the materials is considered.

Until we have translations of the entire Vedas, it were very unsafe to say that monotheism is no part of their primitive doctrine. As far, however, as we are yet acquainted with the practical part, with the hymns and prayers used at seasons of actual worship and adoration, we have no reason to credit the assertion that they are addressed "to the Almighty," or that they inculcate "Monotheism." They are exclusively polytheistic, addressed principally, though not solely, to Fire, to Indra as the deity of the firmament, to the sun, to the moon, to the dawn, to night, and to various forms of divinities of a vague and undefined character, not necessarily connected with heavenly phenomena, but whose offices and stations are not satisfactorily specified, and are even unknown to the Hindus themselves. The religion of the Vedas was not idolatry; it had neither temples nor images. Its shrines were the halls or the court-yards of the dwellings of the worshippers, and its rude altars blazed with burnt offerings to elements, whose ideal impersonations or presiding spirits were indeed invoked to be present at the ceremony, and requested to accept the oblations either for themselves or for the gods universally, but who were never typified by wood or stone, or by any forms more real than the shadowy creations of superstitious awe and religious veneration. But though not idolatrous, the faith was polytheistic, and actual adoration was divided among a very considerable number and variety of imaginary beings.

Count Björnstjerna affirms that the sacred volume begins with these words, "that there is only one God, Brahma, omnipotent, eternal, omnipresent, the great soul of whom all other gods are but parts." The first stanza of the Rig-veda is in Rosen's version, Agnim (Ignem) celebros antistitem, sacrificii divinum sacerdotem, vocatorem, thesauris ditissimum. The first phrases of the Yajur are, "I cut thee, branch of the Palasa tree, for the sake of obtaining rain. I make thee straight (1). Do ye, ye calves, go with your mothers, to pasture (2). May the resplendent sun direct you to what is best for you (3)." The opening verse of the Sama Veda is, "Come, oh Agni (Fire), to the banquet of him who celebrates thy praise, to forward his offering. Herald (of the gods) sit down on the sacred grass;" and the Atharva begins, "May the rivers water the sacrifice and the winds blow over it, may holy hymns secure its prosperity as I offer oblation with flowing butter." Now, none of these are at all like the passage which the Count has cited as the beginning of the sacred volume, and it is clear, therefore, that either a different work must have opened with such a commencement, or that no such initiatory passage occurs. He has not specified his authority for the passage. It is no doubt a genuine citation, but it may not have been taken from a very authentic source, unless it be translated from some other original than that which is here ascribed to it; it is most unlikely that any such dogma should be found in any part of the practical portion of the Vedas, in the hymns and prayers which were dictated by the Hindu religion in its most pure, simple, and primitive condition.

In another professed citation from the Vedas, we are able to discover the authority which the author has followed. The Vedas, he says, express themselves in the following manner:—"The angels assembled around the throne of the Almighty, and asked with submissiveness who he himself were; he then answered, Were there another than I, I should describe myself through him. I have been from eternity and shall remain to eternity; I am the first cause of all that exists in the east and west, and north and south, above and below; I am older than all the kings of kings, I am the truth, I am the spirit of the creation, the creator himself; I am knowledge, and purity, and light, I am almighty:" and the Count concludes; "these truly sublime ideas cannot fail to convince us that the Vedas recognise one only God, who is almighty, infinite, eternal, self-existent, the light and lord of the universe." His authority for this conclusion is not mentioned, but we have found it to be the "Oupnekhat," or Theologia Indica, Anquetil du Perron's Latin translation of a Persian translation of the Upanishads, made by order of Dara Shekoh, the son of Shahjehan and elder brother of Aurangzeb. In his second volume, p. 12, he gives a version of the Atharva Sára Upanishad, which begins "*Oi Fereshtehah in behescht ante Roudr, id est, perientem (destructam) facientem omnem existentiam, cum ivissent et humilem submissionem eum loco attulissent, petierunt quod; Vos, qui estis? Roudr dixit, Si secundus meus (mei) sit, ego dicam quod ego quis sum, semper fui, et semper exis-to, et semper sum futurus; and the text proceeds with details from which those cited by the author are translated, or they may have been taken from a French version of the same publication. This is not very good authority. The text is evidently inter-larded with Mohammedan ideas, as the words themselves declare, Ferishtaha and behisht being Persian words, implying "angels* and heaven." Still we may grant that for all essential purposes the text is a sufficient guide, but what is the authority of the Atharva Sāra, and how far are the Upanishads the Veda! To the first we may answer that the Atharva Sāra is at best of equivocal authenticity, and that the character it ascribes to Rudra, or the identification of an individual form of Siva with the One Supreme, is indicative of a later date and sectarial origin. The connexion between the Upanishads and the Vedas we shall presently speak of, disposing in the first place of the second division of these works—the Brahmanas.

We scarcely know yet what is meant by this term. The Brahmins themselves are chary of a definition, and are content to say that all that is not Mantra is Brahmana. Such of them as have been translated, partake of the same nature as the Mantras, being hymns and prayers, and are addressed to the same divinities, but they are of a less simple and patriarchal style, and are devised for rites more solemn and imposing than domestic worship, such as the sacrifices of animals, horses, or men, real or typical, by princes and sovereigns. Their style is more elevated, and they begin to indulge in a strain of mysticism in which it is not impossible they may contain the germ of later metaphysical speculation. In a still more general sense a Brahmana is practical, directing religious observances, teaching the purpose, time, and manner of performing them, indicating the prayers to be employed, and elucidating their import. In none of these respects do they answer exactly to our author's definition of them, as "religious precepts and theological arguments."

Still less applicable is the character he has given of the Upanishads, as abstracts of the Mantras and Brahmanas; they have nothing in common with the former, little except obscurity with the latter. They are wholly mystical and speculative, being short treatises on the nature of matter and spirit, of man and of God. There are usually enumerated fifty-one Upanishads. They are evidently of various eras, and some of them are most probably of no very remote date. The most celebrated are, however, no doubt of an antiquity inferior only to the secondary period of the Vedas, that of the Brahmanas, or to the collection of the Mantras in a systematized form. The Persian translation comprehends the whole fifty-one, and consequently so does the translation of M. Du Perron, but, as above remarked, they have undergone considerable modification in this double transfer. One or two are translated by Mr. Colebrooke, and several others by Rammohun Roy; we are therefore competent to form an opinion of their character, although not to pronounce definitively on what all of them do or do not contain. It is to them, however, that the monotheism or rather the pantheism attributed to the Vedas is to be traced, and this very circumstance is a proof of their subsequent and independent origin. Worship precedes philosophy. Prayer and praise, the utterance of wants, and acknowledgment of their being supplied, are the natural language of man in the earliest stages of civilization, before he considers very nicely the nature of the supernatural beings to whom his thanks and supplications are addressed. It is only when the national belief obtains a degree of consistency, that some "from the rest retired," begin to meditate on their being's end, and aim; to distinguish between material and immaterial substance, and to look for a first cause and ruler of the universe. These speculative views gave rise to the Upanishads, and as far as they may be considered as a part of the Vedas, the Vedas may be said to inculcate monotheism, but they are rather supplementary to the Vedas than an integral portion of them, and constitute the second or third stage in the history of Hindu belief. In no respects can they be considered as abstracts of the older and practical works. Nor is it correct to say, even of the Upanishads, that their style is metaphorical, although Rammohun Roy be apparently the authority for this characteristic of the language of the Vedas. It is often obscure and mystical, but does not deal largely in metaphor. Still less is this true of the language of the Brahmanas, and, as of the Mantras although not destitute of poetry, it is exceedingly primitive and simple.

Recurring to the account given by our author of the history of the Vedas, we have to notice the somewhat startling announcement, that Manu was a commentator on those works, and that he considerably altered their contents. The Hindus invariably regard the laws of Manu as being in accordance with the doctrines of the Vedas, and this appears to be the case as far as their purposes are the same. From the time, however, of Sir William Jones's translation of the institutes of Manu, we have been aware that they are designed to regulate the civil and social conditions of the Hindus, and have little to do with the system of religious practice or belief, except as they prescribe the especial duties of the Hindus of the first three castes at various periods of life, and in different relations of society; certainly the laws of Manu are not intended nor calculated to illustrate the prayers and hymns of the four Vedas.

With respect to the deviation from the doctrines of the Vedas, with which Manu is charged, we are told that he proceeds from other views than those of the Vedas respecting the Almighty and the creation of the world; that the Vedas say nothing on the subject of caste, and are equally silent on that of the metem-psychosis, and that consequently Manu is to be considered as the institutor of the distinction, and the inventor of the doctrine, positions which are unquestionably erroneous.

How far the social institutions of the Hindus or their metaphysical speculations may be discovered in the Mantras and Brahmanas remains to be determined, although in what has been translated there are indications which would warrant the inference that the social arrangement prevailed even when the Mantras were composed, and that the metempsychosis was not unknown. All doubt on the subject disappears when we come to the Upanishads; and these, as we have seen, the Count denominates abstracts of the other portions of the Vedas, and therefore in substance the same. Had he turned over a few pages of Ram-mohun Roy's small volume, he would soon have found that the notions of Manu are those of the Vedas, in as far as those are expressed by the Upanishads. Thus in the Moondak, "the superior kind of knowledge is that through which absorption into the Supreme Being may be obtained. The Supreme Being is beyond the apprehension of the senses; he is everlasting, all prevailing, omnipresent, unchangeable, and it is he whom wise men consider as the origin of the universe." These are the very terms in which Manu speaks of the self-existent Being from whom the universe proceeded.

In the same Upanishad we have the following explicit assertion of the doctrine of transmigration. "They who depend for emancipation on ceremonial rites, having enjoyed the consequence of such rites on the summit of heaven, transmigrate in the human form or in that of inferior animals or plants." So in the Kath Upanishad, "some of those who are ignorant (of the unity of spirit), enter after death the wombs of females to appear in the animal shape, while others assume the form of trees, according to their conduct and knowledge during their lives." There can be no doubt, therefore, that the Upanishads of the Vedas are familiar with the doctrine of the metempsychosis.

There is little occasion in the Vedas to allude to the distinction of castes, but the Brahman is particularized in almost every prayer or hymn. The Kshetriya or regal caste is also frequently mentioned, and the Vaisya and Sudra are not unnoticed, so are the distinctions of the Asramas or orders of the three first castes, as in the Moondak Upanishad. "Mendicants and hermits as well as householders, possessing wisdom and practising austerities, ascend to the highest heaven." It is clear, therefore, that the origin of these notions has been somewhat inconsiderately and unauthorizedly ascribed to Manu.

the Brahmanical religion is equally inaccurate. They are distributed, it is said, among three branches, termed Vedantism, Vishnuism, and Saivism. Of the first it is affirmed that Brahma is the object, but it is added, that there is but one temple dedicated to this doctrine in which he is worshipped alone. We doubt if there is one temple even in which worship is offered to Brahmá, and certainly there is no temple dedicated to Vedantism. It is in fact a system of philosophy especially opposed to rites, inculcating spiritual knowledge by penance and meditation, and discountenancing ceremonial observances as productive of only temporary good. The object of knowledge is Brahm, not Brahmá; the universal Supreme Spirit, the First Cause of all, not Brahmá, the agent in material creation, the personified creative faculty. The Count has evidently been misled by the similarity of the name, and confounded two very different things. Brahmá, to whom alone worship may be, although it now never is addressed, has nothing in common with Vedantism.

The notices which follow of the worship of Vishnu and Siva are more correct, but they are very far from affording a complete picture of the diversities which exist. If the author had referred to the copious accounts of existing Hindu sects, published in the sixteenth and seventeenth volumes of the Asiatic Researches, he would have learned that there are at least twenty varieties of the worship of Vishnu, and half that number of the worship of Siva, besides a number of modifications of practice and opinion differing from both, with which he is evidently unacquainted. Most of these are of recent and well known origin, and their ready multiplication and extensive popularity, satisfactorily show that Hindu opinion is not the stubborn principle which it has been represented to be, and encourage us to hope, that in the fulness of time it will yield to the persuasive influence of light and truth.

Of the different schools of Hindu philosophy we have little except the names, and those strangely misrepresented. The translator and printer are here, however, probably more in fault than the author. They are said to be the elder Mimansa, the younger Mimansa or Vedanta, the logical school or Nijaya, the atomic theory of Canade (Canada), the atheistic school of Kapila, and the theistic of Pantanjali (Patanjali). It is remarked of the two last, that they are rather pantheistic than either atheistic or theistic: "they suppose that God and the world are the same; that spirit and matter are one; and that God is all, and all is God." Unfortunately this is wrongly attributed. It had been correct if it had been affirmed of the younger Mimansa or Vedanta school, but it is the reverse of the doctrines of Kapila and Patanjali.

The different philosophical systems of the Hindus, with exception of the elder Mimansa, which stops at the consequences of ceremonial observances, have one common object,—the assertion of transmigration through living forms, the final emancipation of the soul from corporeal bondage, and its escape from bodily pain and degradation. This consummation they make to depend upon the acquirement of true wisdom,—knowledge by the soul of its nature and end,—but they do not agree exactly as to its final destination. The consideration of this involves the recognition of one of two principles: of spirit alone, or of matter as well as spirit; and the question, how far individuality may be predicated of the latter as one supreme origin and end of all things. In one sense, all the philosophical schools may be termed atheistical, as attributes are by all withheld from the supreme soul, and neither in the creation nor in the government of the universe is any active interposition exercised. In this they have departed from the doctrines of some of the Upanishads, which seem to be the foundation of most of the philosophy; for they, in speaking of spirit anterior to creation, ascribe to it “will,” the exertion of which led to the evolution of the world and of man,—as in the text, “THAT (Spirit) was alone, and willed to be many.” Thence came into existence the perceptible creation, which once extant, was left to the guidance of inferior creatures, the gods of the ordinary mythology: so far, therefore, is God admitted as “willing” things to be, but there his function terminates, and the notion of one supreme, presiding, all-directing, all-judging Providence, is foreign to every system of Hindu philosophy.

The secondary Mimansa or Vedanta professes to derive its doctrines of the unity of spirit from the Vedas, being, as the name implies, the end or scope of those authorities. By the Vedas, however, must be understood the Upanishads: with perhaps a few obscure texts of the Brahmanas: the speculations of the Vedanta derive no countenance from the ritual. The Vedānta, maintaining the doctrine of unity, or of one principle alone, is reduced to the necessity of either considering matter and spirit to be the same, or of getting quit of the former. It has chosen the latter alternative, and holds that matter has no existence independent of our ideas, and that all material substance is unreal or illusory. This is what is meant by Máyá, or delusion, and our author, therefore, is inaccurate when, after specifying a few of the Vedanta tenets, he proceeds: “the next of the philosophical systems of India which deserves to be mentioned, if on no other account, from the number of its adherents, is the so-termed system of Máyá or Illusion.” As far as Máyá constitutes an essential element in any system, it is the same thing with the Vedanta.

It is to this school also that the term pantheistic is most appropriate; for neither the Sankhya nor the Yoga system, or as they are here both called, Sankia, supposes that "God and the world are one, that spirit and matter are one, or that God is all and all is God." This is transcendental Vedantism; the Sankhya and Yoga are its antagonist systems; both maintaining the dualistic doctrine, and asserting the co-eternal and independent existence of both matter and spirit. The latter, the Yoga school, affirms the existence of "God as a soul or spirit distinct from other souls, unaffected by the ills with which they are beset, unconcerned with good or bad deeds and their consequences, and with fancies or passing thoughts. In him is the utmost omniscience. He is the instructor of the earliest beings that have a beginning (the deities of mythology); himself infinite, unlimited by time." Kapila, the teacher of the Sankhya, "on the other hand, denies an Iswara, ruler of the world by volition; alleging that there is no proof of God's existence, which is unperceived by the senses, not inferred from reason, nor yet revealed." We are afraid, therefore, that the author has omitted to peruse Mr. Colebrooke's essays on the different systems of Hindu philosophy, and he must certainly be unacquainted with the translation of the Sankhya Karika, published by the Translation Fund, or he would never have called the Sankhya doctrine, pantheism.

"The cosmogony of the Hindoos is contained not alone in the Vedas and in the Vedanta, but also in the Codex of Manu." That any account of the creation of the world is found in the Vedas is very unlikely, unless we restrict the term to the Upanishads, and even in them we have only allusions to the event, not any detailed description. The subject is not peculiar to the Vedanta, but enters necessarily into all the philosophical systems which pretend to investigate the origin of spiritual and material existence. The first book of Manu does contain a system of cosmogony, but the account is somewhat vague and obscure, owing in part to its eclectic character, and to its having mixed together fragmentary portions of incompatible systems, and added particulars derived from the Upanishads, and probably from tradition. Although, therefore, not an original or consistent account, it is the more deserving of attention as it apparently represents with sufficient precision current and popular belief.

It is, in the first place, dualistic, intimating, in concurrence with the Sankhya and Nyayikas, the eternity of matter; for though it is said that "THIS" (that is, the yet unformed universe) was dark, unperceived, not inferrible, indefinable, incognizable, yet "IT WAS:" it was only, as it were, immersed in profound sleep; it existed in the shape of crude, undeveloped matter, or Prakriti. The doctrine is not unsupported by the Upanishads; as in such texts as "This world was extant in the beginning." Sir William Jones has added from the commentator, This world existed only (in the first divine idea yet unextended, as if involved) in darkness; but this is a gloss of the Vedanta school, of the advocates of the principle of unity, and is wholly unauthorized by the letter and tenor of the text, which is evidently dualistic, and affirms the independent existence of matter before creation,— "without form," indeed, but not without existence. The translation of M. Des Longchamps, which Count Björnstjerna has preferred, is much less accurate—at least in its English dress—than that of Sir William Jones, and conveys equally wrong notions.

In the next stage of creation we have in Manu—following the texts, no doubt, of the Upanishads—the agency of a Creator: "The self-existent, the unperceived, making manifest the rudimental elements, of irresistible creative power, and dispelling the darkness, appeared."

The notion of a Creator is here something more than the supreme universal spirit of the Vedanta or any of the philosophical schools, and appears to have been the popular notion founded on texts of the Vedas, implying not only spirituality, but individuality and person: as the commentator on Manu observes, "of his own will he assumes body." Still the original texts are capable of a different interpretation, and admit of the Vedantic exposition of the unity of the Creator and the created: as it is said, "He is single, he becomes double;" "Brahma is that from which all are born, by which all live, and to which all return." Manu, however, clearly distinguishes the self-existent Swayambhu from the matter of the universe, and does not therefore exclusively follow the Vedanta school.

The description of the Self-born which follows in Manu is not incompatible with personal individuality, although, as usual, vague and capable of being variously explained: "He is apprehensible by the mind alone, subtile, invisible, eternal, inconceivable, composed of the universal elements (or one with elementary substance)." This latter attribute would seem to imply pantheism, identifying God and the created world, at least in the Vedanta sense of the ideality of the latter; but that were incompatible with what has preceded, and the contradiction is one of the proofs of the eclectic character of the text, and the manner in which conflicting tenets have been culled and confounded together.

The elemental character of the Self-born has been probably a popular notion, and is adopted to account for what follows, which is entirely of a popular character, and is not authorized by any philosophical system: "He being desirous of creating creatures, having meditated, emitted from his own body, in the first place, water and scattered in it a seed." Here we have person and material existence clearly predicated of the Self-born, and the origin of the first element,—not an illusory, ideal element, but bondâ fide water, is ascribed to him: an origin, it may be marked, which is irreconcilable with the previous assertion that crude matter co-existed; a contradiction which the dualistic philosophy avoids, by assigning the development of water and other elements in this rudimental state, not to spirit, but to Prakriti, to nature, or crude matter, through the influence of spirit.

The seed or germ thus abandoned or cast in the waters, is said by the Vedanta to be a metaphorical expression for the divine or spiritual energy, but this is not the doctrine of Manu; and the text now evidently departs from all abstractions, and expresses palpable and popular notions, based no doubt upon the oracular phraseology of the Upanishads, but not altogether consistent with their interpretation by any of the philosophical schools. The seed becomes a golden egg, and in that egg is produced, from the inscrutable First Cause of all, Brahmá, the active author of all the forms of created things, the immediate Creator of the existent universe. In respect to the mundane egg, the Hindu notion corresponds with one very common among the ancient nations of the East, but whether it be among the archaic fictions of the Hindus is very questionable. It is older than Manu, if our impression of the eclectic character of his code be correct, but whether it be as ancient as the Vedas, or even as the Upanishads, has yet to be ascertained.

We shall not follow our author in his observations upon the traditions of the Deluge which prevailed among the nations of the ancient world, and which are common to the Hindus. He has cited not very correctly one only of the accounts, and that taken from a work of modern date, the Bhagavat Purana; but the same, the legend of Satyavrata, who was preserved during a universal flood in a boat constructed by him by command of Vishnu, and piloted by the god in the form of the Matsya or fish avatar, is to be found in other and older books, as, for instance, in the Mahabharata. The other two of the three first avatars, the Tortoise and the Boar,—the former upholding the mountain with which the ocean was churned, and the latter raising up the earth from beneath the waters,—evidently refer to the same event. But then comes the question, what is the age of the avatars? No details respecting them have yet been found in either portion of the Vedas, not even in the Upanishads, and the allusions hitherto met with are few and doubtful. The Rig-Veda, for instance, refers to the divinity of the "Three Steps," which not improbably alludes to the fourth avatar of Vishnu as the Vámana or Dwarf, who, on having three paces of space granted him by Bali, whose pride he had descended to humble, bestrode earth and heaven, and refrained from the third step, which would not have left Bali even sovereignty in Hell; at the same time the appearance of Vishnu at all in the Vedas is unfrequent, and the identity of the Vishnu of those works with the Vishnu of the Puranas so questionable, that it may be doubted if the epithet Trivikrama be not merely metaphorical, denoting a divinity paramount either over the three worlds or the three periods of time, and whether the epithet may not in fact have suggested the legend. These are among the many problems which remain to be resolved, before we can venture to affirm, of a variety of important details in the practices and belief of the Hindus, that they are of an ancient date and of unborrowed origin.

We shall leave to geologists the objections Count Björnstjerna urges against Cuvier's theory of the deluge, and to metaphysicians his adoption of the Sankhya doctrine that matter is immortal like spirit; our business has been exclusively with his account of the religious and philosophical notions of the Hindus, and we are sorry that we cannot bestow upon the manner in which he has performed his task more unqualified commendation. We had no reason to expect from the author any original information, but we had a right to demand the accurate communication of all that was authentic and recent, the sources of which are abundant and accessible, and of the highest authority. It is clear, however, that he has turned aside from the well-head to wade in shallow and muddy channels, and deserting the only guides competent to lead him through the mazes of his subject, he has followed others imperfectly masters of the clue, and has lost his way on the very threshold of the labyrinth. Making little or no use of Colebrooke's essays on the Vedas and philosophical systems, or of the translations of the Rig and Sama-vedas, of the Upanishads, of the Sankhya Karika, of the Bhagavat and Vishnu Puranas, all of them incontestable authorities, he has followed such half-informed and indiscriminating writers as the compiler of the "Mythologie des Hindous," or such crude and second-hand translations as the "Oupnekhat" of Du Perron.

There was a time when such want of discrimination would have been excusable, but it can no longer be extenuated; as even if the abundant information furnished through the English language be not readily available to a native of the continent, there is no lack of correct information on Hindu subjects, both original and translated, in the languages of France and Germany, in the writings of Burnouf, Lassen, and Schlegel, and of a host of meritorious cultivators of the languages and literature of India.

At the same time we are willing to acknowledge, that although we are now in possession of a great mass of materials for constructing a conclusive scheme of Hinduism as it now is, and as it has been for many centuries, we are not yet provided sufficiently with the means of tracing it to its source, or of acquiring accurate knowledge of its pristine and archaic condition: we are not yet prepared for the investigation. The task cannot be safely undertaken until we have before us all the most important texts of the Vedas, and trustworthy translations of them. Something, as we have had occasion to remark, has been contributed towards the accomplishment of this object, but not much; something more is in progress, but it is tardy. The untimely death of Dr. Rosen cut short the publication of the Rig-veda, and the portion of the Sama-veda published by Mr. Stevenson is of limited extent. A useful institution, the Oriental Text Society, has engaged to print the entire texts of the Rig-veda and Yajur-veda, and two of our most eminent Sanscrit scholars, Professor Wilson and Dr. Mill, are pledged to edit them, and propose to add translations. The work is laborious and requires time, and as the means of the Text Society are, we believe, but limited, a considerable interval is likely to elapse before either of these important works can be consulted by those who seek to become acquainted either with the early religion of the Hindus or the history of opinion in general. Our knowledge of the religion and philosophy of the ancient world must necessarily be imperfect and inaccurate, until we have ascertained the precise notions which either originated in India, or flowing thither from other parts of the East, there received a new development and a cumulative impulse, the consequences of which are still in active operation among so many millions of the human race, obstacles to their elevation in moral dignity and fatal to their hopes of future happiness. It were for the credit of Great Britain—we may venture to think it is her duty, interwoven as India now is with her political prosperity—to take the lead in tearing away the veil that shrouds the ancient form of the Hindu faith, secure that the more thoroughly it is known, even by the Hindus themselves, the more sensibly will they feel the want of another and a better. As a matter of enlightened curiosity also, it becomes a great government to preserve the relics of the old world: we need not rebuild its decaying shrines, but we may worthily protect them from dilapidation, and maintain them as interesting and not un instructive records of the past.

WITH the exception of St. Bernard, Peter Abelard is the most remarkable personage in the literary history of the twelfth century. The former may be considered as representing the conservative and orthodox spirit of his age, the latter may be regarded as the type of its liberalism and speculative rationalism. Without reference to their moral qualities, and viewing them only in an intellectual aspect, Abelard¹ is perhaps the more striking character of the two. The glowing eloquence indeed of the abbot of Clairvaux, and the immense influence which he had obtained throughout Christendom, so overpowered Abelard in the dispute which brought these rivals into collision, that he has not emerged from the shade into which he was then condemned, nor is it to be expected, or indeed desired, that he will ever assume that rank in the literary history of Europe, to which if his talents and acquirements were alone regarded, he might appear to be so justly entitled.

Independent of the moral lessons which the history of Abelard teaches us, his biography is both interesting and instructive. The names of few writers of that seculum obscurum, the twelfth century, are better known than his ; but his true claims to popularity are not always rightly understood. They do not rest, as they are generally supposed to do, upon his unfortunate and disgraceful connexion with Heloise. More incident is associated with his history than with any other ecclesiastic with whom we are acquainted. Abelard was not only an elegant poet and skilful musician, but he was one of the most popular and successful teachers whom France, or perhaps modern Europe, has ever produced. As a philosopher he moderated in the great dispute of his age; he rejected both Realism and Nominalism, and created an intermediate system named Conceptualism. In Theology he founded the school known by the name of Rationalism. His speculations gave occasion for the holding of two councils, those of Soissons and Sens; and although the eloquence and authority of St. Bernard were called into exercise for their suppression, these opinions survived in the person of the celebrated Arnold of Brescia, and a host of other admirers, and have descended to our own generation.

"All is not heaven's while Abelard has part."

As might be expected from these circumstances, Abelard has had warm friends and bitter enemies. By the latter he is represented as a dangerous and a rash theorist, a man whose wild philosophy, if carried out, would undermine the everlasting truths of revelation. His character, according to their estimate, is made up of pride, arrogance, insubordination, contempt of constituted authority, treachery, and dissoluteness. His advocates tell us, on the other hand, that his only object was to systematise theology, and to give to that science greater precision and accuracy than it had hitherto attained; and if in this attempt he opposed the narrow prejudices of the ecclesiastics of the age in which he lived, it surely is our duty to sympathise rather with his clear-sightedness than their bigotry. Uninfluenced by prejudice or by theory, it shall be our object in the following pages to give a sketch of the life of this extraordinary individual, derived for the most part from his own writings, and illustrated by contemporaneous authorities, and we shall examine as they arise such questions as may enable us to form a fair and a candid estimate of his opinions and character.

Peter Abelard, the eldest son of Berenger and Lucy, was born in the year 1079, at Paletz², or Palais, a small town situated a few miles to the east of Nantz. His father, although a soldier, was a man of cultivated mind and refined taste, and he took care that his sons should be instructed not only in arms, but also in literature. Abelard's predilection for study soon exhibited itself, and deserting the court of Mars, to use his own expression, he took refuge in the bosom of Minerva. His favourite study was logic, its subtleties were calculated to engage a mind like his, naturally astute rather than profound, and his vanity led him to study a science which enabled a defeated disputant to cover his retreat when overpowered in argument. But it was his misfortune to be placed at this early period of his life under the tuition of a master whose theological opinions were decidedly heterodox. Roscelin³, a canon of Compeigne, had speculated in such an unguarded manner upon the nature of the Trinity, as to end by affirming that the Three Persons in the Godhead were really and essentially distinct, and that to assert there were three Gods was not an heretical expression, although it was unusual⁴. These blasphemous doctrines were warmly opposed by Anselm, archbishop of Canterbury, and were condemned by the Council of Soissons in A. D. 1092; but notwithstanding these censures, they were still entertained by their originator. After a banishment into England, which gave him the opportunity of promulgating his obnoxious doctrines at Oxford, he returned into France, and towards the conclusion of his life settled in that district of which both he and Abelard were natives. The young logician was thus brought into contact with the veteran heretic, and from such an instructor it would appear that Abelard imbibed those unsettled opinions, from the influence of which he could never afterwards totally free himself.

Abelard's apologists, however, are anxious to save him from the obloquy of having been educated in such a school; and observing that in "the History of his Calamities," he does not mention Roscelin among his instructors, they have ventured to assert that no direct communication existed between these parties. But the statement which we have made rests upon evidence which cannot be shaken. Otho of Frisingen⁵, the contemporary and apologist of Abelard, tells us, that he derived his earliest instructions from Roscelin, and in this he is followed by Aventine⁶; and the question is set at rest for ever by Abelard himself, who refers to the doctrines of his master Roscelin, from which however he was compelled to dissent⁷.

Under this instructor, Abelard made considerable progress in learning. Logic, however, was his darling study, his ruling taste, his supreme talent; in him the logician was the father of the theologian; logic has conferred upon him all the reputation which he enjoys, and brought upon him all the discredit under which he labours; to it he is indebted for all the splendour of his youth, and all the gloom which hangs over the history of his maturer years⁸. Anxious to exhibit the proficiency which he had made in this polemical study, he wandered from province to province, visiting each school of literary gladiatorship as he went along, and as might have been expected, he soon found himself in Paris.

Paris was at this time the most learned city in Europe. In the affected phraseology of the period it was styled *Cariath-sepher*⁹, which being interpreted means, the City of the Book. About the middle of the twelfth century, the number of students was so great that they could with difficulty find accommodation within its walls, and they are said to have been even more numerous than the citizens¹. The see of Rome itself did not hesitate to consult the University when doubts pressed, as they sometimes did, upon the minds of its infallible Pontiffs. Pope Innocent the Third applied to Peter Lombard, bishop of Paris, for his opinion upon the knotty question of Fraternal Correction². The importance of its various schools may be gathered from merely naming a few of Abelard's contemporaries, who there taught, or were there educated. William de Campellis, one of his earliest tutors there, was soon afterwards promoted to the see of Chalons³. Bandré, archbishop of Dol⁴; Ulger, bishop of Angers⁵; Alberic of Rheims, archbishop of Bourges⁶; Geoffrey de Oratorio, archbishop of Bourdeaux⁷; Walter de Mortagne, bishop of Laon⁸; Peter Lombard and Maurice de Sulli, bishops of Paris⁹; all of whom were the contemporaries of Abelard, had studied in the University of Paris, or in some of the schools connected with it. Michael de Corbeil, dean of St. Denys, then celebrated for the education which it gave, after having refused the patriarchate of Jerusalem¹, was consecrated archbishop of Sens. Bernard de Moellan, bishop of Kimper², had there taught philosophy³. Gilbert Porretanus, another professor, was made bishop of Poitiers⁴. It would be tedious were we to reckon up the names of our own countrymen who crossed the Channel in order to complete their education at Paris; we shall satisfy ourselves with mentioning some of those more distinguished Englishmen who became teachers of logic, philosophy, or theology, within the French capital. Adam de Parvo Ponte, canon of St. Denys, and lecturer there, became bishop of St. Asaph⁵. Robert de Bethune, bishop of Hereford, had taught philosophy at Paris in conjunction with his brother Godfrey⁶. His successor in his chair as well as his see, was Robert de Melun⁷. Baldwin, successively abbot of Ford, bishop of Worcester, and archbishop of Canterbury, wrote a treatise upon mythology for the use of his Parisian scholars⁸. Gilbert, surnamed Universalis, from the extent of his learning, another professor there, was afterwards consecrated bishop of London⁹. Robert Pullus, another countryman of our own, attained such reputation by his lectures, that a cardinal's hat was bestowed upon him, and he is said to be the first Englishman who attained that distinction¹. And the list may be closed with the name of Nicholas Breakspere, who before ascending the papal throne as Adrian the Fourth, had first studied and then taught in the monastery of St. Victor².

The chief attraction of the University of Paris when Abelard first visited it, was the teaching of the celebrated William de Campellis. He received Abelard with kindness, but ere long he discovered that instead of having gained a pupil he had met with a rival. The new student set himself to refute some of his teacher's opinions; he frequently reasoned against him openly, and according to his own statement was generally the victor in these disputations. Here we have the first instance of that annoyance and self-sufficiency which attended him through his whole life³, and we can scarce be surprised to find that from this period he dates the commencement of his misfortunes. Master and scholar could not long continue together upon such a footing, and Abelard settled at Melun, then one of the royal residences, for the purpose of opening a school for philosophy. The result equalled his most sanguine expectations; scholars flocked to him from all quarters; and elated with his success, he resolved to return to Corbeil, near Paris, with the intention of pushing his late master to extremities. While preparing for the renewal of these hostilities, a severe malady, occasioned by intense application to study, compelled him to return to his native air, and to abandon his literary occupations.

When he again visited Paris, after an advance of some years, he was astonished to find that William de Campellis, his former master, had assumed the habit of a canon regular, and was occupied in teaching in the monastery of St. Victor. He ascribes this change to no better motive than the craving for ecclesiastical preferment, and remarks that ere long it was gratified by the attainment of a bishopric. A reconciliation followed, and then, as might have been expected, another quarrel, in which Abelard assures us that he was again victorious. The individual who had succeeded William de Campellis, when he relinquished the schools at Paris for the monastery of St. Victor, resigned this appointment in favour of our young philosopher, and descended from the rank of a teacher to that of a pupil. These statements rest upon Abelard's own authority, and we have no means of testing their accuracy. A contemporary author, however, mentions an incident which should not be here omitted. In the midst of these triumphs, which Abelard assures us he was gaining over a veteran logician, we have good evidence for believing that he sustained a signal defeat from a disputant of his own standing. A youth named Gorwin, afterwards abbot of Auchin, in Flanders, but at that time a student in Paris, shocked at the novelties contained in the propositions advanced by Abelard, challenged him to a discussion, and defeated him⁴. No allusion to this incident is found in the autobiography, whence we have derived most of our information.

That document proceeds to mention various skirmishes between the followers of Abelard and those of William de Campellis; and a pitched battle between the leaders themselves was prevented only by the former being recalled home to arrange his domestic affairs, in consequence of his mother having renounced the world and adopted the monastic profession, thus following the example of her husband Berenger. The attention of the latter was entirely engrossed by his promotion to the bishopric of Chalons sur Marne, which occurred at the same time; and Abelard was left without a rival.

He was not long however in making one, and the circumstances which gave rise to his new disputes, afford another instance of the undisciplined character of his mind. Hitherto he had studied only logic and philosophy; he now wished to make himself acquainted with theology, and for that object he entered the schools of Anselm of Laudun. Anselm's reputation was high, and deservedly so. During the forty years he taught theology he was regarded as the light and the oracle of the Latin Church; he was styled the Doctor of Doctors; and by his instructions were formed the great theologians, not only of France, but of England, Italy, and Germany⁵. In the same sentence in which Abelard tells us that his master was the most celebrated divine of his day, he speaks of him in terms the most disparaging and contemptuous⁶. "This old man," says he, "had gained his reputation rather from unopposed concession than from merit. If you came to consult him upon any doubtful question, you departed more doubting than when you came. They who heard him lecture were astonished, not so they who questioned. He had a considerable flow of language, but the sense which lay under it was contemptible and devoid of reason. When he lit his fire he filled the house with smoke, but produced no light. He was a tree whose foliage promised great things to those who looked upon it from a distance; but when you drew near in search of fruit, you discovered that it was barren. I found upon a more intimate acquaintance, that this was the fig-tree which the Lord had pronounced accursed."

Extreme as these opinions were, Abelard took no pains to conceal them, and they speedily reached the ears of his instructor; but Anselm appears to have treated them with calm dignity, and to have let them pass unnoticed. When his fellow-students remonstrated with him, Abelard persisted in asserting that since Anselm professed only to expound the Scriptures from the writings of the Fathers, less advantage was to be gained from hearing his lectures than from the study of a good commentary. Advancing from one degree of presumption to another, he next affirmed that there was no difficulty in the exposition of Scripture, and he undertook to explain any passage, however obscure: with the intention of convincing him of the absurdity of this theory, his friends referred him to the commencement of the Book of Ezekiel, confessedly one of the most mysterious portions of the whole sacred volume; but nothing abashed, he declared his readiness to explain it, and invited them to attend his lecture on the morrow. In reply to their advice, that he should study the subject before compromising himself, he met them with an avowal which is worth noticing, as giving us an insight into the principle upon which many of his theological opinions were based. It was not his custom, he said, to regard experience, but talent'. When the morning came few attended his lecture, but those whose curiosity led them thither were so struck with the novelty and talent evinced in what they heard, that from that day there was a rapid increase in the number of his auditors. The jealousy of Anselm of Laudun was now roused, and it was not less bitter than that which had formerly been evinced by William de Campellis; a strong party headed by two of Anselm's scholars, Albericus and Lotulfus, was formed against the self-constituted professor, and he was again compelled to take refuge in his former retreat at Paris.

The success of his experiment as a teacher of divinity had been so flattering, that he resumed without delay his exposition of Ezekiel. He became, ere long, as celebrated in this department of literature, as he had been in logic or philosophy. A letter of condolence addressed to him when in the midst of his misfortunes, by Fulcho abbot of Deuil, thus dwells upon the reputation which he had attained at this period of his history. "It is not long," says this well-informed, though perhaps somewhat prejudiced correspondent, "since the full glory of this world shined upon you, and would not permit you to remember that you were liable to misfortune. Rome sent you her children to be educated, and by so doing admitted that you were more learned than herself. No length of journey, no lofty mountains, no deep valleys, no fear of robbers, prevented your scholars from hastening to you. The sea and the tempest did not frighten the youth of England, but despising all danger, no sooner did they hear where you were to be found than they flocked thither. Remote Bretagne sent you her heavy sons to be made wise. Fierce Anjou served you, for you had tamed her ferocity. The Pictavians, the Gascons, and the Irish: Normandy and Flanders, the German and the Swede, warmly praised your mental acuteness. I pass by all the inhabitants of Paris and the whole of France from one end to the other; all thirsted after your instruction, as if you were the only teacher in the world. Won by the brilliancy of your intellect, and the sweetness of your eloquence; the readiness of your diction, and the subtlety of your knowledge, they hastened to you as to the purest well of philosophy⁷."

We have already mentioned that at this time Paris was eminent as a seat of learning; we are compelled to admit that it was not free from those vices which too often attend a highly cultivated state of society. According to the description of a contemporary writer, it contained within all that was calculated to excite the passions and to gratify them⁹. When we read of the University of Paris, and the students who attended it, we naturally imagine that a system of academical discipline similar to our own, or in some degree approaching to it, was there established. Such, however, was not the case. Teachers and students came and tarried, and departed with a degree of independence which to us is surprising. Professors were to be found wherever there was the greatest prospect of success, and scholars flocked after the most popular lecturers. The system of education too, which there prevailed, had not acquired any unity of purpose, any dependence of one part upon another, at the same time having reference to one end and to one object. Logic and philosophy, instead of being the handmaids to theology, were regarded as independent studies, and we read of men who were proficient in the former, while they were mere tyros in the latter¹. The clergy themselves had fallen into a state of much degeneracy, and the more spiritual minded among them called loudly for a reformation. Abelard, probably a sufficient authority upon such matters, warmly censures their luxury, corruption, idleness, and dissipation²; and however much they might differ upon other subjects, in this he and St. Bernard were unanimous³.

The picture which Abelard has drawn of his own mental condition at this period of his life, shows us that he was deficient in many of those qualifications which alone could enable him to pass in safety through the temptations by which he was surrounded. We have already had proofs of his pride and arrogance in reference to his instructors, but these now exhibited themselves in a new and a more dangerous direction. We cannot do better than give a paraphrase of his own words. "I was then so celebrated," says he, "and so pre-eminent in the graces of youth and beauty, that I did not fear a repulse from any woman whom I honoured with my love. I now thought myself the only living philosopher; and anticipating no further disquiet, from having lived most soberly, I began to give the reins to my passions ; and the more progress I made in the study of philosophy or theology, the further did I in the impurity of my life recede from the character of a philosopher or a Christian. The grace of God vouchsafed to me, although I was unwilling to receive it, a remedy for the diseases of pride and dissoluteness under which I then laboured⁴." It is unnecessary to do more than hint at the unfortunate and disgraceful connexion which he now formed with his pupil Heloise, or the hideous revenge which her relations took upon her seducer, notwithstanding the attempt which he made to atone for his crime by marriage ; we pass onwards to narrate the events which followed.

Degraded thus below the rank of manhood, Abelard's sufferings were those of the mind rather than the body. The condolences offered by his friends and pupils were intolerable. His present abasement was in proportion to his former elevation ; he felt that it was God's hand which pressed so heavy upon him ; he knew that he had entailed disgrace upon his relations, and that he could not venture to cross his threshold without being pointed at by the finger of scorn. In this frame of mind he saw one only haven of rest, a monastery ; and influenced rather by shame than devotion⁵, he took refuge within the walls of St. Denys. His ill-fated wife, disregarding the entreaties of her friends, at the same time became a nun at Argenteuil. But they both carried with them memories and feelings for which no monastery afforded any adequate consolation.

Scarce had Abelard recovered his former health and strength, ere his scholars requested that he would resume his lectures. He consented to do so, not however, as hitherto, from the love of worldly gain or reputation, but because he felt that God had given him a talent which must not be hidden in a napkin. The office of teacher did not afford sufficient scope for his awakened energies ; he assumed the character of reformer. He discovered that the monks were of profane habits and unholy conversation, and that their abbot⁶, so far from being a pattern of sobriety, was the most dissolute of the whole brotherhood. Frequently and vehemently, in public and in private, did he rebuke their misdeeds ; and they on their part did not fail to resent the interference of this self-constituted monitor. It must have been a relief to both parties therefore, when, by the permission of the abbot, Abelard removed to a neighbouring cell, that he might more easily instruct the numerous scholars who flocked to his lectures. His success again provoked the hostility of his enemies. Headed by Albericus and Lotulfus, his former persecutors, they matured against him a more systematic and dangerous attack than any to which he had been yet exposed. He had hitherto been censured for his insubordination, his disregard to authority, his want of respect to his elders, his pride, arrogance, and assumption; but the charge now brought against him was, that he was a teacher of heresy.

Two distinct classes of theological reasoners then existed. The more numerous part of the clergy, anxious to make all subservient to the interests of the Church, was willing that her doctrines should be supported by argument as well as authority, without forgetting that in some instances, authority must be more powerful than argument. The other party, better logicians than theologians, although they were not influenced by any direct hostility to the Church, were inclined to follow reason wherever she led them; and where argument and authority appeared to clash, they would, if consistent, have sacrificed the latter to the former. They wished to discuss and to demonstrate the articles of the Christian faith upon the principles of scholastic reasoning, and to apply to all their own system of philosophy. As we have already remarked, Abelard was the representative of the rationalists, as St. Bernard was of their opponents.

We must not imagine, however, that Abelard was the originator of these principles, although they were advocated and matured by him, and he contributed much to their development and extension. We have already seen that he had imbibed them from his master Roscelin; and there were others, his contemporaries, whose orthodoxy was more than questionable. Gilbert Porretanus, bishop of Poitiers, ventured to affirm that the epithets "God" and "Son of God," were applied to our Saviour only by reason of his adoption⁷, and in various other respects had broached doctrines which were justly held to be pernicious novelties. Tanchelin denied that the Sacraments conduced to man's salvation⁸. Even the celebrated Peter Lombard, "the Master of the Sentences," held that our Lord, inasmuch as He was man, was nothing⁹, and was led into other errors by his too great predilection for the authority of Abelard¹. Abelard himself was shocked by the lengths to which some theorists went, and draws a fearful picture of the wild heresies then current, many of which are too blasphemous for translation². Such opinions as these caused much anxiety among the orthodox party, for the influence of their rivals was by no means inconsiderable³. They discouraged all inquiry and speculation with a severity which was perhaps ill-judged, and they saw heresy where it did not exist, or might have been satisfactorily explained, had an explanation been admitted⁴. John of Cornwall, who had been led astray by this philosophy, falsely so called, after his recantation, forbade⁵ his disciples to reason systematically upon such questions as the Trinity, the Incarnation of our Saviour, and the Sacraments; and Stephanus Tornacensis would not even permit a young monk to study at Paris, apprehensive that the peace of his monastery would be disturbed by scholastic controversies⁶ introduced within its walls. Such being the state of feeling between the rival parties, we need not be surprised that Abelard regarded with much anxiety the ecclesiastical proceedings which were now about to be instituted against himself and his doctrines.

An incident occurred on his arrival at Soissons, where the matter was to be discussed, which must have filled Abelard with no small apprehension. The populace arose in a tumult, and had they not been prevented, they would have stoned him to death, as well as the scanty band of admirers who followed him thither. He lost no time in presenting to the papal legate, Conan, bishop of Preneste, a copy of the obnoxious treatise which he had been enjoined to bring with him for examination, and he professed his willingness to correct such of its statements as could be proved to be contrary to the teaching of the Catholic Church. This was delivered to his accusers, who carefully examined it in the legate's presence, but finding in it nothing to censure, they requested that its consideration might be reserved till the end of the meeting, in order that they might have the opportunity of inspecting it more at their leisure. Before each meeting of the council, Abelard from day to day addressed the people; he told them what his opinions really were, and vindicated himself from the accusations under which he laboured. He was not long in convincing his hearers, that he had been misunderstood and calumniated. Towards the conclusion of the meeting, Alberic blandly asked Abelard to explain to him the meaning which he wished to convey in a sentence which he had written upon the generation of the Godhead, the orthodoxy of which appeared to be questionable. Abelard did so, and referred his questioner to a parallel passage in the writings of St. Augustine. Alberic was defeated, and retired full of anger and threats.

On the last day of the council, Abelard's business came under their discussion. While the papal legate, Rodolph, archbishop of Rheims, and his other enemies, hesitated how to proceed, although they were bent on severe measures, Geoffrey, bishop of Chartres, advised them to act with prudence and moderation. He reminded them that among Abelard's numerous admirers there would be no lack of men ready and able to vindicate their master; that the doctrines advanced were not palpably and broadly heretical, and that if they wished to deal with him according to the canon, he should be called in, and have the opportunity of being heard before his condemnation. This advice was rejected, upon the plea that Abelard, if admitted, would overpower the assembly with his sophisms. The friendly bishop then suggested that the heretic should be reconveyed to the monastery of St. Denys, the monks of which might possibly be able to bring him to a saner frame of mind by their learning. The legate and the rest assented to this proposal; and it was about to be carried, when Abelard's personal enemies fearing that he would escape from their hands if permitted to enter another diocese to which their influence did not extend, obtained an important alteration in the sentence. Having been summoned, he was ordered with his own hands to commit the obnoxious treatise to the flames, and to recite the Athanasian Creed; and he was then placed under the custody of the abbot of St. Medard, who was charged to convey him to that monastery.

The abbot and monks of St. Medard treated their unhappy inmate with consideration and humanity, and attempted, but in vain, to lessen the bitterness of his imprisonment. They could not alleviate the mental pangs which he endured, in comparison with which he regarded as nothing his former bodily sufferings. His stay in this abode was of no long duration, for the papal legate, when leaving France on his way homeward, gave orders that Abelard should be permitted to return to the monastery of St. Denys. Here he spent some months in comparative tranquillity, but a circumstance occurred which renewed against him all the former ill-will of the brethren. The monks of St. Denys were sensitive upon all questions connected with the honour of their patron Saint. Whom, in accordance with an early tradition, they affirmed to have been Dionysius the Areopagite mentioned by St. Luke⁷, afterwards Bishop of Athens and the Apostle of Gaul; and they imagined that the safety of the kingdom of France, and the glory of the Gallican Church, depended somehow upon the maintenance of this theory. It happened however, unfortunately for Abelard, that in reading the commentary of the Venerable Beda upon the Acts of the Apostles, he noticed that Dionysius was styled by that writer, not the Bishop of Athens, but the Bishop of Corinth; and he incidentally pointed out the sentence to those persons who happened to be standing near him at the moment. They were so much scandalized by the insinuation, that they called Beda a lying writer, and asked Abelard which of the two accounts he believed. When he answered that he considered Beda's written authority preferable to their tradition, they summoned him before the chapter, and threatened to denounce him to the king as one ill-affected to the glory of the French crown. In vain he requested that he might be judged by the ecclesiastical law; they persisted in threatening him with all the severities of the civil judicature. He was so much alarmed by these menaces, that he stole by night from the monastery, and took refuge in the neighbouring territory of Theobald, Earl of Champagne. By the kindness of this nobleman, with whom he had been previously acquainted, a refuge was afforded him, yet not secure enough to protect him from the enmity of his offended abbot, who threatened him with the extremity of the civil law as well as the ecclesiastical. The death of this individual, which occurred shortly afterwards, relieved him from much anxiety, especially as his successor in the abbey of St. Denys, the well-known Suger, was induced to abandon the prosecution; and Abelard was permitted to select his own place of abode, provided he did not take up his residence within any monastery.

The use which he made of his newly-acquired liberty was singular. He appears to have discovered that the peace which may be found in retirement was more to be desired than the notoriety which was attended by danger. Having obtained the approbation of the bishop of the diocese for the step which he was about to take, he retired with a single companion to a remote and uninhabited spot in the neighbourhood of Nogent sur Seine, upon the river Ardusson, and there built himself a rude oratory of reeds and twigs, which he dedicated to the Holy Trinity. But, ere long, his hiding-place was discovered by his pupils, and they assembled in great numbers round their instructor. They readily exchanged, says he, the city for the wilderness; leaving their spacious houses, they built for themselves mean hovels; they were contented to exchange their beds of down for a couch of straw, and their usual dainty fare for herbs and coarse bread, which they ate from the grass, since they had no other table. The little oratory could not hold the number of the students; and it was quickly replaced by one built of more substantial materials, which Abelard dedicated to the Paraclete, in grateful acknowledgment of the unexpected blessings which had been vouchsafed to him by the God of all consolation. In this unusual title his enemies imagined that they detected proofs of his heresy, and they affirmed that there was no example of a church being dedicated to one single Person of the Trinity. There was probably more ground for censure in an image erected by him in the same church, which was intended to represent and explain the mystery of the Trinity. It was to be expected that such eccentricities as these should bring him once more under the notice of his more steady contemporaries, by whom his movements would naturally be watched with suspicion. He accuses, but without naming them, St. Norbert and St. Bernard as having been the chief instigators of this new persecution. As far as the latter is concerned this is certainly a mistake, for we have the testimony of the Abbot of Clairvaux himself (testimony above all suspicion), for believing that he had paid no attention to Abelard's doctrines until twelve or thirteen years afterwards, when they were brought before his notice by William de St. Thierry⁶. Be that as it may, all Abelard's former apprehensions for his safety were revived, and he imagined that the whole world was banded together for his destruction. He paints his terrors in language which can scarcely be read without a smile, so amusingly do timidity and vanity blend themselves together. He takes God to witness that he could not hear of the meeting of a few ecclesiastics without supposing that it was for his condemnation. He expected to be cited as a profane person or an heretic. He compared himself to St. Athanasius when persecuted by the Arians. He fell into such despair (God's name is again invoked in truth of this statement), that he planned how he might escape from among the Christians, and live among the heathen.

So willing was he to accept any terms from the enemies of Christ, that he rejoiced upon the whole that his faith had been questioned, since this accusation would procure for him a kinder reception among the infidels⁹.

Abelard was prevented from carrying this wicked design into execution by an occurrence which placed him among men who, though monks and Christians, were worse in his opinion than the very heathen themselves. While he was distracted by such fears and anxieties as these, the monastery of St. Gildas de Ruits in Bretagne became vacant by the death of its abbot, and the office having been offered to Abelard, was joyfully accepted by him, yet it was valued only as affording a retreat from the impending tempest. It was his misfortune to discover vice and to experience unkindness wherever he went; but never were monks so wicked, never was abbot so persecuted, as were the monks and the abbot of St. Gildas. The neighbourhood where he now found himself was barren and unpleasant; he was ignorant of the language spoken in the district; the possessions of the monastery were overrun by a neighbouring chieftain, who taxed them to an amount which they were unable to sustain. The monks appropriated to themselves the revenues which were intended for the general purposes of the monastery, and squandered them upon their own pleasures, and then stormed at their abbot because he was unable to meet the necessary expenses of the establishment. Even his life was endangered, for they made several attempts to remove him by poison. In the midst of these persecutions he heard that the nunnery of Argenteuil, of which Heloise was the prioress, was about to be removed, to make room for the monks of St. Denys. He gladly availed himself of the opportunity which this occurrence gave him of visiting his wife; and he removed her, with such of the sisterhood as were inclined to accompany her, to the solitude of the Paraclete. By the permission of Otho, Bishop of Troyes, and Pope Innocent II., the oratory which he had erected was converted into a nunnery, of which Heloise was made the abbess. Abelard's residence among the sisterhood was abridged by the reports which scandal circulated as to the motives which led him thither; and he was unwillingly compelled to exchange this happy retreat for the miseries of the abbey of St. Gildas.

On his return he endeavoured to alleviate his sorrows by detailing them in a long epistle which he addressed to a friend, whose name is now here mentioned¹. This valuable document contains a sketch of his history from his boyhood up to the period at which it was written. Although not without a decided bias in favour of his own prejudices, it exhibits upon the whole much candour, and bears every appearance of truth in its leading features. If he is severe upon those from whom he had experienced unkindness, he certainly does not screen himself, but exposes his own failings and crimes with an unsparing hand. This letter has not only given us the outline of the preceding narrative, but we are further indebted to it for having been the means of originating the correspondence between Abelard and Heloise, which we are now about to introduce to our readers.

A copy of this epistolary narrative having accidentally fallen into the hands of the abbess of the Paraclete, she read it with the most lively interest. Observing towards its conclusion that Abelard considered his life endangered by the violence and the treachery of his monks, she could no longer conceal her anxiety; and though no letters had passed between them since they took the vows, she resolved that she would no longer keep silence, and she wrote to him without delay. In her letter, which is preserved², she chides him affectionately for his persevering silence, and she tells him how great would be her joy could she hear of his welfare. The letter she had just read had pained her much, and she exhorts him by various arguments (backed by authority of Xenophon and Seneca) no longer to keep her in suspense, but to relieve her anxiety by writing. Abelard in his reply³ assures her that his silence had proceeded from no want of affection, but was simply a matter of prudence and expedience. He thanks her for the kindly interest which she had taken in his welfare, and asks for the continuance of her prayers and those of her nuns, to the efficacy of which he attaches much importance. He speaks doubtingly, nay despondingly, as to his own safety, and requests that his body might be interred at his beloved Paraclete if he should fall a victim to the malice of his enemies.

This letter awoke in the bosom of Heloise all the affection which she had so long striven to extinguish. She made haste, under the first impulse of her heart, to assure him that he had undervalued his own worth, and too highly estimated her character; and, with all the unselfishness of a woman, she proceeded to make good her assertion by entering into various details taken from the history of their early acquaintance, through which we cannot follow her. She sees cause for much regret that the punishment due to the crime in which both shared should have fallen upon him alone, and that he should have suffered at the very time when he had made the best atonement in his power for their mutual offence⁴.

In his reply⁵, Abelard traced step by step, and refuted the objections and difficulties which his wife had started. He gently rebukes her for having been overpowered by the mention of his sorrow, adding, that as true friends it was their duty as well as their privilege to support each other through whatever might be their lot to suffer. He reminds her that they both might derive much benefit from the unhappy circumstances in which they were placed; and he exhorts her to abstain for the future from such worse than useless regrets and complaints. He follows her through the recollections to which she had referred him, and from them he deduces arguments why they should feel deep gratitude to God, Who of His mercy had chastened them both in the person of him alone. He admits the justice and mercy of his punishment; he shows her what benefits have already resulted from it; and he teaches her how to derive from it others yet more important.

Heloise had the good sense and the good feeling to profit by these admonitions. In the letter⁶ which immediately follows, we read none of the passionate regrets and complaints with which her former correspondence had abounded. The mind is not always under our own control, she remarks; and when the mind is sad, it will leave traces of its sadness upon every thing around its influence. Instead of adopting a tone which must have agitated herself no less than her husband, she leads his thoughts from the contemplation of their sad history, and interests him in subjects akin to his former tastes and pursuits. She and her nuns have now discovered that they are ignorant upon some questions, and they are anxious to have the benefit of his advice, knowledge, and experience. They wish to know something about the origin and the early history of nuns; and furthermore, as none of the fathers have framed a rule applicable to a nunnery, they request that he would compile one for their sisterhood.

In replying to the former of these questions, the opportunity was afforded Abelard of displaying his erudition, and in the second his wisdom and experience. He availed himself of this opportunity, and he answered both inquiries at considerable length. It is not our intention to follow him through the letters extending over more than one hundred closely printed quarto pages⁷. The scheme, founded upon Heloise's acquaintance with the character of Abelard, succeeded perfectly; he became deeply interested in these investigations, and she wisely resolved that there should be no lack of occupation. Ere long he received a letter, informing him that the nuns of the oratory in their reading had met with many obscure passages of Holy Writ; and he was requested to explain several "hard texts" which were enclosed. Happy in the thought that herein he was imitating St. Jerome, Abelard set himself to the task, and answered the forty-two questions thus proposed for his solution.

With such occupations as these, his wife strove to divert the attention of Abelard from dwelling too intently upon the persecutions from without, and the memories from within, by which she knew him to be assailed. It is obvious that to some extent she succeeded in this office of kindness, but for how long a period, we know not with any degree of accuracy. This, however, is certain, that in the year 1136 (how much sooner we know not) he had abandoned the abbey of St. Gildas, and was again employed in teaching philosophy at Mont St. Genevieve in Paris, with all his accustomed brilliancy and success. In the following year, however, he abandoned this occupation, why, we know not, nor can we ascertain the place where he afterwards resided. But wherever that may have been, he was not idle. He employed himself in the composition of various theological treatises, which were much admired by some, not only from the literary skill which they exhibited, but also from the novelty of the doctrines which they propounded. There were others, however, who regarded them with a less friendly eye, and discovered in them mingled presumption and heresy. One of these was William, abbot of St. Thierry, who deduced from Abelard's writings such propositions as to him appeared the most startling, and despatched copies of them to the most influential ecclesiastics of the age, of whom the most celebrated was St. Bernard, and he accompanied them with a letter requesting that his correspondent would examine them at their leisure⁶.

St. Bernard's answer is marked by that humility which formed such a prominent feature in his character. He had no doubt as to the heresy of these opinions, and he believed them to be highly dangerous; but he was unwilling that any proceedings should be instituted against the offender upon the responsibility of his own private judgment⁷; and he fixed a day upon which they might examine, at their leisure, this obnoxious treatise with the calmness which the deep importance of the subject appeared to demand.

The result of this writing confirmed St. Bernard and his correspondent in the opinion which they had separately and independently formed; but anxious for the welfare of one for whose talents and acquirements they both entertained a high opinion¹, they resolved to seek a private interview with him, that they might, if possible, convince him of his errors. St. Bernard's affectionate remonstrances appear to have produced a considerable impression on their first interview; and Abelard promised that he would be guided by his advice in endeavouring to correct the errors which he had been the means of circulating. If he were sincere in this promise when he made it, his good intentions speedily vanished; for no sooner had his friendly monitor departed, than he was persuaded by some evil counsellors to avow his sentiments openly, to defend them at all hazards². It is not improbable that he was induced to take this step by the influence of Arnold of Brescia, who having been expelled from Italy, had at that time taken refuge in France³.

Disappointed and grieved at this unexpected event, St. Bernard's charity grew not cold. In the presence of two or three witnesses he advised Abelard to recant, and he attempted to dissuade his scholars from reading such treatises as were tainted with heresy. But all his persuasions were ineffectual; for Abelard laid the matter before the Archbishop of Sens, and requested that a council might be summoned to give him the opportunity of defending those doctrines of which the orthodoxy had been assailed by the abbot of Clairvaux. The archbishop consented, and having fixed that the meeting should be holden at Sens upon the octave of the feast of Pentecost, A.D. 1140, he wrote to apprise St. Bernard of this arrangement, and requested him to attend at the day and place appointed⁴.

St. Bernard was not prepared for such an arrangement, and declined to meet Abelard upon such terms as he had proposed. He himself was but a stripling, he said, whereas his adversary had been a man of war from his youth up; he was unwilling that his own powers of reasoning and disputation should be made the test of the truth or falsehood of the articles of the Christian faith; and he asserted that as Abelard's written works contained these questionable doctrines, they should be appealed to, and if necessary, censured by the ecclesiastical authority. He maintained, in the last place, that the dispute was not between individuals, and that he was not personally required to attend, especially as an accuser or a disputant, since the interests of the whole Church were involved⁵. Such were St. Bernard's first impressions; upon more matured deliberation however, he resolved to attend the meeting. At the time appointed, a numerous body of ecclesiastics and nobility assembled at Sens; the king himself was present. The friends of Abelard had already decided that their master would find no difficulty in overcoming a man whose terror was obvious to all. But the result was widely different from what they had anticipated; St. Bernard's manly and honest line of attack completely baffled the more wily Abelard. A series of propositions, extracted from his works, were read before the council, and when he expected to have the opportunity of defending them with all the skill of a sophist, St. Bernard arose, and abruptly required that Abelard (if he admitted that these articles were the fair expression of his opinions) should show that they were consistent with the teaching of antiquity, and that they were not, as had been asserted by his accusers, the inventions of his own reasonings. He felt himself so surprised by this unexpected attack, that instead of replying to the demand, he at once appealed from the council to the Pope, and hurried from the assembly, leaving friends and foes alike astonished at his timidity and irresolution. The council acted with moderation. The judges resolved to separate the errors of Abelard from the individual, and while they condemned the one, to leave the other to the pontiff to whom he had appealed. They instructed St. Bernard to furnish Innocent II. with an account of their proceedings, and they accompanied it with a list of the errors which they had pronounced to be heretical⁶.

Abelard hastened from the assembly to support the appeal which he had made to the court of Rome. He had arrived at Lyons, when the intelligence reached him that the Pope, without awaiting his arrival, had confirmed the decision of the council of Sens, had caused his writings to be burnt, and had issued directions that he and Arnold of Brescia should each be immured for the remainder of their lives in separate monasteries. Overpowered with this accumulation of sorrow, Abelard needed a counsellor and friend, and he found one in the person of Peter the Venerable, then abbot of Cluni. Acting upon his advice, he resolved to resist no longer, but to seek a reconciliation with St. Bernard and the Pope. Supported by the influence of Peter, he was successful in both applications, and the sentence of excommunication which had been pronounced against him was removed. Thus relieved from all further anxiety, the evening of Abelard's eventful life passed away in serenity and peace. Life now had little to offer him, and he had found that which he most needed, a tranquil resting-place in which he might prepare himself for the approach of death.

And death was not long in taking the wearied man to himself. The austerities which he practised upon a frame attenuated by long continued anxieties and labours, induced a fever, to which he fell a victim upon the 21st of April, A.D. 1142, being then in the sixty-third year of his age.

Peter the Venerable hastened to communicate this intelligence to Heloise, and hesitated not to compare the deceased to St. Germain, and St. Martin; the first of whom he resembled in his humility, the latter in his poverty. According to the testimony of this friend, who had ample opportunity of observing the tone of mind in which Abelard passed the evening of his life, his heart was always intent upon sacred things, his lips spoke of them, and they were exhibited in his conduct.

The answer of Heloise was affectionate, yet calm and dignified. She requested that the body of her husband might be transmitted to the Paraclete for interment there, according to his own request; she recommended to his protection her son Astralabe; and she requested him to send an attested copy of the absolution which he had pronounced over the body of Abelard, that it might be affixed to his tomb. Twenty-one years afterwards, on the 17th of May, 1163, the same tomb was again opened to receive the body of Heloise.

The remains of few individuals have undergone more frequent disentombments and reinterments, than those of Abelard and Heloise. We shall notice very briefly such of them as have been mentioned by M. and Mme. Guizot.

The bodies were permitted to repose in peace, until the year 1497, when they were placed in separate tombs, one on each side of the cathedral church of Nogent. In this position they remained until 1630, when Marie de la Rochefoucauld removed them to the chapel of the Trinity, and her successor, Marie de Roncy de la Rochefoucauld, in 1766, erected a new monument to their memory. The epitaph which she caused to be placed over it, was furnished by the Academy of Inscriptions, and is in better taste than the generality of such productions of that period⁷. In 1792, when the decree for the destruction of the French convents was issued, the authorities of Nogent determined upon preserving whatever remained of the bodies of these lovers. They went in procession to the church, they disentombed the relics, and having pronounced a funeral oration over them, placed them in the same grave, but separated from each other by a thin leaden partition.

Under the ministry of Lucien Bonaparte in the year 1800, the remains were transferred to the Jardin du Musée Français, and deposited within a chapel constructed out of the ruins of the Paraclete and the abbey of St. Denys. Upon being opened, the tomb was found to contain a considerable portion of the skull and lower jaw of Abelard, together with some of the ribs, the vertebræ, and the greater part of the thigh and leg bones. Time had spared the skull of Heloise, as were also the bones of the lower extremities. Judging from these remains, it would appear that both Abelard and Heloise were tall and well proportioned.

In 1815 the site of this chapel having been ceded to the Mont de Piété, the relics were once more disturbed, and on the 6th of November, 1817, they were finally deposited in Père Lachaise, where they now remain.

⁷ We therefore transcribe it. IF lying and boasting be fruits and evidences of that spirit of truth and humility which belongs peculiarly to the discipleship of Christ, then, indeed, the claim of the papal system to be Christian, κατ' ἐξοχὴν, must be allowed; but if not, if lying and boasting are fruits and evidences of the spirit of darkness and of pride, then unquestionably Rome is bearing witness against herself by the very deeds and words by which she seeks and hopes to accomplish her victories. To a rightly constituted mind there is something singularly repulsive in the tone and language adopted by the Romanists in their controversial writings; something which clearly indicates that the cause whose battles are fought with such weapons, and its triumphs celebrated in such strains, is not, cannot be, the holy cause of truth. Fraud and falsehood of every shade and description, from the most palpable to the most subtle, run through their representations of the facts of the Reformation, and of the doctrines of the different bodies which in consequence of the religious convulsion of the sixteenth century, have ceased to be in communion with Rome. And while they thus endeavour by the grossest mis-statements, to create a prejudice against every thing that bears the name of reformation, in the minds of the ignorant and unwary; what are the means on which they rely for that restoration of the former ascendancy of the papal system, both here and elsewhere, to which at present all their hopes and energies are directed? Have they recourse to that mighty Apostolic weapon, the persuasive force of truth, the demonstration of the Spirit and of power? Is it with the sword of the Spirit, the Word of God, under the banner of Christ, in reliance upon his intercession, and the assistance of the Holy Ghost sent by Him from the Father, that they go forth conquering and to conquer? No! They invoke, it is true, the aid of a heavenly ally. They announce to the world, that it is by prayers that they mean to bring all the differing communions back to the unity of "the Catholic Church;" but to whom are those prayers directed? by whose intervention are they to be presented before the throne of God? whose powerful influence and irresistible intercession is relied on for their success? The Virgin Mary, a creature,—blessed among women, it is true, but yet a creature, yea, and by Christ's own verdict¹, not blessed above all creatures, but only blessed among them,—she whom, in derogation of the royalty of Christ, the Romish Church has exalted to the dignity of queen of heaven; whom, in disregard of the exclusiveness of the mediatorial office of Christ², she has erected into a mediatrix, ascribing to her an unlimited power, not of influence only, but of command, over her divine Son, and thus making a creature's will, in the place of the eternal will of God, the groundwork of men's salvation,—she, the Virgin Mary it is, by whose invocation the conversion of the world to the faith and obedience, not of Christ, but of Rome, is to be brought about.

A perpetual rejoicing in, a gloating upon iniquity of every kind, characterise the high hopes which the Roman Church has conceived of proximate triumph over all the opposition against which for these three hundred years she has contended in vain. With keen and eager eye she watches the perplexities of nations; with unfeigned delight she hails, with untiring zeal she foment, the elements of civil and religious discord wherever they appear; she agitates with the demagogue for the subversion of the government and constitution of every kingdom which does not own allegiance to her usurped and tyrannical domination; and exultingly she re-echoes the calumnies of the sectarian, the fallacies of the heretic, the ravings of the fanatic, yea, and the blasphemies of the infidel, for the purpose of damaging and neutralizing every testimony to Christ's holy truth, which is independent of her assumed spiritual supremacy, and unadulterated by the errors and corruptions of her system of doctrine and of worship. Not to build up, is her endeavour, but to pull down; not to plant, but to root out; that in the universal desolation she may stand alone upon the earth, the only refuge of the harassed conscience and the distracted mind. It is not by a high and holy hope that she seeks to win the nations, but by a deep and black despair that she hopes to drive them into her fold.

This unhallowed character of Rome's warfare against differing communions does not appear to us to be sufficiently known or properly appreciated; and we think, therefore, that we may render service to the cause of truth, if we present our readers with an analysis of some publications which have recently been put forth by the Romanists, more particularly in relation to our own Church, whose downfall, above all others, is the object of their ambition, and the aim to which their strenuous endeavours are directed. We have arranged them, at the head of this article, in the order of their appearance; but for the purposes of discussion we shall take them according to their subjects; beginning with the one whose scope is more general, the work of Hoeninghaus (No. 3), which the French edition by M. Audin has rendered more accessible and more generally known than it was in its original German garb. This is, in fact, nothing more than a theological cento, composed with much industry and ingenuity, but without much erudition or fairness, though there is a considerable display of both. The German author of the compilation, which appeared about ten years ago, is a Roman Catholic, and not, as is erroneously and boastingly stated by the *Ami de la Religion*³, a Protestant. This evidently appears from the introduction of M. Audin, who describes him as being, "himself a Catholic, constantly saluted in his passage across the regions of Protestantism, by a number of souls, fallen away indeed, yet marked on the forehead with streaks of light;" and speaks of "the homage which by his means the bright luminaries of Protestantism have been made to render to the doctrines, the morality, the discipline, the institutions, and the liturgy of that holy Roman Church in which Hoeninghaus had the good fortune to be born."⁴ To this may be added the conclusive evidence of a passage quoted by M. Audin from Hoeninghaus' own preface: "This book is not written against the Protestants, but against Protestantism; may it bring our erring brethren back to unity"⁵! The title of the German original is, "Result of my wanderings through the domain of Protestant literature, or the necessity of returning to the Catholic Church, demonstrated exclusively by the admissions of Protestant divines and philosophers themselves⁶." The translation is executed, as the title indicates, by two different hands, and as far as we are enabled to judge, in the absence of the German original, in a somewhat loose manner ; so much so, that one and the same passage being quoted more than once, which is not unfrequently the case, appears in different parts of the work in altogether different phraseology. The responsibility of the publication has been assumed by M. Audin, previously known as the author of histories of Luther, Calvin, and Leo X. ; of the two former works, which have gone through several editions, he has also published abridgments for the use of the young, which have received the approbation of several Archbishops and Bishops. M. Audin, whom we may therefore consider as an accredited writer of the Romish communion, gives in his introduction a rapid outline of the argument of Hoeninghaus, preceded by the following grandiloquent remarks :—

"Möhler, the author of the Symbolic, had read the book of Hoeninghaus. We have repeatedly heard him speak of it as of a kind of prodigy of philological erudition ; he used to call it a Benedictine performance.

"He was right ; in the whole field of German literature, fruitful as it has been since the Reformation, there is not a single Protestant of any value whom he has not put under contribution. He has consulted the theologians, the philosophers, the historians, the moralists, and even the poets ; and of all these dissenting writers, dead and living, he has formed a kind of choir, in which all the voices, in unison, sing a canticle to the glory of Catholicism. Upon Catholicism, as it appears in its faith, in its doctrine, in its liturgy, in its discipline, in its fathers, in its doctors, in its pontiffs, in its religious orders, the praises of our separatist brethren are bestowed. Hoeninghaus listens and transcribes every note of this splendid hymn.

"There is no irritating controversy here ; it is simply the beautiful idea of Cicero carried into effect : ' Wonderful power of truth, which is able of itself to resist all the cleverness of human genius⁷. In one word, it is Protestantism arrayed against Protestantism. Hoeninghaus, in those debates, performs the office of reporter. With painful com-

And let there be no mistake ; they are not obscure intelligences which lay open the miseries of the Reformation, but the most glorious organs of the three schools of Wittemberg, Geneva, and Zürich, from Luther, Calvin, and Zwingli to our days."—Introduction, pp. vi. vii.

How far the work itself answers to this high-sounding announcement, we shall now proceed to examine. We are not prepared to say that if it had been possible to collect testimonies from the most distinguished writers of the different Protestant communions, in favour of the leading points controverted between them and the Roman Church, it would not have been, though not a conclusive evidence that Rome has the truth on her side, yet a very great and just cause of triumph to the latter. But in order to make out a case upon this plan, three things would be required:—1. that the extracts should all be taken from such writers as may be considered fair witnesses, the acknowledged representatives of the respective Protestant communions, and impartial chroniclers of their history ; 2. that the passages adduced should have reference to the points on which they are alleged as testimonies ; and 3. that they should be fairly and fully quoted, so as to present a faithful expression of the sentiments of those from whose writings they are taken. To string together detached passages, sometimes consisting of no more than half a sentence from one author, tacked on to another half sentence from another author, without the least regard to the above requirements, is evidently dishonest ; but if it should turn out that the principal part of the extracts are taken from the avowed opponents, and often the virulent revilers of these Protestant communions ; that the passages from the writings of those who might be considered fair witnesses, are comparatively few in number ; and that even those few are, for the most part, garbled quotations, torn out of their context, and cunningly introduced into a context in which they appear to mean the very contrary of what the authors of them really thought and said,—if this should turn out to be the case, then such a compilation of Protestant evidence in favour of Romanism, is nothing more or less than an impudent fraud, a disreputable trickery, such as, we venture to say, no Church but the Church of Rome would demean herself by attempting or abetting.

But our readers shall judge for themselves. The total number of authors quoted by Hoeninghaus is from 380 to 390 ; besides about 70 periodicals ; the sum total of quotations is upwards of 1800, of which about 200 are from periodicals, and the rest from authors whose names are given. Deducting from them the English authors, 70 names, and 180 to 190 quotations, of which more hereafter, there remain, having reference to the Protestant communions of the Continent, upwards of 1400 quotations, taken from more than 300 different authors.

Of these, a very large number are not Church writers at all, but historians, philosophers, poets, dramatists, novel writers, tourists, and the like; and of those who belong properly to the field of theological literature, there are many, of whose characters neither their names, nor the title of their books, nor the passages quoted, enable us to form any opinion. Omitting all these from our calculation, we find that Hoeninghaus has collected his materials in the following proportions: Of the Reformers of the sixteenth century, he adduces in all eleven names, with forty-four quotations; among them, two from Calvin, two from Zwingli, six from Melancthon, and twenty-five from Luther; and nearly one-half of these do not bear in any way upon the doctrinal differences between the Roman Catholics and the Protestants, but exhibit the temper and personal character of the reformers in an unfavourable light. Thus, for instance, Calvin is put into the witness-box, to prove what? That he felt ashamed of the quarrel that took place between the Reformers, and that he thought it would have been a great blessing if Luther had had more command of his temper;—two very important admissions, it must be confessed, which make it as clear as the sun at noonday, that the Roman Church is supreme and infallible, and altogether in the right, and that the Reformation is altogether wrong! Of divines of the orthodox schools (taking the word “orthodox” in the Lutheran and Calvinistic sense), we have counted about twenty names, with about one hundred and thirty quotations; on the contrary, of Neologians, Rationalists, and Ultra-Rationalists, there are at least forty names, and upwards of four hundred citations. To enter into details, with regard to the foreign quotations, would carry us too far, and be scarcely interesting to our readers; a few specimens of the sort of men, and the kind of evidence, which the compiler of this cento presses into his service, may suffice under this head. Inter alia we have a quotation from Kotzebue’s play, “Gepriüfte Liebe” (Tried Love), to the effect that “what is new is always attractive, even though the old be better,” which helps to demonstrate that the Reformation in Germany arose from a mere idle love of novelty. Frederic the Second of Prussia, a great king no doubt, but, we apprehend, a small authority in Church matters, is called to speak to the character of the Jesuits, to state his preference for the Roman ceremonial over the Protestant form of worship, and to give his opinion that neither Luther nor Calvin had any claim to be reckoned among the "fortes têtes." That distinguished Protestant divine, Jean Jacques Rousseau, who is all the better qualified to form an opinion on the subject, as he turned Papist for a little while before he became quite an infidel, supports the necessity of taking the infallible Church of Rome for a guide, in the most startling, not to say conclusive, manner, by maintaining that as the Reformers repudiated the authority of the "Catholic" Church, the "moi individuel" is the only interpreter of Scripture that can be recognized. Dr. Hufeland, the author of the "Macrobiotic" is subpoenaed on behalf of the celibacy of the clergy on physiological grounds; and the celebrated Lessing, who preferred a Jew to a Christian, because he believes less, and an infidel to both, because he believes nothing at all, is called to prove that the Bible is every whit as uncertain as tradition. But the most impudent of all, is the quotation of a passage from the life of Innocent III., by Hurter, whose defection to the Roman Church excited a considerable sensation some time ago in Switzerland, and who is, nevertheless, adduced here in the character of a Protestant witness to the superlative excellency of the Romish Church, to which, he says, "so many souls look up with suppliant eye, as to the rock which rises in the midst of the tempestuous waves."

So much for the evidence of foreign Protestants in support of the Romish Church, her supremacy, her doctrine, and her discipline. Turn we now to the materials which the Anglican Church has furnished for bolstering up the case of Rome, or, as Messrs. Hoeninghaus and Audin would say, proving it by irrefragable evidence, taken out of the mouths of Protestants themselves. Before we do so, however, we must not omit to mention two facts respecting our Church, which Mr. Hoeninghaus states on the authority of foreign writers; not only because they are in themselves conclusive, but because they may chance to be new to some of our readers. The first, for which a Dr. Wendeborn vouches, is, that the clergy in Wales are not unfrequently obliged to gain their livelihood by keeping a beer-shop and playing the fiddle to their customers and parishioners; the second, authenticated by Dr. Niemeyer, and originally resting, it seems, on the evidence of Hogarth's Rake's Progress, that a considerable portion of the prostitutes of London are the daughters of clergymen; which, of course, clearly proves the very great impropriety of allowing the clergy to marry, and beats all the arguments we ever heard, not excepting even those of Mr. Ward, in favour of clerical celibacy.

We do not wish to detract from the credit due to Mr. Hoeninghaus for his industry in disinterring these two statements, for the more accurate information of the English clergy respecting their own condition ; we are the more anxious to give him all the praise which is due to him on this head, because we are afraid we may have occasion to handle him somewhat severely, when once we engage him fairly on English ground. We have already mentioned that the number of English authors quoted in the two volumes before us amounts to seventy, the number of extracts from their writings to 180 or 190. Among these seventy names there are about twenty of which, though we have been at some pains to trace them out, we have not been able to get any certain account, from the imperfect way in which the citations are made, and the obscurity of the writers ; some few are the names of dissenters ; others, again, are historians, lawyers, physicians, and metaphysicians : thus Dr. Robertson, Lord Bacon, and a Mr. Dallas, are brought in as witnesses for the Jesuit order ; Locke furnishes a passage to show, that on the hypothesis of infallibility the Romanist reasons correctly in yielding absolute submission to his Church ; Angel and Saint-worship finds its apology in Dr. Thomas Browne's Religio Medici ; Gibbon proves that one Benedictine convent has done more for literature than Oxford and Cambridge put together ; and what is still more instructive, that the Papacy existed in full force during the first four centuries ; and Hobbes, whose opinion on such a point cannot but have great weight, declares that the succession of the Roman is infinitely preferable to that of the Anglican Church. Occasionally we get a scrap from some speech in or out of parliament. Mr. Canning once expressed his surprise that people who sat by the side of Socinians, should object to the admission of Romanists into parliament ; and Lord Bexley remarked at a meeting of the Reformation Society, that at the very time when the Pope was a prisoner in France, the papal power extended itself in America ; nay, horribile dictu, a Mr. Thomson, at a Bible society meeting, on the 16th of March, 1830, offered to employ the devil himself in the distribution of Bibles ; a strong statement, no doubt, to say nothing of its irreverence, but in our humble opinion, an exceedingly weak argument for Popery. The English missions, without much discrimination between Church and Dissent, come in for a large share of disparaging observation, for which purpose a motley company of naval and military officers, governors, judges, and envoys, are made to contribute their passing remarks, to which are added scraps from the reports of the missionaries themselves ; among them some from the journal of good Bishop Heber, loosely strung together in such a manner as to make the whole of our missionary work appear a total failure.

Having disposed of these extraneous matters, we now approach the phalanx of English divines, whose testimonies in favour of the Romish Church and her system, are marshalled in the course of the two volumes before us. Passing over thirteen names of minor note, to which sixteen insignificant quotations are attached, we come to a publication from which Mr. Hoeninghaus has not only made copious extracts, but from which we suspect that he has collected sundry of his other English quotations. The publication in question, which has furnished no less than twenty-one original shreds towards this famous piece of theological patchwork, is a pamphlet put forth some twenty-five years ago by the worthy vicar of St. Bartholomew the Less, under the title "Reflections concerning the expediency of a Council of the Church of England and the Church of Rome being holden, with a view to accommodate religious differences, and to promote the unity of religion in the bond of peace, humbly but earnestly recommended to the serious attention of His Royal Highness the Prince Regent, the most reverend the Archbishops, the right reverend the Bishops, the reverend the Clergy, and all lay persons who are able and willing dispassionately to consider the important subject." This pamphlet, which in furtherance of the purpose which it was intended to answer, smoothes down the differences between the Roman Church and our own as much as possible, while, at the same time, it bestows a profusion of strictures upon every species of dissent, must have been a perfect treasure to Mr. Hoeninghaus. In justice to Mr. Wix we feel bound to add, that with the exception of two or three passages exculpatory of the saint and angel worship of Rome, of the use of the crucifix as a help to devotion, and of the use of the Latin tongue in public worship, there is not much to find fault with in his statements, so far as they appear in the extracts made from them ; they are generally consistent with the views and principles of the English Church, and tend rather to support ancient Catholic truth, than the errors of the Church of Rome. How far the pamphlet from which these extracts are taken may be entitled to the prominent place among our standard divines, which Mr. Hoeninghaus has assigned to it, his quotations from Mr. Wix's "Reflections" alone being nearly equal in number to those taken from all our standard divines put together, is quite another question, and one which we will not discuss ; but we would recommend Messrs. Hoeninghaus and Audin, in case their book should live to see a second edition, to complete this evidence by the addition of a few passages from the able and learned reply made to Mr. Wix's pamphlet by Dr. Burgess, the bishop of St. David's, under the title "English Reformation and Papal Schism; or, the Grand Schism of the Sixteenth Century in this Country, shown to have been the Separation of the Roman Catholics from the Church of England and Ireland, in a letter to the Right Honourable Lord Kenyon, on Mr. Wix's Plan of Union between the Churches of England and of Rome;" and moreover, we would recommend to them for insertion the extract from Archbishop Wake's letter, in reference to the proposals of Union between the Churches of England and of France, made, in 1718, by Dr. Du Pin, of the Sorbonne, which Mr. Wix transcribes, as setting forth the principle by which in his opinion any council between the Church of England and the Church of Rome should be guided. The extract is as follows:—

"I cannot tell well what to say to Dr. Du Pin. If he thinks we are to take their direction what to retain or what to give up, he is utterly mistaken. I am a friend to peace, but more to truth. And they may depend upon it, I shall always account our Church to stand upon an equal foot with theirs; and that we are no more to receive laws from them, than we desire to impose any upon them. In short, the Church of England is free, is orthodox; she has a plenary authority within herself, and has no need to recur to any other Church to direct her what to retain or what to do. Nor will we, otherwise than in a brotherly way, and in a full equality of right and power, ever consent to have any treaty with that of France. And, therefore, if they mean to deal with us, they must lay down this for the foundation, that we are to deal with one another upon equal terms. If, consistently with our own establishment, we can agree upon a closer union with one another, well: if not, we are as much, and upon as good grounds, a free, independent Church, as they are^a."

But we proceed. The standard divines of the English Church whom Mr. Hoeninghaus alleges as witnesses for Rome against the Reformation, are:—Bishops Patrick (2 quotations), Pearson (2), Andrews (1), Bull (1); Doctors Hammond (4), Waterland (4), Cave (1), Field (1); Herbert Thorndike (5), and Charles Wheatly (1); in all ten names and twenty-two extracts; to which must be added three nonjuring divines, Bishop Hickes (1), Dr. Brett (1), and Jeremy Collier (7). Let us now proceed to examine these quotations in particular. Wherever we have been enabled to trace the passages referred to, which on account of the slovenly manner of quoting adopted by our compiler, is not at all times an easy matter, we shall place the original and the quotation as it appears in M. Audin's book side by side, marking the inaccuracies of the latter by italics.

BISHOP PATRICK, On Tradition, has the following passage, which affords Mr. Hoeninghaus two separate citations:—

“It is a calumny to affirm that the Church of England rejects all tradition, and I hope none of her true children are so ignorant, as when they hear that word, to imagine they must rise up and oppose it. No! the Scripture itself is a tradition; and we admit all other traditions which are subordinate and agreeable unto that; together with all those things which can be proved to be Apostolical by the general testimony of the Church in all ages.”

Can any thing be more impudent than to make Bishop Patrick, on the ground of the above two and a half lines, a witness for tradition in the Romish sense? If Mr. Hoeninghaus has had Bishop Patrick's treatise before him, he can hardly have failed to meet with the following lines, which would have deterred any honest man from meddling further with Bishop Patrick for such a purpose:—

“True tradition is as great a proof against Popery, as it is for Episcopacy. The very foundation of the Pope's empire (which is his succession in St. Peter's supremacy) is utterly subverted by this; the constant tradition of the Church being evidently against it. And, therefore, let us not lose this advantage we have against them, by ignorantly refusing to receive true and constant tradition; which will be so far from leading us into their Church, that it will never suffer us to think of being of it, while it remains so opposite to that which is truly Apostolical¹.”

A passage from BISHOP PEARSON'S Exposition of the Creed, furnishes two quotations, or rather one and the same quotation twice repeated, with some little variety of expression:—

“The necessity of believing the Holy Catholic Church appeareth first in this, that Christ hath appointed it as the only way unto eternal life. We read at the first, that the Lord added daily to the Church such as should be saved; and what was then daily done, hath been done since continually. Christ never appointed two ways to heaven, nor did He build a Church to save some, and make another institution for other men's salvation²."

"Jamais le Christ n'indiqua deux chemins pour aller au ciel; jamais il ne fonda une Église pour le salut des uns, et une autre Église pour le salut des autres." —Vol. ii. p. 290.

"Jamais le Christ n'indiqua deux voies de salut; jamais il ne bâtit deux Églises l'une pour le salut de ceux-ci, l'autre pour le salut de ceux-là." —Vol. ii. p. 306.

Of what church is it that Bishop Pearson thus speaks? Surely not of the Church of Rome, to which Hoeninghaus dishonestly applies his language. Let us hear Bishop Pearson himself explain his meaning, again in a passage not very far distant from that made use of by our compiler:—

"As several Churches (in one city or nation) are reduced to the denomination of one Church, in relation to the single governor of those many Churches, so all the Churches of all cities and all nations in the world may be reduced to the same single denomination in relation to one Supreme Governor of them all, and that one governor is Christ, the bishop of our souls³."

And in a note, after adducing the well-known passage from Saint Cyprian De Unitate, ending in the words:—Hoc erant utique et cæteri Apostoli, quod fuit Petrus, pari consortio præditi, et honoris et potestatis; sed exordium ab unitate proficiscitur, ut Ecclesia una monstretur, Bishop Pearson quotes from Clement Alexandrinus (Stromat. l. vii.) the words, ἐνὸς ὄντος τοῦ Θεοῦ, καὶ ἐνὸς τοῦ Κυρίου, διὰ τοῦτο καὶ τὸ ἅκρως τίμιον κατὰ τὴν μόνωσιν ἐπαινεῖται, μίμημα ὃν ἀρχῆς τῆς μιᾶς, and then adds:

"This is very much to be observed, because that place of St. Cyprian is produced by the Romanists to prove the necessity of one head of the Church upon earth, and to show that the Bishop of Rome is that one head, by virtue of his succession to St. Peter; whereas St. Cyprian speaketh nothing of any such one head, nor of any such succession, but only of the origination of the Church, which was so disposed by Christ, that the unity might be expressed⁴."

The Sermon of BISHOP ANDREWES on the Power of Absolution, furnishes a passage in which the bishop is made to support the Romish sacrament of Penance. The former part of the quotation is not to be found at all in the sermon ; it seems an abstract rather than a quotation, gathering up, far from accurately, the outline of the bishop's argument :—

“ Where God proceedeth by the Church's act, as ordinarily He doth, it being his own ordinance, there, whosoever will be partaker of the Church's act, must be partaker of it by the Apostles' means, there doth remiseritis concur in his own order and place, and there runneth still a correspondence between both. There doth God associate his ministers, and maketh them workers together with Him. There have they their parts in this work, and cannot be excluded, no more in this than in the other acts and parts of their function. And to exclude them, is, after a sort, to wring the keys out of their hands to whom Christ hath given them ; is to cancel and make void this clause of remiseritis, as if it were no part of the sentence ; to account of all the solemn sending and inspiring, as if it were an idle and fruitless ceremony ⁵. ” et, 3. la personne du prêtre dans les mots à qui vous les remettrez. Où l'on désigne trois individus, il en faut trois ; où il en faut trois, deux ne suffisent pas.

Vouloir en exclure le prêtre, ce serait pour ainsi dire arracher les clefs des mains de ceux à qui Jésus-Christ les a données ; effacer les mots à qui vous les remettrez, comme s'ils se trouvaient par mégarde dans l'ordre de Dieu ; ce serait ravaler cette mission et ce pouvoir, et en faire une cérémonie vaine et inutile.”—Vol. i. p. 209.

As little to the purpose, and not much more accurate in its rendering, is the following quotation from BISHOP BULL's Defensio Fidei Nicænæ :—

tianæ, nempe, de personæ Jesu Christi Servatoris nostri dignitate; sitne ille ut verus Deus colendus, an in creaturarum et rerum vero Deo subjectarum ordinem et censum redigendus. Si in hac maximi momenti quæstione toto cælo errasse universos ecclesiæ rectores, erroremque suum plebi Christianæ persuasisse fingamus, quo pacto constabit fides Christi Domini nostri recipientis, se ad consummationem sæculi Apostolis, adeoque eorum successoribus, (nam cum promissio ad consummationem sæculi se extendat, Apostoli autem tamdiu victuri non essent, omnino Christus in Apostolorum persona censendus est etiam successores ejus muneris compellasse) adfuturum⁶?"

" Si l'on suppose que sur un article essentiel de la foi tous les pasteurs de l'Église sont tombés dans l'erreur, et ont pu tromper les âmes chrétiennes; comment défendra-t-on les paroles de Jésus-Christ, qui a promis à ses Apôtres, et par eux à leurs successeurs, d'être toujours au milieu d'eux? promesse fausse si les successeurs des Apôtres avaient pu se tromper ou nous tromper."—Vol. i. p. 159.

Without any comment of ours, we believe, our readers will arrive with us at the conclusion, that Bishop Bull is no more a witness in this passage for the infallibility of the Romish Church, in proof of which it is quoted, than Bishop Andrewes in the preceding passage for the sacrament of Penance.

DR. HAMMOND'S works furnish four quotations, two taken from passages of his work on heresy, one from his Dissertations, and one from his Practical Catechism. The last of them we shall notice in another place; the former are as follows:—

" To this also my concession shall be as liberal as any Romanist can wish, that there are two ways of conveying such revelations to us, one in writing, the other by oral tradition; the former in the Gospels and other writings of the Apostles, and which make up the Sacred Writ or canon of the New Testament; the latter in the Apostles' preachings to all the Churches of their plantations, which are no where set down for us in the Sacred Writ, but conserved as deposita by them to whom they were entrusted. And although in sundry respects the former of these be much the more faithful, steady way of conveyance, and for want thereof many things may possibly have perished, or been changed by their passage through many hands, this much being on these grounds confessed by Bellarmine himself, that the Scripture is the most certain and safe rule of belief; yet there be no less veracity in the tongues than the hands, in the preachings than the writings of the Apostles; nay, Prior sermo quam liber, prior sensus quam stylus, saith Tertullian, the Apostles preached before they writ, planted Churches before they addressed epistles to them.

On these grounds I make no scruple to grant, that Apostolical traditions, such as are truly so, as well as Apostolical writings, are equally the matter of that Christian's belief, who is equally secured by the fidelity of the conveyance, that as one is Apostolic writing, so the other is Apostolic tradition⁷."

"Je n'hésite pas à le proclamer: les traditions Apostoliques sont, comme les écrits des Apôtres, dignes du respect des Chrétiens, assurés par une fidèle transmission, que les écrits et les traditions viennent réellement des Apôtres."—Vol. i. p. 181, latter part of quotation.

Here, to say nothing of the superior degree of confidence which Dr. Hammond claims for Scripture, as compared with tradition, and which Cardinal Bellarmine himself admitted, the sense of the passage, even as far as it is quoted, is manifestly perverted in the translation. Dr. Hammond limits his recognition of Apostolic traditions by a most important qualification, "such as are truly so," and again, "that Christian's belief who is equally secured;" but that qualification altogether vanishes in the translation, in which it is assumed that all so-called Apostolic traditions are really such, and that all Christians have assurance thereof, viz.—by the fidelity of their transmission in the Roman Church, who vouches for them. The next passage furnishes two quotations:—

"Next then the inquiry must proceed by examining what is this equal way of conveyance, common to both these, upon strength of which we become obliged to receive such or such a tradition for Apostolical. And this again is acknowledged to be not by any Divine testimony: for God hath no where affirmed in Divine Writ, that the epistle inscribed of Paul the Apostle to the Romans, consisting of so many periods as now it is in our Bibles, was ever written by that Apostle, nor are there any inward characters or signatures, or beams of light in the writing itself, that can be admitted, or pretended for testimonies of this, any more than the like may exact to be admitted as witnesses, that the Creed called the Apostles' was indeed, in the full sense of it, delivered to the Churches. It remains, then, that herein on both sides we rest content with human testimonies of undoubted authority, or such as there is not any rational motive to distrust, and of which alone the matter is capable⁷."

"Dieu, par exemple, n'a nulle part révélé que l'Épître de l'Apôtre St. Paul, telle qu'elle se trouve aujourd'hui dans nos Bibles, ait réellement été écrite par cet Apôtre. L'Écriture elle-même ne porte pas un caractère irrécusable d'inspiration; est-elle entourée de rayons de lumière, qui en illuminent la preuve et le témoignage?—Vol. i. p. 168.

The passage from Dr. Hammond's "Dissertations" is directed against the Presbyterian allegation that Episcopacy is a corruption, which was introduced into the Church in the very first age after the Apostles. In the connexion in which Hoeninghaus introduces it, and in the form given it by his translation, it is made to appear as an admission of the antiquity and divine right of the Papal hierarchy, instead of being, as it is, a vindication of the Apostolic distinction between the Episcopate and the Presbyterate :

"Si de universâ Christi familiâ (œconomis fidelissimis vixdum e foribus egressis) sic pronuntiandum sit, si de utriusque Testamenti ἀποθήκαις, a quibus (præter alias παραδόσεις) Sacrum Scripturæ Canonem stabilitum et conservatum nos accepisse agnoscimus, hæc et talia censenda sint, habebunt adversarii nostri, unde de Hierarchicis simul et Christianis triumphare possint, unde de disciplinâ, fideque integrâ, unâ mensurandis strage, eodem busto componendis, sibi affatim gratulentur. Quid enim de Scripturarum Canone inter Protestantes ipsosque qui se Evangelicos nuncupant, recepto, de Dicit Dominicæ observatione aut e Scripturâ, vel ex universo antiquitatis penu adversus ἀντιλέγοντας dici potest, quod non multo auctius et cumulatus pro Episcopali dignitate contra paritatis Presbyterianæ assertores dici poterit⁸ ?"

"Il ne nous reste d'autre ressource, que d'accepter de part et d'autre des témoignages humains d'une autorité incontestée, ou des témoignages que le sujet porte avec lui, et que nous ne saurions raisonnablement révoquer en doute."—Vol. i. p. 181, former part of quotation.

⁹ Hammond, Dissert. I. p. 50.

The next divine put under contribution is DR. WATERLAND; to two of the quotations from him we shall presently refer; the other two we subjoin:

“The question is not, whether Scripture and Fathers be equally infallible? all the Fathers together are not so valuable or so credible as any one inspired writer; but it is plainly this, whether the ancient Heretics or Catholics, as they have been distinguished, have been the best interpreters of disputed texts; and whether we are now to close in with the former or with the latter? You would insinuate that you have Scripture, and we, Fathers only; but we insist upon it that we have both; as for many other reasons, so also for this, because both, very probably, went together, and as you certainly want one, so it is extremely probable that you have neither, for this very reason, among many others, because you have not both.”¹

—Vol. i. p. 180.

Dr. Waterland is reasoning against Dr. Clarke's heretical doctrine on the nature and person of Christ; it is with reference to this that he asserts that Scripture and tradition went together, and thence argues, that he who wants either, probably has neither. To quote what he so says on this particular subject, as a general assertion that Scripture and tradition always, or most probably, go together, and to place this pretended recognition of tradition generally as co-ordinate with Scripture, to the credit of the traditions of the Roman Church, imposed by the Creed of Pope Pius IV., deserves again no other name than that of an impudent fraud. The same moral obliquity lurks in the following quotation, in which two distinct passages from Waterland are welded together, suppressing a most important portion of the former, which, had it been inserted, would have nullified the whole as evidence in favour of the Romish doctrine of tradition.

“The admitting such a secondary proof, (i. e. the testimony of tradition or antiquity,) in this case, (i. e. the doctrine of the Trinity,) is not derogating from Scripture authority, but is confirming and strengthening it in more views

than one, as it is accepting the same kind of proof here, which we accept in another case, with respect to the canon of Scripture; and as it is corroborating the Scripture account of the Christian faith with collateral evidences, both to illustrate and enforce it. Not that one would, at this time of day, presume to rest an article of faith upon Church records alone, or upon any thing besides Scripture; but while the superior proof from Sacred Writ is the ground of our faith, the subordinate proof from antiquity may be a good mark of direction for the interpretation of Scripture in the prime doctrines²."

"If it be said, that common Christians at least can reap no benefit from antiquity, nor make any use of it, that will not be reason sufficient for throwing it aside, so long as the learned may. But even common Christians do enjoy the benefit of it, if not at first hand, yet at the second, third, or fourth, and that suffices here, as well as in other cases of a weighty concernment. How do they know, for instance, that Scripture is the word of God? They know it immediately or proximately from their proper guides, or other instructors, who in the last resort learn it from the ancients. So then, ordinary Christians may thus remotely have the use of antiquity (not to mention other nearer ways), with respect to the sense of Scripture, as well as with regard to its authenticity; and their faith may be both strengthened and brightened by this additional reinforcement³."

The quotation from DR. CAVE is as follows:—

"Ce serait une grande folie que de nier, que Saint Pierre ait été à Rome, y ait fondé l'Église et l'ait glorifiée de son sang."—Vol. i. p. 236.

The quotation is one of a series strung together in support of the supremacy of the Pope as the successor of St. Peter; it is canon de l'Écriture Sainte, et en étayant l'Écriture sur la tradition orale. Et si l'on prétend, &c.

"Et si l'on prétend que la masse des Chrétiens ignorants ne tire aucun avantage de la tradition, ou ne peut pas en faire usage, ce n'est pas une raison pour la rejeter tant que les Chrétiens lettrés peuvent en profiter: les ignorants n'ont qu'à gagner à cette transmission orale.

D'où savent-ils, par exemple, que l'Écriture Sainte est la parole de Dieu? Ils le savent ou directement ou indirectement par leurs guides et maîtres qui, en dernière instance, le tiennent des anciens. Ainsi les Chrétiens illettrés peuvent donc profiter de la tradition, puisqu'elle explique le sens de l'Écriture Sainte, ou en confirme l'authenticité."—Vol. i. pp. 181, 182.

given as from “Cave, Vom ersten Christenthum ;” without any further indication of the place, a fashion very usual with Hoeninghaus, and very expedient for one who quotes as he does. We thought of course we should find it in Cave’s “Primitive Christianity,” but after hunting for it in vain, we satisfied ourselves that no such passage existed in that work, and we then bethought ourselves of turning to his Historia Literaria Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, where, under the article S. Petrus, we found, sure enough, the following lines :—

There can be little doubt that the words marked in italics are the materials from which Hoeninghaus manufactured his quotation, improving the text of Cave by rendering “fundatâ ibi Ecclesiâ,” not as every tyro would render it, “having founded a Church there,” but more à la Romaine, “having founded the Church there.” It is hardly necessary to vindicate Dr. Cave from the suspicion of giving the least countenance to the Romish claim of supremacy ; but there are, immediately below the passage quoted, or rather mutilated, by Hoeninghaus, a few lines so very much to the point, that we cannot forbear quoting them in further proof of the fact, how totally against the real evidence of our English divines the evidence is, which he culls from them in support of Rome. The passage from Cave is as follows :—

The next quotation is from DR. FIELD’S work on the Church ; and we cannot set its fraudulent character in a clearer light than by setting down the entire passage from which it is taken :—

“First, I profess before God, men, and angels, that I neither do, nor ever did think the present Roman Church to be the true Church whose communion we are bound to embrace ; but an heretical Church with which we may not communicate. Secondly, I profess in like sort, that though I did, and do acknowledge the Church wherein our fathers lived before Luther's time, to have been the true Church of God in respect of the best, and indeed the principal parts thereof, which held a saving profession of the truth in Christ, (howsoever many, and they greatly prevailing, erred damnably,) yet I never thought it to be that Church in whose judgment we are to rest without any further doubt or question; nor that it was safe to follow the greater part of the guides and rulers of it; but the Church in whose judgment we must absolutely and finally rest, is that whole and entire society of holy ones, which, beginning at Jerusalem, and filling the world, continues unto this day. To refuse the judgment of this Church, or to resist any thing delivered ab omnibus, ubique, semper, in all places, at all times, by all Christian pastors and people, not noted for heresy or singularity, were extreme folly and madness: so that, as I noted in answer to the first chapter out of Waldensis, it is not any particular Church, as the Church of Africa, nor the particular “Grande folie que de s'élever contre des doctrines enseignées ubique, semper, ab omnibus, en tous lieux, et tout temps, et par tous, tant qu'elles n'ont pas été reconnues comme fausses ou opposés à la vérité.”—Vol. i. 182.

Roman Church, but the Universal Church, not gathered together in a general council, which hath sometimes erred, but the whole Catholic Church dispersed through the world, from the baptism of Christ unto our times, which doth undoubtedly hold the true faith and faithful testimony of Jesus, and in whose judgment we must absolutely rest, without any further question or doubting; and hereunto agreeth Vincentius Lirinensis, prescribing this course to be followed in matters questioned, touching faith and religion. If error creep into one part of the Church, we must look unto others that still are sound and pure; if into almost the whole present Church, we must look up higher into former times, and the resolutions of them that have been since the Apostles' times. Thus I hope the reader will easily perceive that this first allegation is frivolous. For I do not think the present Church of Rome to be the true Church of God, whose communion we must embrace, nor that the particular Roman Church, when it was at the best, was that Church, in the judgment whereof we are absolutely to rest; and, therefore, let no man confine himself here without further wading into particular controversies, but let every man, as he tendereth the salvation of his own soul, look to the judgment of other Churches also, and to the resolutions of former times⁷.

Can any thing be more luminous, or more decided, than the canons here laid down for distinguishing between Catholic truth and Romish doctrine? any thing more shameless, than to detach a sentence out of this argument, for the purpose of quoting Dr. Field as a witness for the claim of Rome to settle the standard of the faith for the Catholic world?

We now come to the quotations from THORNDIKE, five in number; the first of them is so pointless that it is not worth noticing; we give it below⁸, as a fair sample of numberless common-places which are inserted in the work of Mr. Hoeninghaus, apparently for no other purpose than to make a parade of the names of the authors from which they are taken. Two others from his epilogues to the law of the Church we have been unable to verify⁹; of the remaining two, one is tacked on to the passage before quoted from Dr. Field on the Church, with a view to lead to the inference that the Roman Church is that visible Church in which alone Catholic doctrine is to be found. The passage of Thorndike is as follows:—

“That article of our creed which professeth one Catholic Church . . . either . . . signifies nothing, or it signifies that God hath founded one visible Church. That is, that He hath obliged all Churches (and all Christians, of whom all Churches consist) to hold visible communion with the whole Church, in the visible offices of God's public service; and, therefore, I am satisfied that the differences upon which we are divided, cannot be justly settled upon any terms, which any part of the whole Church shall have just cause to refuse, as inconsistent with the unity of the whole Church¹.”

How far these views of Thorndike are favourable to the idea that unity is to be restored by conformity to the Church of Rome, will best appear from the following passage, which occurs a little further on in the same treatise:—

“I confess I am convicted, that as things stand, we are not to expect any reason from the Church of Rome, and those who hold communion with it, in restoring the unity of the Church, upon such laws, as shall render the means of salvation visible to all that use them as they ought. And this, and only this, I hold to be the due ground, upon which we are enabled to provide an establishment of unity in religion among ourselves (as heretofore a reformation in religion for ourselves), without concurrence of the whole ²."

⁹ We take this opportunity of recording our regret that the library of the British Museum should be as incomplete as it is in the department of English Theological Literature. In a National Collection of this kind, surely none of the works of the leading English divines, none of the writings that have been put forth in the various controversies which have agitated the National Church at different times, should be wanting. We cannot forbear expressing a hope, that a portion of the sums recently voted by parliament will be appropriated with a view to remedy this deficiency.

The other quotation from Thorndike which we have been enabled to verify is this:—

"Ne souffrons pas que ceux qui traitent le Pape d'Antechrist et qui accusent les Catholiques d'idolâtrie, mènent le peuple par le nez, et lui fassent croire qu'ils sont en état de fournir la preuve de leur accusation, ce qui leur est tout-à-fait impossible."—Vol. i. p. 270.

This is not, properly speaking, a quotation at all, but an abstract, à la Hoeninghaus, of the commencement and the close of the section of Thorndike's "just weights and measures," entitled, "What we get by the charge of Idolatry and Antichrist," in which Thorndike insists on the inexpediency and the danger of producing arguments against Rome which cannot be substantiated; for, he says, "when a novice grounded upon this supposition" (i. e. the charge of idolatry and antichrist), "is forced from his ground upon remonstrance of such reasons, how ready is he to fall into the snare of the missionaries ³." Indeed, throughout the whole treatise, Thorndike shows by the most powerful arguments, that it is not only unlawful, but impossible to hold Catholic communion with the Church of Rome.

The quotation from WHEATLY is taken from the section of his "Rational Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer," entitled "A prayer of Oblation proper to be added after the prayer of Consecration;" in which he expresses his regret at the transposition of that prayer from its original place to the post-communion office, in the terms following:—

"Upon the exceptions of Bucer these manual representations" (i. e. the laying of the hand upon the bread and the cup) "shared the same fate with the above-mentioned petition for the Descent of the Holy Ghost, being left out of king Edward's second common prayer-book, and not restored again till after the Restoration; except in the Scotch common prayer, where the same order is renewed, in which also is inserted the prayer of oblation, which by the first liturgy of king Edward is ordered to be said immediately after the prayer of consecration. Great part of this prayer, indeed, we have still in our liturgy, though thrown, I think, into an improper place, being enjoined to be said by our present rubrick in that part of the office which is to be used after the people have communicated. Whereas it was always the practice of the Primitive Christians to use it as soon as the elements were consecrated. For the Holy Eucharist was, from the very first institution, esteemed and received as a proper sacrifice, and solemnly offered to God upon the altar before it was received and partaken of by the communicants. In conformity whereunto it was Bishop Overall's practice, to use the first prayer in the post-communion office between the consecration and the administering, even when it was otherwise ordered by the public liturgy⁴."

"Le Saint Sacrement de la Cène fut, dès son institution, regardé et reçu comme un sacrifice, et offert solennellement à Dieu sur l'autel, avant d'être présenté aux communicants."—Vol. i. p. 189.

It is needless to observe, that whatever might be Wheatly's views on the undesirableness of the change in our liturgy, here adverted to, he neither himself held, nor affirmed the ancients to have held, the Holy Eucharist to be a sacrifice in that sense which is taught by the Roman Church in her doctrine of the sacrifice of the mass, which is the doctrine for which Hoeninghaus attempts by the above extract to make Wheatly a witness.

As we have already been carried considerably beyond the limits which we had proposed to ourselves, in this examination of the quotations of Hoeninghaus from our English divines, we shall pass over the quotations from the three nonjuring divines. With the exception of one passage from Collier's argument for restoring the prayers for the dead in the communion office, and another in which he condemns the conduct and spirit of Knox and Calvin, they are of a similar tendency with the quotations from Bishop Patrick, from Hammond, Waterland, and Field, on the use of Christian antiquity. We shall, however, make an exception in favour of one quotation (properly speaking, three,) from Collier, as it happens to form part of a catena, which is intended to show by the evidence of our own divines, that we are bound to return to Rome, and which may serve as a sample of the manner in which different authors and extracts are incorporated together by Hoeninghaus:—

"I desire to know what authority any particular society of Christians of the sixteenth century had to desert from the custom of the Universal Church, from early and more enlightened ages, and which, as our author observes, were better guides, as being much nearer the fountain's head, than those so long behind them⁵.

“It was a maxim with Luther and his adherents, to resign to nothing but a text of Scripture, of which themselves were to be the expositors. The Bible was God's, but the comment was their own. As for antiquity, they had no regard for it⁶.”

“I should rather suggest a preference for Justin Martyr and Irenæus, for the Christians in Tertullian, for S. Cyprian, for Arnobius, &c. These shining lights were better judges of *the matters now in debate*⁷. They prayed for, honoured and obeyed even heathen princes; and being pure and peaceable, were much more likely to be directed by the wisdom from above⁸. I say, I should rather suggest a preference for those primitive non-resisting fathers, than resign to the novelties of the sixteenth century, and be governed by the tenets of those men, who, in several countries, turned the world upside down, and pressed their reformation with fire and sword. In short, to give these moderns a superiority of sense, a deeper penetration, and a more guarding conscience, than the fa-

Luther et ses partisans établirent pour maxime de n'admettre d'autre autorité en matière de croyance, que celle d'un texte de l'Écriture Sainte, dont ils se disaient les interprètes. La Bible appartenait à Dieu, mais l'interprétation du texte n'appartenait qu'à eux seuls! Quant à l'autorité de l'antiquité, ils n'y faisaient aucune attention. Je pense, moi, qu'il faut s'attacher de préférence à Justin le Martyr, à Irénée, à Tertullien, à Saint Cyprien, à Arnobe, et autres. Ces lumières brillantes de l'Église sont de meilleures autorités pour décider des questions controversées de notre temps.

⁸ It is obvious why this passage is omitted. It stands ill with the Romish supremacy over Christian princes.

thers of the second, third, and fourth centuries, to make them thus an overbalance to antiquity, is to have a mean opinion of those learned apologists, of the spirit of martyrdom and the flower of mankind. To do this, is in effect to affirm that the river runs clearest at the greatest distance from the springhead, and that truth is best discovered when supernatural light is withdrawn, and the assistance of heaven least visible⁹."

"Whether the Church, after the Apostles, was as infallible as the Apostles themselves, is quite another question. We think it very unlikely that the Apostolic Church should not know the mind of the Apostles; or should suddenly vary from it in any matter of moment. We look upon it as highly improbable that the faith of those Churches should so soon run counter to any thing in Scripture; since they had the best opportunities of knowing what Scripture meant; were made up of wise and good men, men who would sooner die than commit any error in that kind wilfully. Upon this, we believe the concurring judgment of antiquity to be, though not infallible, yet the safest comment upon Scripture; and to have much more weight in it, than there generally is in wit and criticism; and therefore not to be rejected, where the words of Scripture will, with any propriety, bear that interpretation¹."

"It is not at all likely, that any whole Church of those early times

sième et quatrième siècles, prouverait à mon avis, quel'on a une bien faible opinion de ces savants apologistes et de tous ces martyrs de la foi véritable et de la religion de Jésus-Christ, et modèles du genre humain.

Nous regardons comme invraisemblable que les Églises Apostoliques n'aient pas connu l'enseignement des Apôtres, et que dans des questions importantes elles se soient écartées tout-à-coup de la doctrine Apostolique. Il nous paraît aussi peu vraisemblable que la croyance de ces églises se soit mise dans un point quelconque en hostilité avec l'Écriture Sainte, puisqu'elles avaient un infallible moyen de connaître le véritable sens d'un texte, composées qu'elles étaient d'hommes purs et sages qui auraient préféré mourir, plutôt que de commettre sciemment une erreur de cette espèce. L'accord des Églises, &c.

⁹ Idem, ibid. pp. 165, 166. The omission of the last lines of the paragraph is again easily accounted for; they are inconsistent with the claim to infallibility and the miracle-mongery of modern Rome, and with the many changes she has in the course of her "development" introduced into the doctrine and discipline of the Church.

should vary from Apostolical doctrine in things of moment ; but it is, morally speaking, absurd to imagine, that all the Churches should combine in the same error, and conspire together to corrupt the doctrine of Christ. This is the argument which Irenæus and Tertullian insist much upon, and triumph in, over the heretics of their times ; and it is obliquely glanced upon by Hegesippus and Clemens Alexandrinus of the same second century, and by Origen also of the third. The argument was undoubtedly true and just, as it then stood, while there were no breaks in the succession of doctrine, but a perfect unanimity of the Churches all along, in the prime articles ; though afterwards the force of this argument came to be obscured, and almost lost, by taking in things foreign to it, and blending it with what happened in later times. The force of it could last no longer than such unanimity lasted. I say, *while the Churches were all unanimous*² in the main things (as they were in Irenæus' time, and Tertullian's, and for more than a century after), that very unanimity was a presumptive argument that their faith was right, derived down to them from the Apostles themselves. For it *was highly unreasonable to suppose, that these several Churches, very distinct from each other in place, and of different languages, and under no common visible head*³, should all unite in the same errors, and deviate uniformly from their rule at once. But that they should all agree in the same common faith, might easily be accounted for, as arising from the same common cause, which could be no other than the common delivery of the same uniform faith and *doctrine to all the Churches*⁴ by the Apostles themselves. Such unanimity could never come by chance, but must be derived from one common source ; and therefore the harmony of their doctrine

L'accord des Églises sur les points d'importance du temps d'Irénée et de Tertullien, et encore plus d'un siècle après ; cet accord est la preuve que leur foi était la véritable, et qu'elles la tenaient des Apôtres mêmes. Car il serait insensé d'admettre que des Églises, séparées entre elles par de grandes distances, et parlant diverses langues, ne se fussent entendues que pour tomber dans l'erreur, et abandonner, toutes à la fois, la voie primitive ; au contraire, cette unité des croyances s'explique comme effet d'une cause qui n'est autre que la tradition continue d'une dogmatique uniforme et d'une symbolique transmises par les Apôtres mêmes. Un tel accord ne saurait être l'effet du hasard, il découle forcément d'une Source commune. Cette unité est déjà une forte preuve en faveur de la vérité de ces doctrines.

trine; and if for my doing so I fall under persecution of the rulers of that particular Church, meekness then requires me patiently to endure it, but in no case to subscribe to, or act any thing which is contrary to this Catholic doctrine⁷."

What an accumulation of mutilations and distortions of the sense of the authors quoted, does this connected passage present! the whole being appropriately wound up by a quotation, which, in its integrity, is in fact a direction to endure persecution rather than conform to the Roman Church, and which is wrested into an exhortation to return as speedily as possible to the unity of the Church in the Romish fold. Yet this is a fair sample of M. Hoeninghaus' entire performance, of that which M. Audin blushes not to describe as "a canticle to the glory of Catholicism, sung in unison by the voices of the Protestants!!" We cannot better express our judgment and our feeling upon this piece of literary and theological imposture, than by transcribing the observations made by Dr. Waterland, on the allegation by Dr. Clarke, of certain so-called "concessions" of the fathers, by which he sought to give countenance to his Arian errors.

"It should be considered that the moral obliquity and turpitude of misquoting or misrepresenting authors consists in this; that it is a means to deceive the simple, to surprise the unwary and unlearned (who must or will receive things upon trust); it is taking advantage of the blind side of human nature, laying a snare for such readers (perhaps ninety-nine in a hundred) as read not with due care and thought. I do not see but this very method of the doctor's (though he has endeavoured to lessen the scandal of it⁸) is big with all this mischief. He has indeed given notice; and wise men and scholars would have been secure enough without it; others will not be so with it; and therefore he is still to take advantage of the ignorance of one, the partiality of another, the forgetfulness of a third, the credulity, simplicity, haste and inadvertency of as many as come unprepared and unfurnished to the reading of his citations. The thing itself, you may perceive, is equally mischievous, however gilded over with specious pretences. And there is no more in it than this; misrepresentation practised, and, at the same time, seemingly defended; and (though the learned doctor does not perceive it) it is really nothing else but contriving a way how to reconcile (if possible) a good name and an ill thing together.

"It might be of ill example, should this method of citing authors (never before used by good and great men) grow into vogue. A Romanist, for instance, might, in this way, undertake to defend some of the Romish tenets. It would be easy for him to make a numerous collection of testimonies from the fathers⁹; and as much to the purpose as the doctor's collection is. Two inconveniences he might foresee; one to his own character, upon discovery; the other to his cause, because his own citations might be turned against him. To obviate the former, he might declare beforehand, that he did not cite places out of these authors so much to show what was the opinion of the writers themselves, as to show how naturally truths sometimes prevails by its own native clearness¹: and to obviate the latter he might say, he alleged the testimonies, not as proofs, but as illustrations only. Thus the writer might seem to come off pretty handsomely; but in the meanwhile the unlearned and unthinking might be led aside by the fair show of authorities; and all the remedy left for them is, Si populus vult decipi, decipiatur. These are my present sentiments of the nature and tendency of this new and extraordinary method of citing; which, however, I shall be very glad to alter if I see any good reason for it. To me it seems that it ought never to be practised, though to serve the best cause in the world²."

It is but fair, however, to state, that Mr. Hoeninghaus has not proceeded with the same "moral obliquity and turpitude" in all his quotations from the field of English theological literature. There are two "Fathers" of the English Church, whom he treats with all due respect, whose thoughts he reproduces with the utmost fidelity as regards both the letter and the spirit of their writings. And who are they? our readers will ask naturally enough. The first of them we will introduce to them in the language of a Romanist writer, who professes to have good authority for the statements he makes.

"The edition of the letters of Atticus, which was published in London, does not bear the author's name, but we know with certainty that they were written by LORD FITZ-WILLIAM, whom we must be careful to distinguish from Earl Fitzwilliam. A native of Ireland, where he had very large estates, he expended six thousand pounds sterling in building, in a parish of his domains, a Catholic Church, and took a pleasure in superintending the labours of the workmen. A vast store of information, with agreeable manners, joined with a noble affability, gave a wonderful charm to his conversation. He had travelled much, and during a long abode in France, had familiarized himself with our language, so as to write it with a correctness and an elegance rarely attained by foreigners. He spoke with enthusiasm of Pius the VIth, whom he had known intimately at Rome. When he published the letters of Atticus, he sent copies of them to Louis XVIIIth, and to all the French bishops then residing in England³. A respectable ecclesiastic who has furnished us with these particulars, said to him one day, while walking with him in his park at Richmond: 'My lord, one would never suppose that a Protestant could have spoken as you have done of the Roman Catholic religion.' He replied: 'God knows all.' We know not what motives prevented a man of a mind so just, of a character so upright, from returning to the bosom of that Church, to which he has paid so magnificent a homage. There are strange secrets at the bottom of the human heart. Externally a Protestant, Lord Fitzwilliam died in London of a stroke of apoplexy⁴."

The disparaging language in which this Lord Fitzwilliam, acknowledged by his Romanist encomiast to have been a Protestant only externally, speaks of the Protestant faith, and the extravagant praises which he bestows upon the Roman Church, Mr. Hoeninghaus blushes not to adduce on nine several occasions as Protestant evidence. But this is a mere trifle. Who, do our readers imagine, the other Protestant witness is, whose evidence Mr. Hoeninghaus reproduces in its integrity? No other than that profound divine and eminent saint, WILLIAM COBBETT! While the great luminaries of our Church, the extracts from whose works we have examined, do not, all of them put together, furnish quite six pages of quotations, William Cobbett, the foul-mouthed reviler of the English Church, furnishes by himself alone upwards of thirty pages. We should like to know what the Romanists would say if a Protestant were to collect passages against their Church from the writings of Voltaire, and offer them to the world as the testimonies of a Roman Catholic witness. And yet that would be a much fairer proceeding than the allegation of the ignorant ravings of Cobbett against the English Church; for Voltaire was the pupil of the Jesuits, and lived and died in the communion of the Roman Church, to whose sacraments he was constantly admitted; which is more, we apprehend, than can be predicated of the author of the "History of the Protestant Reformation in England and Ireland."

But enough of Messrs. Hoeninghaus and Audin, and of their ignorant and fraudulent compilation. Let us see what another Romish writer, Mr. Joseph F. P. (No. 1), whose performance, small in size, but great in pretension, is meant for the information of the people at large, has to say to our Church. The plan of this little compendium of confessional differences is to place, side by side, in successive chapters, the Roman Catholic and the Protestant institutions and doctrines. Thus, in chap. i., we learn, that before His reascension into heaven, Christ “founded His Church, to which He committed the treasure of the sacraments, and the deposit of His holy Gospel, and over which He appointed Peter as the visible head.” This Church, which has the promise of indefectibility, says Mr. F. P. drily, “is the Roman Church.” Then in chap. ii., which treats of the origin and establishment of the Protestant religion, we learn, in the first place, that a man of indomitable pride, Martin Luther, an Augustinian monk, being hurt because Pope Leo X. had committed the preaching of indulgences to the Dominicans, to the exclusion of his order, declaimed both against Dominicans and indulgences; and after having caused the most crying disorders, and the most grievous scandals, by the absurd and contradictory errors which he preached, “filled up the measure of his iniquity by seducing a nun, Catherine de Bora, whom afterwards he married publicly;” and secondly, we are informed that “John Calvin, a native of Noyon, who had been forced to quit that town, after having been branded on the shoulder in punishment for his infamous crimes, became, with shameless effrontery, the partizan of the pretended reformation of the Protestants⁵.” This account of the origin of Protestantism is followed, in the next chapter, by an enumeration of the Protestant communions; they are: “Rigid, mitigated, and relaxed Lutherans, Millenarians, Infernals, Sacramentarians, Zwinglians, &c. &c.; Clancularians, Libertines, Independents, Polygamists, Quakers, Calvinists, Anglicans, &c.” Though last in this curious catalogue, the “religion Anglicane” is, as the title indicates, made the subject of a special diatribe by our author. As might be expected, we have here an edifying abridgment of the history of the English Reformation, which is placed wholly to the account of the evil propensities of Henry VIII. At the close of his reign the author exclaims:—

“Thus was the pillar of the truth overthrown and broken to pieces, thus was the torch of faith extinguished, in England, by the infamous passion of a king who had six wives in succession, two of which had their heads cut off by his command.”—p. 243.

Under the reign of Edward VI., called by mistake Edward IV., and the primacy of Cranmer, we are told that each in his own way. Pure Lutheranism, the doctrine of Zwingli, and the impieties of the Anabaptists, were taught. The Parliament, in order to content all the innovators, took from every sect a certain number of observances and doctrines, and out of these manufactured the Anglican religion."—p. 245.

“A host of preachers, both English and foreign, laid down the faith,

⁵ The allusion is to the foul and long-exploded calumny of Bolsec, which in another part of the volume is reproduced totidem verbis, p. 38.

After an expression of regret at the shortness of Mary's reign, "whose first reforms promised a happy future to the English Church," the author passes on to that of Elizabeth, and thus describes the settlement of the Reformed Church:

"Elizabeth, as a matter of fact, usurped the rights and privileges of the Papacy; she made herself a Papess, and she exercised the Papal functions with a boldness hitherto unheard of; she nominated, instituted, and deposed bishops; she presided over the synods convoked by herself; she abolished the sacrifice of the mass, all the ancient rites of the divine office, and of the administration of the sacraments, in order to substitute for them new ceremonies and new observances. The bishops, and generally speaking all who protested against these scandalous upturnings, were persecuted during this deplorable reign. Does not this narrative alone rouse the indignation of every righteous soul? Elizabeth instituted bishops and pastors of her sect, framing for herself a hierarchy of archbishops, bishops, priests, and deacons, in order not to confound herself with the other sects."—p. 247.

Among the further charges brought against our Church, are the removal of several books from the Bible, by act of Parliament; the insertion of numerous errors into the symbol; the alteration of the canonical form of conferring holy orders, so as to render (independently of the question of Archbishop Parker's consecration) our ordinations invalid, and the consequent extinction of the Episcopate and Presbyterate; and above all, it is alleged that "the power of reforming and correcting all errors, heresies, and abuses, of prescribing the formularies of worship and of ordination, is committed to female hands" (p. 254). The whole is wound up with an expression of pity for so many "unfortunates," whom

"Their prejudices, their passions, and their interests, retain in error; their prejudices, because the Catholic religion is known to most English people only in the black colours under which it is represented to them; their passions, because it is so painful to submit to the laws of the Roman church, after a comfortable life, such as the pretended Reformation authorises; their interests, because it is well known with what rich benefices or incomes the English ministers are endowed⁶, and what

heavy fees they receive for baptisms, marriages, and burials, to the payment of which all the English, without distinction of creed, are liable."—p. 255.

Still, in spite of "our prejudices, our passions, and our interests," the author does not despair of us; far from it.

"The edifice of the Anglican religion," he says, "seems to totter on its basis; the elements which compose it are approaching their dissolution. The temporal power which understands that it cannot conscientiously enjoy the spiritual privileges which it has unjustly arrogated to itself, relaxes its hold upon the rights taken by usurpation from the true Church; it grants the Catholics more liberty, and acts conformably to its own true interest; for the sectarians of Protestantism are on principle less docile and more troublesome than the Catholics. The English government would, therefore, find in a general return to Catholicism a new guarantee for its security. This return is insensibly going forward. Conversions in England are frequent, and striking examples occur even in the upper classes'. This is a happy omen for the future. Any favourable circumstance may in a few years bring all England back to the bosom of the Catholic Church; let us pray for the advent of that happy day."—pp. 298, 299.'

After the specimens which we have given of the qualifications of our author for enlightening the public mind of France on the state and constitution of our Church, both in point of information and of veracity, we have no doubt they will readily excuse us from following M. Joseph F. P. into the details of his arguments, or entering upon a refutation of his statements; and we will therefore dismiss him in his own words to a Protestant writer, probably M. Roussel, the author of the pamphlet, "La Religion d'argent," who is politely designated as "l'auteur éhonté d'un infame libelle contre la papauté." It would be doing too much honour to this writer,—but no! we will not spoil the compliment by translating it, he shall have it in his own nervous style, and his native tongue—Ce serait faire trop d'honneur à cet écrivain que de relever ses bévues historiques, ses mensonges, ses grossières et rebutantes injures.

Let us now turn to the most vociferous of the ἀλαζόνες στρατιῶται of the Romish camp, whose note of triumph, recently equally among all the clergy, every bishop and every pastor would receive 21,850 francs (874*l.*) per annum. Yet these clergy, like all the Protestant ministers, have no masses to read, no confessions to hear, no children to catechise, no sick to confess or minister to. What then, have they to do? to read the Bible, and a few prayers, once in every seven days."—p. 217.

sounded, has directed our attention to this department of the ultramontane literature of France, M. Jules Gondon, the author of Nos. 2 and 4 at the head of this article. M. Gondon is, as our readers are no doubt aware, one of the editors of the Univers; he has, as he himself tells us, kept his eye upon the movement in our Church, generally designated by the term Tractarian, ever since 1838, and has repeatedly visited England, with a view to make himself better acquainted with the state of things amongst us.

“In 1842,” he says, “we visited the University of Oxford, and we had every reason to be pleased with the cordial reception and the courteous hospitality which we met with at the hands of some of its members, and among others of the celebrated Dr. Pusey, and of his learned and pious friend, the Rev. Mr. Newman.”—Mouvement religieux, préface, p. viii.

The result of the observations which M. Gondon thus made, he communicated to the world in 1844, in a good sized octavo volume, under the title, Du Mouvement religieux en Angleterre, ou les Progrès du Catholicisme, et le Retour de l'Eglise Anglicane à l'Unité: par un Catholique; in the first instance, he published it anonymously, but he has since avowed himself to be the author. In justice to M. Gondon we desire at once to acknowledge that his performance differs materially from those which have hitherto occupied our attention. There is none of that gross ignorance respecting the character, the principles, and the position of our Church; none of that vulgar contempt and low abuse, which in their ignorance, Messrs. Hoeninghaus, Audin, and Joseph F. P., bestow upon her. Indeed, it is evident that his object was rather to conciliate that party in our Church, on whose Romanizing tendencies the big hopes he has conceived of her reunion with Rome are founded, though he has evidently overrated and exaggerated its strength and importance. Yet, although he speaks of our Church in a more respectful tone, he cannot suppress either the bitterness of Romish hatred against her, or the vain-glorious expectations which he entertains of Rome's speedy triumph over her; and often his language is all the more hostile and insulting, because he knows he has to do with an adversary of great power and high character.

But we will, without further preface, introduce M. Gondon to our readers. He is a thorough-going Romanist; and in recording his estimate of the character of his Church, he produces what, speaking of the evidence of some of M. Hoeninghaus's witnesses,

M. Audin, with great naïveté calls des pages ravissantes de poétique impartialité. He gives to the Roman Church the palm even of intellectual superiority :

“While the North was making way for all sorts of heresies, the Southern nations, whose good sense disposes at once of ridiculous and impracticable systems, instinctively repelled Protestantism, from an innate aversion for whatever is not rational.”—Introd. p. xii.

We were not, we confess, prepared to hear the Roman system recommended on the ground of its “rationality,” but we were still more surprised at another statement of M. Gondon’s which is directly opposed to all that has hitherto been considered the historical experience of the world. The impression which certainly has gone forth, that the Roman Church is inimical to freedom, is, it appears, quite erroneous ; and not only so, but the Protestant trickery which produced that impression is exploded, and “now-a-days, that calumnies have passed away, and the truth remains, it is very well ascertained, not only that the Church has always associated herself with the independence of the nations, and with the mental efforts of bold thinkers, but that she is moreover the mother of freedom and nationality. Poland, Belgium, and Ireland, might be quoted in evidence of this. There are revolutions and agitations which are nothing else but the development of the doctrine of peace and union propounded by the Author of our faith.”—Introd. pp. xii. xiii.

If we remember right, the Romish Church was, and where she has the opportunity, is to this day, the strenuous supporter of civil despotism, whose iron arm she is uncommonly fond of setting in action for the forcible suppression of the faintest breath of opposition against herself ; but, to be sure, in countries in which the civil power is not subservient to her, where she hopes to be the gainer by the overthrow of the established government, and the subversion of social order, she can and does turn demagogue. We will not, therefore, cavil at M. Gondon’s statement any further ; the less so, as he seems himself to imply, that the liberalism of the Romish Church is rather a new feature in her character.

“Christianity has reached one of the solemn epochs of its existence. St. Augustine has said after St. Paul : ‘There must be heresies, in order that the truth may develop itself’.” Up to the sixteenth century it was the business of the councils to aid this development in fortifying men's consciences against error. But now that the political revolutions have changed the external position of Christianity, the Church proceeds differently. Rome has suffered herself to be stripped, day by day, and privilege after privilege, of all her external power; during the general persecution set on foot against her in all the states of Europe, she has suffered herself to be stripped of those external emblems of power, in order to retire into the sanctuary, and to fulfil the august mission of reacting upon society by her virtues, her character, and her unity."—Introd. pp. xiii. xiv.

That is to say, if we understand M. Gondon rightly, having employed herself up to the sixteenth century in transmuting Catholic truth into Romish error, Rome has stereotyped what she conceives to be the perfection of that error at the council of Trent, for the use of all after ages; and finding it impossible to impose herself any longer upon the world by the sword of despotic power and the flames of the inquisition, she has wisely resolved on turning rational and liberal, and so trying to carry her point by dint of popularity. All we say is, let the world beware,

"Decipiat ne te versis tamen illa figuris!"

At all events we know the mind of Rome on this subject, and forewarned, they say, is forearmed. As regards the English Church, M. Gondon is willing at present not to deny her the place of repentance; she shall have an opportunity of throwing herself into the arms of Rome, become rational and liberal; he hopes she will embrace it, but if not, this is, by his calculation, her horoscope:

his writings that would bear such a construction. He frequently refers to the passage in question from St. Paul, 1 Cor. xi. 19, and insists on the benefit accruing to the Church from the opposition of heretics; ex. gr. "Multa ad fidem Catholicam pertinentia, dum hæreticorum calida inquietudine exagitantur, ut adversus eos defendi possint, ET CONSIDERANTUR DILIGENTIUS, ET INTELLIGUNTUR CLARIUS, ET INSTANTIVS PRÆDICANTUR; et ab adversario mota quæstio DISCENDI existit occasio."—De Civit. Dei, l. xvi. c. 2. And again: "Improbatio hæreticorum FACIT EMINERE QUID ECCLESIA SENTIAT, ET QUID HABEAT SANA DOCTRINA." Confess. l. vii. c. 19. The benefit here described by St. Augustine, consists in promoting a deeper consideration, a fuller understanding, a more emphatic declaration of the doctrine of the Church, the faith once delivered to the saints, not in a "development" of that doctrine. The idea of "developing" Catholic truth, is one which was never known in the Church, it was always a note of heresy, and as such utterly repudiated by St. Augustine and the whole of the Fathers. St. Irenæus teaches us in what light such irreverent meddling with God's truth should be regarded. "Numquid perfectam tunc cognitionem nondum habebat Petrus, quam postea adinvenerunt hi? Imperfectus igitur secundum hos Petrus, imperfecti autem et reliqui Apostoli; et oportebit eos reviscentes horum fieri discipulos, ut et ipsi perfecti fiant. Sed hoc quidem ridiculum est."—Adv. Hæres. l. iii. c. 12.

“The cause of Anglican Protestantism has, in spite of its great labours in the field of exegesis, in fact, by reason of the prodigious efforts it has made, become so impoverished and so bare, that it is obliged to disavow its history; and after having disgraced itself with its own hands in the works of Cobbett, it now denies itself through the mouth of the most learned of its doctors. Feeling no longer any life circulating in its decrepit members, it appeals to Rome; it weeps over the dust of the successors of the Apostles, and protests now only against its own former protests. Anglicanism has arrived at the last throbbing of its pulse; it is the throb of agony, the death struggle, and yet at the same time, the giant effort which shakes the winding sheet, and seeks to raise the sepulchral stone that seals it to nonentity.”—Introd. pp. xviii. xix.

We beg our readers to remember that we are not responsible for M. Gondon's confusion of tropes, nor for the inflation of his style; we simply do our duty as translators. Happily he grows more sober himself as he descends to the more practical questions involved in the issue which he contemplates.

“The great spectacle,” he continues, “which the Anglican Church presents to the world, was predicted more than a century ago by Bossuet, who, speaking of the Anglicans, has said in the History of the Variations, (Book vii. 114,) ‘So learned a nation will not rest . . . in this establishment; the respect for the fathers which it retains, and its curious and continual researches into antiquity will bring it back to the doctrine of the first centuries. I cannot believe that it will persist in the hatred which it has conceived against the chair of St. Peter, from which it has received Christianity. . . . The times of vengeance and illusion will pass away, and God will hear the sighs of his saints!’ This prophecy of the great bishop is on the point of being realised; for the Anglican Church can no longer maintain its position, without uniting itself to the Catholic Church. That reunion would allow the property of the Church to be anew devoted to the purposes for which it was given; it would strengthen the hands of the illustrious British aristocracy which is destined to live or to succumb with the Church to which it is so closely united; it would consolidate the constitution, and put an end to all the divisions and disputes with Ireland, of which religion is the principal source. That event would paralyse the dissenting factions, and by the restoration of the ancient subdivision of Church property, the landed proprietors would find themselves relieved of a portion of the poor-rates; the middling classes and the poor would have no more church-rates to pay, and a fund would be formed for the building of churches and chapels. In one word, the Church would thus acquire the popularity which she stands in need of, and which she has so long lost. If, on the contrary, the happy prophecy of the bishop of Meaux should not be realised, it is not impossible that we might, in the course of half a century, see civil war, the Church overthrown, the great principles on which civil and ecclesiastical property rests, forgotten, and a general confusion ensuing, which would infallibly bring the ruin of the monarchy in its train."—Introd. pp. xix. xx.

This, then, is the alternative which M. Gondon proposes to us ; this the extremity to which the Romish Church, in alliance with the liberalism of the day, means to drive us, that we shall either throw ourselves into the arms of Rome, or else utterly perish. The grounds on which M. Gondon adventures himself upon these prognostications, are explained by him in the course of his volume ; of the contents of which we will endeavour to give our readers a concise outline. In the first chapter he paints in the strongest possible colours the social miseries and embarrassments of England ; the growth of immorality, the distress of the working classes, the wretchedness of the Irish peasantry, the condition of the manufacturing and mining population disclosed by Lord Ashley's inquiry, the grievances connected with the administration of the poor-law, the spread of socialism and chartism, and the excesses of the Rebeccaites ; all these wounds and sores of England's political and social life are gloated upon by M. Gondon with malignant satisfaction, and reckoned up as so many counts in the indictment drawn up against the Reformation, upon which, as their cause, all our national miscarriages, past, present, and impending are charged. It is the old argument of Tenterden steeple and the Goodwin sands with a vengeance ; so much so, that M. Gondon at last grows ashamed of it himself, and at the close of the chapter provides a loophole for himself, by adding :—

“ Without pretending to say, that the gloomy picture now placed before the eyes of the reader is directly and exclusively the work of the Reformation, no serious doubt can remain in the mind of any one who has followed the action of Anglicanism upon the social life of Britain, that the religious revolution of the sixteenth century was the principal source of all these misfortunes.”—pp. 31, 32.

Pray, will M. Gondon go back one step further in history, and tell us what was the cause of the “ religious revolution ” of the sixteenth century ? Was it not the perversion of Christ's holy Catholic truth by the craft, the tyranny, the covetousness of Papal Rome ? was it not the unexampled corruption of her hierarchy, the intolerable arrogance of her despotic sway, which trampled under foot the kings and the nations of the earth ? And will M. Gondon further tell us, what fruits these same causes have produced, and still are producing, in countries where Protestantism was successfully resisted, in the Catholic kingdoms of France, of Spain, of Portugal, yea, and under the very nose of the Pope himself, under the immediate influence of that system which M. Gondon panegyrises as the panacea of all social ills and political disorders, in wretched, distracted, disorganized, denationalized Italy?

And as we have taken the liberty of putting questions to M. Gondon, we may as well make bold to ask him one or two more, before we suffer him to escape from the indiscretions of his first chapter. How comes it to pass, that his friend O'Connell still has those millions of "the finest pisantry in the world" to support him with displays of brute strength, and to fill his pockets with "rint," if it be true that famine is of as regular recurrence in Ireland as the seasons themselves, and "year after year decimates its population?" (p. 12.) And how does M. Gondon account for the continuance of pauperism in England, if, as he says, the poor, who in the days of Cobbett had nothing left to support them but bread and water, have since the death of "that illustrious historian," which took place in 1835, not been allowed to taste a morsel even of bread? (p. 27.) And—we beg his pardon for troubling him with so vulgar a subject as chronology—how does he make out his appeal to history, where he says (p. 34), that England owes all its greatness to its essentially Catholic constitution, and to the happy independence which it enjoyed in the palmy days of its union with the Church of Rome? We always thought that the internal freedom and the external greatness of England dated from the impulse given to mind and enterprise, and the rise of its naval power, in the days of Queen Elizabeth, and somehow or other we imagined that her reign was connected with the settlement of the Reformation. But we clearly perceive, that if the Jesuits succeed in their benevolent design to undertake the education of the rising generations, the world will have much to learn, and much to unlearn, in history as well as in religion. Meanwhile, we hope, M. Gondon will kindly bear with our ignorance.

Having sufficiently harrowed up the feelings of his readers by his description of the wretched condition to which England has been reduced by the Reformation, M. Gondon is considerate enough to allay those feelings again, by showing in the second and following chapters, how the Papacy is busily employed in pouring oil into her wounds, by the most active endeavours to propagate Popery, and to re-establish the Papal ascendancy in the land. We learn here, what some of us had before suspected, that the Emancipation Bill of 1829 was never intended by the Papists to be a final measure, but only an "instalment;" that all they then wanted, was to get the principle of the recognition of Popery by the law of the land once admitted, and that they trusted to their own cleverness and activity, and to our supineness and good nature, for a successful working out of the consequences of that principle. We learn, upon evidence which upon that subject we can hardly venture to question, that the agitation in Ireland, so often and so decidedly repudiated by the English Romanists, is, in fact, only one of a series of measures set into operation for the accomplishment of the one great design of Rome, the overthrow of the English Church and the substitution of Popery in her place. It is for this purpose, M. Gondon assures us, that Ireland has been and still is kept in a ferment; for this purpose that the number of vicars apostolic in England was doubled in the year 1840, and the number of the inferior clergy is annually increased⁹; for this purpose that Mr. Pugin is raising Popish structures in every part of the country; that the Romish offices are celebrated with greater pomp and show; that monasteries and nunneries have been established all over England; that a number of Romish colleges and schools have been founded; and that the Catholic Institute has been set on foot, and is propagating itself by branch associations throughout the whole extent of the British empire. Nor, if we are to rely on M. Gondon's data, have these efforts been unsuccessful. At the beginning of the reign of George III. the number of Roman Catholics in England and Scotland amounted to only 60,000; in 1821 it had risen to 500,000; and in 1842 M. Gondon estimates it at between two millions and two millions and a half (p. 44); of these, he says, 300,000 are in London, where the number of conversions is from 4000 to 5000 annually (p. 78)¹: in 1792 there were in England and Scotland thirty-five Romish places of worship, there are now 500, and among them churches on a large and magnificent scale, recently built (p. 55); the political power of the Romanist body has been greatly increased by the organization of the Roman Catholic electors, under the auspices of the Institute; their votes, given en masse, being made use of on the hustings in the same way as the votes of "the tail" in the Commons, to hold the scales between parties of nearly equal strength, and to turn them in favour of whichever party is willing to purchase victory at the price of subserviency to Rome; lastly, the parliamentary influence so acquired has paved the way for influence over the cabinet itself, some of whose members, according to M. Gondon, are in regular communication with the chiefs of the Institute, concerting with them such measures as the latter may from time to time suggest, for the extension of the rights and the removal of the grievances of the Roman Catholics.

⁹ According to the statement of M. Gondon, the number of Romanist priests in the London district was increased from 91 to 135 between 1836 and 1842 (p. 78): and from the "Catholic Directory" it appears that since the passing of the Emancipation Bill in 1829, there has been a regular progression in the increase of the Romish priesthood throughout England and Wales, amounting within 15 years to an addition of more than 50 per cent. The numbers were, in 1830, 426; in 1835, 447; in 1840, 552; in 1845, 666.

¹ We have no means of testing the accuracy of these assertions of M. Gondon; but as regards the number of conversions here stated, we hesitate not to say that it is a gross exaggeration. If the Romanists in London could make a display of from 80 to 100 new converts every week, we should not have to wait till we learned the fact second-hand from Paris. Indeed, M. Gondon himself gives a very different account of the matter in his Conversion de soixante Ministres, where the annual average of conversions in the whole of the London district, between the years 1837 and 1842, is stated at about six hundred.—p. 30.

But these are only the first faint beginnings of what we are to expect: M. Gondon's anticipations of success rise higher and higher as he proceeds. In the fifth chapter he reviews the education question; that question which has every where been made the chief means of attack on the part of the Romanists, and which has already become so prominent a feature in their aggressive movements upon our Church. The defeat of Sir James Graham's education bill of 1843, is recounted by our author in a tone of exultation; he makes no secret of the fact, that it was achieved by the joint efforts of Papists and Dissenters; the agitation got up by the schismatic preachers fills him with admiration, and Mr. Hume comes in for his meed of praise for the pious solicitude which caused him to "tremble at the idea of allowing the education of the people to fall into the hands of a clergy, who are to this day far more taken up with pounds, shillings, and pence, than with the souls entrusted to their charge." Excellent Mr. Hume! who never troubles himself about pounds, shillings, and pence; whose care is all for the souls of men! But there is no alliance which Rome eschews, if it will help to slander, to obstruct, or to destroy the true Catholic Church of Christ. M. Gondon, in the excess of his satisfaction at the fate of the ministerial measure, forgets all his Roman Catholic prejudices, and actually recognises the clerical pretensions of the teachers of dissent:—

"We must particularly note one of the circumstances of this struggle between the English ministry and that part of the population which does not profess the national worship; it is this, that every where the clergy gave the signal for resistance; it was under their direction that the opposition was organized. It was on the invitation of their ministers that the Dissenting sects rose up against the pretensions of the government. The ministers, men clothed with a religious character, whose business it is to watch for the salvation of souls, were seen calling meetings, preparing the people for the conflict, and placing their names first on the petitions against the liberticide project of Sir James Graham."—pp. 161, 162.

But the Romanists proved themselves worthy of their allies, and their merit on this occasion is not lost sight of by M. Gondon :—

"The Catholic priests were not less active, nor less ardent; the Vicars Apostolic set them the example. We have already spoken of the protest signed by the Bishops of England," (we beg our readers will notice this anticipation of the style, which the bill brought in by Mr. Watson, Lord John Manners, and Mr. Bickham Escott, will, if passed, enable their Popish reverences to adopt;) "and we may add that Mgr. Wiseman, having been privately consulted by the Minister, handed him a memorial, explaining the grounds on which the Catholics felt it their duty to oppose the attempt made to deprive them of the liberty of teaching."—p. 162.

Their liberty of teaching, forsooth! As if any interference with that had been contemplated. Was there ever impudence equal to this? We should like to know whose liberty of teaching was interfered with by the bill of Sir James Graham. Was it not the liberty of teaching, yea, the right and the duty to teach, the rising generation, which undoubtedly belongs to the Catholic Church of Christ in this land, so long as she continues to be a national institution,—that was scandalously interfered with by the ministerial project, by attempting to force the clergy of that Church into co-operation, unnatural and unlawful, with the propagators of error, heresy, and schism; by endeavouring to introduce in this country a system of so-called national education similar to that which is already established in Ireland, which takes the oversight of the lambs of Christ's flock out of the hands of the successors of the Apostles to whom of right it belongs, and vests it in the hands of a government, whose political necessities compel it, while its love of expediency predisposes it, to be a free trader in religion, and to give to those whose business it is to poison the minds of the young with the opium of Popery, and the various drugs of Protestant dissent, the same free access to the schools, and the same public countenance, as to those whose office it is to feed them with the sincere milk of the word. If the national Church is the authorised teacher of the nation, and by consequence, the national clergy the authorised superintendents of national education, was it not a monstrous interference with their authority and their liberty, not only to restrict them in the exercise of their office of teaching, out of complaisance for the teachers of superstition and of error, but to make them by act of Parliament ex officio parties to the inculcation of all the erroneous and strange doctrines, which by their ordination vows they are solemnly bound to banish and drive away? Here, indeed, there was interference, here there was a grievance; but there was nothing of which either Papists or other schismatics had any just cause to complain. Their liberty of teaching was not touched; a provision was made to allow them to teach where they had no business to teach, i. e. in the national schools, of which the national Church is the only rightful teacher; and as for the rest, they were left as free as ever they were to set up schools of their own, to any extent they pleased; a liberty of which, by M. Gondon's own showing, they avail themselves without the least attempt being made to interrupt them:—

“As regards schools for the children of the Catholic poor, vast establishments have been formed in London during the last four years, in which 1400 children are admitted. There are besides schools at St. John's Wood, at Islington, and at Bermondsey. In 1842, the number of Catholic children receiving gratuitous instruction in London and the suburbs, amounted to 7409. In this calculation we do not include the Sunday schools, nor private schools, which render extensive and distinguished services.”—p. 78.

If this is not “liberty of teaching,” we know not what is; still the Romanists are aggrieved; M. Gondon even goes the length of finding fault with the National Society for its illiberality in not providing Popish education for the Romanists. The fact is, that so long as Popery has not the power of intermeddling with the freedom of every one else, and full licence for itself to do as it pleases, Popery has, and of its very nature must have, a grievance. The same spirit of encroachment, which makes the introduction of the Bible into the “national” schools a grievance in Ireland, makes it a grievance in Algeria, aye, and more recently in France itself, that the priests are not permitted to hang up a crucifix in government schools, in which Protestant and Jewish children are receiving instruction, along with the Roman Catholics. And why, on the same principle, should not the statue of the Virgin Mary be put up in those schools of the Irish “National” Education Board, in which the majority of the children are Romanists? We fancy we hear M. Gondon exclaim: “Why not, indeed!”

M. Gondon's views and hopes are not, however, confined to popular instruction; he argues in the same chapter the question of academical education; he records with particular satisfaction the terms of the charter by which the College of St. Mary Oscott was incorporated with the London University, and in which our Queen is, strangely enough, it must be confessed, made to express her “entire confidence in the ability, knowledge, and discretion" of the crafty Jesuits, to whom it seems every encouragement is to be given for spreading their mischief amongst us; he expresses his belief that the appointment of "Catholic" professors to the University of Dublin, will, ere long, be extorted from the fears of England; and that in consequence Oxford and Cambridge also will be thrown open to the Romanists. As regards the former indeed, M. Gondon tells us "he knows, on good authority, that those members of the University who are not enslaved by the prejudices of another epoch, so far from being hostile to this innovation, would, on the contrary, be disposed to hail it with the greater pleasure, as it would enable them to testify the good-will and the brotherly sentiments which they entertain towards the members of the Catholic Church." We sincerely hope that those members of the University who are "enslaved by the prejudices" of the good old times, when Popery was looked upon with wholesome abhorrence as a religious pestilence, still constitute the vast majority. After devoting to the Protestant reaction against the encroachments of Popery, a separate chapter, containing, inter alia, an amusing account of the May meetings at Exeter-hall, which we are sorry we have not room to transcribe for the entertainment of our readers, M. Gondon proceeds in the seventh chapter to introduce us to another feature of the great "Catholic" movement, the "social regeneration," as he terms it, of England, accomplished by the "crusade" of Father Mathew; and in the course of his narrative he fails not to recount "the homage rendered to a poor Irish friar, by one of the chiefs of Protestant England, by an Anglican Bishop." Indeed, M. Gondon commits himself to the assertion, that it was "by the urgent solicitations" of that prelate, and of several members of the English aristocracy, that Father Mathew was induced, much against his own inclination, to extend his "crusade" to England; and although M. Gondon admits that he was less successful here on the whole than in Ireland, he considers the movement to have been extremely serviceable to the cause of Popery:—

"The very fact," he says, "that an Irish Catholic priest was enabled to run all over England, surrounded with all the popularity and the marks of respect which every where accompanied the friar of Cork, was an immense step in advance. A short time before his journey to England, Father Mathew had received from the Sovereign Pontiff a testimony of his satisfaction. Gregory XVI. had raised him to the dignity of Commissary Apostolic. Hitherto Father Mathew had only been the Provincial of the Capuchin Order. The relations established between the Catholics and the Protestants on the occasion of the Temperance Associations, cannot fail to pave the way for farther approaches. The power of the Catholic faith has struck the mind of the masses by the miracles which it alone was capable of operating; but we hope that it will soon win and convert the hearts."—pp. 221, 222.

So much for the discernment of those who insisted that the expedition of Father Mathew was the isolated movement of a benevolent individual, which had no connexion whatever with the Irish Repeal agitation, and the general designs of Popery. We have it in evidence, in M. Gondon's book, that it was in fact a move in the general game which the Papacy is playing against us; that he undertook his "crusade" in the character of Papal Commissary, and that its object was to produce an impression upon the masses in favour of Popery. For our own part we never doubted it.

The latter half of M. Gondon's book is occupied with what he considers the most hopeful feature in the present aspect of England—the spread of "Puseyism," as he calls it, apologizing withal for the use of the term, in the Anglican Church. To this the remaining seven chapters of his "Mouvement religieux" are devoted; they contain, with a separate chapter on Dr. Pusey and Mr. Newman, a general history of the rise and progress of the movement. As this account is nothing more than a narrative of the various incidents of the history of the "Tractarian" movement, in the colouring which M. Gondon's "Anglican brethren" would give to it, rendered occasionally more pungent by a sprinkling of the "Catholic" tone and style of the author himself, and interspersed with copious extracts from the "British Critic," and other periodicals, as well as from the different pamphlets which appeared in the course of the controversy, there is little in that part of M. Gondon's volume that would interest our readers, or that has not been already discussed, usque ad nauseam. The only new fact we have gathered from the perusal, is the origin of the term Puseyism, for which M. Gondon thus accounts:—

"It is not exactly known to what circumstance the preference given to the name of Dr. Pusey (for designating the party) is owing. No doubt it arose from this, that the enemies of the regenerating movement (for they have the merit of coining the appellation) found it more easy to say "Puseyism and Puseyite," than "Newmanism" or "Lookism" (?). The word is more easy to pronounce; it sounds better to the ear, and this was a great consideration to those who wished to put it into every one's mouth, and to cause it to resound every where."—p. 246.

We thank M. Gondon for these valuable hints on English articulation and euphony; and we beg to assure him that his views on this subject are not more incorrect, than the opinions he emits on a variety of points of more serious importance. Thus, when he attributes the origin of our Articles to an assembly of laymen; when he anticipates the possibility of a revolution in England, because the English clergy consider the sponsorship of the King of Prussia, on the occasion of the Prince of Wales' baptism, a ground of forfeiture of His Royal Highness' rights to the throne of the United Kingdom; when, on the evidence of a statement made in the House of Lords, by the same prelate who is said to have invited the "crusade" of Father Mathew, he states, that if not the majority, at least a very large proportion of the clergy deny, in their hearts, those doctrines of our Articles to which, at their ordination, they subscribe; and when he adds, that the wish to see subscription to them abolished altogether, is pressed upon the parliament daily by numberless petitioners, and supported by several bishops, we can only express our regret that M. Gondon should be so profoundly ignorant of the subjects he talks about.

The tardiness with which even the most advanced leaders of the Romanizing party moved towards Rome, which had so evidently their sympathies and their allegiance, he accounts for partly by their "ardent desire to carry the whole Anglican Church back with them to Rome," a desire which M. Gondon "firmly hopes" will be blessed with success (p. 335); and in another place he says:

"There is another consideration which will always prevent the Anglican clergy, even the most advanced among them, from separating from their Church; it is this, that if instead of labouring to regenerate England, to instruct its population, they were to abandon their mission, in order to join, under existing circumstances, the Roman Catholics, they would deliver up into the hands of the Protestant party in their Church, the magnificent monuments of antiquity which Catholicism has bequeathed to them; those abbeyes, those cathedrals, those colleges, in which so many Catholic reminiscences seem to have escaped from the hammer of Puritanism, only to aid in unprotestantizing England."—p. 235.

This was written in 1842; since then, events have occurred by which a large proportion of those who so lingered in our Church have given M. Gondon the opportunity of entoning the ἡ παλαιὰ of his latest publication (No. 4), at the head of this article. On the very title-page this little performance is guilty of a most discreditable piece of equivocation. It contains an account of the defection to Rome of thirty-five clergymen of our Church, and twenty-four lay members of the two universities, which fact is set forth in the title as follows:

“CONVERSION DE SOIXANTE MINISTRES ANGLICANS,” in large type, and then, in remarkably diminutive type, “ou membres des universités anglaises,” which is again followed by the addition in large type: “ET DE CINQUANTE PERSONNES DE DISTINCTION;” the effect of the arrangement being, that the uninitiated will understand the words, “ou membres des universités anglaises,” if they notice them at all, to be a further description of the “sixty Anglican clergymen;” more particularly, as both on the first leaf and on the back, the little book bears no other title than this: “CONVERSION DE SOIXANTE MINISTRES ANGLICANS.”

But pass we on from the title-page to the performance itself. It opens with a letter from Monseigneur Wiseman to the bishops of France, on the Mouvement Religieux de l'Angleterre, as if the whole Isle was already “frighted from her propriety.” The object of this letter, dated October, 1845, and published in the Ami de la Religion of November 29th, is to ask the French bishops for a “great manifestation of sympathy and of prayers for the unhappy Church of England;” a request with which the greater part of them complied by ordering a Neuvaine on the occasion. The letter of Dr. Wiseman is followed by a short introduction entitled, “Different causes which have contributed towards the religious regeneration of England, and the conversions which we witness; Puseyite movement, and anarchy of evangelical Protestantism.” Among these causes M. Gondon enumerates the hospitable reception which the French emigrant priests met with on the shores of England during the Revolution; the consequence of which was, not only that the penal laws against the Papists were necessarily relaxed, but that the priests had opportunities afforded them of introducing their principles into the families into which they were received. Thence M. Gondon passes on to the rise of the “Tractarian” school, the history of which, and of the reaction which it caused in the public mind, he briefly recapitulates. Lastly, he adverts to the “Evangelical Alliance,” which he ignorantly supposes to be the only power which remains in our Church, capable of opposing the further spread of Popery amongst us. After giving a sufficiently caustic account of its proceedings, he concludes by saying:

“This coalition, formed in the interest of the Protestant faith held in common by persons who ‘severally retain their opinions on the points of difference between them,’ will naturally succumb under the weight of its own ridicule.”—p. 23.

In this opinion we perfectly concur, and deeply regret that any ministers of our Church should have been found weak enough to attempt daubing her walls with such untempered mortar. In a third section M. Gondon recapitulates the leading facts of his larger work on the progress of "Catholicism" in England since the middle of the last century; and after passing slightly over the earlier "conversions" of Digby, Pugin, and Spencer, he enters upon a more detailed history of the late "conversions," commencing with that of Mr. Sibthorp, whose name he cautiously suppresses, thereby escaping from the necessity of mentioning the untoward fact, that he who so "boldly explained the motives of his conversion," has since returned as an humble penitent to the communion of that Church which he had too hastily forsaken. Then follows an account of the proceedings against Messrs. Ward and Oakeley, with large quotations from Dr. Pusey's letters put forth at that period; and after this, in the fourth section, we are presented, after a few introductory remarks, with a list of thirty-five clergymen, twenty-four lay members of the two universities, and from fifty to sixty other individuals, chiefly relatives, wives and children, of those before mentioned, who have gone over to the Church of Rome during the last five years. The numbers in the different years are, in 1841, 2; in 1842, 10; in 1843, 13; in 1844, 13; in 1845, 68; and at the commencement of the present year, 11; to which M. Gondon tells us, must be added considerable numbers from the middle and lower classes; his list being confined to persons of station and importance in society. This catalogue is followed by four more sections filled with sundry particulars respecting the personal career of the more conspicuous of the deserters. Mr. Newman, Mr. Ward, and Mr. Oakeley, have each a section to themselves; and in the eighth section, Mr. Capes, Mr. Brown, and Mr. Seager bring up the rear. The whole is wound up by a "Conclusion," and a "Postscript," in the latter of which the author mentions that intelligence of additional conversions has reached him while his pages were passing through the press; and further gives us to understand, on the authority of "a dignitary, high placed in the Church of England," who appears to be M. Gondon's confidential correspondent, that "the conversions will not stop here; that the universities and the clergy give promise of many more; and that a great many timid minds wait, before they adopt a resolution of such magnitude, to see the result of the experience of those who have preceded them in the way of truth."

To follow M. Gondon into the details of his narrative would be manifestly tedious to our readers, who are fully acquainted with the circumstances here detailed; and for obvious reasons we shall abstain from all remark upon the personal circumstances connected with the different individuals who have had the profound misfortune of falling away, let us charitably hope and pray, in many cases not irrevocably, from the truth. If we cannot suppress a feeling of indignation at the wholesale treachery to which our Church has been exposed at the hands of her sons and sworn ministers, our mind is yet more strongly moved by compassion for the sad fall in which they have been overtaken, and the depth of which, we doubt not, the more earnest and thoughtful of them will discover to their utter dismay, before they have been long in the embrace of Rome. Not a word would we willingly add to increase the pain which they cannot but feel to see their names paraded in connexion with the unseemly boasts and the bitter railings which the Romish writers are hurling at the Church by whose ministry they were grafted into Christ, and were so long supported in the communion of Christ.

But we have a word or two to say to M. Gondon, and through him to his Church. Not that we desire to be over-fastidious as to the tone which, in his exultation to see the prognostications of his former work thus far justified, he assumes in the course of his narrative, and of the reflections with which he accompanies it; we are willing to make every allowance for a little inflation of language on such an occasion. But we would have him be more careful to adhere to the truth; we would have him abstain from foolish exaggerations, as regards both the importance of the triumph which he thinks Rome has achieved, and the hopes which he conceives for the future. First of all, let us hear him as to the past. Speaking of Mr. Newman, and of the effect of his "conversion" as compared with that produced by Dr. Pusey's arguments for remaining in the Church of England, he says:—

"Example was more eloquent than argument; and religious England seemed to doubt the correctness of Dr. Pusey's views, when it saw the most learned of its divines, Mr. Newman, abandoning his position, in order humbly to submit himself to the authority of Rome. The resolution of Mr. Newman has thrown one-third of the Anglican clergy into a state of confusion. Hitherto the national Establishment had lost individuals; in the person of Mr. Newman it lost the leader of a school, a man whom a considerable party in the Church surrounded with its respect and admiration. His disciples were enthusiastically attached to him; they regulated their conduct by his, and in the hour of danger they blindly confided their destinies to him as to their ablest pilot. It is natural enough that the submission of this lofty intellect to the authority of the Church should have thrown the ranks of Puseyism into disorder; for Anglicanism possessed neither in its Episcopate, nor in its universities, nor in its numerous clergy, any man who enjoyed, as a divine, an authority equal to his."—pp. 73, 74.

We advise M. Gondon not to make so very sure of the "humble submission of Mr. Newman's lofty intellect to the authority of the Roman Church." We do not believe that there is any submission in the case at all. Mr. Newman split on the rock of overconfidence in his own intellectual powers, and his extensive reading; he formed a theory for himself, with which the English Church was not found to accord, and therefore he forsook her; he joined the Roman Church, not because he abandoned his theory to throw himself at the Church's feet, (his prostrating himself before "Father Dominick, of the mother of God, Provincial of the order of the Passionist, in England," is quite another thing), but because he imagined that the Church of Rome accorded with his theory. As long as that imagination lasts, he will remain with her; but if ever that imagination should pass away—and we can see quite enough in his work on the "Development of Christian Doctrine," to anticipate that it will not last very long,—Mr. Newman will turn from the Romish Church, as he has turned from ours. Neither, therefore, is our loss, nor is the gain of Rome, nearly as great as M. Gondon flatters himself, whatever might be Mr. Newman's authority as a divine, or his influence as a leader. We have no wish to detract from Mr. Newman's high and deserved reputation as a divine of erudition; nor do we wish to underrate his influence; yet we have no hesitation in saying, that to represent him as the chief, if not only, stay of one-third of our clergy, to affirm that there is not among our bishops, in our universities, and among our clergy, a single man his equal in learning or authority as a divine, is a preposterous and ridiculous exaggeration. Not less, but if possible, more ridiculous and unfounded is the view which M. Gondon takes of the importance of the entire body of converts. We will again let him speak his own mind fully:—

"If we group the names just mentioned with those of the distinguished men who, since the conversion of Mr. Wackerbarth, have successively been admitted into the Catholic Church, two leading considerations will present themselves to our mind. On the one hand, the most learned men which England possesses in the different branches of ecclesiastical knowledge, who had associated together for the purpose of labouring together for the regeneration of the Anglican Church, have arrived, after long years of research and study, at this conclusion: That the Romish communion is the only one in which truth, grace, and salvation are to be found. On the other hand, we are no less struck by the heroic disinterestedness with which these men accept this conclusion, and submit to it at the sacrifice of their material interests. Whoever knows the wealth of the Anglican Church, the magnificent revenues of its benefices, the sumptuous endowments which the colleges of Oxford and Cambridge enjoy, will appreciate the value of these sacrifices."—pp. 91, 92.

To hear M. Gondon, one would suppose that the cream of erudition and talent had been taken off from the English Church by the defection of the thirty-five clergymen, and that they had been either in possession, or had had before them a certain prospect, of her choicest emoluments. But what is the real truth? As regards, first of all, the question of material sacrifices; out of the thirty-five clergymen who have gone over to Rome, there were only ten who had any ecclesiastical benefice at all, and only three who held livings of considerable value; three more were in possession of fellowships, without ecclesiastical preferment; thirteen of them were only curates, and full one-half of these had lost their curacies before they took the fatal step of separation from their Church; and nine of them, of which four were still in Deacon's orders, had no Ecclesiastical or Academic position whatever to sacrifice. Add to this, that with their notoriously unsound opinions, their chance of preferment was exceedingly small; and we shall arrive at the conclusion, that whatever personal inconvenience some of the parties might have subjected themselves to by the step they took, their sacrifice of Church preferment and emolument was not on the whole very considerable, to say nothing of the fact that the few who had such emoluments, acted scarcely with common honesty in retaining them so long after they had become in heart lieges of the Church of Rome.

As regards the other part of M. Gondon's statement, which would lead the uninitiated to suspect that all the learning of the Church of England had come out of her in a body, it is still more palpably absurd. Not a few of the "converts" are young men, whose unripe judgment and incomplete information has proved a snare to them under the too potent influence of Mr. Newman; and with the exception of Mr. Newman himself, there is actually not one among them who has occupied a commanding position in theological literature. Mr. Faber has written some pretty verses; Mr. Ward has made himself notorious by his unseemly abuse of his mother Church; Mr. Oakeley has published, besides a volume of sermons, some tracts and pamphlets, and in them has exposed either his ignorance, or his bad faith, or both, by the fallacies and anachronisms by which he endeavoured to support his positions; and Mr. Morris has the reputation of being an able orientalist; but surely no one acquainted with the theological literature of the English Church of past or present times, will imagine that the few pieces which these gentlemen have written, or the productions of Mr. Seager, Mr. Wingfield, Mr. Marshall, and Mr. Formby, or lastly, the contributions to the "Lives of the English Saints," from the pens of Messrs. Walker and Coffin, will procure for any of their names a place among the standard divines of the English Church; so far from it, we think it exceedingly possible that several of them, with tolerably sound constitutions, will manage to survive their literary fame.

This being the case, M. Gondon himself must perceive that he has altogether miscalculated the importance of the late desertions from our Church. And if he knew, which evidently he does not, how much sound and truly Catholic principle there is left amongst us, to make head against Popish and Romanizing wiles on the one side, and against Puritanical extravagancies on the other; if he knew how many able men there are in our Church to defend those principles on every emergency against her aggressors, whose erudition is less paraded before the world, but not on that account less solid than the erudition even of the most learned among those who have left us; he would understand, that even if 350 clergymen, instead of 35, were to leave our Church, taking with them an equal proportion of learning, talent, and personal weight, still the case of our Church would be far from desperate. Indeed we must beg leave to doubt whether in his heart M. Gondon and the Romish party, whose mouthpiece he is, believe it to be as desperate as they say. The very system of exaggeration of which they are guilty, is calculated to induce this suspicion; and so is the affectation with which they deny the ecclesiastical character of our Church—not only the validity of her orders, but the very baptism ministered in her. In this the modern controversialists of the Romish school must surely know themselves to be opposed to the sentiments of some of the most illustrious divines of their own Communion, who, though they considered our Church to be in schism, did not deny her the character of a Church, and even admitted, in the event of certain historical facts (of which there is no doubt) being proved, the validity of her orders. Not only are these treated as wholly invalid by the modern emissaries of Rome; but in violation of the custom of the primitive Church, and the uniform rule of the Roman Church herself², they set aside our

² As early as the third century a controversy on this subject arose, between Stephanus, bishop of Rome, and the African Church. In that controversy the Africans insisted on the necessity of rebaptizing those who had been baptized by heretics, considering their baptism null and void. The Roman Church opposed this view, upon the ground that "it was an old custom, in regard to such, to use only prayer with imposition of hands."—Παλαιοῦ κεκρατηκότος ἔθους ἐπὶ τῶν τοιούτων, μόνῃ χρῆσθαι τῇ διὰ χειρῶν ἐπιθήσειω εὐχῇ.—Euseb. l. vii. c. 2. After this it was ruled at the first council of Arles, that baptism by heretics, if ministered in the name of the holy Trinity, should be held valid, and persons so baptized received into the Church by confirmation;—Si ad Ecclesiam aliquis de hæresi venerit, interrogent eum Symbolum, et si perviderint eum in Patre et Filio, et Spiritu Sancto esse baptizatum, manus ei tantum imponatur, ut accipiat Spiritum Sanctum. Quod si interrogatus non responderit hanc Trinitatem, baptizetur.—Concil. Arelat. l. can. viii. On the same principle the first council of Constantinople, being the second Œcumenical Synod, decreed that the baptism of certain heretics, among them that of Arians, Macedonians, and Novatians should be held valid, and those only rebaptized who came from heretical sects whose baptism lay under just suspicion on account of their tenets.—See Concil. Con- baptism by rebaptizing, sub conditione, those who have been baptized in our Church.

All these are symptoms of conscious weakness, indications of a bad cause. And so are the calculations on which M. Gondon founds his hopes of the ultimate overthrow of our Church, and the substitution of the Romish Church in her place. It is not to the intrinsic superiority of his Church that he trusts, so much as to the external difficulties by which he rejoices to see the Church of England surrounded:—

“ It is,” says an English demi-Popish correspondent of M. Gondon (probably of the Young England School), whose sentiments he adopts as his own, “ precisely by the events which threaten us, that the hopes of the Catholics are confirmed ; for every thing indicates that we are approaching the great day of vengeance. It is not to be denied, that not only our religious system is quaking before the ascendancy of Catholicism, but our whole social system is tottering on its foundation. Our great political parties have lost their ancient homogeneity, they are in full fusion. The power of our haughty and wealthy aristocracy is threatened in its very essence by one of those blows which Providence strikes for great purposes. Our proud industry, which has reached the apogee of its glory, dares not to interrogate the morrow. This is what we have come to, and a few years will suffice to make old England young again, by the transformations which are now at hand. How can our Church, as by law established, the most unpopular and monstrous of our institutions, escape from these metamorphoses ? ”— pp. 244, 245.

While M. Gondon and his correspondent thus gloat upon the chances of a great social crisis, the former brings, by way of “ a last reflection,” a charge against our Church, which on the principle, fas est et ab hoste doceri, we will transcribe:—

“ No doubt the reader will have been surprised, that in the serious crisis to which Anglicanism is exposed, the English Church did not interfere to settle the minds, to disperse doubts, and to give sentence

stantinop. I. can. vii. Again the same rule is asserted, and that on the ground of ancient tradition, by Gregory the Great. Ab antiqua Patrum institutione didicimus, ut qui apud hæresim in Trinitatis nomine baptizantur, cum ad Sanctam Ecclesiam redeunt, aut unctione chrismatis, aut impositione manus, aut sola professione fidei ad sinum Matris Ecclesiæ revocentur.—Gregor. Papa I. Epist. l. ix. ep. 61. ad Episcopos Hiberniæ, vel Iberiæ. And the fourth Lateran council complains in bitter terms of the violation of this principle on the part of the Greek Church towards the Latin, and classes such readministration of baptism, as an act of “daring presumption,” among those things quæ periculum generant animarum et ecclesiasticæ derogant honestati.—Concil. Lateran. IV. cap. 4. It is difficult to understand how in the teeth of all this and much more evidence of a like kind which might be adduced, the Romanists can venture to rebaptize, even conditionally, those whose baptism in the name of the Holy Trinity, and upon the profession of the Apostles’ Creed, is beyond all doubt. The motive, to throw a slur upon our Church in the eyes of the vulgar, is too evident to be mistaken.

between the Puseyite and Puritan parties. At one time a bishop, at another a court of law, at another an university, has taken in hand the defence of one principle, and the condemnation of its opposite. But that bishop, that law court, that university is not the Church, and their decisions remain powerless as against the anarchy which reigns in the religious society of England. Not to interfere, under such circumstances, with the full weight of her authority, is to confess her impotence, to admit, in the face of the world, that she has allowed the sceptre of authority to fall from her hand, and that she has nothing left of a Church but the name."—pp. 249, 250.

While we admit the force of these remarks, and humbly hope that considerations of this kind will, ere long, lead to a vigorous effort on the part of our Church to set her house in order; we desire to call to mind the fact, that the inaction of the Church is any thing but voluntary inaction. Indeed we cannot but consider it one of the most oppressive features in the position of our Church at this moment, that while her enemies, of every name and description, are suffered freely to deliberate upon the means which they will employ for her overthrow, she is debarred, and has been so for one hundred and thirty years, from the privilege of taking counsel with herself for her preservation. She is reproached for not having kept pace with the exigencies of the times by the very parties who keep her chained down to her institutions as they were a century and a half ago, without permitting her to alter one jot or tittle with a view to adapt her system to her altered circumstances. We are quite aware that the Papists, among others who taunt her with this fact, as if it were her own fault, will do all they can to prevent her from applying a remedy. But for all this we despair not. Whatever reproach may, justly or unjustly, be heaped upon our Church, however great trials and sufferings may be brought upon her by the malice of her enemies, will not make the cause of the Roman Church, which is intrinsically bad, one whit the better; neither will it make the cause of our Church either a bad or a hopeless cause, and that simply for this reason, because she is built upon that Rock against which, and the Church that is built on it, the gates of hell shall not prevail.

AMONG the manifold sources of sorrow which have lately been opened to those who love the Church, there is one which must pre-eminently and peculiarly strike every thoughtful observer. We mean the unsettlement of men's minds on every subject connected with religion;—on its doctrines, its evidences, its duties, its divine origin, and its positive claims upon man's obedience. All subjects are now often argued ab initio, as if there were nothing which had been established as a standing ground, from which the mighty mass of mankind might be moved, and the world thus purified by the sway of Christianity. The ordinary condition in which the Church finds the mind of man in regard to faith in the great truths of Christianity, will generally be an acceptance of its evidence on the grounds which have usually been sufficient to command belief, and by which the Christian religion has obtained its present hold upon mankind, and its wide dominion over so large a portion of the earth. That these grounds are essentially true, we cannot doubt; its doctrines create an impression in its favour from their divine purity, and its evidences are so happily addressed to the general sense of mankind, that they feel satisfied in resigning themselves to its guidance. They have a general insight into the nature of its evidence, which, although it may not be equivalent to a philosophical and searching inquiry into its validity, still gives them a sufficient assurance that they have not believed a discoverable fallacy or a cunningly devised fable. In saying this, we have no wish to weaken the argument which arises from the common consent of mankind—we mean of the great portion of the civilized world—in favour of Christianity. That argument is a primâ facie argument of great weight, for it proves, at all events, how happily Christianity is adapted to the wants and necessities of man. For the establishment of such a dominion as Christianity exercises over the hearts of men, something is required which shall satisfy a reasonable degree of inquiry, even among those with whom deep and metaphysical researches would be quite out of place. It is, therefore, with the greatest satisfaction that the deeper inquirer into the evidences of Christianity perceives, that while his more searching investigation is rewarded by increased confidence in his reasons for “the hope that is in him,” it has pleased Providence not to lose sight of the wants of the multitude, and to gratify them with the possession of arguments based on truth and sufficient to meet their wants, while those very arguments, when further sifted, repose upon investigations too difficult for their intellectual faculties, and too complicated for the limited learning which they possess. To use an illustration, more commonly adduced in reference to another subject, the minds of men, and their capabilities for the reception of argumentative proofs, are like vessels of different capacities, but the wonderful nature and the varied fulness of truth are so adapted to their wants, that it reaches to the full measure of all without overflowing those of smaller dimensions.

If, then, this representation of the ordinary disposition of mankind towards Christianity be just, it will, surely, seem to all thinking minds a great evil, when a faith of this simple character is unsettled. Our appreciation of the evil does not arise from any fear that the most searching investigation can ever diminish the value of the evidence for Revelation. It is simply in a subjective point of view that we deplore such a result. Objectively every new inquiry only strengthens the position of Christianity, but notwithstanding this, subjectively the employment of reasoning on its evidences may be injurious to a large class of minds. To pursue the illustration we have taken above, to set all intellects to this employment, would appear like attempting to force the larger measure into the smaller vessel. To minds in such a condition as we have supposed, it must be the best and the highest and the most improving occupation—not to reason on the foundations of their faith—but to go on unto perfection. Satisfied that the objects on which they have placed their hopes are the great realities of life, surely for them the highest employment is the formation or promotion of devotional habits, and the exercise of Christian graces and duties, the carrying out into practice that which they have learned to be based on truth.

If we are unwilling to see such considerations exchanged for the din of controversy, and for the necessary consequences of controversy, at all events we have the consolation of thinking, that in regard to one part of the subject, which it has become indispensable to discuss and sift with the utmost care, the blame must be cast upon those who have gone forth from us, and not on those who remain. If any irreverence be the consequence of these discussions, they who have brought upon the Church of England the necessity of the investigation, or rather of the resuscitation of a controversy almost consigned to a wholesome slumber, must bear the fearful responsibility. We mean the subject of Ecclesiastical Miracles. Within the last five years opinions have been promulgated (chiefly by those who have within the last year left the communion of the Church of England), which are so dangerous to the cause of truth, that we have felt it an imperative duty to attempt, according to the measure of our ability, to examine the foundations on which these opinions rest. The subject is one of such extreme importance, and at the same time so complicated and full of questions of so much delicacy, that it requires to be examined with the utmost calmness and circumspection, but the result of an examination so conducted, is satisfactory in the highest degree; it leaves the mind impressed with a deep conviction of the manifold wisdom and mercy of God, in placing the evidences of our faith upon a basis which cannot be shaken.

The opinions to which we allude are those which are frequently enounced in the well-known series, called "Lives of the English Saints," written chiefly by Mr. Newman and his personal friends, and originally advertised as a Series to be published under his Editorship. With regard to his supervision of these performances, or his responsibility as editor of them, that question has, of course, ceased to be a matter of any interest, unless it be to ascertain the statements which he would think fit to sanction, as a means of testing his reasoning powers and his judgment. While, however, we have no wish to make him answerable for any particular statements in these volumes, we feel that we are perfectly justified in considering them as a development, and a very rapid development too! of the views more formally promulgated, and more cautiously argued in the "Essay on Ecclesiastical Miracles," prefixed to the first volume of his Translation of Fleury. We proceed now to the consideration of the questions involved in this great inquiry. The conclusions to which Mr. Newman's remarks tend, will be stated in his own words; and we shall then examine the reasoning by which he arrives at these conclusions, and illustrate the effect they may be expected to produce, by a few citations from those books which we have ventured to call the development of the principles maintained on this essay.

But before we enter on the examination of Mr. Newman's opinions and his essay, we must trace by a slight sketch the history of opinions in the English Church concerning Miracles during the last century, and a portion of the present.

Mr. Newman states in the Introduction to his Essay, that many questions are brought before the reader in the history contained in the volume of Fleury, published by him, "which are apt more or less to startle those who with modern ideas commence the study of Church history generally;" and after enumerating several of these subjects, he adds, that among them all, "it seems right to bestow attention in the first place on the supernatural narratives which occur in the course of it, and of which various specimens are found in that portion of it which is now presented to the reader" (i. e. the first volume). Mr. Newman then proceeds to say:—

"It will naturally suggest itself to him to form some judgment upon them, and a perplexity, perhaps a painful perplexity, may ensue from the difficulty of doing so. This being the case, it is inconsiderate and almost wanton to bring such subjects before him, without making at least the attempt to assist him in disposing of them. Accordingly, the following brief remarks have been written in discharge of a sort of duty which a work of ecclesiastical history involves; not indeed without a deep sense of the arduousness of such an essay, or of the extreme incompleteness and other great defects of its execution; but at the same time, as the writer is bound to add, without any apology at all for discussing in his own way a subject which demands discussion, and which, if any other, is an open question in the English Church, and has only during the last century been viewed in a light which he believes to be both false and dangerous to revealed religion altogether."—Introduction, p. xii.

Mr. Newman, therefore, undertook the composition of this Essay, we may presume, to introduce a more correct state of opinion on the important subject of Ecclesiastical Miracles, because he considered that "during the last century," and only then, "it has been viewed in a light which he believes to be both false and dangerous to revealed religion altogether." Under these circumstances it may be desirable, before addressing ourselves to the arguments and views of Mr. Newman, to review briefly the state of opinion in England concerning Miracles during the last century. In doing this, we shall however advert to a few publications of an earlier date.

From the middle of the seventeenth century the question has been agitated in this country with considerable keenness, and it has branched out into two main divisions.

1. The nature and evidence of Scripture Miracles.
2. The nature and evidence of Ecclesiastical Miracles.

With regard to the first of these questions, attempts were very early made to overthrow the evidence which Miracles afford of a Revelation from God; but the objections raised in the first instance were chiefly of a metaphysical nature. A little quarto volume is now lying before us, which contains two remarkable pamphlets, published in the year 1683. The first is entitled, "Miracles no violations of the Laws of Nature." Printed for Robert Sollers, at the King's Arms and Bible, in St. Paul's Church-yard. This pamphlet (although, proh! Pudor! it was published at the King's Arms and Bible,) is a malicious attack on Revelation, vamped up from Hobbes and Spinoza, without the smallest acknowledgment of the sources from which it was compiled, or of the disingenuousness of patching together two discordant opinions, by omitting in the one all that contradicted the other. The greater part of the treatise is translated from Spinoza, and the argument, which is utterly worthless, depends on his views of the Laws of Nature. The other pamphlet, the title of which is, "Miracles; Works Above and Contrary to Nature, &c." London: printed for Samuel Smith, at the Prince's Head, St. Paul's Church-yard, 1683; is an answer to the first, written with considerable ability and acuteness, and pointing out the sources from which the infidel publication had been derived. These pamphlets were published not long after the appearance of "Cudworth's Intellectual System," of which the first edition appeared in 1678, and in which the question of Miracles is treated more with reference to Hobbes than to Spinoza, whose opinions Cudworth dismisses as unworthy of refutation. Mr. Trench in his enumeration of the assaults upon the Miracles, has very lucidly stated the ground on which the Pantheistic assault was made by Spinoza. The objection is, simply, that the Laws of Nature are immutable, and that it is incompatible with the wisdom and perfection of God to change that which He has established. We have mentioned these pamphlets, because they show the direction in which men's minds were turned at that day; and we think that Dr. Samuel Clarke, in the very acute observations on this subject which he makes in Prop. xiv. of his "Evidence of Natural and Revealed Religion," probably had these very pamphlets in view. His book was, as we know, mainly directed against Hobbes and Spinoza.

In 1701, Mr. (afterwards bishop) Fleetwood, published his "Essay on Miracles, in two Discourses." In the first of these discourses the Miracles of Moses and the Egyptian magicians are chiefly considered. Fleetwood gives the following definition of a Miracle; "an extraordinary operation of God, against the known course and settled Laws of Nature, appealing to the Senses." It will be observed that he excludes all created beings from the power of working miracles, except as delegated expressly by God. He allows the works of the enchanters to have been Miracles, but permitted by God. In the second part, he considers how far Miracles are a proof of any religion, and divides Miracles into Providential and Evidential. Under the former head he includes all those Miracles (such as healing diseases, &c., whether wrought in Pagan or Popish countries), which are calculated to call the attention of mankind to the overruling providence of God. Evidential Miracles he defines to be such as "God enables man to work in order to obtain belief, and which they know beforehand they shall work; these are such Miracles as Moses and our Saviour wrought, and other prophets, and such as we have all along been speaking of." In regard to these Evidential Miracles, Fleetwood insists upon the condition, that those who claim the evidence of Miracles to their doctrines, must proclaim those doctrines first, and then work the Miracle in confirmation of them. Our Lord, for example, claimed to be a teacher sent from God, and worked his Miracles in attestation of this declaration. In a posthumous work by Locke, there are a few observations, entitled, "A Discourse on Miracles," suggested by this Essay. Those observations relate chiefly to the definition of a Miracle, and the consequences deducible from it, but are not of great weight. We find now that the question has assumed a form in which many of the points most warmly contested in the course of the ensuing century, if not satisfactorily disposed of, are, at least, fairly mooted.

These points are the credibility of Pagan and Popish miracles, and their worth as evidence; and also the question whether evil spirits have any power to work miracles. It must be stated that there was not in that day any strong disposition among Protestants to deny the truth of all miraculous accounts except those of Scripture. The writings of Dr. Cave, a man of very considerable learning, fully attest this; for although occasionally he finds it necessary to express his distrust and disbelief of the miraculous accounts of early ages, many ecclesiastical miracles (those of the fourth century especially) are related by him without the smallest suspicion of their reality. We must, however, in estimating the belief of that age, take into account the ready credit which stories of apparitions and witchcraft obtained. Even Cudworth makes use of these as arguments of primary force against Atheists, and a considerable portion of the arguments of Henry More against Atheism, in his Philosophical Works, if we remember rightly, (for we speak here from memory,) are founded upon the supernatural phenomena brought about by witchcraft.

We are not concerned at present with the absurd and blasphemous opinions of Woolston on Miracles. His attempt to resolve them all into allegorical fables, whether originally suggested by a misunderstanding of the writings of the Alexandrian fathers¹ or not, has long been consigned to merited contempt. Those who feel any interest in it, in an historical point of view, will find ample details in Leland's Deistical Writers, and some very excellent observations on Woolston, in the Introduction of Mr. Trench, to his "Notes on the Miracles."

We pass at once, therefore, to the middle of the eighteenth century, which was signalized by discussions of no common vehemence on these subjects.

In 1742 David Hume published the first part of his Essays at Edinburgh, where it appears to have received a very favourable reception; this partly consoled him for the neglect which his "Treatise on Human Nature" had experienced, which appears to have chagrined him deeply. He, however, took courage, recast his neglected treatise, and published it while he was at Turin (about 1748), under the title of an "Enquiry concerning Human Understanding." His account of its reception (in the sketch of "My Own Life") is as follows, "On my return from Italy I had the mortification to find all England in a ferment, on account of Dr. Middleton's 'Free Enquiry,' while my performance was entirely overlooked and neglected: A new edition, which had been published in London of my Essays, moral and political, met not with a much better reception."

Our object in making this quotation, is not to exhibit the mortification felt by Hume at the cold reception which his Essays met with, but to point out the effect produced by the "Free Enquiry" of Dr. Middleton. There can be no doubt that Dr. Middleton's was a performance of much higher pretensions than the sophistical essay of Hume, and deserved far greater attention. Nearly the whole argument of Hume might be contained in a single sentence, and the miserable fallacy on which it rests, if it was neglected at first, has received abundantly more attention than it deserved. It was a shallow argument, and it was presented in a form which made it accessible to the meanest capacity. This, perhaps, may account for the pains which have been taken to set its inconclusiveness in the strongest light. But the work of Middleton was the composition of a man of considerable learning, of great acuteness, and, one would imagine, of very bad temper². The sensation it caused at first is testified by the numerous answers it received. But notwithstanding the disagreeable tone of mind in which it is written, and the hard and frequently unjustifiable attacks upon the fathers, in which it abounds, as well as what Gibbon stigmatizes as its evasions, and Douglas denounces as its unfairness, and notwithstanding the fierce opposition with which it was at first assailed, there is no doubt that it has exercised a very considerable influence on public opinion, and changed in great measure the whole state of the question in England. From that time, undoubtedly, the credit of Post-Apostolic miracles has perceptibly declined, and those who are unwilling to commit themselves to the wholesale condemnation of those maintained by Middleton, cannot resist the conviction, that much of that fabric which he attacked, crumbled to pieces under his examination. His Introductory Discourse to this "Free Enquiry" was published in 1747, before which time (in the prefatory matter to the fourth edition of his "Letter from Rome," 1741,) he had maintained similar views, but with less elaborate arguments, and far less research. It would seem that this disbelief of Post-Apostolic miracles is the evil spirit of unbelief which Mr. Newman is desirous of banishing from our Church as dangerous to the cause of religion, but, as we proceed, we shall see that he has directed far more of his argument against Bishop Douglas than against Middleton.

² We have, however, very good traditional authority for stating that in private life Middleton was a man of great kindness and urbanity. The late Master of Pembroke College (Dr. Turner) was old enough to remember the impression Dr. Middleton left of himself at Cambridge, about a dozen years after his death.

In 1754, after the death of Dr. Middleton, which took place in 1750, appeared the celebrated "Criterion" of Bishop (then Mr.) Douglas. Its title is, "The Criterion ; or, Miracles examined, with a view to expose the Pretensions of Pagans and Priests ; to compare the Miraculous Powers recorded in the New Testament, with those said to subsist in later times, and to show the great and material difference between them in point of evidence ; from whence it will appear that the former must be TRUE, and the latter may be FALSE." It would appear that "Hume's Essays" had begun to make a considerable impression, and accordingly the first part of this essay is devoted to an exposure of the fallacy of Hume's argument against miracles. The book was in the form of a letter to a friend who had suffered himself to be led away into infidelity by these and similar arguments. That individual is since known to have been the intimate friend of Hume, the celebrated Dr. Adam Smith. This may, perhaps, together with the circumstance that Douglas was by birth a Scotchman, explain the length at which Hume's notions are combated. But the main part of the book is devoted to the exposure of false pretences to miracles, and to showing that the rejection of other miraculous accounts ought to bring no discredit upon the miracles of the Gospel. It is clear that we are entitled to accept the one and to reject the other, without inconsistency, if we can show (1) that the facts rest upon evidence of a different character ; and (2) that, granting the facts to be proved, their nature is clearly different. In the first case we should be entitled to disbelieve the facts ; in the second, to deny their miraculous nature. We are not here determining whether certain points are to be received, or whether certain occurrences are miraculous. We merely suggest, that as soon as a difference is pointed out between these occurrences and the miracles of Scripture, either in their evidence or their nature, there is no inconsistency in accepting the miracles of Scripture as evidence for the religion which our Lord promulgated, and refusing, in the other case, to believe the facts, or admit the consequences sought to be deduced from them.

Before the publication of the Free Enquiry, in December, 1748, the miracles which were said to be performed at the tomb of the Abbé de Paris, had attracted considerable attention in England, and some slight allusions are made to them, and to M. de Montgeron's volume in defence of them, by Dr. Middleton. But the fullest examination which these miracles received in England, was that in Douglas's Criterion, in which more than one hundred pages are occupied in considering them. Dr. Middleton had brought them forward as rivals to the miraculous cures recorded in the Fathers, and Mr. Hume had dared even to compare them with the miracles of Scripture. The object of Douglas was simply to show, that while many of the cures alleged were impostures, all were not to be so classed, and the facts disbelieved : but, then, that even in those cases where no imposture was charged, there was not sufficient ground to account the cures really miraculous. This was shown by an examination of the nature of the diseases, and a comparison of them with other cures of an extraordinary but not miraculous kind. The great point was to show clearly the circumstances in which they are really distinguished from the Scripture miracles. But to this part of the subject we shall have shortly to recur, and, therefore, leave it now with this brief notice. In the year 1771, Hugh Farmer published his Dissertation on Miracles ; designed to show that they are arguments of a Divine Interposition, and absolute proofs of the Mission and Doctrine of a Prophet. His object, which Mr. Penrose has characterized as an erroneous one, required, it is obvious, that he should absolutely deny all miraculous accounts whatever except those of Scripture. Every one is aware that Hugh Farmer, in another work, attempts to resolve all cases of demoniacal possession into ordinary diseases, and to explain the language of Scripture on this subject by the dangerous scheme of accommodation. In his work on miracles, he maintains that there are no instances in Scripture of miracles performed by evil spirits, and he explains the miracles of the Egyptian enchanters as delusions ; and in the case of the appearance of Samuel to Saul, he inclines to the opinion that Samuel was raised beyond the expectation of the woman by a miracle of God's appointment.

In 1794, Paley published his "Evidences of the Christian Religion," which has become a standard book in our literature, and the merits of which all must acknowledge, even though they may dissent from some of the views propounded in it. The two fundamental propositions on which it is based, and the introductory remarks, are perhaps the most elaborate and complete confutation of Hume's sophistry which ever appeared ; and the chapters by which they are supported, altogether form a chain of argument such as few books have ever exhibited.

It will be seen by this brief sketch of the chief publications on Miracles in England, during the 18th century, how large a share they occupied of public attention. In one respect it was, perhaps, unfortunate that so much stress was laid upon this portion of the evidences of Christianity, that it might seem that the whole of the mighty fabric of evidence which God has constructed, consisted only of this one great corner-stone. This exclusive reference to miracles as proofs of the Divine origin of Christianity, was certainly not discouraged or diminished; but rather promoted by the publication of Paley's Evidences. It is a circumstance certainly to be regretted, and we know of no work more calculated to afford a corrective to this exclusive view than the Propædia Prophetica of Archdeacon (now Dean) Lyall, in which, although perhaps we might demur to some statements, yet the whole providential dealings of God in preparing among the Jewish people a testimony to the mission of our Lord from Him are so beautifully illustrated, that the work forms a most valuable accession to our literature.

But this is beside our present purpose, and we shall now merely allude to three other publications expressly on Miracles, all of which were published about twenty years ago. In 1824, Professor Lee published the "Controversial Tracts," which passed between the late Henry Martyn and some eminent Mohammedan writers, in which some degree of new interest is infused into a subject, which would almost appear to be exhausted by the constant attention which it had now engrossed for upwards of a century. The Mohammedan writers show a far greater readiness to admit the miracle, than to receive the doctrine for which it is wrought. Mirza Ibrahim, the preceptor of all the Moolas, is inclined to argue, that whatever our Lord may have wrought, there are no proof to us of his Divine mission, because they may have proceeded from magic. Magic cures diseases, and no one can say whether a further progress in the art may not enable its votaries to raise the dead. The Western deist denies the miracle, but if he believed the miracle, would admit the proof of a Divine power; the Mohammedan infidel admits the miracle, but denies the inference! We know not whether it was the publication of these tracts, which specially called the attention of Mr. Penrose to the subject, but in 1826 his very valuable Essay on Miracles was published, and followed in the same year, by an admirable and lively review of it in the British Critic, written by the Rev. C. W. Le Bas, and published separately with some additions. Mr. Penrose defines a miracle, "an act above human power," and explains his reasons for excluding from it any reference to the source from which it proceeds. He combats some of the positions of Farmer, and after showing that acts above human power may possibly be in the common course of the operation of higher beings, he contends that we cannot establish as a primary position, that none but the Supreme God can work a miracle. Mr. Penrose considers under what circumstances miracles can be adduced as evidence of a Divine commission, and having fully shown that Scripture miracles are pre-eminently endued with all which is requisite for this object, he proceeds to point out how far all other miraculous accounts fall short of them, and differ from them. Mr. Penrose also enters very fully into the inquiry, how far the consideration of the doctrines taught may be permitted to influence our views with regard to the miracle. In regard to the acceptance of other miracles beside those of Scripture, Mr. Penrose speaks very sensibly. He does not venture to draw so sweeping an inference, as to conclude that God has never worked any other miracles, but he sets forth very plainly the grounds upon which the miracles of Scripture have a just claim upon our attention; and he very properly observes, that "the question is not, whether we can put a general negative on all claims of miracles, except those of the Scriptures, or on any particular classes of such claims; but whether those claims assume a shape or a seriousness which reasonably entitles them to regard and attention."—p. 305. These and some further observations of Mr. Penrose on this portion of the subject, are quoted in the essay of Mr. Le Bas with entire approbation, and we cannot forbear to add, that they seem to us to be fraught with important and sensible considerations. We ought, perhaps, before concluding this brief sketch of the History of Opinions concerning Miracles, to state that in the year 1801, a translation was published of Marchetti's "Official Memoirs of the Juridical Examination into the Authenticity of the Miraculous Events, which happened at Rome in the years 1796-7, including the Decree of Approbation." (London: Keating and Brown, 1801.) This publication probably exercised but little influence on public opinion, as its circulation was chiefly confined to the Romanists, but it will be necessary in the course of our observations to make some allusion to its statements, and it is therefore mentioned here.

As a little episode in this history we might mention, towards the close of the last century, the attempt on the part of Dr. Alexander Geddes (professedly a Roman Catholic clergyman) to explain away the miracles of Scripture, and resolve them into mere natural events, a mode of proceeding then becoming fashionable among the Rationalists of Germany. Although unhappily too great an approximation to such a course was displayed in a "History of the Jews," published some few years ago, to which we are unwilling now to call further attention, these attempts have hitherto been looked upon with any thing but favour in England. The real end to which they must lead has been so clearly seen, that they have rather served to deter English

Upon a review, then, of the chief publications, expressly relating to miracles, which have appeared in England for a period of more than 150 years, the following would seem to be the result to which we should come. The question has been argued in almost all its phases, and a difference of opinion has existed with regard to the possibility of miracles proceeding from any thing but an interposition of the Supreme God, as well as with regard to the share which the nature of the doctrines involved may be allowed to take in our investigation of the evidence ; but on these points the last publications⁴ which appear to express the prevailing opinion in the English Church, are written in a very temperate tone, and establish, on the whole, very sound and satisfactory conclusions⁵.

The course, however, of opinion manifestly received so violent a shock in the middle of the eighteenth century, that it was long before it could recover a sound and healthy condition. Middleton attacked all Post-Apostolic miracles, and Hume attacked all miracle. The argument of Hume was a sophism, which would receive some slight countenance from any exposure of false pretensions to miracles, because it was founded on the improbability of miracles taking place, and the probability of testimony being untrue. Unjustifiable as parts of Middleton's treatise may be, it is equally true that much which he attacked was also unjustifiable, and could be accounted for on no other grounds than those of delusion and imposture. This combination of circumstances, and the further exposure of credulity and artifice, which was found in the Criterion of Douglas, appear in great measure to have influenced all subsequent discussions. All our writers were anxious to show that Hume's sophism could not damage the evidence for the miracles of Scripture, but they could not deny that it was entitled to some credit when applied to many cases of Post-Apostolic miracles. There was an absolute necessity to distinguish between the two cases, and if the process of examination has been unfavourable to the claims of other miracles upon our regard and attention, it must be acknowledged that it has resulted in a triumphant establishment of those of Scripture.

We confess that the more we study the subject, the more we are inclined to acknowledge that this result is essentially founded upon truth ; that the Scripture miracles are placed upon a foundation which cannot be shaken, whether we believe or disbelieve other miraculous narratives ; and with regard to these latter, that they do not come upon us with claims to regard which can in any way be put into competition with those of Scripture. We would further add, that we think it only natural and reasonable that a difference of opinion should exist with regard to the evidence of some particular miracles, that some Protestant divines should acknowledge its force and others deny it. We now proceed at once to the consideration of the views propounded by Mr. Newman. The following is his own statement of the conclusions to which his essay tends, but in extracting it we have ventured to place some parts of it in italics :—

“ It may be advisable to state in the commencement the conclusions to which the remarks which follow will be found to tend ; they are such as these : that ecclesiastical miracles, that is, miracles posterior to the apostolic age, are on the whole very different in object, character, and evidence, from those of Scripture on the whole, so that the one series or family ought never to be confounded with the other ; yet that the former are not, therefore, at once to be rejected ; that there was no age of miracles, after which miracles ceased ; that there have been at all times true miracles and false miracles, true accounts and false accounts ; that no authoritative guide is supplied to us for drawing the line between the two ; that some of the miracles reported were true miracles ; that we cannot be certain how many were not true ; and that, under the circumstances, the decision in particular cases is left to each individual, according to his opportunities of judging.”

From this extract it would appear, that one of the great conclusions to be established by Mr. Newman's essay, is the difference in objects, character, and evidence, between ecclesiastical and Scripture miracles, but a very large portion of the essay appears to us, on the contrary, most elaborately directed to obliterate all traces of this difference. And this attempt is made in various ways. The character of Scripture and ecclesiastical miracles is asserted here to be different, but in p. lx. and lxi., after a sort of comparison of the mission of St. Antony, St. Martin, and St. Benedict, with that of the prophets of the Old Testament, of whom Mr. Newman calls these “ great confessors or reformers,” the antitypes, we have an enumeration of the miracles of Elisha, introduced by an observation that “ much might be said of the romantic character of the prophetic miracles.” After the enumeration has been made, we are quietly told,—

“ Surely it is not too much to say, that after this inspired precedent there is little in ecclesiastical legends to offend as regards the matter ; their credibility turning, first, on whether they are to be expected at all ; and next, whether they are avouched on sufficient evidence.”

Although, therefore, the author assures us that the difference between Scripture and ecclesiastical miracles in their character, is one of the conclusions which this essay is intended to establish, we think it would hardly be possible to find language more calculated to destroy every such difference, and to place them upon a par.

But let us proceed now to another point, and see how this author deals with the difference between the two series in regard to their evidence. Among the ecclesiastical miracles in which the testimony to the facts is the strongest,—and in some cases it is probable unimpeachable,—by far the greater number are cases of exorcism and healing; and in the examination of such cases, Douglas has admitted the fact but denied the miracle, and endeavoured to show that the cures may be accounted for by natural causes. Mr. Newman, after quoting many passages of the Gospels, in which our Lord's miracles of healing are related without circumstantial minuteness, proceeds to say:

“It appears, then, that the two special powers which gave a character, as to our Lord's miraculous working, so to that of his Apostles after Him, were exorcism and healing; and, moreover, that there were, in matter of fact, the two gifts especially promised to the latter above other gifts. It appears, also, that if one other gift must be selected from the Gospels and Book of Acts as of greater prominence than the rest, it will be the gift of visions; so that cures, exorcisms, and visions are, on the whole, the three distinguishing specimens of Divine power, by which our Lord authenticated to the world the religion He bestowed upon it.” Now it has already been observed; that these are the very three especially claimed by the primitive Church; while as to the more stupendous miracles of raising the dead, giving sight to the blind, cleansing lepers, and the like of these, she makes profession also, but very rarely, as if after the manner of Scripture.” (Pr. lxxxiii. 4.)

Now in this passage there is a statement which we cannot admit for a moment. These three gifts might be the most frequently exercised, or their exercise most frequently recorded in Scripture, but it is impossible to allow that they are the distinguishing specimens of Divine power, by which Christianity was authenticated. It would almost seem as if Divine Providence, from an anticipation of the difficulties to which such an authentication would have been exposed had it stood alone, has mercifully vouchsafed other manifestations of supernatural power, which could by no possibility be capable of such explanations as we are often compelled to give, of instances of miraculous interposition, which imply only these gifts. No reasonable explanation can be given of the raising of Lazarus, of the cure of the man born blind, examined and allowed by the enemies of our Lord, which admits the facts and denies the miracle. But it is absolutely trifling with the question to place the authentication of Christianity even upon these latter miracles alone, how stupendous soever they may be, and to leave out the Resurrection and Ascension of the Lord, and the Descent of the Holy Spirit, and the unequivocal Gift of Tongues.

But as we proceed in this part of the essay, we shall perceive still stranger attempts to confound the evidence for ecclesiastical miracles with that of Scripture. Does Douglas argue that the Jews and Gentiles professed to exorcise and cast out devils, and add that some may think this circumstance puts these feats of jugglers and impostors on the same footing of credibility with the works ascribed to Christians! Mr. Newman subjoins the inquiry, "Why not with the works ascribed to Apostles?" Again, with regard to the cures ascribed to the prayers of Christians, to the imposition of their hands, &c., in those early times, Bishop Douglas argues that they "might, for ought we know, be really brought about in a natural way, and be accounted for in the same way in which we have accounted for those ascribed to the Abbé Paris, and those attributed by the superstitious Papists to the intercession of the saints;" on which Mr. Newman remarks, "Perhaps the acute unbelievers of Corinth or Ephesus, by a parallel argument, justified their rejection of St. Paul." And thus each objection of Douglas is, as it were, met by applying it to Scripture. Whether this be more likely to raise the evidence for ecclesiastical miracles, or to lower that for Scripture, we think may safely be left to the judgment of every unprejudiced reader. We confess, that to us it is a circumstance of no common thankfulness that we are not reduced to a dependence on these miracles alone for an answer to the acute unbelievers either of Ephesus, of Corinth, or of England and France. But there is one assertion of Mr. Newman so often repeated, and yet so very far from true, that although we have already casually adverted to it, we must still call more pointed attention to its utter unsoundness. The author states in one page that these gifts, the ambiguity of which is attempted to be shown by Douglas, were the distinguishing specimens of Divine power, by which our Lord authenticated to the world the religion He bestowed upon it."—p. 83. In another, that they (or rather two of them) are the prominent external signs of power in the history of our Lord and of his Apostles (p. 85); and lastly, in another⁷, that it was by these two gifts that the Apostles

"in matter of fact converted the world.—p. lxxxvii. These repeated statements of the same circumstances (and they are not all which might be adduced) show the great stress which the author lays upon it, but we contend that it is a statement which is grounded upon more than one fallacy. In the first place, there is one great difference in the circumstances under which these miracles were performed. It is one thing to perform them among and upon professed believers, another to perform them in the midst of enemies and unbelievers. But not to insist on these differences, we deny that it was to them alone that the Apostles trusted in the conversion of the world; we acknowledge that they really were a means of awakening the attention of the world to God's presence among them, and his mission to them, but it was only as making way for a most important and stupendous revelation of God's will, testified by miracles of another character, a character liable to no suspicion, and capable of no ambiguity. And in this estimate, it is left out of the account that these very miracles were the predicted signs of the Messiah. There is no fallacy, we contend, more evident, than that of assigning the conversion of the world to these miracles as the one great means. They might be and were, one great means of calling attention to God's message; being stronger, as Mr. Newman intimates, as evidence to those who saw them, than to us who read of them. They are to us among those miracles of Scripture which "are received only on the credit of the system of which they form a part."—p. lv. At all events, the eternal wisdom of God has subjected us to no such trial of our faith as to trust to these alone.

Without any desire to press unfairly on the author, we must point out the very great difference in the two cases. Those miracles in Scripture, the evidence of which rests to us on the credit of the others, were a great means, we acknowledge, of obtaining attention to God's great message to mankind, which was attested by other miracles of an entirely unambiguous kind, furnished with evidence which reaches in undiminished strength to the end of time. On the contrary, the strength of the case of ecclesiastical miracles lies almost entirely in those of this ambiguous class. This simple statement will, we trust, be sufficient position and style from the earlier portions of the sacred volume, and present a view of the miraculous dealings of the Almighty with His Church, very much resembling what we disparage in ecclesiastical legends, or again in the historical portions of the Apocrypha, as poetical or dramatic."—p. lxii.

"If the miracles of Church history cannot be defended by the arguments of Leslie, Lyttelton, Paley, or Douglas, how many of the Scripture miracles satisfy their conditions?"—p. xvii.

to show that those inquirers who desire to follow the truth, will place a broad boundary line between the two, and not allow such representations as these to obliterate it. Mr. Newman professes to establish such a line, but we have seen how the course of his reasoning tends altogether to a different conclusion. And if we acknowledge that this difference has been brought forward more prominently within the last century, let it be remembered that it was a matter of necessity. The Treatise of Middleton was in some respects a gratuitous attack on ecclesiastical miracles; but the work of Douglas was imperatively called for by the Essay of Hume, and by the use which was made of the alleged miracles at the tomb of the Abbé Paris.

We now proceed to another branch of the argument.

Mr. Newman, in the beginning of Section IV., enters on the consideration of the manner in which the argument of Hume has been treated by his opponents, and endeavours to show that his maxim has influenced them in their rejection of ecclesiastical miracles, after they have discarded it as applied to those of Scripture. Douglas^a is the writer whom he selects more particularly for animadversion, and while he complains of his incredulity in regard to all ecclesiastical miracles, attempts to show that it is unreasonable. He observes of Protestant writers generally, on this point, that “ Though they are earnest in their protest against Hume’s summary rejection of all miraculous histories whatever, they make admissions, which only do not tell against the principal Scripture miracles, and tell against all others. They tacitly grant that the antecedent improbability of miracles is so great, that it can only be overcome by the strongest and most overpowering evidence; that second best evidence does not even tend to prove them; that they are absolutely incredible up to the moment that all doubt is decisively set at rest that they may be treated altogether as fictions, till they are clearly proved to be truths.”—p. 67.

The author then proceeds to observe, “ It looks like a mere truism to say, that a fact is not disproved because it is not proved,” &c. A statement in which we fully concur; and if it be applied merely to modify the positive manner in which Douglas sometimes concludes the falsehood of the story from the insufficiency of the evidence, we are ready at once to acknowledge its justice. But we cannot assign to it the degree of weight which it deserves, without coupling it with what its author, no doubt, would call another "truism," which is to this effect ; "Although the facts are not disproved because they are not proved," yet till they are proved, they do not come forward with any claim on our belief. Mr. Newman will indeed assure us that they have a claim, as we shall shortly see, because they have, in his view, an antecedent probability. But in the estimate here given of the opinions of Douglas, we think great injustice is done to him. He uses these strong expressions in some parts of his work, and some allowance must be made for a person who has been occupied in the consideration of numerous accounts where miracles are claimed, which after all may and ought to be explained by natural causes. The constant recurrence of such a phenomenon is apt to lead to a great suspicion that it is so general as to be almost universal, unless some strong grounds for exemption shall appear in any particular case. It has been seen that such grounds do occur in Scripture miracles ; those which might in their nature be liable to this ambiguity, are clearly evidenced to be miracles, because they are found in an inspired narrative of circumstances which are plainly and unequivocally miraculous. They are part of a dispensation proved, independently of them, to be miraculous, and, therefore, are in a totally different condition from those of the same class, which are the only vouchers for the occurrence of miracles. One cannot fail to see that such investigations as Douglas was obliged to enter into, would infuse a suspicion in many cases, where previously he might have been willing to acquiesce ; but Mr. Newman appears to us in the following passage to treat Douglas with unfairness :—

"Now these passages from Douglas have been drawn out, not with a view of criticising him, but in order to direct attention to the fact which he illustrates, viz., that our feeling towards the ecclesiastical miracles turns much less on the evidence producible for them, than on our view concerning their antecedent probability. If we think such interpositions of Providence likely, or not unlikely, there is quite enough evidence existing to convince us that they really do occur ; if we think them as unlikely as they appear to Douglas, Middleton, and others, then even evidence, as great as that which is producible for the miracles of Scripture, would not be too much, nay, perhaps not enough, to conquer an inveterate, deep-rooted, and (as it may be called) ethical incredulity."

In regard to Douglas, it seems hard that this judgment should be passed on him for writing a book, the express object of which is to show that the evidence for Scripture miracles infallibly proves their reality, and that the evidence for other miracles does not ; it is hard, we say, to turn round on Douglas, and say that

Scripture evidence would not be enough to convince him in another case, when his whole object is to prove that it is so strong that it must be received! But this is not all; it would appear from this extract that Douglas is so hard and incredulous, that no miraculous interposition since the times of the Apostles can possibly find an entrance into his circle of belief. And yet, towards the conclusion of his treatise, Douglas expressly declares the contrary, for, after dividing miracles into two sorts, "either events brought about by God's immediate invisible interposition, or works performed by the agency of men made use of as his instruments," he states that the "controversy" (between Middleton and his opponents) "doth not at all relate to miracles of invisible agency." He then adds, "Had Dr. Middleton maintained that there have been no such interpositions of Providence since the times of the Gospel, he could have been refuted by the meanest of his antagonists." Douglas then specifies some instances of such interposition, especially the constancy of the martyrs, which he attributes to God's invisible agency, but places these personal assistances, and in general, the visions, revelations, &c., of those ages, out of the way, as being but little to his purpose, "because, however certain the persons to whom they were granted might be of their reality, they are of a nature not capable of being supported by testimony, and consequently, properly speaking, not miraculous; to us, at the least, it cannot be made to appear so."—pp. 365, 366. He then instances the defeat of Julian's attempt to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem as a signal interposition of Providence, so proved by testimony, "that he who denies it will scarcely be able to assign a reason for admitting the certainty of any distant fact."—p. 367. Neither this, nor the language of Douglas a little further on (p. 386), where he says—"Thus much with regard to the miraculous powers of the three first ages; but if there should be room for allowing (and I am far from denying this) that these ought, in justice, to be distinguished from the more modern and more suspicious pretensions of Popery, surely this favourable opinion cannot be extended, by any one who hath examined the subject, to the claims of the fourth and fifth centuries,"—is consistent with a character of obstinate incredulity, such as Mr. Newman would seem here to attribute to him.

But although justice to Bishop Douglas required this elucidation of his views, we must not evade the great question which is here opened. Mr. Newman, in the passage just cited, seems to intimate that the question of the existence of miracles is settled rather by our "views concerning their antecedent probability," than by the evidence producible for them. If we make a practical application of this statement, it seems almost like a truism. The man who believes these miracles probable, will, of course, be satisfied with evidence of a less cogent character than he who deems them improbable. From the very nature of our minds it must be so ; and in point of fact, in this, and all similar cases, we find it to be so. We suppose the evidence which satisfied our forefathers of the reality of the mysterious agency of witchcraft, would fail to convince the present generation. The stories concerning the evil eye, which are unquestioned and undoubted proofs to a Neapolitan of the reasonableness of that fear which he entertains of the Jettatura, would, in all probability, be insufficient to bring our countrymen under its influence ; and even ocular demonstration does not bar the Protestant from denying that the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius is a miracle.

All this is true, but it seems to us quite beside the purpose, except as a mere passing remark, in a dissertation on miracles. The evidence for their occurrence is surely capable of being drawn out, objectively, without any reference to subjective prepossessions, and we contend that on the strength of that evidence, so drawn out, our decision ought to be founded. In estimating this evidence, we do not deny that their antecedent probability forms an argument. If it can be fairly shown, let it have its due weight, it is then objective argument. If it can be shown, à priori, that it is probable that miracles should last to the end of time, that is a species of evidence in their favour, but it must be shown independently, or we shall be proving their probability by assuming their occurrence, and then arguing their occurrence by their antecedent probability. Thus if we compare the Ecclesiastical miracles with the Prophetical, and consider that these two economies answer to each other, both in a general semblance and in their position in the two covenants⁹, we are preparing the way, no doubt, towards establishing an antecedent probability in their favour, but it is by assuming their occurrence. It is obvious that it is necessary, therefore, to consider the question of this antecedent probability with great care. And in treating this part of the subject, we think that Mr. Newman has unconsciously, we doubt not, in some degree laid himself open to the charge of arguing in a circle. Although apparently only answering an objection against the Ecclesiastical miracles, as fantastical and absurd, he has, in the early part of this essay, contrived to work up the argument of analogy into something like a positive presumption in favour of their occurrence. In the first place, after alluding to the great variety in the works of nature, especially in the animal kingdom, Mr. Newman makes some remarks on the surprise with which persons view, after some interval, or for the first time, the exhibition of a menagerie. "They have been accustomed to identify the wonder-working hand of God with the specimens of its exercise which they see around them;" they are accustomed to domestic animals, and although they have read of wild beasts, the reality seems too strange for them. And much of the same class, he then intimates, may be the variety in the works of God as displayed in miracles. The miracles of Scripture in this comparison answer to the tame animals, and the ecclesiastical legends to the menagerie, and the variety of nature is made "antecedently a reason for expecting a variety in a supernatural agency, if it be introduced."—p. l. "There is far greater difference," we are told, "between the appearance of a horse, or an eagle, and a monkey, or a lion and a mouse, as they meet our eye, than between the most august of the Divine manifestations in Scripture, and the meanest and most fanciful of those legends which we are accustomed, without further examination, to cast aside."—p. xlix. We cannot admit the cogency, though we may admire the ingenuity of this analogy. It has been very much the fashion among those who estimate Mr. Newman most highly, to compare him to the great thinker of the last century, Bishop Butler, but we apprehend it will not be on account of this analogy. It might, perhaps, occur to a maliciously-minded person to pursue the analogy a little further. Instead of being brought into a real menagerie of living animals, where there can scarcely be any deception, let us suppose the stranger introduced into a museum of stuffed or dried specimens, and to have an opportunity of examining their structure. Suppose upon examining a great many of them, he should find that they were made up, that the head of one species was accommodated with the tail or the legs of another, and such pranks of the imagination played, that Mermaids and Centaurs were quite ordinary exhibitions in the cases of this museum, we certainly think that his credit in the genuineness of the collection generally would be considerably shaken. And those who, like Douglas, were obliged to anatomize a great many specimens, have perhaps found this result.

But to proceed with our argument. Mr. Newman then argues that "the miracles of Scripture are a greater innovation on the economy of nature, than the miracles of the Church upon the economy of Scripture" (p. 53): and very properly warns us against condemning the miracles of the Church by an à priori argument of propriety, and intimates that they who have done so, have before now condemned the notion of a miracle altogether, as a barbarous and unphilosophical notion¹. We are quite willing to concede to the author what he elsewhere observes, that the Scripture miracles have borne the brunt of this presumption, and that they have altogether destroyed the edge of the weapon as an argument against miracles as miracles; but this admission leaves it quite open to us to believe that they are rare, and to think that there is an improbability about them which it requires strong evidence to overcome.

But leaving this out of the question, let us see the next stage in the presumption which Mr. Newman is here building up, in favour of these ecclesiastical miracles. We are next told that "the question has hitherto been argued on the admission, that a distinct line can be drawn in point of character and circumstances, between the miracles of Scripture and of Church history; but this is by no means the case²." And Mr. Newman then enumerates some ecclesiastical miracles as awful in their character, and as momentous in their effects as those of Scripture; and on the other hand, points out some of those in Scripture which seem most nearly to approach the character of the legendary miracles. The only answer to this is, we think, that man must feel his utter inadequacy to assign the objects for which a miracle might be wrought by God; or to judge what miracles would be proper in each case; and that he flies to the examination of evidence, as the ground of his judgment, with thankfulness to God that He has endued him with faculties fitted at least for that purpose. It is impossible to help feeling, of course, that some occasions would naturally appear to him more likely to call them forth, and some miracles more unlikely to occur, but he soon learns that the whole question is too great for him, and that he must approach it with profound humility and distrust of his own powers. Those miracles of Scripture which appear "difficult" to him, he finds in an inspired record of God's dealings with mankind, furnished with undoubted evidence of having come from God, and he studies that book to learn the ways of God; where he is permitted to understand, he feels his mind expanded and enlarged; where he sees but dimly and darkly, he is but gently reminded of his feebleness and ignorance. Mr. Newman then draws out a sort of comparison between the two series of miracles, with a view to show their connexion and intermixture; but this we only mention in a cursory way, in order that we may hasten to the last stage in this process of accumulation. The author, lastly, intimates that the ecclesiastical miracles have an assignable place in God's dealings. "There exists," he tells us, "a sort of analogy between the ecclesiastical and evangelical histories, and the prophetic and Mosaic. The prophetic and ecclesiastical are each in its place a sort of supplement to the supernatural manifestations with which the respective dispensations open, and present a similar internal character." The analogy is further pursued; for as miraculous powers seemed to be revived in the prophets, though miraculous interpositions had never wholly ceased³, and as they revived in Elijah and Elisha,—so the gift of miracles was restricted in the first centuries, compared with the exuberant exercise recorded of it in the fourth and fifth, when it was revived in special connexion with the ascetics and solitaries. This comparison is carried on at a length which it would be inconvenient and unnecessary to detail, but it ends with a statement which might have warned us of the road on which the author was then travelling. He says, that if it be urged "that the ecclesiastical miracles virtually form a new dispensation, we need not deny it in the sense in which the prophetic miracles are distinct from the Mosaic, not as repealing the law, but as a new exhibition of that supernatural Presence, which overshadowed Israel from first to last."

² We should be sorry to urge here upon Mr. Newman the necessity of abiding by one alternative or the other. If the two series are alike, the argument from the variety of nature is out of place. But we should not press this consideration, because the nature of each series is mixed, as the author afterwards points out.

"And it may be added," Mr. Newman proceeds, "that as a gradual revelation of Gospel truth accompanied the miracles of the prophets, so to those who admit the Catholic doctrines as enunciated in the creed, and commented on by the fathers, the subsequent expansion and variation of supernatural agency in the Church, instead of suggesting difficulties, will seem but parallel, as they are contemporaneous to the developments, additions, and changes in dogmatic statements, which have occurred between the Apostolic and the present age, and which are but a result and evidence of life."

It would be very desirable in analyzing these notions, to be distinctly informed of the relative positions of doctrines and miracles; to know which of the two is to be accepted as a voucher for the other. It has pleased God in giving us a revelation, to furnish it with evidence which brings it home to us, and when the evidence is admitted the doctrines must be received; and we conclude that if any new Gospel was to be preached, it would be provided with evidence as unexceptionable. But this is the very point in dispute. The evidence is so unsatisfactory, at best, for the miracles of a later age than the Apostles, or at all events after the first three centuries, that our doubts of their occurrence are increased in a manifold ratio, when we find them to be the vouchers for a new body of doctrine. We are quite willing to admire the vividness and power with which Mr. Newman seizes upon every circumstance, which can present the dealings of God to us in a beautiful and symmetrical form; it seems to be, as it were, a part of his religious nature: but in this instance we think that he has allowed his love of analogy to lead him to an entirely improper use of its teaching. We feel the beauty of Butler's Analogy too warmly, not to be extremely jealous of any thing which may seem to lessen the value of the chief argument on which it rests. And few things can be more prejudicial to its persuasiveness, than to see something like an imitation of it which leads to unsound conclusions. It would, in the present instance, have been available, we willingly admit, to answer presumptions against these miracles, if cogent evidence is offered to prove their occurrence; but the mere circumstance that an ingenious and religiously-disposed mind can think out an analogy for them, and assign a place in God's dispensation to them, is hardly to be used as a presumption in their favour, and stand in the place of evidence. We do not mean that their antecedent probability is placed upon this basis alone; but still we think that in this respect the argument is unfairly used.

Another ground on which the antecedent probability is argued, are the declarations of our Lord in the Gospel of St. Mark, where He enumerates the "signs" which "shall follow them that believe."—St. Mark xvi. 17—19. This is, no doubt, a grave and important consideration, and we ought to be very careful in our interpretation of such a passage; but at the same time it is obvious, that it leaves the question entirely open, as to the time to which the performance of this promise must extend. The fulfilment of the prophecy is recorded in the last verse of the same chapter, which declares that they "went forth, and preached every where, the Lord working with them, and confirming the word with signs following." We are not here arguing for its restriction to this one fulfilment; but we contend that this declaration of the Evangelist, and the fuller exposition of these signs, as wrought by the Apostles and recorded in the Acts, altogether satisfy the conditions of the promise. We have heard it sometimes remarked, that the gift of miracles was bestowed on the Church, and its withdrawal is no where intimated; and while we admit the assertion, we must limit its cogency. It is valid, as far as it goes, only against peremptory conclusions, that no other miracles have been, or ever will be, performed in the Church. But the number of those, at least among well-informed or thinking men, who would attempt or wish to establish such a conclusion must be so few, as to be utterly insignificant, so that we cannot think this maxim of quite as much importance as those who quote it appear to deem it.

There is another maxim, for which we do not wish to make Mr. Newman responsible, but which it was our destiny to hear in several quarters, as soon as the discussion of these questions was set on foot by him, and practically illustrated by the Lives of the Saints. It is, that unbelief is a very bad condition for the mind of man, and that belief is so much better for him than unbelief, that we ought rather to accept these stories with tenderness and faith, than critically and sceptically to doubt them. With much respect for the tender feeling which dictated this maxim, we must consider it altogether lacking in wisdom. If we are asked whether it was a better and a happier state of mind for a heathen to attribute his recovery from disease to Esculapius, and make his offering in gratitude for the cure, than to scoff at such a belief, we should acknowledge that there this maxim might have some weight. He had no guide to truth, and if he gave up that faint hope and that feebly supported belief, he had nothing to fall back upon, he had nothing with which he could satisfy the desire of the human heart after some relations with a Power above, which nothing can altogether obliterate. But a Christian has a guide to truth, which commands him to try the spirits, whether they be of God, and he must be careful lest this easiness of belief should lead him to views utterly at variance with the doctrines of that infallible guide. But, surely, we are chargeable with no evil spirit of unbelief, if we acknowledge the mercies of God, and recognize his healing hand, although we discard the intercession of a saint, or doubt the virtue of a relic. These two maxims we should have thought scarcely worthy of animadversion, if we did not happen to know how widely they have spread, and how disproportionate the influence is which they have exercised, to their real validity.

The last observation which we shall now make on the argumentative portion of this essay, is on the reflections with which it concludes⁴. After remarking that the fathers⁵ wrote for contemporaries not for us, and that they did not foresee that evidence would become a science, doubt be thought a merit, and disbelief a privilege, and the author further observes, that,

⁵ In using language in regard to miracles which indicated their frequent occurrence ; as notorious facts, &c.

“ They did not feel that man was so self-sufficient, and so happy in his prospects for the future, that he might reasonably sit at home, closing his ears to all reports of Divine interposition, till they were actually brought before his eyes, and faith was superseded by sense ; they did not so disparage the Spouse of Christ, as to imagine that she should be accounted, by professing Christians, a school of error, and a workshop of fraud and imposture.”—pp. ciii. civ.

The chief conclusion which one seems to gather from the former part of this sentence, is an acknowledgment that the evidence of the Gospel and the truths of Scripture are insufficient for the comfort and happiness of man, unless they are supported by the testimony of these interpositions ; a conclusion against which we must protest, until we are assured on evidence, as strong as that for Scripture, that the Almighty has thought it necessary to vouchsafe this supplement to his word. The latter part would carry more weight, if unfortunately history did not intervene to show that the Romish Church, at all events, has given too much countenance to such an accusation. Until we are prepared to admit such claims as the liquefaction of the blood of St. Januarius, annually exhibited to the Neapolitan world, to the title of miracles, or the miraculous movements of the images of Italy, attested at the beginning of this century by cardinals, and every grade of laity and clergy, and sanctioned by the pope, we are unhappily reduced to the necessity of strict examination and consequent rejection. We have, however, a consolation in remembering, that our incredulity here must date from very early times, and may be supported by the best authority. The rule which St. Augustine applied to the miracles of the Donatists, expresses with greater brevity than we have elsewhere seen, the explanation which after all must be given, unless we renounce all claim to any use of our reason in the matter.

“ Nemo ergo vobis fabulas vendat. Et Pontius fecit miraculum, et Donatus oravit, et respondet ei Deus de cœlo. Primo, aut fallunt aut falluntur.”—Aug. Expos. in Evang. Joann. Tract. xiii. de Cap. iii.

This is St. Augustine's first rule ; his second is, that no miracle is to be listened to, if claimed by those who break the unity of the Church. But, unhappily, the first rule is but too applicable to the claim of miracles put forth by the Church of Rome, and if it be very widely applied, the responsibility must rest with those who made its application necessary by their frauds and delusions.

We do not profess to have considered all which is brought forward in this essay, but those which we have selected are salient points of the argument. We have endeavoured to place before the reader some of the reflections which have suggested themselves to us, from the time we first read the work, and which we think calculated to diminish the evil likely to be caused by these speculations. That Mr. Newman was actuated only by a desire to preserve that which he believed to be true and holy from an unrighteous judgment, we are quite willing to concede; but that concession cannot blind us to the mischievous consequence of such a treatise. We believe that, instead of raising the evidence for ecclesiastical miracles, its chief effect must be, if admitted, to lower that for Scripture. That this, again, is an effect which its author, gifted as he is with so many qualities calculated to command esteem, would deprecate, we have no doubt. But we have endeavoured to judge calmly and truly concerning this essay, and we can come to no other conclusion.

The remainder of the preliminary matter to Fleury is occupied with an examination of the evidence of some particular miracles, alleged to have occurred before the end of the fourth century. Nine instances are selected, which are as follows :—

1. The Thundering Legion.
2. The change of water into oil by St. Narcissus of Jerusalem.
3. The miracle wrought on the course of the river Lycus by St. Gregory Thaumaturgus.
4. Constantine's Luminous Cross.
5. The discovery of the Holy Cross.
6. The death of Arius.
7. The fiery eruption on Julian's attempt to rebuild the Jewish Temple.
8. The recovery of the blind man by the relics of St. Gervasius and St. Protasius at Milan.
9. The Miracle upon the African Confessors in the Arian persecution, mutilated by Hunneric.

Of these, the first and the last (and perhaps the death of Arius) are of that class in which, although the fact is indisputable, its miraculous nature is questionable, we mean the Thundering Legion and the Confessors, who spoke clearly after the excision of their tongues. The cases of Narcissus and of Gregory repose upon testimony which is rather late; the miracle of Narcissus is reported by Eusebius on tradition. Narcissus having died early in the third century, (about A.D. 212,) and Eusebius having been born A.D. 264; and the miracle of St. Gregory depends on the testimony of St. Gregory of Nyssa, who was not born till more than sixty years after his death, and although he received information from Macrina, his grandmother, who had been brought up at Neocæsarea by the disciples of St. Gregory, yet this testimony can hardly be considered very satisfactory. The testimony to the Luminous Cross of Constantine is certainly contemporary evidence, but it is surrounded with so many grave difficulties, that we cannot see how it can be placed in comparison with the evidences for Scripture miracles. Our space will not admit of our entering into the question of the discourses of the Holy Cross. It has been discussed at great length by Mr. Newman and Dr. Robinson; the latter of whom has written a great deal to prove that Helena, as other writers had maintained before, fixed upon a wrong site for the holy sepulchre. To those who desire to form a judgment on the subject, we must recommend Dr. Robinson's "Biblical Researches," Mr. Newman's discussion in this treatise, and Dr. Robinson's reply in the first number of the "Bibliotheca Sacra." We must decline giving any opinion till after a more rigorous examination of both sides of the argument. But with regard to the miracles said to be wrought on the discovery of the cross, they rest on very feeble testimony, even as stated by Mr. Newman. There remains, however, one miracle which seems to us one of the best authenticated of all antiquity, and yet even that is liable to no small amount of suspicion. We mean the recovery of the blind man at Milan. There is no doubt that St. Ambrose, Paulinus, and St. Augustine believed that a butcher, named Severus, who had for some time been blind, received his sight on touching the relics of St. Gervasius and St. Protasius, that St. Augustine was at Milan at the time, and that this miracle is reported by them⁶. There is, however, when we compare this miracle with those of the Gospel, that wide difference in the strength of the testimony, that even this is left at an immeasurable distance from them in point of evidence. The ready credence which such miracles then received from St. Augustine, who gave to it what Paley justly calls an otiose assent, rather precludes any belief that he should have instituted any strict inquiry as to the previous circumstances of the man's illness. Nor does it appear that St. Ambrose thought this requisite. If we compare the case of the blind man in the Gospel restored to sight, we find that he was blind from birth, that the case was inquired into by a judicial committee, as it were, composed of our Lord's enemies; and lastly, as another point of difference of great moment, though the court was opposed to St. Ambrose, yet the great mass of the populace was in his favour; he was at the head, therefore, of a large and powerful party, which ultimately prevailed. We have always considered this miracle to be, perhaps, the one which has, upon the whole, the strongest claim to attention of any which we find recorded in the first four centuries; but, on examination, we cannot fail to see how far the evidence in its favour falls short of that with which it has pleased God, in his mercy, to substantiate the great miracles of revelation.

In regard to Julian's attempt to rebuild the temple at Jerusalem, we have before cited the admission of Bishop Douglas that he considers it a Divine interposition, and in this opinion the greater number of modern writers, we believe, coincide. It is obviously impossible in the limited space of one article to examine minutely each of these miracles. Our object has been briefly to point out the difference which really exists between them and the Scripture miracles; a task which, however humble, cannot be considered useless, so long as any attempt can be made to place them on any thing like the same footing.

The principal points brought forward in the discussion by Mr. Newman having now been touched upon, we shall briefly illustrate the rapid development which this doctrine of the trustworthiness of the Ecclesiastical miracles received in the Lives of the Saints, published very shortly after the appearance of this dissertation. Mr. Newman intimates in one part of his Essay, that the same principles on which he defends primitive miracles will defend the mediæval, and accordingly, these biographies are constructed on the broad ground of admitting the legendary stories of miracles to a considerable degree of credit. It is carried in some cases to such a morbid extent, that it is thought necessary gravely to apologize for venturing to look upon the story of St. Helier carrying his own head in his hands as a fable. The legendary belief in certain miracles is accepted as a voucher that other miracles, if not those actually narrated, were really wrought; so that at last we are led to imagine that in history and biography we are not to examine evidence, but, as we are writing or reading for edification, we may take that which appears the most edifying as a subject of meditation. It was happily suggested in a contemporary periodical, that if one desired to give a person unacquainted with German Rationalism and the extravagancies of Strauss, a notion of what they supposed to be the explanation of the wonders of Revelation, by assuming that they are mythical narratives, the transition from myth to history could hardly be better illustrated than by these volumes. It is here an openly avowed principle, and defended on the ground that by these means only can we obtain an adequate and faithful representation of these holy men of old.

We have no wish to use any harsh or uncharitable language towards men, whose religious sensibilities have been strongly awakened, although one cannot but condemn the direction which they have taken ; but at the same time we see no term which can properly be applied to such compositions, except that of religious romances. It is a very grave question, whether it is at all proper thus to tamper with truth in matters of so great importance ; whether the habit of representing things thus fictitiously be not apt to engender a disregard of truth ; but we can use no terms too strong for the reprobation we feel for such representations, when their authors would impose them upon us for history. Their intentions may be good, but the means they use are deplorably wrong and mischievous. The natural effect of such compositions must be to lower the love for truth as truth, both in the author and his readers, and to unfit the mind for discrimination between truth and falsehood, and thus to introduce confusion and doubt into those very regions from which they would wish to banish scepticism. This is one of those consequences, somewhat in the way of judgments, which a disregard of truth seems usually to bring. It will not allow its majesty to be insulted with impunity. And with the authors of these Lives it would seem almost that while they are writing these romances, and even while they are conscious of the mythical dress with which they invest their narrative, they impose upon themselves, and actually believe that they are writing very profound and true histories. The introduction to the life of St. German remarkably illustrates this effect.

“ Care has been taken in the annexed work, to avoid as far as possible all dogmatism upon disputed points of doctrine and discipline. The austerities of saints and the miracles they performed, are, in some measure, an exception ; both because the numbers of those who have ungenial feelings with regard to them are gradually diminishing, and because they form, as it were, the very substance of ancient hierology. At the same time, many things which are out of date in this country, have been produced just as they were found in original documents, for the sake of historical veracity. Facts have been often related as facts, without any intention of proposing them as examples. For which reason little has been said about the development of any principle into its consequences, or the different stages of the process, as necessarily involving an opinion and a decision upon the thing developed, or the reality of the development. Those miracles which have been given without any stress upon the authority or evidence, are here con- sidered true and credible as far as testimony can make any thing credible. Still on the circumstances and accidents chiefly has the weight been laid, inasmuch as probable evidence varies in its influence in proportion to the shades of human disposition and prejudice. Where no authority is given, that of Constantius, the contemporary of St. German, must be supposed; elsewhere the author, or the sources of the information, are distinctly marked. Hericus, the commentator of Constantius, after his original, stands out among the recorders of these miracles."

In the passage which we have placed in italics, the assertion with which it closes is not a little astounding. We confess there is an obscurity about the condition expressed in these words, "which have been given without any stress upon the authority or evidence," which we cannot profess to clear up. But there is no ambiguity about the declaration, that some of these miracles are considered true and credible, as far as testimony can make any thing credible. These words are very strong, and if spoken deliberately, we must consider them calculated most awfully to pervert the truth, and to undermine all faith in historical evidence and testimony. If such miracles as are recorded in this volume are "true and credible," as far as testimony can make any thing credible, they are placed in this respect on a footing of certainty equal to that on which the Holy Scriptures stand. The doctrine professedly maintained⁷ in the Essay on Miracles was, that Ecclesiastical and Scriptural miracles differed in their evidence and character; but the doctrine was not afloat two years before it received a development, by which we find that the evidence for these miracles is as good as testimony can make it. And as we proceed, we shall find that the difference which was once allowed in character, has ceased to be acknowledged. In p. 83, the author speaking of this difference, says—

"Allowing the truth of the remark, still it seems more applicable to the four first centuries of the Church than to the fifth; and again, to public miracles, which affect the Church in general, than to those which rather regard individuals. The miracles of German," he continues, "as will be observed, bear in many cases a strong resemblance to those of our Lord and his Apostles. They are not less striking in the power they evince, the effects they produce, or the publicity with which they were performed."

The first miracle which immediately follows on this deliberate comparison with the miracles of Scripture, is an account of a man with an evil spirit, who had absconded with a bag of money, and who was brought before German, who was unable to make him confess his crime. When, however, German proceeded to church to celebrate mass, and had, after the Salutation to the Congregation, fallen prostrate, while he was praying, "the prisoner of Satan, who had been brought to the church, was seen to be raised in the air above the people, and enveloped in a blaze of fire. His cries filled the place, and spread consternation among all. Suddenly with a loud voice he called out the name of German, and made public confession of his theft." The two next narratives are exorcisms of a similar character^s; the third is an account of a spectre which appeared to the reader of German in a deserted ruin, while German was asleep. The spectre declared that he and a comrade who had been guilty of great crimes were unburied, and deprived of the rest which belonged to other departed spirits. St. German discovers the corpses, buries them, and makes intercession to obtain rest for the departed, and peace for the living; from which time the deserted ruin was no longer disturbed, and became a flourishing and prosperous abode. The last miracle recorded in this chapter (which is, however, only a prelude to the greater miracles of a subsequent date) was wrought upon a cock, who would not crow and awake his master, as he was bound in all duty to do; and German having blessed some wheat and given it to the refractory fowl, unloosed his tongue. This deed, the author tells us, was likely to remain impressed on the minds of the poor, though the rich might have forgotten it; and after reminding us that circumstances which may appear trivial to some are important to others, he ends the chapter with this reflection:—

"Thus could our Lord adapt his wonderful signs to the wants of men, at one time turning water into wine, at another multiplying the loaves, at another taking a fish for the piece of money it contained."

^s The general remarks which we have made in a former part of this article on exorcisms require a slight addition. We protest, with all the earnestness which such questions demand, altogether against the rationalistic method of explanation, adopted by Farmer, and looked upon, we think, too favourably by Douglas, by which all cases of possession, as recorded in Scripture, are resolved into mere physical and mental diseases. But while we make this earnest protest, we must remark, that we are not prepared to take the converse, and resolve insanity in our own days into demoniacal possession. There are some very interesting remarks on this subject in Mr. Trench's Notes on the Miracles, p. 150—178; in his consideration of the case of the demoniacs among the Gadarenes. He gives many interesting references to Heinroth and other foreign psychologists. But the whole question is one of peculiar difficulty and delicacy, and requires most careful thought. Mr. Trench is always instructive, from his learning and his brilliant thoughts, even when one cannot wholly go along with him.

There are, we are compelled to believe, persons who think this mode of writing proper and edifying ; but we should deem it almost an insult to the understanding of our readers, if we thought it necessary to point out at any length the lamentable evils which to our apprehension it exhibits. This desire to give undue honour to the saints brings that which ought to be dearer and more revered than the saints into dishonour ! We do not see at least what effect can possibly result from such a course, except to expose Scripture to the danger of that irreverence and contempt from which these authors seem so anxious to shield the mediæval saints. It is not, of course, worth while to occupy more space in collecting details of these legendary stories from the different parts already published of this extraordinary series. We have not selected the most offensive, but those to which we have called attention, are sufficient to exhibit the nature of this very rapid development of the principles contained in the essay prefixed to the translation of Fleury, and, we should think, to show the extreme danger and extravagance of such a course to all men of sound mind, who have not resigned themselves to the teaching of such unsafe guides.

But the principle of the Essay is calculated, and its author seems aware of the fact, to defend, not only mediæval miracles, but the miracles of the present day : one of the conclusions to which it tends is, that there was no age after which miracles ceased. The arguments appear to us quite as strong in favour of the miraculous images of Italy as of primitive and mediæval miracles. We know that the answer to this will be, that the presumption in their favour is equal, but that Mr. Newman acknowledges that in all times there have been true miracles and false miracles, and that each case must be examined, and a judgment formed by each individual according to his means of knowledge. But then, again, the positive interdict which is laid upon us against considering the Church a workshop of fraud, &c., appears, on the other hand, to preclude our exercising our judgment on any case supported by the Church of Rome. If this be so, it is well that we should be aware of what that Church has elsewhere dared to countenance, and what we might expect even in our own country and in our own times. It is very difficult to procure a copy of Marchetti's "Official Memoirs," to which we have before made allusion, but those who would wish to know the nature of its contents will find in Bishop Philpotts' Supplemental Letter to Charles Butler ample extracts,—at least sufficient to give us warnings of a very portentous kind. The work was found rather unsuitable to the atmosphere of England, however calculated it might be for the neighbourhood of the Vatican, and it has, we believe, been diligently bought up by Romanists⁹.

It seems the most wonderful part of this history, that persons of almost every grade of dignity, lay and ecclesiastical, should have deposed to seeing these images move their eyes, and to the other various wonders which are said to have taken place; but it only serves to render us cautious of mere testimony, when that testimony is derived from persons predisposed to expect and believe these things, and with whom a sort of party rivalry may be said to exist. One is obliged to introduce these considerations, when one observes the effect which the report of such miraculous dealings appears to have upon the offerings to the church in which such images are found. There is a sort of pride, too, in not being outdone by the miracles of a neighbouring Madonna; but if this judgment appears harsh and uncharitable, we must again repeat that they are the authors of all the irreverence which may occur, who attempt to support the credit of their Church by such preposterous delusions and such lying devices. If they merely exposed themselves to the contempt of all enlightened Christians it would be a matter of comparatively small moment, but these delusions spread distrust in all evidence among those who are rather better informed among their countrymen, and give an edge to the weapon of the infidel, which it could derive from no other source. But disreputable as these dealings were, it is more discreditable to the Church of Rome that it should have given public sanction to such barefaced impostures and delusions, by the countenance which the Pope himself bestowed upon them.

The Pope instituted a pious fraternity to honour the miraculous image of Ancona, under the name of the Sons and Daughters of Mary¹.

On the 13th of May, 1814, Pius VII. in person crowned the miraculous image, and fixed the annual feast of the image for the second Sunday in May, and attached to it the power of gaining a plenary indulgence; other indulgences had been granted by Pius VI.

⁹ We remember hearing a late eminent poet and philosopher describe a conversation which he held with an Italian of education and rank, who attested some miraculous fact of a most extravagant nature. Mr. — remonstrated with him, and asked him how he could possibly pretend to have seen such an occurrence. His reply was, if you had been present, and had been in the midst of a crowd of some thousands of persons, every one of whom would be ready to tear you in pieces if you denied it, your sight would have been very much quickened.

Pius VI. instituted the judicial proceedings recorded in the "Official Memoirs," and sanctioned them in various ways, but particularly by the grant of an annual mass with an office, for all the clergy of Rome on the 9th of July.

These miracles were not confined to opening and shutting the eyes, sometimes a shower of tears was shed by the images, sometimes a preternatural perspiration bedewed them, &c.; and these monstrous delusions were cherished and sanctioned by the authorities of the Church of Rome, and by the Pope himself².

The Lives of the Saints, published in Italy, are often full of the most preposterous miracles, calculated to exalt the patron saint above his compeers, but at present in England we are comparatively free from such impostures. Still in Ireland, the "Life of St. Patrick," by Jocelin of Farnes, who lived in the twelfth century, has been thought sufficiently edifying to be translated for popular reading, not forty years ago: it was translated by Edmund L. Swift, Esq., and published at Dublin in 1809. Those who know the original, will wonder that this should have been ventured upon, so extravagantly ridiculous are the miracles it records, and so utterly mythical is the whole narrative. The original is, of course, curious for those who desire to investigate the habits of thinking of the century in which it was composed, but if intended for religious edification, it seems calculated only for persons sunk in the most grovelling superstition and ignorance. Scarcely a page occurs without a miracle, in comparison of which the miracles of Scripture are almost insignificant; mountains are swallowed up in the earth and raised again; lakes removed; cheeses converted into stones; numbers are raised from the dead; a veil is sent from heaven; boys torn in pieces are restored to life; fourteen thousand men refreshed with the meat of five animals, &c. &c. These are only a few that strike one in merely turning over the leaves and reading the titles of the chapters, but there is one which has always seemed to us of a most peculiar character. A thief, who had stolen and devoured a tame goat belonging to St. Patrick, denied the theft, on which the goat from the stomach of the man bleated loudly forth and proclaimed the merit of St. Patrick ; and all the posterity of the thief were afflicted with the beard of a goat !

There may be persons, as we have before intimated, who think that these legends are edifying as religious reading, and consider it profane and irreverent to discard them at once ; but we can see nothing but a perversion of the light of the religious conscience within us, which can ever induce us to look upon such legends as any thing but monstrous, fabulous, and utterly abominable.

But it will be said the authorship belongs to the twelfth century, and this is true ; but the translation belongs to our own century ; and although the translator does not require us to assent to the miracles, yet he considers the book as conducive to piety and virtue. He will not allow the author to be accused of falsehood or imposture, that the narratives were probably founded on truth ; and although "Pyrrhonism may deride the legendary page of old Jocelin," he warns us, before we "gratulate our own superior wisdom, to consider whether implicit belief be not at least as safe as absolute scepticism." The bearing of this sort of argument upon the question, will easily be seen when compared with the representations we have given above of the still more modern notions on ecclesiastical miracles.

But leaving these Italian wonders and Irish translations, we are not without indications even nearer home and nearer to the present day, of that which the Romish Church will venture to attempt. The last book³ in the list of publications at the head of this article, records an attempt in Leicestershire about ten years ago to support the claims of the Church of Rome, by an appeal to a miraculous cure by Mr. Woolfrey, who calls himself parish priest of Grace-Dieu⁴ and Whitwick. We here give an account of the miracle in the words of the Rev. Francis Mere-wether, the incumbent of Whitwick, who deserves our praise for the active part he took in exposing these proceedings. The substantial truth of this account cannot be impeached, although Mr. Woolfrey has attempted to deny three minute points in the statement. But the imputed mis-statements are fully defended in the pamphlet entitled, "Special Pleadings," &c.

"On Sunday, the 6th of December last, a woman of the name of Fullard, living at Whitwick, went to the Romish chapel at Mr. Ambrose Phillipps's of Grace-Dieu ; having been for a long time previous afflicted, at intervals, with fits, partaking of the nature of epilepsy. One of them came on while she was at Grace-Dieu on the above day, about a quarter of an hour before the service was ended. A number having been collected round her near the door of the entrance hall, where she was carried for air, a woman desired the people to move away : for that she was better, and wanted nothing but air. Restoratives were used, and her feet plunged in hot water : after which a medal that had been blessed by the Archbishop of Paris was applied by the priest to the woman's left breast. She almost immediately recovered from the fit, and being taken into the kitchen, and asked to feel in her breast if she had any thing there, she found the medal : and a string was then attached to it, by which it was suspended round her neck, with an injunction that she should wear it. The woman is in possession of the medal, and shows it. She thinks herself cured by it, and believes she shall have no more fits as long as she wears it, and trusts in God : she considers she should be lost without it ; and would give it to no one but him who gave it her, the priest ⁵."

Mr. Woolfrey, who states that these medals "have wrought innumerable miracles in France, in England, and in other countries" (p. 5), makes reference to the brazen serpent of Moses, and to the clay which our Lord moistened with his spittle, and applied to the eyes of the blind man, in an extremely coarse and offensive style ; and then triumphantly asks whether God, who could, and did, confer on a bit of MUD the miraculous efficacy of giving sight to a man born blind, cannot also give to a bit of BRASS, called a MEDAL, "the life miraculous power?" &c.

It is difficult to imagine to whom such language and such arguments can be addressed, but one is happy to learn that the effect has been by no means favourable or encouraging to such attempts. It is desirable, though it can hardly be necessary, to point out the very slender grounds for attributing any thing miraculous to the medal in question, which even the advocates of the miracle bring forward. The woman had been under the fit for some time, she had been for some time under the influence of restoratives, and she was, as far as one can judge, very likely to begin to recover before the medal was applied⁶. Add to this,

⁵ Mr. Woolfrey, in an address to the inhabitants of Whitchurch, says, "that there are in Mr. Merewether's address, at least three facts stated that are perfectly untrue, viz., saying that the medal was placed on the "left" or right "breast;" and saying that the "woman considers that she should be lost without this medal;" and likewise by saying that a certain woman on the spot "desired the people to move away, for that she was better and wanted nothing but air." Mr. Woolfrey says himself, "I placed it (the medal) on the poor woman's bosom," p. 5. In the last instance Mr. Woolfrey misquotes Mr. M.'s words. He says a woman, not a certain woman. His authority for the assertion was the woman who held Anne Fullard's head at the time ; his authority for the second assertion was Anne Fullard herself who used these very words to himself.

the nature of the sermon, on miraculous agency, which she had just heard, and put to the account the strong effect which the mind exerts upon the body in many cases of this kind, and we shall not find that this occurrence has any thing about it which can excite any astonishment, except the very great audacity of the parties who presume to set it forth to the world as a miracle. And this, we say, allowing the whole account to be true without any deductions; but if the statements in the pamphlet, entitled Special Pleadings, may be relied on, which we may presume from the respectability of the author⁷, and from the circumstance that they have been before the world ten years, and as far as we can learn by inquiry from persons in the neighbourhood, entirely uncontradicted; if, we say, these statements are facts, they are very significant, and heavy deductions must be made even from the value of the cure. It is stated that the woman was sent home, on account of weakness, in Mr. A. L. Phillipps's carriage, and that a medical man was sent to her the next day, the explanation of which is supposed to be, that this weakness continued, and it is also stated that these fits have since returned.

With these observations we leave the case of Anne Fullard, and if we appear to fall under the same censure with which Mr. Newman has visited Bishop Douglas for his Criterion, we must submit to the imputation. But we must remind those who uphold such miracles once more of the mischief they do to the cause of truth, by palming on the world alleged miracles which will not bear examination. But let it not be said that this incredulity is only a Protestant feeling, and let not Douglas bear the whole weight of the indignation which falls on those who doubt of the miracles at the tomb of the Abbé Paris. He might have learned his lesson of incredulity in a school to which perhaps greater attention will now be paid. He followed in this only the leading of the Jesuits in France, and the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Sens⁸, who is more severe than the Protestant in his reprobation of these alleged miracles.

Our observations have extended to so great length, that we have no space for many other curious illustrations of the subject, which we had prepared; and we must hasten to a conclusion. We have endeavoured to show that the question has been very unfairly and very injudiciously treated by Mr. Newman, but we trust that we have been betrayed into no expressions which can be misconstrued into any personal reflections on him. Our business is entirely with his arguments and their tendency, and if his name had been of less weight, we should not have thought them worthy of so much attention. He writes with the desire of upholding what he reverences, and so do we. His sincerity in propounding these views must not recommend them to us, if we think them pernicious, and if we think them calculated to give a handle to the infidel, by lowering the evidence for Scripture, and confusing the boundaries of truth. We trust that our sincerity in the opposite view, which we maintain, and our deep conviction of the necessity of maintaining it, may at all events plead our excuse, if we have spoken in some places in language of considerable strength. We feel that in examining these arguments, nothing but the greatest calmness, in the end, will tell; but when we have to deal with such matters as the images of Italy, and the medals of Paris, we think that any ambiguity, any faltering, would be treason to the sacred cause of Christ.

⁷ We are not at liberty to mention the name of the author. We thought it might have been written by Mr. Merewether, but on further inquiry we found that we were mistaken.

⁸ The same side was also maintained by other Roman Catholics. We have consulted in particular two 4to volumes, entitled "Lettres Théologiques," to the defenders of these miracles, written, we believe, by La Taste. It was altogether a party question in the Roman Catholic Church.

We shall now conclude with offering a few observations on another passage in Mr. Newman's Essay.

“It shall here be assumed that this incredulity is a fault; and it is the result of a state of mind which has been prevalent among us for some generations, and from which we are now but slowly extricating ourselves. We have been accustomed to believe that Christianity is little more than a creed or doctrine, introduced into the world once for all, and then left to itself, after the manner of human institutions, and under the same ordinary governance with them, stored indeed with hopes and fears for the future, and containing certain general promises of aid for this life, but unattended by any special Divine presence, or any immediately supernatural gift. To minds habituated to such a view of revealed religion, the miracles of Ecclesiastical history must needs be a shock, and almost an outrage, disturbing their feelings, and unsettling their most elementary notions and thoroughly-received opinions. They are eager to find defects in the evidence, or appearances of fraud in the witnesses, as a relief to their perplexity, and as an excuse for rejecting, as if on the score of reason, what their heart and imagination have rejected already. Or they are too firmly persuaded of the absurdity, as they consider it, which such pretensions on the part of the Church involve, to be moved by them at all; and they content themselves with coldly claiming to know points which cannot now be known, or to be satisfied about difficulties which never will be cleared up, before they are asked to take interest in statements which they consider so unreasonable. And certainly they are both philosophical and religious in thus acting, granting that the Lord of all is present with Christians only in the way of nature, as with His creatures all over the earth. On the other hand, if we believe that Christians are under an extraordinary dispensation, such as Judaism was, and that the Church is a supernatural ordinance, we shall in mere consistency be disposed to treat even the report of miraculous occurrences with seriousness, from our faith in a present Power adequate to their production. Nay, if we go so far as once to realize what Christianity is, considered merely as a creed, and what stupendous overpowering facts are involved in the doctrine of a Divine Incarnation, we shall feel that no miracle can be great after it, nothing strange or marvellous, nothing beyond expectation."—pp. lxxxii. lxxxiii.

It is scarcely necessary to indicate the remarkable omission which this passage exhibits. There is an acknowledgment of the world of miracles and the world of nature, but we hear nothing of that middle world, the world of grace, to which believers in a Christian land like ours are accustomed to look. The world of grace has, indeed, its miracles! The heart subdued and changed, and the spirit purified, and the whole nature regenerated! And does Mr. Newman think that Christians can believe in these and all the wonderful works of God in His spiritual kingdom, and yet think that they are wrought without a special presence of that heavenly Redeemer in the heart of man, without His indwelling power and His undoubted and special operation! We do but suggest this thought, and a thousand illustrations of it will rise up spontaneously in the heart of every thoughtful Christian! We can find them in every daily walk, and we acknowledge them as miracles of unseen agency. We never see those whom poverty and age have bowed down to the earth, looking forward with peaceful hope, and careful only for the everlasting interests of their soul, and not acknowledge that it is a miracle wrought by the special hand of Him who alone can raise us up from the death of sin to the life of righteousness, and we need no other token of His presence with His Church than these—the miracles of grace¹. And let us not then fear the imputation of incredulity, or care that we are accused of not acknowledging the presence of our Lord among us, when we find daily such wonders as these in the cottage or in the sick chamber, because we refuse to listen to lying miracles, and dare to examine delusions and impostures.

There is only one consideration besides, which we would suggest to the thoughtful inquirer. It is this—it seems to us that throughout the Bible there is a gradual withdrawal of the visible presence of God, and the open marks of His government. And it suggests itself to our mind to inquire whether this be not preparatory, and perhaps a necessary preparation, for a spiritual dispensation, where the trial of our faith is one of the main branches of our probation.

God walked and spoke with Adam in the garden of Eden, God openly governed the Israelites by the hand of Moses and Joshua, showing great and national miracles, but soon there was "no open vision," and miracles and prophecy appear almost to have ceased for some centuries before our Lord's appearance on the earth. We disapprove of predicting the course of God's providential dealings by analogy, but we think that if visible interpositions were then altogether suspended after the Apostolic age, or at the latest at the civil establishment of Christianity, a thoughtful observer might see in this only the conclusion of a scheme already partially developed ; and the continuation of a system already commenced of gradual withdrawal. We do not presume to set this forth dogmatically, but we suggest it as an analogical argument. But the two main points on which we would insist are these, that if miracles of later ages have any mission or any message to us from God, it is those only which are endued with trustworthy evidence, and that the miracles of God's invisible agency in His kingdom of grace are tokens of His presence in His Church, which cannot be mistaken ; and which still leave room for that trial of our faith which is most strictly consonant to a spiritual dispensation.

ART. VI.—1. A Defence of the Queen's Supremacy against Romish Aggressions; in Two Letters to a Friend in France. By CHRISTOPHER WORDSWORTH, D.D., Canon of St. Peter's, Westminster. London: F. & J. Rivington.

AMIDST the brilliant discoveries in politics and religion, which are crowding upon us each day more and more thickly; and amidst the striking examples continually presented to us, of an enlargement of intellect, which disdains and explodes all theories and principles which bear the stamp of antiquity: in such days of illumination, and of progress, we are positively startled at a voice which, in the full effulgence of the nineteenth century, arises, as it were, from some abode of things forgotten and dead, and speaks of the "Queen's supremacy," and of "Romish aggression," as men spoke and thought in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries! There is something quite ghostly in the sound of such things; so wholly antiquated are the principles on which this Church and nation used for ages to act—nay, indeed, on which they continued to act till within the recollection of the present generation of men. There was a time when the Sovereigns of England looked on the royal supremacy in ecclesiastical affairs as the brightest jewel in their diadem; and when English statesmen guarded that precious possession with even an excessive care, looking in wrath on all who, whether within this realm or without, sought to despoil the English Crown of its ecclesiastical supremacy. There was a time when imprisonment, confiscation, and even death, were the penalties of such attempts. There was a time when kings and ministers, nobles and knights, bishops and divines, were alike occupied in defending by pen, and sword, and judicial process, and spiritual censures—by fining and confining, deprivation, excommunication, degradation, beheading, hanging, drawing, and quartering, and more other penalties and arguments than we can remember, the royal supremacy over all estates and degrees of men, "in all causes, ecclesiastical as well as civil, within this realm." Now, we are by no means saying that we consider all the modes and methods which our governors in Church and State in those times took to enforce the doctrine of the royal supremacy, as the best and most judicious that could possibly have been adopted. We disclaim any such theory of Optimism. Henry VIII. and Edward, Elizabeth, and James, and Charles, Cranmer and Cromwell, Jewell and Burleigh, Hooker and Bacon, Laud and Clarendon, may, or may not have been ignorant bigots and persecutors. We do not here pretend to discuss this knotty question, or to justify the course of legislative and executive interference on behalf of the supremacy of the Crown which they concurred in or defended. But, whether they were right or wrong, one thing is evident, that they acted under most serious convictions of the importance and reality of the question under debate. Men do not inflict or suffer death for a mere abstract theory of no practical importance.

Times have certainly changed. In the seventeenth century, the publication of defences of the royal supremacy against Romish aggressions, converted many a poor curate into a rich prebendary or a dean, and many a prebendary into a lordly prelate; but we apprehend that at present, if there were not certain legal impediments in the way, the defence of the supremacy would be more likely to transmute bishops and prebendaries back again into unbeneficed divines. We allude, of course, to such defences as include any resistance to "Romish aggressions," which, in the present day, are courted by the advocates of liberal principles, and which the statesmen of England have been for many years past eager to gratify by corresponding concessions. "Aggressions" forsooth! Why, of course, Romanism is making "aggressions," and it has quite as much right to do so as Chartism or the Anti-Corn-law League. "Every one for himself," is the principle of our political economy; and the pope cannot be blamed for acting on so enlightened a doctrine. The principle of free trade, which removes all prohibitions from the introduction of foreign productions, and leaves us at liberty to deal in whatever markets we please, aims at breaking down all the jealousies and restraints which have kept nations aloof from each other. The generous rivalry of nations is henceforward to consist, not in the maintenance of national dignity and morality, but in the accumulation of wealth, and the most advantageous interchange of productions. Each class in the community is to obtain as much as it possibly can at the expense of the remainder; and under these circumstances, it seems only consistent to withdraw any prohibitions which may exist to the importation of the papacy, more especially if it comes recommended by any principles of political economy. The simple question at present seems to be, would the introduction of the papal supremacy operate beneficially on our manufactures? Prove that it would do so, and the point is carried.

“Tempora mutantur :” the principles of the eighteenth century seem to have almost died out with the century in which they flourished. And yet we must confess, that while such men as Dr. Wordsworth continue to advocate the old principles of the constitution in Church and State, the ideas of the nineteenth century are not likely to have absolute and undisputed sway.

Dr. Wordsworth is a writer who is quite capable of reviving an extinct principle and cause, and of lending fresh energy and power to one which is feeble and expiring. His extensive and accurate research ; his purity and integrity of principle ; and the strong faith which he possesses in the truth and the certainty of the doctrines which he inculcates ; combined with a generous and ardent devotion to his cause, irrespective of all selfish considerations ; invest his advocacy with more than ordinary animation and interest, and cannot fail to gain the respect even of those who may differ from the principles which he advocates.

On a former occasion, we were led to offer some remarks on Dr. Wordsworth’s able and well-timed pamphlets on the Maynooth Bill—publications, the value of which at the particular crisis which elicited them cannot be too highly estimated, and which most decidedly furnished to the opponents of that ill-advised measure in both Houses of Parliament the greater part of their arguments against it. The introduction of the Bill for the removal of penalties for religious opinions, by the Lord Chancellor, appears to have led to the publication of the “Letters” now before us, the object of which is to specify the objections which may be offered to that measure. In the first of these letters Dr. Wordsworth, after distinguishing between the temporal and the spiritual supremacy of the Sovereign, proceeds to prove that the papal claims interfere with the former—that the Canon Law and the oaths of bishops to the Roman pontiff assert his temporal power over sovereigns ; that in a recent edition of the Roman Canon Law it is asserted, that the kingly power is subject to the pontifical, that the pope may depose sovereigns, and absolve subjects from their allegiance ; that all oaths to the prejudice of the Church of Rome are null and void ; and that Romish ecclesiastics may resist their sovereigns for the good of their Church. He next turns to history, and touches on the deposition of sovereigns by the popes in various ages ; not forgetting the cases of our Henry VIII. and Elizabeth. A more recent instance of the exercise of this temporal power is pointed out in the Bull of Pius VII., directing the bishops and clergy of France to take the oath of allegiance to the French Republic, and recognising in the first consul the rights of the ancient dynasty. The deposition of one hundred Gallican bishops from their sees "to which they had been appointed by the King of France," and the coronation of Napoleon, are pointed out as further instances of the exercise of the same power by the pope. The Services of Gregory VII. and Pius V. in the Roman Breviary, the Bull in Coena Domini, the oath taken by Roman Catholic bishops at their consecration, are further appealed to in proof that the Roman pontiffs have always claimed temporal dominion over the subjects of other princes, and that those claims have never been retracted.

We do not think it necessary here to enter into an examination of all the particular proofs which Dr. Wordsworth has advanced in support of his position. Perhaps we may not feel quite certain that all the facts which he states will bear the weight of inference which is placed on them. But there can be no doubt that the position which is contended for, is fully and decisively established; and after so clear and able an exposition of the fact, the civil power certainly cannot act in ignorance of the claims of the see of Rome: if it be disposed to compromise its temporal rights in favour of that see, "the blame," as Dr. Wordsworth pithily remarks, "lies with itself, and it must take the consequences—si vult decipi, decipiatur."

Whether the State "vult decipi" in such a matter as this, seems to us somewhat problematical. That it is very unwilling to have any opposition made to the amplest concession of the claims of the Romanists is undoubted. But the State does not suppose, we apprehend, that such acts of concession will compromise its own powers, or confer any temporal authority on the see of Rome. We conceive that statesmen are in general perfectly indifferent to the admitted claims of the see of Rome to depose princes, and exempt subjects from their oaths of obedience. They imagine, and certainly not without reason, that the popes know too well the extent of their power to venture on such acts in the nineteenth century—that such acts would probably only demonstrate the fallen condition of the Roman power, and would recoil in disgrace and danger on the heads of those who made the attempt. They probably are inclined to look on these temporal claims, which are not able to put themselves in execution, in much the same light as Henry IV. or Louis XIV. regarded the assumption of the royal arms and the title of king of France by the contemporary English sovereigns. And looking merely at the world as it is—looking at the fact that the papal power is wholly dependent on Austria and France for its political existence—that the temporal power has in many of the Roman Catholic states not merely preserved its own supremacy in temporals, notwithstanding the claims of the Roman see, but has usurped extensive power in spirituals, either with or without the concurrence of the popes; looking at such facts as these, it does seem at first sight, that the mere fact of the claims of the Roman pontiffs to temporal power over other sovereigns, need not inspire statesmen with any serious apprehensions in making such concessions to Romanists in these countries as they may on other grounds deem advisable. Arguing from probabilities, it does not seem likely that the throne of Queen Victoria, or her successors, will ever be directly endangered by papal bulls of deposition or excommunication. The danger before us is of a very different sort. Whether the throne will survive it, is indeed a serious question; but if it does not, we feel assured that something different from papal bulls and decrees will have caused it.

But while the present state of the world, as regarded by statesmen, may relieve them from the apprehensions which were most justly felt in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, in reference to the claims of the papacy to temporal power, it is very possible that their contempt for these claims may be carried too far. They may find, that although the see of Rome is not likely in the nineteenth century to depose sovereigns, it may have the power of recognizing new sovereigns or states in a way which would be highly injurious to the interests of England, and might serve to exercise a fatal influence on the integrity of the empire. They may find, if all prohibitions on the introduction of papal bulls and mandates are removed,—if those decrees are permitted openly and with the full sanction of the law to circulate, which have hitherto been brought in by stealth and connivance,—that regulations may be introduced which will operate in various ways in temporal matters. The temporalities of the Roman Catholic Communion, at least, may be at any time the subject of papal regulation and interference, and those temporalities are every day becoming of more importance. It may not be possible to specify the particulars in which the power of the Roman see, if once recognized, and given a locus standi by the English government, may be found embarrassing and inconvenient. The papal power is always an encroaching one, whenever there is the slightest chance of success. In the liberty of our civil constitution, which affords unbounded scope to parties to urge their claims, there is a facility for the increase of the papal power, of which it will be certain to avail itself. Assiduity, perseverance, obstinacy, will prevail in the long run over weak governments. The same process which we have seen successfully employed by various political parties in this country for the accomplishment of their objects, will infallibly be employed by the Roman see and its numerous advocates and adherents, if the opportunity is afforded. Doubtless the see of Rome does not directly depose sovereigns and absolve from oaths of allegiance in the nineteenth century ; but it does interfere in mixed causes which the State is very greatly interested in, and it interferes so as to embarrass and prevail against the State. Take the case of mixed marriages in Germany. How much uneasiness, and inconvenience, and even danger arose to the Prussian government in the well-known case of the Archbishop of Cologne ; and the result of the whole was, that the state was obliged to succumb to the papal power. Again, the French government has been recently obliged to call in the aid of the pope in order to suppress the order of Jesuits. Every step of this kind strengthens the influence of the papacy, and encourages it to further interference. In any contests with a government constituted as that of England must always be, the papacy would be almost certain of meeting sympathy and support from various classes of persons in the community. It is far too wary ever to attempt contests with temporal governments on questions which do not in some degree affect religion or "religious liberty," and in all such questions it would be sure to meet with so much sympathy in the English mind, that no government could effectually, in the long run, prevent it from attaining its object. There could not well be a more shortsighted policy than that which would recognize the papal power as an element in our social condition, and which would with conciliatory views give it a legal existence amongst us. Weak and contemptible as the papacy may seem to English statesmen, and weak as it is in some respects, still it does not follow that it might not very seriously embarrass at times the government of this country, or that it could by possibility be restricted by the State to subjects and questions which are simply spiritual and religious. The moment that England attempts to govern Romanists through the see of Rome, it will find its difficulties thicken upon it ; for the papacy is not a power which confers favours without expecting an equivalent.

We have offered these remarks on the temporal power of the papacy, because it seems to us that there is a most mistaken way of treating this subject prevalent amongst public men in the present day. They generally imagine, because the claims of a Hildebrand, or an Innocent III., or a Pius V. cannot be enforced, or even put forth at present—because these claims are in the eyes of the world merely ridiculous—that the papacy has no means of acquiring temporal power in other states—that it cannot possibly be dangerous in any way to temporal governments. This may be generous, and liberal and high-minded. It may argue something of a confiding and romantic spirit. Or on the other hand, it may look like confidence in our own ingenuity and craft, in our own policy and arts of persuasion. We think, perhaps, that the pope is an old gentleman, who may be coaxed and cajoled by neat little attentions and civil speeches into conceding us the power of ruling our own people. But with every conceivable respect and deference for the magnates of the nineteenth century, who are so wondrous wise on the subject of the papal supremacy, and who look in such unutterable scorn on those who entertain any apprehensions of its interference in temporal affairs, we would venture to hint, that the papacy is not altogether blind to its own interests, or devoid of a wish to promote them.

We have digressed somewhat widely from Dr. Wordsworth's publication, and must now return to it. The second of his letters enters on the subject of the "Spiritual Supremacy" of the English Crown, which is thus described and limited by the author:—

"We believe then, that Sovereign governing powers are vicegerents and ministers of Almighty God. For so we are taught by Him in holy writ. We know from the same sacred source, that it is our duty to submit to civil authorities, to pay them tribute, to pray for them, 'that we may lead quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty; for this is good and acceptable in the sight of God.' If, indeed, they should so far forget their duty as to command us to do any thing plainly contrary to the word of God; if they should order us to commit idolatry, or not to pray to God, or not to observe His ordinances, rather than be guilty of these sins, we should prefer the furnace with the three children of Babylon. . . . We obey Cæsar for God's sake, but we cannot disobey God for Cæsar's; but in all his lawful, and not unlawful commands, we obey Cæsar as God."

. . . "Sovereigns are God's 'ministers to us for good,' not only of our bodies, but our souls; and it would be very degrading to them, and very irreverent to Him, whose ministers they are, to suppose that their care is to be limited to the temporal wants of their subjects. No; here is the true dignity, the glorious prerogative of the kingly office; it extends to the soul. . . . Since the Almighty Himself gives to kings and queens the title of 'nursing fathers and nursing mothers' of His Church, and since it is the chief duty of fathers and mothers in their families to provide for the spiritual welfare of their offspring, it cannot be supposed that the eternal interests of their subjects are not to be the first care of sovereigns. This being so, it follows that they have a divine right to those powers, without which this duty cannot be performed. They have, that is to say, royal authority in spiritual matters, as well as in temporal. Let us proceed to examine in what this authority consists."—pp. 28—30.

It "does not extend to the performance of any sacred function,—such as the ministration of the word or sacraments,” or ordination; it consists in seeing “that all they who have sacred functions assigned to them perform them duly.” The sovereign has not “any priestly power,” but he may “command all those who have that power to use it rightly.”—p. 31. The English Crown has “the right of placing persons, whose spiritual qualifications have been ascertained and approved by the spiritual authorities, in the sees which the Crown itself has founded, and in allowing them to exercise episcopal jurisdiction over its subjects within the limits duly assigned to them.” It has also the right to summon councils and ratify their decrees.—p. 33. 35. But this supremacy is only acknowledged to exist

“According to the ancient principles and practices of the Christian Church, and for the maintenance of her laws: but observe, against these received laws and customs of the Church, no power is claimed by our princes, nor is any ascribed to them by us. ‘Nihil potest rex, nisi quod jure potest.’ Our most gracious Queen has supreme power according to the laws, and for the laws, but against them none.”—p. 35.

This is a manly and firm exposition of the principle of ecclesiastical liberty, which is absolutely essential to the preservation of the Church. The supremacy without such a limitation would be liable to all the objections which are so frequently and so unreasonably urged against it by sectarians. But admit this principle, so clearly and forcibly laid down by Dr. Wordsworth, and the regal supremacy is at once divested of all power of entrenching on the great rights and prerogatives of the Church. The sovereign power is bound to rule according to “the laws and customs of the Church:” its acts are not binding where they are opposed to the laws of God, or the laws of the Church: its power becomes null in any such case. And who is to judge of the agreement or disagreement between the laws of the Church and the injunctions of the Sovereign? Certainly the Church herself: for to place this power in the hand of the sovereign, would be to invest him with absolute power, which the Church does not admit to be his attribute. We take it that this affords the true solution of the difficulties growing out of the suppression of half the episcopal sees in Ireland in 1833. It is obvious, notwithstanding all that has been said in justification of that measure, that it was a transgression of the laws and customs of the Church. Here was a case in which nearly half of the episcopal body of a national Church was swept away without any consent from the Church itself—nay, in opposition to the solemn protest of the great majority of its prelates, including three metropolitans out of four. It was a measure which was obviously calculated to be most injurious to a Church which was surrounded by a vast multitude of opponents, and which demanded for its preservation the most unremitting assiduity of its actual hierarchy—which even required an increase in their numbers, and more earnest exertions in every direction. It was calculated to afford a new argument against the Church herself, as if she was the mere creature and slave of the Parliament, and it was an infringement on the canons of the Church to suppress bishoprics without consent of the proper ecclesiastical authorities. The inference from these facts is supplied by Dr. Wordsworth : the acts of the temporal power suppressing the sees in Ireland were null ; they were of no binding force, because they were contradictory to the laws and customs of the Church ; and the Sovereign has “supreme power according to the laws, and for the laws, but against them none.”

Here, then, was a case in which the Church was not bound by the acts of the temporal power—a case in which the Church might, without any violation of her own principles of obedience to the State, have refused steadily to acquiesce in such laws, and waited until the temporal power had retraced its steps. It was a case in which the heads of the Church of Ireland might have refused to perform any consecrations or any ecclesiastical acts whatever, that could recognize such a departure from the duties of the temporal power. But the Church judged otherwise : and as it acquiesced in the measure, it has gradually passed into a custom ; and the Church in acting on and recognizing this custom, gives to it all the necessary sanctions. There is a broad distinction between this case and the union of the sees of Bristol and Gloucester (we hope we need not add Bangor and St. Asaph), in 1835. This latter measure was recommended to the temporal powers by the ecclesiastical commission, which included five bishops, amongst whom were the two metropolitans. Such a body, more especially when no opposition was made by the other prelates and clergy, was a species of representation of the Church ; and the measure itself did not diminish on the whole the amount of episcopal superintendence in the Church : it merely translated sees to more populous districts : it could not be injurious to the general interests of the Church at large. In all these respects it differed widely from the suppression of the sees in Ireland. But suppose the temporal power to extinguish the church-rates in England, and then to suppress twelve bishoprics in order to provide funds for the repairs of churches ; is it not evident that the Church would be entitled, consistently with the fullest admission of the regal supremacy, to protest against any such act, and to refuse to recognize it in any way? If any one is prepared to go to such a length as to maintain that the Church would be bound to acquiesce in such a proceeding, he must be prepared to carry his principle still further, and to affirm, that if any number of sees were suppressed by the temporal power the Church ought to submit—so that if the temporal power should reduce the episcopate of England to a single individual, or consolidate the whole country into one diocese and subject it to a foreign bishop, the Church would still be bound to acquiesce. If any one upholds these principles, he ought by analogy to hold, that if the parishes of England were reduced to a tenth or a hundredth of their present number by the State, and the tithes of the remainder were applied to purposes of general education, to the support of dissenting ministers, or to the payment of the poor-rates, the Church ought to acquiesce in the arrangement.

We are merely illustrating the general principle which Dr. Wordsworth has so clearly and satisfactorily laid down—that the Crown has a supremacy in spirituals—a supremacy which is by Divine right—a supremacy which fully authorizes the sovereign to take cognizance of ecclesiastical affairs, to make laws on ecclesiastical subjects, to oblige the ministers of religion to execute their duties, and to reform abuses. But a supremacy, also, which is limited by the laws of God, and the laws and customs of the Church; which is bound to maintain these laws, and not to violate them. The same principle is applied in the case of the temporal supremacy to temporal matters; and the final judgment is in either case reserved to the whole body of the Church, or of the nation, respectively.

It is of the greatest importance, under our present circumstances, to endeavour to acquire distinct views on this subject. We shall, probably, be very soon called to act upon them in some way. The Church is in most imminent peril. It is all but certain that one of the first measures of any liberal administration which may assume the reins of power will be—not absolutely the “destruction” of the Irish Church; for Lord John Russell has disclaimed any such intention; but such a measure of “reform” as will consist in what Mr. O’Connell has described as “bowling down bishops like nine-pins,” and sweeping away parishes by hundreds. Here, then, is one question on which the Church ought to be prepared to take a course of firm, united, unswerving opposition, from first to last. She ought to be prepared to remind the Crown of its duties to religion. She ought to go before the Sovereign by her united representatives, and announce the principles—the high, unchangeable, and Christian principles on which she is prepared to act. Her Heads should not shrink from the duty of firmly and publicly reminding the State of the duties which it owes to God and to God's Church. They should place confidence in the support of the clergy and the people. They should solemnly appeal from the unrighteous acts of the State against the cause of religion, to that God whose ministers they are; and they should be prepared to offer a resolute and persevering opposition to the execution of what they object to on principle. Let them not commit themselves to any ecclesiastical acts which in any way recognize what they condemn. Let them do this at all personal hazards; and they will find that no English government will be able to overcome such an opposition. The State will then respect the Church, and the Church will rise out of the contest with more union and more power than it ever possessed. We would only remind our readers, that the English Church and its hierarchy never were so popular as when the seven bishops, at personal hazard, refused to obey the mandate of James II. We would remind them of the struggle between the Church and the ministry on the question of church-rates in England. On that occasion the heads of the Church denounced the ministerial measure, and their appeal was heard with gratitude, and responded to with an unanimity and a fervour which read the ministry of the day a most impressive and long-remembered lesson. The episcopal body is in general inclined, both from principle and inclination, to cultivate amicable relations with the existing government; and it is quite right that this should be the case; but most assuredly a more serious evil could not befall the Church than any apparent or real want of firmness, or subserviency to the government of the day, in questions vitally affecting the interests of the Church. It is not merely that in the event of such want of firmness, measures of an injurious character to the Church are certain to be carried; but the Church generally is dispirited, and even indignant on finding itself without leaders; and feelings may hence be engendered, which might be far more perilous to the interests of the Church and to the influence of the hierarchy, than any injuries from without.

The Church might be ruined by rash and ill-considered measures of opposition to the government of the day. We readily admit this. But, on the other hand, it may, as certainly, be ruined by timidity and vacillation. What is to be hoped for in the event of any such disastrous circumstances as seem to be impending over us, is an immovable firmness, resolution, and perseverance combined with discretion. That firmness on matters of principle will meet with respect, and ultimately gain its objects, is exemplified by the struggle between the Roman Catholic Church and the State in Prussia. The Roman Catholic Church in Prussia holds a position of much less influence and power than the English Church does in England. The monarchy, again, is an absolute one, and therefore more powerful than the State in England. And yet in this contest the Church prevailed.

Now, again, let us look to the course pursued in England. We have seen that the Church was strongest, and the hierarchy most respected, when, at a great crisis, the heads of the Church courageously, and at all hazards, defended the rights of that great interest which was entrusted to their care. Now look on the other side of the picture. We need scarcely disclaim any feeling but that of the highest respect for the motives of the large body of prelates who voted for the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts in 1828. Doubtless those excellent men were of opinion that they could not safely oppose a measure introduced by the Duke of Wellington and Sir Robert Peel. They did not perceive, apparently, that this measure led, by necessary consequence, to Roman Catholic emancipation—that the latter could not be refused on any reasonable and intelligible grounds when the former had been conceded. In 1829, then, the heads of the Church were called upon to assent to a measure of emancipation proposed by the same ministry—a measure far more wide and comprehensive, and more destitute of securities than any of the Roman Catholic advocates had ever dared to propose. There was not the same unanimity in the votes of the hierarchy on this occasion, as there had been in the preceding year—they were divided: but a strong minority of bishops voted for emancipation. There was another question of vital importance to the Church, we allude to the Church Temporalities Act for Ireland. On this occasion, too, the episcopal bench were divided: a large minority voted for the measure. Now we are not attempting to express any opinion on the conduct of the prelates who thus took part with the government of the day, and in decided opposition to the wishes of the great body of the clergy and people. We merely wish to observe, that these concessions only led to increased demands, and that the Church and the hierarchy itself were immediately subjected to the most violent attacks. We can recollect that these acts of the hierarchy were held up to public execration in terms which we should be unwilling to employ. Men felt very generally that the first and highest interests of the Church had been sacrificed to the supposed interests of an administration, or to the convenience of political parties. And they accordingly felt very little inclination to lend their support to the hierarchy, when Radicalism raised its outcry for the expulsion of the Bishops from the House of Lords, and the reform of the Church. We are merely stating historical facts, not attempting to express any opinion as to the propriety of the course pursued, or the feelings indulged in. The fact was, that a large part of the community who had always been devoted friends of the Church, were disgusted at the conduct of many of the bishops in voting against, what were generally held to be, the Church's interests; and they contributed, for the time, to swell the feeling of hostility against the hierarchy existing in other quarters. And the result was, that the expulsion of the Bishops from the House of Lords was very near being carried. Their escape was a very narrow one. The church-rates were only saved by an opposite line of conduct. The Tithes in Ireland were rescued by miracle, and with the sacrifice of a great portion of their value. We do not attribute any blame to the prelates who evinced so conciliatory and compliant a disposition in conceding to the wishes of government on these occasions; but we cannot help feeling that the dangers of the Church at that time arose in some degree from the course which the hierarchy thought it advisable to pursue.

The course of events has again, most singularly, come round within the last year or two, to the same state in many respects as was witnessed in 1828 and 1829. The resemblance is, in many respects, truly extraordinary; and more especially so, in the very same set of ministers being a second time in the direction of public affairs. In 1828, Sir Robert Peel's ministry adopted a course of policy entirely opposed to all its former principles and conduct, and the Parliament, including the episcopal bench, sanctioned its "liberal" policy. In 1845, the same government set itself to conciliate Romanism; introduced the Maynooth and the Irish Colleges Bills, and threw itself on the support of the "Liberal" party. In this course it was supported by a portion of its so-called "conservative" adherents, and by about one-half of the episcopal bench. In 1829, the same administration took a great step in advance of their policy of 1828, and were followed by a considerable body of the hierarchy. In 1846, the same administration has again advanced in the same career; and their Corn Bill has received the support of two-thirds of the episcopal bench.

Absit omen! We most devoutly hope that the parallel may here come to an end. We hope that the hierarchy will not be placed in the same danger which surrounded it from 1829 to 1834. It has certainly been a subject of serious anxiety to many well-wishers of the Church, to observe that the measures of last year, which were generally most obnoxious to the people of this country, and which were supposed to be calculated to encourage and strengthen the cause of Romanism, did not meet with the unanimous opposition of the hierarchy; while of two measures seriously affecting the interests of the Church introduced this session of parliament, one, namely, the Corn Bill, has been supported by two-thirds of the episcopal bench; and the other, namely, the "Religious Opinions Relief Bill," has been permitted to pass through the House of Lords without any strenuous opposition except from the Bishop of Exeter.

In the Maynooth Bill and the Irish Colleges Bill of last year, the real question which lay concealed under these measures was, whether the Church of Ireland should any longer be treated as the established religion of the State; or whether the patronage of the State should be equally extended to all forms of religion, and the claims of the Church be set aside. This was the question which was tried afresh last year, and which was determined against the Church by the ministers. We need not say how great a breach was thus made in the principles of the constitution. It was a grand step towards the proclamation of an equality amongst all forms of religion, and therefore the downfall of the Established Church. It affected the Church of Ireland immediately, but it also indirectly affected the Church of England. Nothing could be more lamentable than to see the narrow views which so many worthy men took of these measures; as if nothing had been involved in them but a mere expenditure of 30,000*l.*, instead of 10,000*l.*, or the erection of additional schools.

Now to come to the measures of the present year. Of the Corn-law Bill we shall not speak at any length, because our readers must be weary of the subject. All we would say is this: The bill is a tremendous experiment; no one can tell what its results will be; it may not diminish materially the price of corn, or throw large tracts of land out of cultivation, or increase the poor-rates, or produce any other of the evils which its opponents anticipate. But, on the other hand, it certainly may do all this. No one can tell with any certainty what its effects will be. It may ruin large numbers of the labourers, the farmers, and the gentry of England and Ireland. It may cause extensive changes of property. And, what is more to our present purpose, it may largely reduce the value of the Church property; while it may operate a very great change in the disposition of the agricultural interest towards the Church. Hitherto the Church has been identified with the agricultural interest. Such, at least, has been the impression of agriculturists.

But what may be the state of the case hereafter? What, if agriculturists, exasperated at the sacrifice of their interests by a ministry whom they had elevated to power, and experiencing serious injury to their pecuniary interests, should look to relief from the various burdens on agriculture? What, if they should fix upon the tithe, and ask for its abolition? What, if they should agitate for the transfer of this charge to the consolidated fund, or to the ordinary estimates for each year? What, if they should feel that the Church having taken a part against them in the great struggle which they had made, her interests might just as well be placed in jeopardy as theirs? What, if the agricultural interest should in the pressure of distress, be tempted by offers from its opponents of relief, on condition of concurring in measures for the alienation of Church property? We most fervently hope, that none of these fearful contingencies may occur; but at the same time we are not ignorant that the Protectionists have distinctly stated in the course of the struggle, that tithes are a burden on land, and that some of them have been inclined to recommend the transfer of this burden to the public revenue. There are abundant indications of the danger in which the interests of the Church are placed in this direction.

We extract with pain the following passage from a communication in a recent number of a Conservative and Protectionist journal. While we feel it our duty to lay the opinions it expresses before our readers, we need not say that we lament the tone and tendency of the writer:—

“ If ever there was a measure introduced into the House of Peers, which judged by the principles of religion, charity, and justice, should have met the strenuous opposition of the whole bench of bishops, it is the repeal of the Corn Laws. Whether we look to its origin, which is founded in treachery and fraud, or to its aim and object, which is to lower the wages of the artizan, to deprive the agricultural peasant of his employment, to grind the poor to the earth, and to raise on their prostrate bodies the dominion of the scheming speculative millionaire, we see motives the strongest that can be conceived, as operating in a religious, honourable, and benevolent mind, to excite ardent hostility to this iniquitous bill. When we add to the motives I have enumerated, that the bishops are the selected guardians of the whole body of the beneficed clergy, and that upon their votes it mainly depends whether the incomes of the rectors and curates of our Church shall be reduced at least one-fourth, and distress and worldly anxieties introduced into the families of those who, for the general benefit of mankind, should be preserved from necessity, and enabled to give their time and attention to spiritual labours, I think a case will be made out against them, the strongest which the history of this country can produce, of a gross dereliction of duty, and a glaring abandonment of all those feelings by which religious and honourable men ought to be guided in the use to be made of those privileges which have been intrusted to them by the Constitution. Far be it from me to include in this censure the noble-minded men who have preserved their honour and their principles untarnished, uninfluenced by the hope of future promotion, or by the miserable hankering after the flesh-pots of Egypt, which has led seventeen of their body from the straight path of duty, religion, and charity; but the few will suffer for the delinquences of the many, and their spiritual lordships may rely on it, that thousands who would have cheerfully shed their blood to preserve the privileges of the heads of the Church to which they are sincerely attached, will be led by this glaring instance of defection from every principle by which such men should have been guided, to view with apathy, if not with pleasure, the degradation of the episcopal order, which will be one of their surest consequences of the advent to power of that party which their late vote has so greatly contributed to place at the helm of the State."

For ourselves we do not presume to express any opinion on the recent vote of the hierarchy in support of free-trade. It arose, of course, from mature consideration of the general interests of the Church, rather than of those of any set of ministers, or of any political party.

We now come to the second measure of this year affecting the interests of the Establishment. We allude to the "Religious Opinions Relief Bill," which has been introduced by the present ministry, and which has been suffered to proceed through the House of Lords, without any direct opposition, except from the Bishop of Exeter, while it has been warmly supported by other prelates. To the Bishop of Exeter, in our opinion, the gratitude of every friend of the Church is due for the firm and resolute stand which he took against this measure, and we cannot avoid a feeling of disappointment that he was left to fight the battle alone. There seems to be at present little prospect of this bill becoming an Act of the Legislature; but it appears to involve questions of such grave importance, and questions, too, which seem to have been entirely overlooked in the discussion; that, as such a bill is sure to make its re-appearance in the very next session of parliament, it ought to be most seriously considered by every friend of the Church in the mean time.

Public attention has not been much directed to this measure. Engrossed as every one has been with the more prominent question of the day, the "Religious Opinions Relief Bill" would apparently have passed without notice into law, but for the opposition of the Bishop of Exeter, and the praiseworthy exertions of the National Club, in convening a public meeting at Willis's rooms on the 2nd of May, at which resolutions against the bill were agreed on.

We admit that at the first view of the case, nothing can be more plausible than the arguments produced by the Lord Chancellor and the supporters of the bill. "How absurd and how useless must it be," they argue, "to retain penalties which can be no longer enforced—to inflict fines and imprisonment for the assertion of the papal supremacy, the introduction of papal bulls, the celebration of mass, the attendance on conventicles, the non-attendance at church, and the other religious offences for which penalties are provided in the old statutes, but which became wholly obsolete as soon as the Acts for the Toleration of Protestant and Romish dissenters were passed. To retain such Acts and penalties on the Statute-book any longer is a mere absurdity, and is a needless insult to Romanists and other dissenters." This is the plain and simple case put forward by the supporters of this bill, and of Mr. Watson's bill in the House of Commons; and it must be admitted that these arguments are plausible enough at first sight. But there are objections also on the face of the subject, which are of no inconsiderable moment. The first relates to the Queen's Supremacy, which would undoubtedly be compromised by the enactment of this Bill. This may perhaps be a matter which concerns the State more directly than the Church; but it very nearly concerns the Church as a national establishment. Dr. Wordsworth's remarks on this subject are worthy of attention. He argues that to repeal the Acts requiring the Oath of Supremacy to be taken (as far as regards Romanists), would be tantamount to legalizing a public profession on their parts that they are not subjects of the Crown.—p. 52. But there is another objection which was very forcibly urged at the meeting above referred to, in the following terms:—

"It so happens that these very bills (the Lord Chancellor's and Mr. Watson's), intended to relieve the Roman Catholics from a difficulty of their own choosing, the difficulty of a divided allegiance, involve a most monstrous aggression upon the consciences of the clergy of the Church of England. They are at their ordination, and again at their institution to any spiritual charge, each time solemnly called on to declare, as God shall be their helper, 'that no foreign prince, prelate, state or potentate, hath, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power, superiority, pre-eminence, or authority, ecclesiastical or spiritual, within this realm.' From the taking of this oath, the bill of the Lord Chancellor does not relieve the clergy; and the bill of Mr. Watson expressly provides, that it shall still be incumbent upon them to take it: the effect of which would be, if these bills should become the law of the land, that the clergy of the Church of England would be called upon to deny upon oath the pope's jurisdiction, both de facto and de jure, in the face of statutes formally admitting and sanctioning that jurisdiction¹."

This is a serious consideration as regards the position of the clergy, which would certainly be rendered most embarrassing by the passing of such a measure: but we think the case is yet more serious as regards the Crown itself. By these measures the legislature would formally sanction certain classes of the community in rejecting the regal supremacy in religious matters. This liberty would, in fact, be extended to every religious sect and denomination, except to the Church of England. If this should be the case, it is not easy to see on what ground the Crown could any longer pretend to supremacy over the English Church. If the essential rights of the Crown are not infringed by the denial of the supremacy in one case, would they be infringed by a similar rejection in the other? The whole argument of those who would maintain the supremacy of the Crown would be cut from under them. The Crown would have pronounced its own abdication of the ecclesiastical supremacy, it could no longer claim any authority founded on Holy Scripture, or on common law, to a supremacy over its subjects, as such, in religious matters. Its supremacy over the English Church would from that moment be reduced from Divine right and immemorial privilege, extending to the nation at large, to a mere statutory enactment affecting only a certain class of its subjects, and which might at any moment be unmade by the same legislative power which made it. The Church and the State would be directly at issue: the latter denying, and the former affirming the royal supremacy over all estates and degrees of men in the kingdom. The Church only recognizes the claim on scriptural and religious grounds; but if the State denies the validity of these grounds, it will be quite impossible to prevent the ultimate ruin of the royal supremacy. On what principle could the State pretend to the exclusive right of summoning synods, or of confirming canons, or of legislating on ecclesiastical matters, if it formally relinquished this right in the case of Romanists and Dissenters? It would from that moment rest on mere statute, and not on any higher ground. And as to the appointment to bishoprics, it could in future be defended only on the ground of statute, and of the alleged foundation of all sees by the Crown, which is in many cases a legal fiction, and which, being a mere right of property, might be alienated by the Crown with as much facility as its crown-lands.

We have already spoken of the inconvenience to the temporal power, which may result from the legal recognition of the papal jurisdiction. This furnishes another objection to the removal of all barriers to the open and unchecked exercise of that jurisdiction. We must extract the following instructive and curious statement from the report of the meeting above referred to:—

banished from Geneva, as it was from this country, by severe legal enactments; these remained in force until the incorporation of the Genevese republic with the French empire. It was then that the Roman Catholic Church was, for the first time, readmitted within the gates of Geneva; one of the city churches, curiously enough the church of St. Germain, in which the Reformation begun, was appropriated for its worship; and, by degrees, a Roman Catholic population collected, which, in the year 1814, amounted to 2000. By the treaty of Vienna, which restored to Geneva its independent sovereignty, the territory of the republic was increased by the addition of twenty-one parishes, two of them town, and the rest country parishes, which had belonged partly to Piedmont, and partly to France. The population of these new districts was Roman Catholic, and by way of conciliating their new fellow-citizens, the Genevese not only granted free toleration and equality of civil rights to the Roman Catholics, but they built several new churches and a number of schools for them, and made provision for the payment of the Romish clergy and schoolmasters out of the public funds. So much for the liberality of the Protestant government of Geneva: now for the return which it met with at the hands of the Romish party. The principal priest (archiprêtre) of the Roman Catholic Church at Geneva was a man named Vuarin, a man of great ability, energy, and perseverance. He undertook to catholicize the city of Calvin; and he did it in this way. Whatever shops or other business premises in the town fell vacant, he contrived to secure, and put into them Roman Catholics from the country parishes, who were allowed to occupy them rent free for a year or two, on condition that, when they were properly established in their business, they should either remove to some other part of the town, or pay rent, so as to enable him to take other places for new comers. At the same time, he required of all these settlers, that they should employ no other than Roman Catholic servants, and give their custom exclusively to Roman Catholic dealers. By these means, and having large sums of money placed at his disposal, for the purpose of carrying on his operations, Vuarin succeeded in raising the Roman Catholic population of Geneva from 2000, which was the number in 1814, to 8000, which it was in 1844. The numerical strength of the Roman Catholics being thus brought within 2000 of the numerical strength of the Protestants, Vuarin thought himself strong enough to commence a system of open aggression; further rights and privileges are demanded, and various grievances got up. One of the latter was, that the Protestant clergy refused to take off their hats when meeting the host carried in procession; the education question furnished another topic of complaint; and by an alliance with the radicals, an extension of the right of voting was obtained, which increased the political power of the Romanists.

“Meanwhile Vuarin died in 1844, and the appointment of his successor became the occasion of an open conflict between the Romish hierarchy and the government of Geneva. The latter had, by this time, become fully alive to the dangerous character of the machinations which had been so successfully carried on, and when the Bishop of Lausanne and Geneva nominated Marilley, Vuarin's curate, and his coadjutor in all his proceedings, as his successor, the government exercised the right of putting their veto upon the nomination The bishop, however, denied the right of the government to interfere with his nomination, and persisted in forcing his nominee, Marilley, upon the republic. The government, on the other hand, determined to maintain their right, and intimated to Marilley that if he attempted to assume the government of the Roman Catholic Church at Geneva, they would cause him to be transported beyond the frontiers of the republic. Marilley, acting under the orders of the bishop, set the government at defiance, and drove them to the extreme measure of having him removed from their territory in the custody of two gendarmes. This was precisely what the Romish party desired; the cry of persecution was raised; the bishop caused a protest against the proceedings of the government to be publicly read in the Roman Catholic church at Geneva. He confirmed Marilley in his office, appointed a locum tenens for the performance of his sacerdotal functions pendente lite, and to crown the whole, carried the cause by appeal to Rome. Thus was Geneva, that chief city of continental Protestantism, after the lapse of 300 years, again placed in the position of appearing as a suitor at the court of the Roman pontiff. And how did Rome deal with the case? Before the cause was ripe for decision, it so happened that the see of Lausanne and Geneva became vacant by the death of the bishop, whereupon the pope appointed Marilley as his successor, thus inflicting upon the government of Geneva in the character of bishop, the very man whom they had refused to receive as priest!"

"This is a fair specimen of the way in which concessions to the Romish Church are abused, for the purpose of treading under foot the independence of nations and the rights of sovereign states. As it happened at Geneva, so you may rest assured will it happen to us, if we continue that over liberal course of policy which has of late years been pursued. Let these bills, which virtually repeal the Act of Supremacy, and recognize the papal jurisdiction, be suffered to pass into law, and the time will soon arrive when England will have to appear as a suitor before the papal court, and the jurisdiction of the Lord High Chancellor [may we not add that of the Parliament and Crown?] of England be superseded by the superior jurisdiction of the Chancery of Rome."

We have seldom perused a more striking and remarkable delineation of the working of Romanism to attain supremacy. Romanism is every where the same in spirit. It is always equally aspiring, crafty, and bold in its policy. Such facts as these will show how it avails itself of free political institutions, and how inadequate its opponents are to cope with the unwearied energy of purpose, the exhaustless resource and fertility of machination which the Jesuits bring to bear on their object. We should have no apprehension, if the prevalence of one cause or the other were left to be determined by legitimate modes of argument and persuasion; but when in the face of the unwearied machinations and efforts of Romanism, we see Protestantism relinquishing all the political principles and institutions which protect the doctrines of the Reformation from open aggression; when we see barrier after barrier cast down by the unsuspecting facility of those who are the natural guardians of the Established Church; when we see concession after concession made to those who are steadfastly bent on the destruction of that Church, and who merely wait their opportunity to exchange the tone of affected liberality for a stern and deadly struggle for her annihilation; when we see them willing on all occasions to make common cause with Radicalism for the attainment of increased political power, and actually, year by year, gaining greater and greater power to accomplish their ultimate objects; when we see that by combination with those who abhor their religious tenets, they are able to advance step by step towards the overthrow of the only effectual impediment to the general progress of their religious system; when we see this course successfully pursued for a long series of years; and when, notwithstanding all the warnings that have been offered by experience and history—notwithstanding all the strongest protests of the people of England,—statesmen, and conservative statesmen, and what is still worse, bishops, will lend their support to the political cause of Romanism—we confess that we are inclined to despair for the Church. If bishops themselves, at this time of the day, are blind to the signs of the times,—if prelates of the Church are deluded and beguiled by the pretences of the Jesuits, and lend the weight of their support to the passing of measures which tend to the utter destruction of the Church, we can only say that they ought to be held chiefly responsible for what may occur. And if, in consequence of their fatal and inexcusable rashness, we should live to see those very prelates driven from the House of Lords, and despoiled of their incomes and their patronage, who will not feel that they have richly earned the retribution? Who will not point to them as the chief authors of the downfall of the Church?

A consideration of the alarming advances in power made by Romanism in the last twenty or thirty years, ought of itself to prevent any friend of the Church from assisting in its further progress. We confess that we address ourselves to the mere “Establishment” view of the case principally. We are desirous of making some impression on those who are disposed to take a higher view of the advantages of the temporal establishment of religion than even we do; we are appealing to those who regard the Church as little more than the creature of the State, and who cannot conceive her existence if the bond of union between Church and State were severed. We say to them, that in proportion as they deem the Church to be dependent on the State, so should they struggle to prevent the State from adopting principles which lead necessarily to the destruction of any exclusive establishment of religion.

It is evident that our statesmen, with all the confidence which they undeniably possess in their skill in the art and craft of statesmanship, are no matches for the Jesuits. English diplomacy has always been foiled in its negotiations with Russian, Austrian, and French cunning; and honest John Bull has invariably fought the battles, of which his neighbours have carried off the spoils. In the same way our statesmen have attempted to negotiate with the Jesuits, and they have been regularly made tools of Rome. Able as Lord Lyndhurst is in his legal and official capacity, he has proved himself capable of being made the dupe of Jesuitism. We will not do the noble lord or his colleagues the injustice of supposing that they have any principles opposed to the existence of an Established Church. Many circumstances render such a notion altogether incredible. But notwithstanding this, the ministry in proposing the "Religious Opinions Relief Bill," have been striking a tremendous blow at the foundation of the National Establishment. We have sometimes heard, what we considered at the time mere vain and absurd boasts of Romanists, that they expected soon to see mass celebrated in St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey. Ridiculous as such expectations seem to be, there is every reason to expect that they will be realized ere long, if measures like that of the Lord Chancellor pass into law. We shall presently state our reasons for this opinion, but in the mean time, we are anxious to draw attention to the following remarkable exposition of the designs and plans of Romanism in this country for attaining ultimate ascendancy².

"This is the critical moment when it will be decided, whether as a nation, and a Church, we shall make a determined stand against the papacy, or whether we shall fall prostrate under its anti-Christian power. . . . I am only stating to you that which the Romanists themselves have deliberately placed on record, as the object of their strenuous endeavours, and their sanguine expectations. If the meeting will give me leave, I will refer, in proof of this assertion, to a few extracts from a work which I met with at Paris, and brought over with me two years ago. The author of it is M. Jules Gondon, one of the editors of the Univers, the recognized organ of the Ultramontane party in France; its title, 'The Religious Movement in England; or, the progress of Catholicism, and the return of the Anglican Church to Unity.' . . . All the points and bearings of the question are seriously and deliberately argued by the author, with a view to show that England ought to be, and shortly will be a Roman Catholic country . . . Without any circumlocution M. Gondon accounts for the passing of the Bill of 1829, by the fact, that 'the Catholic Association of Ireland had raised up in that country a government more formidable than that of England.' The circumstances,' he continues, 'were nearly identical with those which at present result from the Repeal Association. The Emancipation Bill, it is true, contained some restrictive clauses, but these restrictions,' M. Gondon here enumerates them, and then contemptuously adds, 'these restrictions were of little consequence; the essential point was to get the principle admitted; that principle the Parliament proclaimed; THE DEVELOPMENT OF ITS CONSEQUENCES WAS LEFT TO THE FUTURE.'"

The development of these consequences is then traced in the progress of the religious organization of Romanism in England—the increase of their numbers—the multiplication of churches and chapels, monasteries, convents, and confraternities. Their hierarchy has been doubled in England since the Bill of 1829: the same course has been followed in all the English Colonies and dependencies. The funds of the Propaganda of Lyons have within ten years been poured into England and its Colonies in a continually increasing ratio, so that while in 1835 the sum expended was 980*l.*, in 1844 it had risen to 40,865*l.*

"Another point which the Papists are keeping steadily in view, and which, according to M. Gondon, they hope ere long to accomplish, is the overthrow of the Protestant character of our ancient Universities. In the first instance, they have been content to get a footing in England for academical institutions of their own. The Jesuit College at Stonyhurst has been in operation for a number of years; and more recently, the Romish colleges of St. Mary Oscott, and St. Cuthbert, Durham, have been incorporated with the London University. But this, though it meets every fair claim of toleration, does not satisfy those whose object is not toleration but ascendancy. So long as Oxford and Cambridge remain exclusively Protestant Universities, the Papists have a grievance; and M. Gondon tells us what their plan is for obtaining its removal. 'Since 1840,' he says, 'numerous attempts have been made to obtain an extension of these liberal principles;—the principles, that is to say, on which the London University obtained a charter which permitted the incorporation of Popish Colleges;—'Ireland has agitated for the introduction of Catholic professors at the University of Dublin, England will as much as possible retard the moment of granting this privilege, for fear of a reaction upon its own Universities; but she will not always be able to refuse this act of justice to the Catholics of Ireland. Fear,'—observe the insulting taunt by which our foolish liberality is recompensed,—'fear will extort from her, as heretofore, what she does not grant of good will; and the Catholics of England will know how to turn this encouragement to account:' which phrase M. Gondon afterwards explains to mean, that they will insist on the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge being thrown open to the Romanists."

M. Gondon then explains the working of the Catholic Institute, the idea of which is, to "unite in one body all the Catholics contained in Great Britain," and to obtain subscriptions from every individual member of their communion. "The results of such a combination," says M. Gondon, "are truly incalculable."

"Some of these results have been already accomplished, others are yet in progress; and it is surely not too much to say that the bills of the Lord Chancellor and Mr. Watson for the more effectual advancement of popery, are to be reckoned amongst them . . . 'It has been settled,'—observe, this is the statement of the Romish party themselves, as to their mode of proceeding,—'it has been settled as a general principle, that the Catholics are to vote in a body; so as to enable them to give the decision between two parties about equally balanced. Candidates expecting the votes of the Catholic body, must give a specific pledge to be on all occasions the defenders and advocates of the religious rights and interests of the Catholics throughout the whole extent of the Empire, subject to the British sceptre.'"

But we now come to what is of still more importance, as bearing on the proceedings of the present Administration in their measure for the protection of Roman Catholic charities, their concession of the rank of "Bishop" and "Archbishop" to the Romish hierarchy, their endowment of Maynooth, and their proposal to repeal all statutes condemnatory of Romanism.

"In this point of view the following statement of M. Gondon, deserves particular attention:—'The importance which the Catholics had acquired, was one of the first questions which occupied the statesman, whom the elections of 1841 had called to the helm. Hearing of numerous conversions in the inferior classes of society, observing that religious fraternities of both men and women were being organized every where, the Government wished to know the real objects of these associations, and to make sure that this considerable increase of the children of the Roman Church portended no design to the social condition of Britain. A secret inquiry was set on foot by the Government, and the ministry was informed that every where, in the manufacturing and agricultural districts, the Catholics form a select body, distinguished by its knowledge, its morality, and its love of order. According to the reports of the manufacturers, the Catholics are the most laborious and best disciplined workmen; they always keep aloof from the leaders of disunion and disorder. It required no more than this to determine the Government to let things take their course, without endeavouring to impede in any way the general tendency which manifests itself towards a religious system formerly condemned by the laws of the State. Thus the regenerating action of Catholicism makes itself felt in a social point of view.' Further on we learn from M. Gondon's book, that 'SINCE 1842, THE CENTRAL COMMITTEE OF THE CATHOLIC INSTITUTE HAS BEEN IN COMMUNICATION WITH SEVERAL MEMBERS OF THE CABINET,' AND THAT THE CONCESSIONS MADE TO ROMAN CATHOLICS HAVE BEEN THE RESULTS OF THAT COMMUNICATION."

And this brings us again to Lord Lyndhurst's Bill. The Romanist authority just quoted, leads to the suspicion that this bill was concocted by the "Catholic Institute." Similar bills have been brought in for the last session or two by Romanists—one we believe by Serjeant Murphy in the House of Commons, and another by Lord Beaumont in the House of Lords. The repeal of the old statutes against Romanism and other forms of religious dissent, have been for some time pressed on various occasions by Romanists. It has at length, most probably at the instance of the "Catholic Institute," been formally taken up by the present ministry.

Now, in examining the real character of this measure, we may be permitted to ask, why Romanists have been so very anxious for it? It is not pretended that any of the penalties against their religion are now in force. It is not pretended that the Act of Emancipation in 1829 left them subject to any danger of persecution from these laws. Nothing could be so absurd as such a notion. No one asserts that it is the case. The Lord Chancellor and the advocates of the bill do not venture to say that any relief is needed from positive penalties. Why then is the repeal of these statutes sought for, when they are wholly suspended from operation, and no one suffers from them? Will any one believe that Romanists seek their repeal merely because they deem their existence an insult to their religion? We can only say that if the supporters of the measure are taken in by mere pretences like this, the credulity of some men of the world is truly marvellous. Does any one who understands Jesuitism suppose that it has not some design deeper than is apparent, when it complains of "insults" being offered to religion? Look at the measure, and see whether the real designs of Jesuitism cannot be distinctly traced in it? Here is a measure which is to remove no one real grievance—Thus much is admitted. What then is the object?

The bill is simply to repeal every shred and vestige of the old enactments against those who dissent from the established religion of the State. If it should pass, there would not be a single remaining proof on the statute-book, that the State had ever disapproved of dissent from the National Church, or that it ever held it the duty of the nation to embrace that form of religion. Let this bill pass, and the whole theory of the constitution as regards religion is at once altered. Hitherto the doctrine of the Law of England has been, that the Church is recognized and established by the State as the true religion; that the State holds it to be the duty of all its subjects to adhere to the Church; but that it does not any longer compel schismatics to conformity by temporal penalties, as it once did: it tolerates what it cannot approve or encourage. This is the principle of toleration, which involves necessarily the supremacy of an established Church, and its peculiar adoption by the State. But as soon as this bill passes, the whole doctrine of toleration is at an end. The State will have declared that it recognizes no superiority of one form of religion to another. It will have blotted from its Statute Book the whole body of laws, which in the course of successive ages attested its preference for the Church of England, and which continue to attest it. By this single act, the State will have recognized the equality of all sects: it will have established the principle that they are all to be viewed with equal favour—that there is to be no further preference.

Such is the object which Romanists and all other sectarians have been aiming at for years. They repudiate the notion of toleration, and demand equality of rights. The demand must by this time be familiar to all our readers. It is conceded by the “Religious Opinions Relief Bill.” Let this bill become law; and the mistaken liberality which has allowed it to pass, will ere long find it bearing bitter fruits. Romanists will be quite satisfied to have gained the concession of the principle, and will wait a little before it is pushed home to its conclusions. What are those conclusions?

The principle established by the bill is, the full equality of all religious sects in the eye of the law—their perfect equality in rights. On this principle, how will it be any longer possible to defend the exclusive possession of seats in Parliament by the “Anglican” bishops? This constitutes a decided inequality between the English Church and other religious sects. Consequently either the bishops must be expelled from the House of Lords, or other sects must have representatives there. The former alternative is, of course, that which would be adopted. Now just let us pause for a moment on this question. We recollect the violent exertion made for the expulsion of the bishops from Parliament in 1830—1834. That the danger was very great, we suppose no one will deny. It was generally supposed that the bench were in no small degree alarmed at it. The first report of the ecclesiastical commissioners in 1835, is believed to have been materially influenced by it. According to the common report the see of Man was suppressed because it afforded the dangerous precedent of a bishopric without a seat in Parliament; and the total number of dioceses in England was not to be increased, (notwithstanding the evident desirableness of some increase, and the universal cry of the Church for it,) because the number of spiritual peers could not be augmented, and the commissioners feared the precedent of the appointment of bishops without seats in Parliament. If these reports were well founded, the Church certainly paid most dearly for the privilege of parliamentary seats for her bishops. The spiritual advantage of the Church was prevented by the apprehension of losing parliamentary rank! However this may be, it certainly showed a very great apprehension of the uncertain tenure of seats in the House of Lords. Again, in the very last session of Parliament, Lord Stanley, then Secretary for the Colonies, and now—observe this point—the leader of the Protectionist party—warned the bishops, that the creation of a single additional bishop without a seat in Parliament, would endanger the seats of the whole hierarchy! He remarked that many very excellent persons were of opinion, that the bishops would be more efficient if they were removed from Parliament. These were ominous words. Now let us look in another direction. There are unquestionably many very well-disposed persons, of high character, and friends of the Church, who have long been anxious to see an increase in the hierarchy, and who have learnt gradually that the seats in Parliament constitute the only real obstacle to a measure which they deem of far more importance than the preservation of parliamentary seats. Such persons have, in many cases, ceased to wish for the preservation of the latter privilege; and would even be rather glad to see it abolished. Further, many of the Protectionist party have taken offence at the recent support of the ministerial policy by the episcopal bench. We doubt whether the hierarchy can look to the Protectionists for the support of their parliamentary privileges. To whom then are they to look? Not to the present government: not to the Radicals or Free-traders, for they are the natural enemies of the hierarchy, and will be immediately open-mouthed for its destruction. Not, we fear, to the Whigs, for they would sacrifice the hierarchy without scruple if it suited their interests to do so. What hope then would there be of resisting the demands of the Radicals and Romanists for the expulsion of the bishops from the House of Lords, if this bill were to pass, and this natural inference were to be drawn from it? We confess that we are not sanguine as to the result. It is our painful apprehension, that if such events should take place,—if such measures should pass without the strenuous and united opposition of the hierarchy,—and if there should be any more instances of want of firmness and resolution in maintaining what is considered by most persons to be the cause of the Church, the hierarchy would fall; we do not say, without any struggle; because, thank Heaven, there are those who would support it under all circumstances; but without any powerful or lengthened resistance.

Let us suppose the enemies of the Church to have gained from the unsuspecting facility of its friends, the concession of the principle of Lord Lyndhurst's bill, namely, the equality of all religious sects in the eye of the law. And let us suppose them to demand the expulsion of the bishops from the House of Lords as a necessary consequence of the principle thus admitted. On what grounds could they be resisted? It would be in vain to appeal to the old principle of the constitution which recognizes a National Church. This ground would have been cut away. It would be in vain to argue that the Church ought to be represented in Parliament: the answer would be, that if so, all sects ought to be equally represented; which being impossible, the Church must be placed on a level with other sects. It would be vain to appeal to vested rights and immemorial privileges. The Corn-law Bill, and the Irish Church Temporalities Bill, and the Irish Tithe Bill, have interfered with vested rights and immemorial privileges. We might urge the benefit derived from the presence of the ministers of religion in the deliberations of Parliament. We should be met by those who would assure us that the House of Commons continues to get on admirably without the presence of any clergy; and would remind us that seats in Parliament detain the hierarchy from the discharge of their duties in their dioceses. We should be assured that the possession of this privilege only renders the bishops obsequious followers of the ministry; and that it makes too marked a distinction between the first and second order of the clergy. We should urge, in reply, the evil and danger of removing the bishops from the House of Lords, as a step to the total separation of Church and State. The reply would be, that the principle of total separation, i. e. of perfect indifference, or equal favour to all religious sects, had been conceded by the "Religious Opinions Relief Bill," which the bishops themselves had supported. We fear then, that as far as argument was concerned, the opponents of the hierarchy would have the advantage very decisively.

Since the above passage was written, we have observed some further evidences of the extremely critical position in which the hierarchy is now placed.

An appeal of the most forcible description had been made to the spiritual lords by the Marquis of Exeter. His lordship had urged upon the episcopal bench the difficulties to which this measure might reduce the parochial clergy, whose interests the bishops were especially commissioned to defend. We cite the report of his speech :—

“ I cannot help expressing my great regret, that many of the right reverend prelates, for whom I have the highest respect, should have thought it their duty to vote for the second reading of this bill. I had expected, as they are the only representatives of the clergy, whose interests will suffer so extremely from this measure, that they would have opposed it as a measure most hurtful to the interests of the Church. My surprise is, that many of those who have been asserting the necessity of augmenting poorer livings, and using their best exertions to carry out the object of the present commission, should have voted for a measure that must indisputably affect the incomes of the poorer clergy, and stultify, such would be the effect, all they have been doing to augment them during the last few years. I can assure the right reverend bench, that their clergy will feel their desertion most acutely. I had some conversation with several, in which I told them, that I had heard reports that the bishops intended to support the measure, but one and all declared, that they did not think the right reverend bench would so betray their trust.”

The Bishop of St. David's, according to the report of his speech, thus addressed himself to the question :—

“ He wished to say a few words in his own defence; for their lordships could not have forgotten that in the course of the recent discussion very numerous appeals—very solemn, emphatic, and earnest appeals, had been made by a great number of noble lords, and he must be permitted to say in a very unusual strain, to those who occupied a place in that part of the house (the right reverend bench), and they must also be aware that they were of such a nature as to involve very serious charges against that portion of their lordships' house, who held the opinions which he (the Bishop of St. David's) held. . . . The right reverend members of the bench on which he sat, were considered to be the representatives of the interests of the clergy, and it was on those grounds himself and his colleagues had been urged to give a vote against the measure which appeared to threaten the interest of that body. But what was the proceeding of the noble lords themselves upon the measure? Did they not most emphatically and indignantly repudiate the consideration of the question as a landlords' or a personal question, or that the measure was one calculated for the interests of a class only? It appeared to him, therefore, rather inconsistent, that though they put away from themselves all personal consideration, they nevertheless asked the right reverend bench to vote against the measure, on the ground that if passed, it would affect their interests. . . . The clergy had no apprehensions of this kind themselves. . . . He rejoiced that no unanimity on the present bill appeared amongst the right reverend prelates, because it was to him, and it would be to the world, a conviction that they had been guided by their own convictions, and by no other consideration. . . . Whatever loss the clergy might be considered to bear, it appeared to him that they would receive but little injury. . . . He would only say, that the great body of the clergy had no desire that their votes should be influenced by considerations connected with themselves. . . . Even if the measure should injure the interests of the clergy, they would secure to themselves that which to them was far more valuable than that they would lose, namely, the unabated and increased respect of the people."

In our opinion any measure which would affect the independence of the clergy would not secure for them "the increased respect of the people." We are, therefore, obliged to dissent from the right reverend prelate, who, we believe, was not in any way authorized by the parochial clergy of England to declare that they are quite willing to submit to the sacrifice of one-fourth of their incomes. Besides, his reply seems to reduce itself to this: "How could noble lords ask the bishops to protect the incomes of the parochial clergy, when they themselves had entirely rejected the notion of being influenced by personal considerations for the interests of the landlords?" That is to say, because the Protectionists generously set aside their own interests, the bishops might set aside the interests of the clergy! No one pretended that the measure would affect the interests of the bishops: this point was subsequently brought out with his usual force and point by Lord Stanley.

"The right reverend prelate said that he thought no reference ought to be made to the right reverend bench on the subject of the revenues of the Church. Now, my Lords, I say that . . . the lowering of the incomes of the parochial clergy is not a private, but a public injury, and is not to be considered merely as a diminution affecting the parochial clergy alone. If the commutation tithe bill had not taken place, the clergy would have been infinitely greater sufferers by the introduction of this measure. . . . I am quite sure that the right reverend bench is above the danger of being unduly influenced. Yet I may mention that there is a broad distinction between the parochial clergy and the members of that bench, who are the guardians of the Church. The parochial clergy are dependent for their incomes upon the price of corn, but the right reverend bench have all a fixed salary. The parochial clergy's income depends upon the fluctuating price of corn, whilst the right reverend prelates received a fixed and definite sum of money. I am quite sure that that circumstance will not in any way actuate the right reverend bench in giving their votes upon this question, and I only mention it for the purpose of showing that a difference does exist."

These observations comprise matter which cannot fail to make a profound impression on the minds of the parochial clergy.

We believe that exceptions have been taken to the alleged fact of the nature of the Episcopal income. But on the other side it might be said, that incomes of 5000*l.* per annum might bear some reduction without distressing their owners, while the same could not be said of incomes of 100*l.*, 200*l.*, or 300*l.*

We now turn to the report of the speech of another right reverend prelate, alluded to in the above extract from Lord Stanley's speech.

“An appeal had been made to the right reverend bench upon which he sat—a very earnest and forcible one—on the ground that the measure would diminish the incomes of the clergy. . . He confessed that he could not welcome such an appeal as that of the noble lord's. It would be in the recollection of their lordships that one noble earl had allowed himself to use such language as the following. That noble earl begun with a most erroneous assumption of a fact respecting the incomes of the English bishops. He then called upon the right reverend bench to remember their interests. He said they were separate from the interests of the parochial clergy, possessing real property, and upon whom the measure of the government would press with peculiar severity. There could be no doubt, the noble earl said, but it would lower their incomes, but it would benefit the bishops, because it would make money cheaper. The noble earl, having laid down this position, called upon the bench, of which he (the Bishop of Oxford) was one, not to give a selfish vote. He thought such an appeal would not be responded to in the spirit in which it was made. He would say more—THE BISHOPS DID NOT REPRESENT ANY PARTICULAR CLASS—IT WAS UNCONSTITUTIONAL TO SAY SO. Such a doctrine, if admitted, would destroy the very constitution of the House of Lords. The bishops sat there to represent the interests of this great country. If they did not, their mouths must be sealed up on all but clerical matters. They were to consult not merely what was best for the clergy, but what was best for the community at large. He would not be understood to sacrifice the interests of the clergy; on the contrary, he thought he was best advancing them when he promoted the public weal.”

We may be allowed to remark on the doctrine of this right rev. prelate, that if it be true, the reason usually advanced for maintaining the seats of the hierarchy in the House of Lords is at an end. If they do not sit there to represent the interest of the Church generally; if they sit merely as legislators who are to look simply to the general interests of the country at large, and with no especial reference to those of the clergy; then we opine, that there can be no very strong reason for calling the ministers of religion away from their more appropriate and peculiar functions, and burdening them with attendance on the House of Lords.

Let us not be misunderstood in saying this. We should regret to see the bishops expelled from the House of Lords; in the first place, because we think that their presence there is useful for the purpose of watching all measures affecting the interests of the Church and of Religion generally; and secondly, because their expulsion would be an important change, which ought not to be introduced without proved necessity. But we do not, we must confess, attach great weight to the mere temporal dignity and position which this privilege confers on the heads of the Church. This dignity has its disadvantages as well as its advantages: it adds largely to the expenses of the prelacy, and detains them from residence and cure of souls in their dioceses—duties which are as strictly incumbent on them in a religious point of view, as on the very poorest curate in the land. Our opinions on the whole question are nearly these: we should feel disinclined on some accounts to vote for the introduction of the hierarchy into the House of Lords, if they had never been there before: but as they have occupied seats in the legislature for a thousand years, we should think it would be dangerous now to remove them. We fear that we cannot take very high ground in maintaining this privilege, or speak very positively on the subject.

But we certainly do feel this most strongly: that the question of seats in Parliament is one of very subordinate importance, in comparison with the increase of the Episcopate: that the one relates to the temporalities of the Church, and the other to its spiritualities—that the one relates to its influence in the Legislature—the other to its efficiency as a means of promoting the kingdom of Jesus Christ on earth. We should be glad to see the Church ready to sacrifice all temporal considerations to those which are purely spiritual. We should be glad to see her willing, if need be, to lay down her temporal dignities, so that her essential ends were accomplished. We should be glad to see her in a spirit of faith, willing to risk all for the sake of Jesus Christ. And we feel confident, that if she could thus, courageously, faithfully, and in a spirit of self-denial, throw herself on the Divine protection—if she could get above the poor anxieties for the favour of princes, and the possession of temporal privileges, by which she is sometimes checked and restrained in the path of simple duty—she would be, even in this world, most amply rewarded. Is she not dependent on public opinion? Does not her strength lie in the affections of the people (humanly speaking)? What then would be so likely to strengthen her position, as to let the people of this country see, that while she does not recklessly throw away the privileges and rights with which the prudence and piety of former ages have invested her, she is still resolved to look simply and stedfastly, in the first place, to the fulfilment of her spiritual duties? That men of this world may fear to create Bishops without seats in Parliament, lest, by some chance, the parliamentary privileges of the hierarchy might be endangered—that statesmen may, in this question, put aside the demands of religion itself, and forget the higher interests of the Church, we can well understand. But if it be so, it is, in our opinion, the imperative duty of the Church to set them right, and to tell them with one united voice, that “the kingdom of God and His righteousness” must first be sought—that no religious cause can long prosper or succeed in which this principle is not the primary motive of action.

Holding these opinions, it is with the greatest gratification that we have read what purports to be a report of speeches recently delivered in the House of Lords, on occasion of the presentation of a petition by Earl Fitzwilliam. We hail, with the utmost satisfaction, such sentiments as those which are comprised in the speeches of Earl Fitzwilliam and Lord Brougham, furnishing, as they do, the most striking evidences of the progress which the question of an increase in the hierarchy is making in the public mind. The remarks of the Bishop of Exeter, who is a proved friend of this cause, are also most valuable; and the whole conversation is doubly important, not merely from its distinct attestation to the necessity of an increase in the episcopate, but from pointing out the source from which that increase is to be provided for.

“EARL FITZWILLIAM presented a petition from a clergyman in Oxfordshire, praying for a new division of the episcopal sees in England, that the bishops might be relieved from their onerous duty of attendance in Parliament, and that the incomes of the bishops, which the petitioner stated were dangerously large for men of God, might be reduced from £163,000 per annum, their present amount, to £80,000 per annum. He (Earl Fitzwilliam) was of opinion that the number of bishops in England ought to be largely increased, and therefore he had always objected to the union of the sees of Bangor and St. Asaph.

“THE BISHOP OF EXETER said, that he thought it absolutely necessary to state, that the crying want from paucity of bishops in this country was an evil which must soon be remedied. He, however, did not wish to see any increase in the general episcopal income, which he thought was quite sufficient to maintain a much larger number of bishops than the present number. He believed it would be a great misfortune to the State, as well as to the Church, if the bishops, the representatives of our National Church, were excluded from Parliament. He should only add, that he hoped the noble earl would introduce some measure for the purpose of increasing the number of bishops.

“LORD BROUGHAM said, that in his opinion the great increase in the population rendered a larger number of bishops necessary. He did not believe that the right reverend bench was overpaid, as matters now stood.

“EARL FITZWILLIAM said, that he thought the bishops ought to be increased to forty in number; and he was convinced that the new ones could easily be paid out of the present episcopal revenues.”

The advocates of an increase in the episcopate have rarely ventured to make any allusion to the possibility of obtaining funds for the purpose from the existing episcopal revenues. There can, however, now be no longer any difficulty or delicacy in speaking on the point. The scale of income adopted for the colonial dioceses, which has descended gradually from 4000*l.* per annum to 1200*l.*, (the incomes of the dioceses being subdivided as new dioceses were formed,) furnishes a precedent, which it might not be possible indeed strictly to follow; but which certainly cannot be overlooked or set aside. The duties of a colonial bishop are more onerous than those of an English bishop—the expenses of his visitations must be greater—the demands on his purse in new settlements, where churches and clergy are to be provided, scarcely less. And yet the average of income in England is 6000*l.* per annum, while in the colonies 1200*l.* is considered sufficient. Under these circumstances we cannot help expressing our concurrence in the views of the Bishop of Exeter and Lord Fitzwilliam. There seem to be sufficient means for doubling the number of sees, without trespassing on the funds of the State, or on private liberality. We may be permitted to add, that considering the immense increase in the population of this country, and the onerous nature of these episcopal duties which are strictly ecclesiastical and spiritual, it is not easy to see how the additional engagements of the hierarchy as members of the temporal legislature can be defended, unless there be a large increase in the episcopate.

We revert to the “Religious Opinions Relief Bill.” We have shown that it would lead by necessary consequence to the exclusion of the bishops from the House of Lords.

But this is only an instalment of what would follow. The next question that would be asked is, How can the large incomes of the hierarchy be defended consistently with the principles of religious equality? Ought not the Roman Catholic hierarchy to be equally well endowed? Or else, ought not the incomes of the Protestant bishops to be divided with their rivals? if this be not admitted, then ought not the two Sects to be placed on a level, by leaving the heads of both to depend equally on the voluntary support of their respective communions? Questions like this will be pressed home, as soon as the principle of religious equality shall have been admitted.

Again, the application of tithes, and Church property generally, to the exclusive support of the ministers of one religious denomination, will be next pointed out as a violation of the principle of religious equality. It will be demanded that all sects shall alike support their own ministers. The contest will be to procure the confiscation of tithes and Church property; but it may be, that some "liberal" minister, anxious to propitiate the agriculturists, may offer them the abolition of this burden on land, and the transfer of the payment of the existing clergy to the Revenue. The change would scarcely be greater and more startling than that effected by the Corn-law Bill. In this case the process of equalizing the position of all religious sects would be a very simple one. Parliament would only have to refuse the supplies, and the clergy would be at once obliged to depend on the voluntary contributions of their flocks.

But we have not yet come to the end of what might be expected. The churches would still be held by the legitimate clergy. But this would be regarded as a sign of inequality, and a grievance. It would be urged by Romanists, that their ancestors built these churches, and that they have as good a right to employ them as Protestants. It would be represented as a grievance that they were excluded from the churches which had been built by the Sovereigns of England, or from the public funds. We do not pretend to say that such claims would have any weight, if made at the present moment. They would undoubtedly now be considered as extravagant and ridiculous. But, would they be so, if the preceding steps in the course of events which we have been pointing out had been taken? Certainly not. The same spirit of Liberalism which had already gone so far, would not hesitate, for a moment, in granting to Romanists the further concession of celebrating their rites in our churches, alternately with those of the Church of England. Thus, at length, we should have arrived, by a very regular gradation, at the object which Romanists even now look to as certain to be attained:—the celebration of Mass in St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey!

Nor is this the last step: religious liberty would be claimed for the occupant of the Throne of England; and we might thus, in process of time, have a Romish Sovereign on the Throne, and be again governed indirectly by the Jesuits.

We shall probably be considered by some of our readers as mere alarmists; and it will be answered, that such events as we have alluded to as within the compass of possibility, cannot occur. We should be most happy to be able to concur in this opinion. We have striven to hope for the Church almost against hope. We have cherished hope for her, when many around us have despaired. We have felt an undoubting confidence in the loyalty of vast multitudes of her adherents, which has been tested and proved on many occasions within our recollection. But the present aspect of affairs, both political and religious, does seem most threatening to the interests of the Church as a National Establishment. And this has occurred in the space of little more than a year. At the meeting of Parliament in 1845, the Church of England stood apparently in a stronger position externally than she had done for many years. A party which had taken its stand on the principle of protection to all Established Interests and Institutions, had, after a glorious struggle, gained the ascendancy, and had elevated its leaders to the Ministry. What is now the state of things? In the space of one year, the ministers, thus elevated to power on the principle of protection and conservatism, have by a series of measures subversive of the interests which they were commissioned and pledged to defend,—in the face of the amplest warning, and avowedly, with the full knowledge of the risk which was run—utterly and finally divided the great and noble party, which had so long adhered to them with unparalleled fidelity, union, and confidence. They have outraged the principles and feelings of the friends of religion. They have exasperated to the last degree the agricultural body, on whom their power was dependent. And they will be compelled, with disgrace, to relinquish the government to those who represent interests hostile to the Church. Whether the constitutional party will be now able to struggle successfully with the tide of revolution which is fast setting in, is more than human wisdom can foresee. They ought at least to have the sympathies and support of every one who wishes to preserve the relics of the English constitution. We are persuaded that they will contend to the last for that sacred cause; and we can only hope that they will not visit on the Church of their Fathers, the temporary defection of some of her leaders in an hour of trial and difficulty. We trust that they will ere long receive the full support of the Church in their efforts: and if the same principles which have always hitherto guided them in their consistent course shall still continue to mark their progress, and to sustain their efforts;—if they will take their stand on the principle of Church and State; the preservation of all interests (and of the Church as the first and highest of all); together with the reformation of all proved abuses; they will infallibly have in the end the support of the whole Church, and of the majority of the people of England. With them, under Divine Providence, now rests whatever of hope still remains for the ultimate preservation of this country. If they cannot direct its affairs, they may at least be enabled to contend pro aris et focis against the antagonists of both: they may be able to frustrate their machinations and confound their measures. This is a noble destiny, if they are called to no higher; and they will finally rally around them in its fulfilment the property, the integrity, and the religion of the country.

- 1.—The Education of the Poor in England and France. By JOSEPH KAY, B. A., of Trinity College, Cambridge. London: Hatchards.

THE publication of this volume was immediately followed by some rather severe remarks by the Master of Trinity College, Cambridge, which, we think, were not calculated to create any unfavourable impression in regard to the author, or his work. Mr. Kay, who is a brother of Mr. Kay Shuttleworth, is an enthusiast in the cause of education, and argues earnestly for the necessity of the adoption of some national system of education by the State. He suggests (p. xviii.) one which shall secure "the direction of religious teaching to the clergy of the different sects, and the direction of secular teaching to the government, providing separate Normal schools for the training of schoolmasters for the Church and for the Dissenters." This is the principle of the Irish system of national education; and as experiments are always tried first in Ireland, and the Irish system has been sustained steadily by successive governments for about fifteen years, there can be very little doubt that an attempt will be made to introduce it into England, as soon as a breathing time from more important questions is allowed. Mr. Kay furnishes many interesting details on the state of primary education on the Continent, dwelling particularly on the provision for periodical inspection and examination of the schools, the nature of the Normal schools, and the instruction imparted in them, the institution of the Frères Chrétiens, and their useful labours; and after drawing a contrast between the means of education provided in England and those provided in the continental countries, and taking a survey of the efforts which have been made by voluntary exertions to supply the wants of the country, he arrives at the conclusion, that it is absolutely necessary for the State to take up the question in a way proportioned to its magnitude. He calculates that the number of Normal schools requisite for England is not less than seventy-two, while there are only five in existence; that to provide for the payment of good masters for the existing schools, the Church would require 500,000*l.* per annum, which she cannot raise; that it would require 2,000,000*l.* to support a general and efficient system of national education; that this sum might be provided by suppressing out-door relief to the poor. This however should, he thinks, only be done in a gradual manner. Mr. Kay takes a gloomy view of the moral and religious condition of the people of England, more especially in the manufacturing districts, and pleads for the general spread of a religious education, under the management of the clergy and the dissenting ministers. There is one obstacle which appears to us to render all these plans perfectly Utopian. Who would believe for a moment, that the English Parliament, which has been in the habit of expending some 30,000*l.* or 40,000*l.* per annum on education, and which last year made a prodigious exertion, and actually expended 75,000*l.*, would listen to any proposal for a permanent charge of 2,500,000*l.*? We should like to see any member of Parliament making such a proposal. This is not the way in which we do things in England. We do not compute the wants of the country, and then attempt to provide for them. But we give as much as we conveniently can, without inquiry. This is an economical method. By pursuing it we acquire the character of liberality at a cheap rate. Our plans for Church extension are guided by this economical principle. No one attempts to procure any estimate of the actual wants of the Church; but a sum is applied to meet them (certainly large in its actual amount); and as some good is of course done, we assume that the want of Church extension has been tolerably provided for. On the whole, though we cannot concur with many of Mr. Kay's views, we have derived interest and instruction from his work. Most earnestly do we wish that such publications might act as a warning to the Church of what is probably coming, and might induce her in the mean time to make increased exertions in the cause of education on sound principles.

11.—The Church of the Catacombs: a Description of the Primitive Church of Rome, illustrated by its Sepulchral Remains. By CHARLES MAITLAND, M.D. London: Longmans.

THE volume before us supplies a desideratum in our literature which has long been felt. The works of Arringhi, Fabretti, Boldetti, Bottari, and others who have laboured in the interesting field of inquiry presented by the subterranean antiquities of Rome, are not within the reach of the English reader. On the other hand, Dr. Wiseman and Dr. Rock have attempted to enlist these relics of antiquity in the service of Romanism, and from the absence of information on a branch of knowledge which has been much cultivated in Italy, some persons have been perplexed by the plausible references which have been made to alleged inscriptions and representations, which are assumed to be of the very earliest date, and to include a recognition of Romish doctrines and practices. The doctrine of development has, indeed, materially weakened the force of this argument, because it demonstrates that the peculiarities of Romanism were not received by the Church from the beginning, but gradually reasoned out. Still, it is both important and interesting to be allowed such an insight as the work before us affords, into the nature of the sepulchral remains of Rome. The extensive catacombs, which extend under a considerable part of Rome, and which spread in one direction to a distance of fifteen miles, were originally excavated as quarries and sand pits, but they gradually were made receptacles for the dead, and in the course of ages the number of tombs, and of sculptures, paintings, and inscriptions accumulated there, was enormous. The catacombs became a place of sepulture about the end of the Roman Republic, and they continued to be so for many centuries after the Christian æra. During the heathen persecutions they were the refuge of the Christians, who here remained in concealment, celebrating their religious rites by stealth, and depending for their daily sustenance on those of the brethren, whose humble station permitted them with safety to remain above ground. The bishops of Rome were generally buried here for several centuries, and the remains of the martyrs were also deposited here. The chapels in which the persecuted believers worshipped the true God are still in existence amongst these catacombs; but the inscriptions and other remains of art have been generally transferred to the various museums of Rome, and more especially to that of the Vatican. In these invaluable collections the author of the work before us has bestowed his time most judiciously, and in a way to interest and instruct his readers. The interesting work of Mrs. Hamilton Gray, on the sepulchres of Etruria, with which our readers are doubtless well acquainted, is an evidence of the interest with which what seems to be a merely antiquarian topic, may be invested by the light in which it is placed by an author. We must select some illustrations of the mode in which the subject before us is treated:—

“The fact that the catacombs were employed as a refuge from persecution, rests upon good evidence, notwithstanding objections that have been made, founded upon the narrowness of the passages, the difficulty of supporting life, and the risk of discovery, increased by seeking concealment in an asylum so well known to their enemies. These objections scarcely apply to a temporary residence below ground in times of danger, and it is not pretended that the catacombs were inhabited under other circumstances The catacombs have become illustrious by the actual martyrdom of some noble witnesses to the truth. Xystus, bishop of Rome, together with Quartus, one of his clergy, suffered below ground in the time of Cyprian.”—pp. 27, 28.

The inscriptions on the tombs of the ancient Christians are in many cases most deeply interesting: we take one or two as specimens. The following is of the date of the fifth persecution, A.D. 161.

“In Christ. Alexander is not dead, but lives beyond the stars, and his body rests in this tomb. He lived under the Emperor Antonine, who, perceiving that great benefit would result from his services, returned evil for good: for while on his knees, and about to sacrifice to the true God, he was led away to execution. O, such times! in which sacred rites and prayers, even in caverns, afford no protection to us. What can be more wretched than such a life? and what than such a death? when they could not be buried by their friends and relations—At length they sparkle in heaven. He has scarcely lived, who has lived in Christian times.”

There is a great mass of most curious information on ancient rites and customs in this volume. In particular, the various signs and tokens by which Romish antiquaries pretend to discover the relics of martyrs in these cemeteries, are very carefully discussed, and their uncertainty is demonstrated. We select the following interesting remarks:—

“The romance of the eleven thousand virgins is said to owe its existence to the inscription,

which was read ‘Ursula and eleven thousand virgins,’ instead of ‘Eleven virgin martyrs.’

“The history of St. Veronica exceeds all other legends of pseudo-saints, in the pertinacity with which it has been supported by the Roman Church, in opposition to the learned of her own communion, and in the entire absence of traditional evidence. Its origin and progress have been brought to light by the researches of Romanist antiquarians.

“About the darkest time of the middle ages, arose the custom of painting the countenance of our Saviour upon pieces of cloth: the accuracy of the supposed likeness, or icon, as it was called, was attested by inscribing beneath it the words ‘vera icon,’ gradually corrupted into Veronica. Many writers mention there veronicæ; as is observed by Mabillon, who has cited passages from Romanus, Petrus Casinensis, and Augustinus Patricius. Mabillon also mentions the petition of a certain Cistercian abbess, dated 1249, to Jacobus de Trevis, the pope’s chaplain, that he would send her a copy of the picture contained in St. Peter’s. He complied with her request, and begged her to receive the copy as ‘a holy Veronica, Christ’s true image and likeness.’ The next stage in the growth of the legend (for it does not seem to be of older date), was the discovery that the original Veronica was an actual impression of our Saviour’s features, miraculously taken at some time or other: according to Mabillon, during the agony in the garden; to Ducange, on the way to Calvary; and by another class of persons, as noticed by Baronius, supposed to have been left upon the head-dress in the sepulchre. But the story still wanted something, and Veronica was at length found to be the name of a holy woman who followed our Lord to Calvary; and who, while piously wiping the Redeemer’s brow with a cloth, received as a reward the miraculous impression of his countenance. Of this woman, whom Baronius calls Berenice, there is a colossal statue in St. Peter’s, at Rome; and what is worse, her image occupies a prominent place in the hearts of our ignorant people. . . . The handkerchief of St. Veronica is publicly worshipped in Rome on stated occasions, and the ceremony is performed with the utmost splendour: perhaps there is no part of the Romish ritual more calculated to strike the imagination. The prostrate multitude, the dome of St. Peter’s, dimly lighted by the torches in the nave, and the shadowy baldacchino, hanging to all appearance in mid-air, form a spectacle not easily forgotten.”

There is much interesting discussion in this volume on the supposed signs of martyrdom on the tombs of the ancient Christians. This is a question of very great practical importance at Rome, inasmuch as the catacombs have furnished a large number of relics, the sanctity of which is tested in some degree by certain signs which antiquarians have chosen to regard as indicative of the martyrdom of their former inhabitants. Various implements are found in these tombs, which are considered to be instruments of torture: some of these appear to have been forged in modern times; in reference to others, Dr. Maitland remarks with justice, that "these objects, if merely an imitation of the instruments of torture, are of no value as actual relics of the martyrs: and if it is pretended that they were really employed in the execution of those with whose bodies they were interred, we may answer, that it is incredible that the Christians should have obtained from the Pagan authorities their instruments of punishment, in order to add to the honours of the martyrs' funeral." It seems, in fact, that these pretended instruments of torture, were nothing more nor less than the tools which the deceased had employed in their various trades and callings. It has been supposed that "a figure praying," represented on a tomb, was a symbol of martyrdom; but Dr. Maitland remarks that this sign occurs on tombs of the fourth and fifth centuries—after the ages of martyrdom. Again, the Congregation of relics, in 1668, determined that a palm sculptured on a tomb, and a vessel tinged with blood, are most certain signs of martyrdom. The vessels here alluded to are vases of terra-cotta, glass, alabaster, or ivory, found in the Christian tombs, which have been considered as receptacles of the martyrs' blood. But it appears that the "palm branch" is now almost universally abandoned, and "the vessel of blood," though still generally received on the Continent as an emblem of martyrdom, is already attacked in various quarters as being of uncertain meaning. Of the latter emblem, no trace is found in contemporary writings—the blood sometimes collected at the time of the execution seems to have been preserved as a relic, not to have been buried: and "the great number of cups discovered, some of which are drinking vessels, with inscriptions and figures of a date long posterior to that of the persecutions, leaves room to doubt their having been employed with any uniform intention." Dr. Maitland, after quoting the various opinions of antiquaries on this point, arrives at a very sensible conclusion—"Between the heathen lachrymatory and the so-called martyr-vase there exists no well-defined difference; and not knowing the exact intention of the vessel in either case, beyond the probability that it was a depository for aromatic gums, we may suppose the Christians to have borrowed it from the Pagans, with such modification of its use as time and circumstances suggested."

On the whole, it appears that the supposed symbols of martyrdom lie under most serious objections. "Excepting a very few cases, where the deceased is expressly described as a martyr, that circumstance seems to have been left unrecorded in the cemetery."

The catacombs contain some inscriptions on clergy who were buried there. The following is on one of the Roman presbyters:—

“ LOCVS BASILI PRESB. ET FELICITATI EIVS
“ SIBI FECERVNT.”

“ To Basilus the presbyter, and Felicitas his wife. They made this for themselves.”

Aringhi has preserved an inscription, of which the following is a translation :—

“ Petronia, a priest’s wife, the type of modesty. In this place I lay my bones ; spare your tears, dear husband and daughters, and believe that it is forbidden to weep for one who lives in God. Buried in peace, on the third nones of October, in the Consulate of Festus [i. e. in 472].”

Dr. Maitland remarks, that very few epitaphs of persons devoted to celibacy are found in the Lapidarian Gallery at the Vatican. The inscriptions, too, seem in general not to contain prayers for the dead ; and the invocations of saints do not appear. Sculptured representations of scenes and events mentioned in Holy Scripture are not unfrequent ; such as the Three Children in the Fiery Furnace, and the History of Daniel. The Good Shepherd carrying a Lamb thrown across his shoulders is a well-known emblem of our Lord. This emblem occurs frequently on the sepulchres of the early Christians, but the representation is derived with little variation from heathenism. “ In the tomb of the Nasones,” says Dr. Maitland, “ a heathen family of eminence in Rome, may be seen, among many mythological paintings, the figure of a shepherd with a sheep on his shoulders, and a crook in his hand, surrounded by the Four Seasons. What was intended by this heathen painting is not clear ; but by a slight alteration, the same composition was soon converted into a ‘bonus pastor’ by Christian artists. The change however was slow: the Pan’s pipe remained for some time in the hand of the chief shepherd, and the Roman dress was ‘seldom abandoned.’ There are many representations of the events of our Lord’s life in these sepulchres—such as the raising of Lazarus, the multiplication of the loaves and fishes, the restoration of sight to the blind, and the cure of the paralytic. It is a very curious fact, that “in all the pictures and sculptures of our Lord’s history, no reference is ever found to his sufferings or death.”

On the whole, we are bound to say that Dr. Maitland has produced a most interesting and valuable book, replete with information which is in a great degree new to the English reader. It is copiously illustrated by wood-cuts from drawings by the author.

III. Christian Boyhood at a Public School. A Collection of Sermons and Lectures delivered at Winchester College. By the Rev. CHARLES WORDSWORTH, M.A., late Second Master. 2 vols. London: Rivingtons. 1846.

IT has long been the reproach of our public schools, and we fear not without reason, that religious culture has been excluded from their system—that they have offered, not facilities, but discouragements, for the formation of the Christian character. It was to be expected, of course, that a boy would be exposed to greater difficulties and temptations upon going to school, than he could have experienced at home. Where boys are congregated in large masses, there must be a considerable amount of moral evil. But the fault has been, that little or no pains have been taken in our larger schools to counteract and mitigate the evil which was unavoidable; it has been regarded too much as a thing for which there was no remedy. Suggestions for a higher and more Christian mode of dealing with it have been immediately put aside as impracticable. Complaints have been put to silence by the formidable truism, that “boys will be boys.” The idea of “Christian boyhood” has been well nigh lost among us. Our public schools have produced scholars and gentlemen; but they cannot be said to have tended, by the system pursued by them in later times, to train the “babe in Christ” to the perfection of his spiritual manhood.

We should be very sorry to imply that men of high Christian principle, nay of the highest eminence in this respect, have seldom issued from public schools. A host of living examples, as well as many of a former generation, would instantly occur to the mind, and forbid such an allegation; but we greatly doubt whether any of these have owed ought of their Christian integrity and steadfastness to the training of their schoolboy days. It has been rather in spite of the influences by which, in that period of their life, they were surrounded, than by the aid of them, that their religious principles were maintained and strengthened.

There are now, however, many cheering indications that a better state of things is beginning to arise: Dr. Arnold, it must be gratefully acknowledged, set an example of improvement, which, we trust, is being extensively followed. And we are happy to think that the great defect of his teaching, useful as it undoubtedly was, in important respects, to his pupils, is not chargeable upon those who are now aiming, under God, to Christianize “the most principal” of the schools of the country. The volumes before us are published by their excellent author as a legacy of love to the boys of Winchester college, his impaired health having compelled him to retire from the office of second master, which he held for ten years. Although, however, they are "especially designed," as Mr. W. informs us, for Wykehamists; and, naturally, abound in references, and treat of details which none but Wykehamists can understand; they furnish us with a most valuable body of Christian teaching, from which all who are engaged in education, of boys particularly, may gather lessons eminently wise and profitable. It is evident from these discourses, that Mr. Wordsworth never lost sight, in discharging the duties of his office, of his own special obligations as a minister of Christ's Church, or of the responsibilities of his pupils, as being, by holy baptism, members of the same. He deals with them as with "new creatures in Christ Jesus," and labours to awaken in them a worthy sense of their spiritual capacities, privileges, and obligations. But the great excellence of his teaching consists, we think, in his happy application of Church or Gospel principles to the various ordinary and (so to call them) trifling occasions of a schoolboy's every-day life. This, we suppose, is felt to be their greatest difficulty by those who are attempting to carry out a Christian education; and to all such these results of Mr. Wordsworth's experience and judgment must prove an invaluable help. As an instance of the practical character of these addresses, we give the following extract from the sermon on "The Practice of Private Prayer." It appears that the boys had been shamed out of the performance of this necessary Christian duty—and Mr. W. appeals to the prefects, to use their authority to break through this disgraceful custom—

"It is never my desire," he says, "or intention, to recommend what I cannot fairly expect you to perform; still less to press upon your obedience any command which I myself believe to be impracticable. And as regards the practice of private prayer, in the present state of things, I am ready to confess that (much as I might wish it) I dare not hope to be able to persuade the generality—perhaps not one individual—of you to kneel down singly by his bedside, and say his prayers. All I can now hope is, that many of you are in the habit of praying secretly as you lie down in your beds; and though I consider this as unsatisfactory, if not insufficient, on many accounts, still any method of prayer, provided it be regularly and devoutly performed will prove, I doubt not, an acceptable service in the sight of God, &c.

"What I do wish then is, to put it to you as prefects, whether the present state of things in this respect might not be improved? I wish you to consider, whether by some simple regulations among yourselves, the practice of this unquestionable duty, which is now so full of difficulty and temptation, might not be rendered easy and delightful."

Soon afterwards follows the proposal :—

"Say your own prayers openly, and at a stated time, on your knees, and require those who are committed to your charge to do the same. Let the 'Prefect in course' in each chamber preserve the same quiet and order before you retire to rest for the short space of five or ten minutes of prayer time, as he is accustomed to do during the longer period of 'Toy time.' "

It is interesting to learn that this good counsel was adopted, and that it proved successful, by the Divine blessing, in banishing the reproach to which it referred.

We take the following from the discourse, entitled "On the duty of young Communicants in details of School Discipline :"—

"Certain it is, we teach you again and again, that the very test and touchstone of your sincerity, of the strength of your characters, and of your religious earnestness, lies in matters of this kind (the point under immediate notice is that of keeping within bounds), that the exact, punctual, regular performance of the ordinary duties of your daily life, is the best and only sure method, not only to win the favour of man, but to approve yourselves in the sight of Almighty God: that however these may be little things in themselves, yet so long as they are positively commanded by those whom you are bound to obey, to you they are not such: and even if they were, that it is in little things that the real hearty desire of doing one's duty will best be shown; and again, that it is not whether the transgression be little or great, but whether you are acting on the principle of obedience, or of disobedience, which it concerns you to consider; for 'He that is unjust in the least, is unjust also in much.' "

On the duty of reverent behaviour in public worship, Mr. W. has these impressive words :—

"You will do very wrong if you suffer yourselves to regard this matter as one between yourselves as schoolboys and a master whom personally you may or may not choose to respect. It is not as a master, but as a minister of Christ, that I speak to you on these things; neither is it as schoolboys, but as members of Christ's body, and as God's children, that you are admitted here. I desire, indeed, as far as in me lies, to point out to you what is right; but having done this, however much I may wish and pray for your own sakes, that you may be led to practise it, both in this and every other case, Christian discretion, no less than Christian reverence in holy things, forbids that I do seek to compass, by the exercise of any lower authority that which the authority of the Church and of Christ's ministers is insufficient to effect. Only let me leave you with these reflections :—If we cannot, will not, drive out sin and disobedience from the immediate presence of God in his house and worship, how shall we hope to overcome them and expel them elsewhere? . . . Above all, consider this. Twice, at the least, in every day, accordingly as you shall follow or neglect these directions, you will either be practising yourself in a habit of wilful, deliberate disobedience, (and that, too, while professing to be engaged in God's service,) a practice which cannot fail to be productive of the most fatal consequences upon your future course, or you will be forming a habit of holy, dutiful obedience, which is no less certain to call down upon you God's blessing, and to clear and smooth the path which is before you."—Vol. i. p. 283.

These samples, taken at random from the work before us, may help perhaps to give those who are not yet acquainted with it, some notion, though a most imperfect one, of its great value. We heartily and entirely recommend it to all who are engaged or interested in the important work of education.

IV.—Poems. By the Rev. C. E. KENNAWAY, M.A. London: Rivingtons.

THE pieces comprised in this volume are classed by the author under the following heads—"Religious Subjects"—"Home Subjects"—those which are "of a general character"—"Sonnets"—"Epitaphs." It will thus be seen that there is very considerable variety in the contents, and that the author has attempted most of the styles of poetic composition. We can, perhaps, best express our sense of the merit of these compositions, by expressing a wish that the author could be permitted by his sacred avocations to undertake and complete some longer poems than any which are included in the present publication. There is that in the character of his poetry which reminds us forcibly of Cowper, and occasionally of Wordsworth. There is something of the affection and simplicity of the one, with the high philosophy of the other. It is not for us to determine the rank and position which the author of these poems is to hold amongst English poets, but we can say with sincerity, that we have perused his volume with no ordinary gratification and interest. The poems on "the affections" seem to us those in which the author appears to most advantage. Take the following specimen "On seeing in a book, J. K—, jun., chiefly on my Father's Death:"—

"Why from my bosom rose that pensive sigh,
As on that name I gazed? A brother's name,
Dear from my cradle, dear from childhood—loved
With warmer love as each maturer grew,
And summer ripened all the hopes of spring.

A brother's name ! but oh ! how strange a tale
 One little word declares of changed existence !
 Age has gone down, and youth hath ceased to be—
 For who can keep the character of a son,
 When he that was his honour'd father dies.

* * * * *

The flowers have all come out since he went hence ;
 The forest has been green and gay : the birds
 Have sung their love-songs ; piping to the morn,
 The lark has scal'd his cloudy stairs, and all
 The summer tribes have had their summer joys :
 But cold the while thine honoured head was laid,
 My Father ! Thou no more canst taste the joy
 That fills the frame, when spring puts forth her power,
 And comes with life o'erloaded ; not for thee
 Peeps the gilt crocus from its summer grave,
 Or lily later loads the air with love."

The following lines are from a poem entitled, "Change of Residence," referring to an incident in the author's early life :—

" Far away,
 In many a distant solitude repose
 Sequestered hearts ; they wake at morning prime
 In happy joyance, and they lay them down
 When softly on the slope the shadows fall ;
 Small care have they of camp or kingly court ;
 Encircled by their native hills they dwell,
 Each his own centre ; bearing each the bloom
 Of social charities, as she that loved
 Her own few people better than the world.

Yet e'en to these, though silent and remote,
 Reaches the wondrous stream ; no devious bay,
 No inland creek, how much soe'er removed,
 Eludes the wandering waters. Calm they live,
 And calmer still 'mid weeping friends they die ;
 Calm is their sunny youth and green old age ;
 And yet the changes of mortality
 Are theirs as all men's. . . .
 The change e'en now commences : slowly move
 The freighted waggons ; bustling menials urge
 Their rapid work ; confusion absolute
 Sits o'er the scene ; while jests and laughter loud
 Tell the strange sights that rummaged chests disclose.

* * * * *

Those books have slept within their narrow shelves,
 Just as he left them when he laid them down,
 Himself to sleep the dreamless sleep below.

Piled on that truck, alas! they tell no more
Their former tale; they're dumb for memory,
And all their pleasant tones have died away."

We should gladly dwell further on this most pleasing and interesting volume, but our space warns us to conclude. Mr. Kennaway is already advantageously known to the theological world by an excellent little work on Baptism, and by his Sermons; and the volume before us will add to his reputation.

v.—Ecclesiastical Reminiscences of the United States. By the Rev. EDWARD WAYLEN, late Rector of Christchurch, Rockville, Maryland, eleven years resident in America. London: Straker.

THE author of this work in the preface states, that he "has made no effort to shape and adapt his narrative to any established model in the same department of authorship; nor is he prepared with any apology for the prominence which is given to himself." We certainly cannot say much for the execution of this work, which is rather carelessly put together, and betrays occasional inaccuracies of style. It combines the various characters of an autobiography, a book of travels, and a series of ecclesiastical sketches. We select a specimen of the author's mode of treating his subject, which will be read with interest:—

"My clerical engagements took me several times up the Delaware. One of these excursions, which lives in my memory as the most interesting in the incidents which marked it, was to Burlington, the residence of the Bishop of New Jersey. . . . It was a bright sunny day, and the ample doors of Riverside were thrown open, discovering the Bishop's family at breakfast, while enjoying the prospect spread out by Nature's most lavish hand before the house. The sober, quiet refinement, and social comfort presented by the family group, and the unambitious elegance of the mansion, imparted to the scene a character peculiarly English. Several beautiful children occupied their places at the family board, whose deportment gave evidence of their good breeding, and the happy influence of private and maternal training under the check of religious principles. After breakfast I accompanied C——n to the garden, spread round the house, where the gravelled walks, winding their serpentine course through borders of well-trimmed shrubs, and the closely shaven lawn, completed the picture, which instantly carried our thoughts homeward. The church of St. Mary fronts a street a little out of the closest part of the city. It is cruciform in its plan, but unpretending in its architectural design, and rather low. Surmounting the central elevation is a stone cross, announcing to the by-passer that the building is neither a Mahomedan nor a Pagan, nor (by its appropriate symbol, the weather vane,) a sectarian place of worship, but a Christian temple, belonging to the one universal Church of the Apostles. Groups were gathered in the pleasant churchyard at the time of our arrival, and many had taken their seats in the consecrated place where the Trinity is worshipped. It was the festival of that holy mystery, and the Bishop's sermon embraced a notice of the sublime doctrine of the Three in One, which he treated practically in the evening's discourse at three o'clock. The evening's service was also celebrated at eight, p.m., in the chapel of St. Mary's hall, when the Bishop summed up the arguments, and enforced the exhortations used in his previous discourses; adding an appeal, couched in most feeling language, to his female auditors, to carry to their closets the recollection of the instructions received during the day. At the end of the chapel service the young ladies of the school, numbering about two hundred, each shook hands with the Bishop on their way to the supper-room."—pp. 424, 425.

VI.—The History of Egypt from the Earliest Times till the Conquest by the Arabs, A.D. 640. By SAMUEL SHARPE. New Edition. London: Moxon.

A CONSIDERABLE mass of information is accumulated in this volume, but the style is heavy and ungraceful, and we are sorry to observe that the author is very unsound in his views of Christian doctrine and Church government. From the manner in which he speaks of "Jesus of Nazareth," we should infer that Mr. Sharpe holds Socinian views. We cannot, therefore, recommend the work to our readers.

VII.—The History of British India, from 1805 to 1835. By HORACE HAYMAN WILSON, M.A., F.A.S. Vol. II. London: Madden and Malcolm.

THE present volume of Professor Wilson's History of British India, in continuation of the well-known work of Mill, includes the administration of the Marquis of Hastings, and extends from 1813 to 1823. The high reputation of the author, and the authentic character of the work itself, derived as it is from original documents, combined with the most perfect knowledge of the subject, will, of course, place this history amongst that class of works which are indispensable to every well-furnished library.

VIII.—The Life of Jesus, Critically Examined. By Dr. DAVID FREDERICK STRAUSS. Translated from the Fourth German Edition. In 3 Vols. London: Chapmans.

THE appearance of this work is curious, as an indication of the present tendencies of Unitarianism in England. Unable to maintain its own cause against the advocates of Catholic truth, Unitarianism appeared for many years to have sunk into a state of torpor and inanition; but it has of late apparently been led to hope that its objects may be attained through the increasing taste for German literature. It is our apprehension that some of our own writers are indirectly tending to bring about the same result, by appealing on all occasions to the writings of modern German theologians. In the excited state of the public mind on religious subjects, and the avidity with which religious novelty is sought for, there are certainly grounds for the apprehension, that the translation of German works bearing on philosophy and theology, is likely to have some effect in further unsettling the faith of many amongst us. Unitarianism would not be listened to for a moment; but German Transcendentalism and Mysticism may obtain some hearing, because they are new to most English readers. On the other hand, it is a conclusive and final argument against Unitarianism, that it has been driven at last to make common cause with absolute blasphemy and infidelity, like that of Strauss's Life of Jesus. Such is the result of Unitarianism—the Gospel is at length asserted to be a “mythus,” from beginning to end!

IX.—The Works of WALTER SAVAGE LANDOR. In 2 Volumes. London: Moxon.

To those who are admirers of the works of Mr. Walter Savage Landor, this neatly and accurately printed edition of them will be an acceptable gift. Admitting, as one is bound to do, the ability and learning of Mr. Landor's imaginary conversations, there is something unsatisfactory in a work which by such means contrives to put forth the most opposite doctrines and principles, in many cases most dangerous and objectionable, without pronouncing any decision. There is in some parts of these works a tone of levity on religious matters which is much to be regretted.

X.—The Theory of Developments in Christian Doctrine applied and tested. By MORTIMER O'SULLIVAN, D.D., Rector of Killyman, &c. London: Parker.

THE author of this able work is well known to the world as a powerful advocate of the cause of the persecuted Church of Ireland. The volume before us is dedicated by permission to the reverend prelate who presides over that Church; and we have no doubt that it will add to the well-earned reputation of its respected author. It would be difficult to make an analysis of the contents of Dr. O'Sullivan's work, which is a reply to Mr. Newman's Essay, and follows the order of subjects in that remarkable production. We must say that in vigour of argument and learning, the work before us surpasses most of the replies to Mr. Newman which have been written at this side of the Channel.

XI.—Naology: or a Treatise on the Origin, Progress, and Symbolical Import of the Sacred Structures of the most eminent Nations and Ages of the World. By JOHN DUDLEY, M.A., &c. London: Rivingtons.

THE author of this work had intended to publish it under the auspices of the Camden Society, but subsequently disapproving of the supposed principles of that society, he now offers it to the public unpatronized, "as one of the numerous articles that almost daily issue from the machinery of the press." The work contains a great mass of materials, furnishing many evidences of research and labour; and without more than the average amount of antiquarian speculation. Mr. Dudley's Protestantism is of the most ardent kind.

XII.—Selections from the Records of the Kirk Session, Presbytery, and Synod of Aberdeen. Aberdeen: Printed for the Spalding Club.

THIS volume of the publications of the Spalding Club is chiefly valuable as illustrating the ecclesiastical history and discipline of Scotland. It commences with the regulations made at Aberdeen in 1562, on the introduction of the Reformation, and it brings the series of events down to the Revolution of 1688. Much curious information in reference to popular superstitions and customs now extinct is supplied in this collection.

XIII.—The Epistle to the Hebrews; being the substance of Three Lectures, &c. With a Preface, containing a Review of Mr. Newman's Theory of Development. By FREDERICK DENISON MAURICE, M.A., &c. London: Parker.

A REVIEW of Mr. Newman's essay occupies considerably more than half of the volume before us, and thus forms, in fact, the principal subject of the work. The author proceeds regularly through Mr. Newman's essay, furnishing an analysis of each chapter, with his own remarks. Mr. Maurice thus describes what he conceives to be the essential idea of the Bible:—

“ This, I think, is the principle of the Bible, the principle which goes through every part of it, that the unseen God is actually ruling over man; that all orders of men are appointed by Him, and are ruling under Him; that just so far as they know this, and live and act in the faith of it, they are doing their right work in the world, are helping to expound the laws and principles of the Divine Government, are helping to bring man into that service which is freedom. . . . Now this statement may seem to Mr. Newman and to a great many others, a mere vague repetition of what they have heard often before; of what they have sneered at, and dismissed from their minds, as quite unsatisfactory and unmeaning. I am content that it should be so. But I am sure that this which they reject, is still the simple faith of hundreds of poor men and women in all countries of the world, Romish as well as Protestant.”—pp. xxxvi. xxxvii.

We trust that this is the faith of something more than “ hundreds ” of poor men; and that it is not restricted to the “ poor.” The position which the author of this work holds, as Professor of Divinity at King's College, lends, of course, peculiar interest to his first publication after his appointment to that important office. We must confess that we cannot altogether go along with him in certain views which seem calculated to unsettle all existing theological systems, without constructing any definite and coherent system in their place.

XIV.—Sermons preached at Jerusalem in the years 1842 and 1843.
By the Rev. GEORGE WILLIAMS, M.A., Chaplain to the late Bishop of the Anglican Church in that City, &c. London: Parker.

THE preface of this volume furnishes painful evidence of the difficulties in which the episcopal mission at Jerusalem was involved from its commencement.

“ I will candidly avow,” says Mr. Williams, “ that I was very anxious, as opportunity was afforded me, to counteract, as far as possible, the effects of a certain tone of teaching which obtained at Jerusalem during my connexion with the mission, and which appeared to me both erroneous and exceedingly objectionable, as tending to the subversion of Christian liberty, and to the corruption of the purity and simplicity of the Gospel. I allude to that view which would substitute the exploded literal, for the received spiritual interpretation of the prophecies relating to the privileges and glories of the Israel of God; on which is based a system that would in effect build up again 'the middle wall of partition between Jew and Gentile.' . . . Persuaded as I am of the dangerous tendency of such views (which sometimes go the length of looking for the restoration of the bloody sacrifices of the Law, and the re-establishment of the Levitical ritual), my office required me to guard against it; delicate and difficult as the duty was in my peculiar position."

As far as we have examined these Sermons, they appear to be sound, practical, and Scriptural discourses.

xv.—The Modern British Plutarch; or, Lives of Men distinguished in the recent History of our Country. By W. C. TAYLOR, LL.D., &c. London: Grant and Griffith.

THE volume before us will be found useful in making children acquainted with the lives and characters of the most eminent statesmen, and other distinguished personages of the last and present generation. It is written in a clear and unaffected style, and with apparent impartiality.

xvi.—Verses for Holy Seasons; with Questions for Examination. By C. F. H. Edited by WALTER FARQUHAR HOOK, D.D., Vicar of Leeds. London: Rivingtons.

THESE hymns were written by a lady resident in Ireland, with a view of adopting the principle of the Christian Year to the capacities of the young and uneducated. We cannot say much for the poetical merits of these verses, but their tone is simple, and adapted to children. The following stanzas will convey some notion of the work.

"When first our Lord came down on earth,
He did not scorn like us to be,
For He was born of mortal birth,
A simple child of low degree.

"Where Syrian waves are bright and clear,
Where Judah's grapes grow large and red,
He walked below; and men drew near,
And heard the holy words He said."

We perfectly agree with the respected editor, that there is in the volume a little of "what may appear to some to be a kind of sing-song style of versification."

xvii.—Ephesus; or, the Church's precedent in Doctrine and Discipline. By the Rev. P. POUNDEN, A.M., Vicar of Westport, diocese of Tuam. London: Seeleys.

THE author of this work, from a comparison of the various notices which Scripture supplies of the state of the Church at Ephesus in the time of the Apostles, deduces an argument to show that the clerical orders, government, and standing of the Church of England as a sound branch of Christ's Church Catholic, is more nearly accordant to the Apostolical model, than that of any community of dissenters in existence.

XVIII.—Bishop Heber and Indian Missions. By the Rev. JAMES CHAMBERS, B.A., &c. London: Parker.

A PLEASING little volume, comprising a brief outline of the Church History of India, previously to the appointment of Heber to the See of Calcutta, with a Life of that eminent man, and a notice of the principal events which have occurred in reference to Christianity in India since his death. The life and character of Heber occupy too large a share of the volume in our judgment.

XIX.—Religio Quotidiana; Daily Prayer the Law of God's Church. By the Right Rev. RICHARD MANT, D.D., Lord Bishop of Down, Connor, and Dromore. London: Parker.

THE right reverend author of this little volume has here collected a large mass of authorities and examples in reference to the daily celebration of Divine Service, which he strongly and earnestly recommends. Independently of the importance of such a collection, as evincing the opinions and practice of our bishops and clergy in former times, it is edifying to be brought thus in contact with the private and devotional life of so many excellent men. It is deeply to be lamented, that the frequent offering of worship to God should be considered by any one as indicating peculiar or party opinions on religious subjects.

XX.—Bohn's Standard Library.

THE volumes of this library which we have recently seen, are Sismondi's Literature of Europe, Schlegel's Dramatic Literature, and Roscoe's Lorenzo de Medici. The cheapness of these volumes is astonishing: we sincerely hope that the enterprising publisher may be supported by the public in this attempt to supply cheap books. But we should think that the risk must be very great.

XXI.—A Letter on the Recent Schisms in Scotland. By the Rev. ROBERT MONTGOMERY, M.A. London: Lendrum.

A SENSIBLE and well-timed publication. We have already expressed our opinion on the subject of the Scottish schism. To separate from the Communion of a Church, which has been recently recognized by the legislature of this country as in full communion with the English Church, is, in our judgment, equivalent to a separation from the Church of England herself.

XXII.—Miscellaneous.

WE have to notice with the highest commendation a Sermon on the "Practical Doctrine of the Incarnation," and the Hyperdulia ascribed to the Virgin Mary. By the Rev. W. B. Heathcote, B.C.L., Fellow and Tutor of New College. (Oxford: Parker.) This, for its size, is one of the most elaborate compositions we have ever seen, bearing on the worship of the Virgin. "Anglican Ordinations Valid." By the Rev. J. Fuller Russell, B.C.L. (Masters), containing some strictures on a publication by Dr. Kenrick, a Romanist, appears to be carefully and well executed. "Romanism as represented by the Rev. J. H. Newman," &c. By the Rev. H. Irvine, B.D., Vicar of St. Margaret's, Leicester (Rivingtons), contains many curious details of Romish superstitions. "Mithridates; or Mr. Newman's Essay on Development, its own Confutation; by a Quondam Disciple" (Cleaver), is not deficient in ability; but its limited extent tends to rather a superficial view of the subject. The Rev. Walter Blunt has published a very useful Tract on Confirmation (Cleaver), in which the spiritual benefits of that holy rite are considered, and questions for examination are appended. The Rev. Stafford Brown, M.A., has published a Sermon on Prayer for the Clergy, entitled, "Brethren, pray for us"—The Rev. T. C. Hadden, LL.B., a Visitation Sermon, "The Church of England's Commission to her Priests Considered"—The Rev. C. B. Dalton, M.A., Rector of Lambeth, A Farewell Sermon in Lincoln's Inn Chapel (Sharpe); all of which are deserving of notice.

"Observations on the Present State of Congregational Singing," by W. H. Plumstead (Sharpe), contains many sensible remarks, and suggestions for the improvement of congregational singing. "Church Reform and Clerical Delinquencies" (Hatchards), touches on the subjects of Clerical Education and Testimonials, the Amusements of the Clergy, and Clerical Magistrates, Pluralities, Patronage, Discipline, and Pews.

The "Transactions of the Exeter Diocesan Architectural Society, Vol. II. Part II.," furnish evidence of the zeal and ability with which the study of Architecture is pursued in the West of England. The papers in this number evince very great knowledge of the subject, and the engravings are very well executed. We are glad to see that "The Churches of Yorkshire" (Green, Leeds), is still in the course of publication. The architectural details of this work are excellent, and its letter-press possesses more than ordinary interest.

Foreign and Colonial Intelligence.

SPREAD OF PROTESTANTISM IN FRANCE.—Justification of the Intelligence contained in a former Number of the English Review.—Our Foreign Intelligence of December, 1844, contains, among other articles on the State of Religion in France, an account of the "Spread of Protestantism" in several of the French dioceses. The paragraph, having been copied by the Calcutta Christian Advocate, a dissenting publication, without citing the authority on which the statement rested, was treated by the Bengal Catholic Herald, its popish antagonist, as an invention of its own, and denounced as a scandalous fabrication; and further the Bengal Catholic Herald published from the Vicars General of the different dioceses referred to by us, letters written expressly for the purpose of denying or invalidating the statements transcribed from our pages. Under these circumstances we have been appealed to by the Calcutta Christian Advocate; and although we must decline mixing ourselves up in any way with the controversy between the two publications in question, we now furnish, in justice to ourselves, the details of the intelligence of which the paragraph which has so forcibly excited the wrath of the Romanists, both in India and in France, was a summary. Our information was derived from different publications, and chiefly from a series of articles, documents, and letters, in the Archives du Christianisme, the organ of a section of the French Protestants, in which the proceedings of the Société E'vangélique are usually reported. The first of them is an article in the Archives of April 13, 1844, from which the following are extracts:—

"VILLEFAVARD is a borough in the arrondissement of Bellac, Haute-Vienne (diocese of Limoges). Twelve years ago the inhabitants, about six hundred in number, separated, almost to a man, from the Roman Church, from motives unknown to us, and with which we have no concern, and called among them a priest of the 'French Catholic Church.' For twelve years that priest officiated peaceably in a Church built expressly for this purpose at the expense of the inhabitants; the entire population, with one or two exceptions, had rallied round him, and there was no Romish priest in the place. At the end of last year, without any new fact transpiring to provoke such a proceeding, the authorities, applying a general measure to Villefavard, prohibited the 'French Catholic' priest from continuing his functions, and caused seals to be affixed to the place of worship. . . .

"At this period a colporteur of Bibles and New Testaments arrived in the place. The word of God was dispersed, made its way, and was read in every house. There, as everywhere, it carried light and conviction to the mind and the heart. At the commencement of January last, a letter addressed to the reformed consistory of Paris, requested the consistory, in the name of the inhabitants, to establish Protestant worship among them, declaring that they were resolved to join the Reformed Church. The consistory was unable to take any practical cognizance of the letter, Villefavard being altogether beyond the reach of its operations, and passed to the order of the day. They then addressed themselves to the Société E'vangélique of France, and shortly after one hundred heads of families of Villefavard addressed to M. Le Pasteur Napoleon Roussel a request signed by them, to come among them to preach the Gospel. M. Roussel complied with this appeal, and he would have failed to his ministry and betrayed his Master, had he not done so. M. Roussel first of all applied for and obtained a delegation from the consistory of Lezay. Having arrived at Villefavard, M. Roussel declared to the municipal authority, in writing, his intention to celebrate the Protestant worship, and obtained an acknowledgment of this declaration; he also applied for and obtained from the maire the permission required by Art. 294 of the penal code, respecting the use of the locality in which the worship was to be celebrated. It is clear, therefore, that M. Roussel has omitted none of the formalities prescribed, even according to the pretensions of the authorities, the construction of the law adopted by the Cour de Cassation, and the circular of the minister of justice and worship, of the 28th of February last. Notwithstanding the delegation of the nearest consistory, notwithstanding the declaration made by him, notwithstanding the permission given by the maire, the prefect of the department has formally interdicted the evangelic religious assemblies at Villefavard, by a decree of the 5th instant, which has been served upon M. Roussel by a lieutenant of gendarmes. The following is a copy of this new act of bon plaisir.

"Department of Haute-Vienne. Limoges, April 5, 1844.—"We, Master of Requests, Prefect of the Haute-Vienne, considering the law of the 18th Germinal, year X; the articles 291, 292, and 294 of the Penal Code; the decree of the Cour de Cassation of April 22, 1843; the circular of the Minister of Justice and Worship of the 28th of February last; the official statements of the 31st of March and the 4th and 5th of April last; from which it appears that numerous assemblies, called by the Sieur Roussel, Protestant pastor, have taken place at Villefavard on three different occasions, the said assemblies having for their object the celebration of Protestant worship;

"Considering that no one inhabitant of Villefavard belongs to the Reformed Church, and that consequently the interference of the Sieur Roussel is without object, and cannot in good faith be claimed;

"Considering moreover that he has not provided himself with the authorisation prescribed by Art. 291 of the Penal Code;

"Decree as follows:

"The religious assemblies for Protestant worship which have taken place at Villefavard under the direction of the Sieur Roussel are formally interdicted under the penalties enacted by law;

"The authorities will immediately proceed to close the place of the assemblies interdicted by the preceding article, and to affix seals to the doors;

"Any infringement of the foregoing orders will be officially taken in evidence and notified to the tribunals, without prejudice to such measures of coercion as the importance of the circumstances may render necessary.

"The Sub-prefect of Bellac is specially charged to direct, superintend, and insure the execution of the present decree by all legal measures, to give it every possible publicity, and to cause it to be notified to the proprietor of the locality as well as to the Sieur Roussel.

"Done and decreed at the Prefecture of Limoges, April 5, 1844.

Signed: T. MORRIOT."

"The prefect, who had evidently taken instructions beforehand in a higher quarter, had, it is plain, lost no time; for his decree, dated April 5, is founded partly upon the official statements of March 31, April 4, and the same 5th of April. The object was to prevent the celebration of worship, as intended, on the next following day, April 7, being Easter-day, in the same manner as it had been celebrated in the presence of from 400 to 500 persons, on Sunday, March 31, Thursday the 4th, and Friday the 5th of April. On the 6th three gendarmes, under the orders of a lieutenant, arrived at Villefavard. M. Roussel having loudly and before witnesses protested against the seals being affixed, the lieutenant replied that he should proceed. M. Roussel then required his protest to be entered in the official statement. Two gendarmes were left at Villefavard to see the decree of the prefect observed, and to give evidence of any infringement which might take place. They will not have the trouble of doing so. M. Roussel has very wisely retreated before the employment of physical force. The tribunals will decide the question. . . .

"We shall take care to acquaint our readers with the sequel of this affair, which is the more important and worthy of notice, because the evangelic movement of Villefavard is not the only one, but in other localities as well entire populations declare that they renounce Romish worship, and intend to embrace the religion of the Gospel."

The following extracts are taken from a letter of M. Roussel to the editor of the Archives, dated "Villefavard, July 8th, 1844," and inserted in the Archives of July 27th:—

"After the seals had been affixed, I left Villefavard to regulate my affairs, to fetch my family, and to come and settle in this parish. On my return, I continued to hold religious assemblies as heretofore, from house to house, refraining withal, at the request of the inhabitants, from holding assemblies of a more public character, until the arrival of the answer from the minister to a petition which they had addressed to him in my absence. On the other hand, the Consistory of Lezay, which had sent M. Bourchenin to visit the place, explained to the minister the importance and the extent of the religious movement which had taken place in this locality. The answer of the Keeper of the Seals has at length arrived, and on Sunday last the solemn opening of our worship has taken place, with the assistance of M. Bellivier, pasteur and president of the Consistory of Lezay, and of M. Gibaud, pasteur and president of the Consistory of Lamothe Saint Héray."

The letter goes on to detail the efforts made by three Romish priests, sent one after another, for the purpose of arresting the movement if possible, and the discussions which M. Roussel had with one of them, and then continues:—

"As nobody here would let a place to say mass in, the Romish clergy have been obliged to buy at the rate of 6500 francs a shell, which with the field attached to it, is worth but 1200 francs. But the owner took care to stipulate that he was not selling himself, and that he was not going to attend mass. In short, the best proof how unanimous the parish is in rejecting Romanism, is that although the mass has been established for four months, with the approbation of the sub-prefect and the protection of gendarmes, no inhabitant of Villefavard has ever attended. They have had to pay at the rate of twenty-five or fifty centimes a head, to get two or three women from the neighbouring parishes to attend. Upon one occasion, however, they wished to have a procession; they gathered together thirty women, and distributed some five franc pieces, which, as a woman said who is now standing before me, 'we went to spend at a public house.' Another proof how fruitless their attempts are, is this; the present priest is at the same time a licensed teacher; he offers his services gratuitously, and has not yet got more than one single pupil. All the others prefer paying our Protestant schoolmaster, to sending their children gratis to be taught by the priest.

"Yesterday, then, our Protestant worship was installed in the old Roman Catholic Church. . . . Some say there were 1200 people from this and the neighbouring parishes present: I believe I shall be nearer the truth by estimating the attendance at one-half that number. At all events, it is certain that for two hours the Church was densely thronged, and a crowd standing outside, all attentive, devout, and I hope seriously impressed. . . .

"In consequence of this assembly, several persons who had already asked me to visit their parishes, renewed their entreaties. It would be imprudent to name the places; but I may at least express my conviction that the spark which has fallen in the centre of the department, will soon kindle in all directions, and I will wait till the work is accomplished before I tell you of it.

"Meanwhile here is a parish of more than 600 souls which has passed over entirely, bag and baggage, with its maire, its priest, and its Church, to the evangelic faith, or at least to evangelic worship. If all are not converted to the Lord, all at least will now have the opportunity of hearing God's word."

To this letter the editor of the Archives adds the following note :—

“ Subsequent letters show that this remarkable movement is gaining strength and extension, both in the Haute-Vienne (diocese of Limoges), and in the Charente Inférieure (diocese of La Rochelle). On Sunday, July 14, M. Roussel preached at Balledens, a league and a half from Villefavard, at six in the morning, to 200 persons, who all have been hitherto Roman Catholics. He was sent for by the maire, the adjunct, the members of the municipal council, and all the inhabitants capable of writing their names. The same day, at ten o'clock, there were 250 to 300 hearers at Villefavard, and at three o'clock he again preached two leagues and a half from Villefavard. Besides this a Church is forming at Limoges. M. Roussel is no longer able to attend to them all, and it is to be apprehended that the movement will spread too fast; he urgently asks his colleagues to come and help him. Four active and well-disposed ministers of the Gospel would find here a vast and splendid field for labour, and the Société Évangélique of France would not hesitate to pay their charges. God grant that this simple and energetic appeal may be heard. Nothing like this has been witnessed in France since the days of the Reformation.”

Another letter from M. Roussel, of July 22d, in the same number of the Archives, contains additional particulars of his success at Balledens, and of the total failure of all the attempts made by the Romish priesthood to retain the inhabitants in the communion of their Church. Their offers to make the place, which was hitherto only a succursale, a regular cure, to erect a parsonage, &c., were rejected. On the contrary, steps were taken by the inhabitants for permanently protestantizing the village :—

“ They drew up and signed a petition to the minister, which I think superfluous, as I am invited and authorized by the maire. I must, however, do the superior authority (which I believe is aware of the real state of the case) the justice of saying, that not the least obstruction was offered to this new establishment of our worship.”

In another letter of August 5, 1844, contained in the Archives of August 10, M. Roussel relates the particulars of an interference on the part of the prefect, to stop the progress of the movement at Balledens, and then continues :—

“ Meanwhile, there were yesterday at Balledens, not 200 persons, as on the first, nor 250, as on the second and third occasions; but 500, who had come to hear the Gospel preached. Two hundred of them could not find room, and remained at our door instead of going to hear mass, which was celebrated at the same hour. I ought to say, however, that this concourse is partly accounted for by the circumstance of its being the day of the patron saint; but still it remains to be explained, why they came to celebrate St. Stephen's day, not at mass, but at the Protestant preaching-house.”

M. Roussel next relates, that at the moment of his departure from Limoges, whither the Protestants of that place had invited him, he was summoned before the juge d'instruction, at Bellac, as the first step of a prosecution against him, ostensibly on account of some of his controversial tracts, but in reality for the purpose of putting an end to his active labours in the diocese of Limoges. He also mentions a further attempt made by the Romanists at Villefavard, to take advantage of the feast of the patron saint, to make a Romish demonstration in the shape of a procession, which was a complete failure, as not one inhabitant of the place joined it.

Again, the number of the Archives of September 14, contains under the head, "Opening of Worship at Limoges," an article from which we extract the following passages :—

"The new Opening of Evangelic Worship has just taken place at Limoges. The solemnity took place on the 1st of September The number of known Protestants in this city is one hundred ; many more will no doubt make themselves known by-and-bye. There was therefore no reason to expect a congregation of more than 30 or 40 persons ; yet although there were many reasons to think that few Roman Catholics would come, although a report had been innocently spread, that the Protestant worship was not public, about 250 persons assembled in an exceedingly remote locality."

The number of the Archives for October 26, contains another letter from M. Roussel, in which he says :—

"Of Villefavard and Balledens I shall have no more reports to give you, as these posts have been transferred to the direction and charge of the Société Évangélique. . . . Two pastors have been sent there, and two schools opened. Villefavard to a man, and one-half of Balledens, are completely attached to our worship ; and in the latter place we are daily gaining more ground."

He then describes the efforts made by the Romish clergy in the cathedral town of Limoges to prejudice the people against the Protestants, and not only to prevent the latter from obtaining a suitable locality for the celebration of their worship, but to make it a matter of difficulty for a Protestant to get even a private lodging. Under these circumstances M. Roussel makes an appeal for pecuniary contributions for the erection of a Protestant temple, in order to secure permanently the establishment of Protestantism in the heart of the diocese.

So much for the diocese of Limoges. Similar facts are stated, though with less detail, touching the neighbouring dioceses of La Rochelle and Bordeaux. The former is mentioned in the editor's postscript to M. Roussel's letter in the Archives of July 12th, and is again named in two other statements to which we shall presently refer, as the scene of Protestant movements. It is also referred to in a paragraph in the Espérance of October 4th, 1844, where it is said :—

"The movement towards Protestantism which has manifested itself in the Charente Inférieure (diocese of La Rochelle) continues to be very promising. Seven or eight evangelists are constantly employed in this interesting work."

And in an article, dated from Paris, in the Allgemeine Kirchen-Zeitung of October 13th, 1844, in which the establishment of the Protestant worship at Villefavard is also related, the following statement occurs :—

"The Consistory of Saintes (diocese of La Rochelle), in whose district principally this remarkable movement has taken place, is careful to watch over it, and has empowered President Delon and his colleagues to interpose for the interests of the Gospel and the Reformed Church. The Minister of Worship will, it is hoped, lose no time in recognizing the religious wants of about twenty-five parishes, and organizing a consistory in the district, or ranging them under the neighbouring consistories."

The occurrence in the diocese of Bordeaux created a great sensation, in consequence of the ridiculous regulation of the prefect, who attempted to limit the number of worshippers to twenty-six, and those twenty-six only the identical individuals enumerated by name in his official list: an interference with the freedom of worship which of itself proves the dread in which the Romanists in those parts are of the spread of Protestant principles among their population. The whole story, too long to be transferred to our pages, is contained in the Archives of September 28th and October 26th, which contain the official documents issued by the authorities, and the correspondence between the Protestant pastors and the prefect of the department: a notice of it also occurs in the Archives of October 12th, which concludes with the following general statement:—

“It is not in the power of any one here below to arrest Christian proselytism. Ask in the Haute-Vienne (diocese of Limoges), in the Deux-Sèvres (diocese of Poitiers), and in many other places, where the people in hundreds and in thousands leave the Popish mass for the preaching of the Gospel.”

In reference to the last named diocese, Poitiers, a communication from Geneva, November 25th, 1844, states that thirty parishes, which had expelled their curates, and been without church ordinances since 1830, were now asking for Protestant pastors¹.

The diocese of Chalons was the scene of the prosecution against M. Roussel, for tracts written by him ten years before, some copies of which were seized at Vitry-le-Français, with a view both to withdraw M. Roussel from his active labours in the Limousin, and to arrest the progress of Protestant opinions in the diocese of Chalons itself. The history of that ridiculous prosecution, which ended in the acquittal of all the accused, is contained in the Archives of December 14th, and a full report of the trial before the Court of Assizes of the Department de la Marne (the diocese of Chalons) is given in the Espérance of December 10th. In accounting for these proceedings, which excited much attention at the time, an article on the subject in the Archives of December 14th expressly states, that they were occasioned by the spread of Protestantism, and mentions “the parish of Glannes, and some other parishes of the same department,” as instances of the effect produced by the dissemination of Protestant tracts.

Touching the diocese of Verdun, it is not only included in the general statement which we shall presently transcribe in connexion with the diocese of Fréjus, but it appears from the Archives of February 24th, 1844, that in the early part of that month a formal application was made to the local authorities, and favourably received by them, and transmitted to the Minister of Worship, for the establishment of Protestant worship in the cathedral town of Verdun itself.

Lastly, with regard to the diocese of Fréjus, the Archives of April

27, contain the following petition addressed to the Chamber of Deputies by the Roman Catholic inhabitants of several parishes in that diocese, dated March 31, 1844 :—

“ We, the undersigned, proprietors and inhabitants of the parishes of Cagnes, Saint-Laurent and Cannes, in the arrondissement de Grasse, and Département du Var (the diocese of Fréjus), being all members of the so-called Roman Catholic Church, have the honour to state to the honourable deputies,

“ 1. That we are more than doubtful respecting the religion taught us by the priests; being fully convinced that they have instilled into our forefathers, under pain of being delivered up to the secular arm, doctrines contrary to, or not ordained by, the Word of God;

“ 2. That it is the desire of our souls to recover that religion which Jesus Christ has instituted, which the apostles have taught, and to unite ourselves for this purpose to the Reformed Christian Church called Protestant.

“ But that, as we cannot assemble together for common prayer, without our municipal authorities threatening, at the instigation of the priests, to proceed against us, and to apply to us the art. 291 of the Penal Code;

“ We, therefore, most humbly and respectfully request our honourable deputies, to define, if Art. V. of the Charter has force of law in our dear fatherland, or to interpret it in such a manner, as to put an end to the arbitrary power by which we are oppressed.”

The movement of which this petition testifies, is again referred to in a letter from M. E. Lacroix, of Grenoble, which is contained under the head “ Appeal on behalf of the religious movement in France,” in the Archives of August 24th, 1844; and in which the following passage occurs :—

And in the Archives of October 26, 1844, there is an article to the following effect :—

“ The evangelic movement which has manifested itself in the department of the Haute Vienne, (diocese of Limoges,) of the Charente Inférieure, (diocese of La Rochelle,) of the Meuse, (diocese of Verdun,) and of the Marne, (diocese of Chalons,) is going forward also in the Var (diocese of Fréjus). The following statement is contained in the Catholique Apostolique, a Christian journal published at Marennes. ‘ In the department of the Var about ten parishes have rejected the erroneous traditions of the Roman Church, and among them are Cannes, Cagnes, La Gaude, and Saint-Laurent, the principal inhabitants of which have lately addressed a petition to the Chamber of Deputies in favour of religious liberty. The pastors of Marseilles, an evangelist, and a colporteur, are unable to hold all the religious assemblies for which they are called upon on all sides; notwithstanding the zeal with which M. Roize, ex-curé of one of these parishes, who has laid aside the cassock and band, spends himself wholly in evangelizing the inhabitants of his former parish. The greater part of the flock has followed in the footsteps of the pastor, and now both are in the way of salvation. As of old the disciples of Jerusalem did not recognize Saul of Tarsus in the habit and language of St. Paul, so the inhabitants of the Var have been greatly surprised, and scarcely able to believe that the Abbé Roize had become a Bible Christian, and a preacher of the Gospel as it is taught in Holy Scripture itself.’ ”

To these particulars of the different dioceses mentioned in our statement, we subjoin the following extract from the annual report of the Société Évangélique of France, which was read at the eleventh anniversary of the society, and is contained, with an account of the meeting, in the Archives of April 27, 1844.

"The following are a few examples of the evangelic movement in which we rejoice. In the department of * * *, one of our evangelists stationed in the midst of about a hundred populous parishes, is entreated on all sides to hold assemblies for reading and explaining the Bible. He has already been enabled to attend in a great many places, and to preside over assemblies of 60, of 200, and even of 300 persons, who were really attentive, and took the liveliest interest in the things declared to them. A pastor in one of the towns of the department in question, has earnestly besought the committee to send immediately a minister of the Gospel in order to meet so serious a demand. Being unable to comply with this request, the committee has, for the present at least, sent a second evangelist, who has presided over numerous and blessed assemblies. At * * * he had first 25, then 60, then 200 hearers. At * * * he had 90; and afterwards, on the Sunday, he held in one and the same place three assemblies, at each of which more than 100 persons were present. On Monday he had 150, on Tuesday 220, and on Wednesday 250 hearers. He has written quite recently that a great door is opened, and that there is a pressing demand for several evangelists.

"In another district of the same department a similar movement manifests itself; an evangelist has gathered around him as many as 500 persons anxious to know thoroughly the doctrine of the Gospel.

"In quite a different part of France the same facts have been reproduced. The evangelist who there exercises his ministry thus writes: 'At * * * I had the opportunity of preaching in an old convent to 250 persons. At R * * and at B * * forty families ask me to hold meetings, and to instruct them. At * * * 500 persons are firmly resolved to obtain, even at a sacrifice, the establishment of Protestant worship amongst them; they have made up their minds henceforward to follow the religion of the Bible. In a neighbouring town a protestant burial has drawn together 600 spectators and hearers, and there also the establishment of Protestant worship is urgently demanded.'

"In another place, again, one of our agents being requested to hold religious assemblies in a locality which he had never visited, announced the Gospel to more than 300 attentive hearers; tracts have been distributed, and read with seriousness; and there is an unanimous desire expressed for the continuance of the assemblies for worship.

"At Villefavard, a parish of from 600 to 700 souls in the Haute Vienne, an analogous movement has manifested itself. A New Testament which fell into the hands of the former priest of the parish, made him anxious to be instructed in the evangelic faith. A colporteur was immediately sent. The inhabitants showed themselves unanimously anxious to hear a minister of the Gospel. The committee delegated for the purpose one of its members, M. le pasteur Roussel."

The rest of the story of Villefavard is already known to our readers. Lastly, it deserves to be mentioned as a proof of the extent and importance of these movements, that they led to a proposal, which created much discussion at the time among the French Protestants, on the part of M. Roussel, to remedy the want of ordained ministers to meet the demand, by ordaining devout laymen for this work without the usual requirement of a regular theological education. This proposal is contained in a letter from M. Roussel, dated Limoges, Nov. 4, 1844, in the Archives of Nov. 9. We must content ourselves with giving from it the following paragraph:—

"I shall not enumerate the departments and the parishes in which numerous Catholics call in vain for Protestant pastors; they are sufficiently known to the readers of our vol-

gious journals. I will only observe, that in most of those localities they are no longer satisfied with colporteurs, who have already done their work there; nor with simple evangelists who cannot administer the sacraments, and thus necessarily leave the populations, in a state as yet but little enlightened, in contact with the Romish priests. What they want, are consecrated men, able not only to instruct them in doctrine, but to baptize, to administer the communion, to solemnize marriages, to bury the dead; in one word, an ecclesiastic is wanted in each parish, unless the people are to fall back under the influence from which they so much desire to escape. Give us a pastor, they say, and we are yours; but so long as M. le Curé can refuse to bury our parents, and to baptize our children, we cannot connect ourselves with your worship, which is confined to a lecture and prayer."

These are the data on which our statement was founded. With the exception of one or two statistical details, they were all taken from the leading organs of the Protestants in France; many of the particulars are authenticated by documentary evidence; and the main facts both formed the subject of discussion in public bodies, and were referred to again and again in the Protestant journals of Paris as matters of public notoriety. Nor were they denied by the Romanists in France, who could not be ignorant of these statements. We watched the Ami de la Religion, which is not slow to contradict statements unfavourable to the Romish Church, narrowly at the time; but although the statements of the Protestant journals extended over a space of ten months, during which additional facts were constantly adduced, and the former statements referred to as matters of fact which were generally admitted, and occupied the attention of government in various ways, not a word of contradiction escaped the Ami de la Religion. Of all the facts thus obtruded upon the notice of the public, the only ones referred to at all in that publication were those which transpired at Verdun and at Villefavard, and with regard to both these the notices of the Ami de la Religion went directly to confirm the statements of the Protestant papers. As to Verdun, two angry paragraphs appeared, one in the number of March 26th, the other in that of May 11th. In the former it was stated as a grievance against M. Martin du Nord, the Minister of Worship, that "the Lutherans, Calvinists, and Anglicans of Verdun had obtained an authorization to assemble together for worship;" and it was sneeringly stated, that being unable to afford a pastor, they were placed under the guidance of an elder, "according to their discipline." The latter paragraph is too characteristic not to be given entire:—

"The town of Verdun has been gratified in its turn by a Protestant chapel, and an Evangelic pastor. This is how it happened: the Rhine provinces, and the countries adjoining the Luxemburg, send forth periodically nomad workmen, who come to drive their trade in France. A score of these artizans are gathered at Verdun, and have had the idea of applying to the Ministry of Worship for an authorization to open an oratory, suggested to them. The permission was not long in coming; in the reply, the different agents of the administration have been told, that in similar cases they are to show all readiness, and to smoothe down all obstacles to the erection of preaching-houses in the localities which call for them. Here, then, is a city where Catholicism has always reigned undivided, which now sees error take root within its walls, and pave the way for the most fatal proselytism. There is enough in these facts to enlighten the most blind, and to reveal to France the tendencies of the men of the revolution."

As regards the transactions at Villefavard, the Ami de la Religion of March 23d, 1844, states, after referring to the previous condition of the parish under a priest of the "prétendue Église Française," that during Lent a priest from Limoges was sent thither to reclaim the "esprit égarés;" but that "he was unable to succeed;" and, moreover, that "there had arrived at Villefavard two Protestants, one of whom was a minister." On the 11th of May, an extract from a local paper, the Avenir National, is given, which contains no new facts, but confirms those previously stated, with a plentiful accompaniment of abuse. On the 11th of June, there comes a paragraph which represents the parish in a fair way of being reclaimed from protestantism, the inhabitants having received the newly-appointed curé with great deference, and being busily employed in rebuilding his parsonage; but that happy vision is again dispelled by another extract from the Avenir National, in the Ami de la Religion of August 13th, which recapitulates in the most virulent style the events which took place during the interregnum of the Église Française in the parish, and concludes by saying: "Then those events occurred which have occupied public attention in so lively a manner, and have ended in the enthronization of protestantism in this parish." How far the diocesan authorities thought the movement in the diocese important, may be inferred from the following passage of the pastoral, published by the new bishop on his arrival in the diocese in August, 1844, and which is given in the Ami de la Religion of August 20th; the passage in question being marked in italics: "We shall keep our eyes continually open, for fear of our flocks being stolen from us, and our sheep being exposed to the ravening wolf."

We have now furnished our readers with the evidence on which our statement rested; evidence put forth under every circumstance of credibility, and left uncontradicted, in those points in which it was not confirmed, by the official organ of the Romanists in France. We might have easily swelled our catalogue of dioceses; there were data which would have justified us in adding the names of Langres, Beauvais, Valence, Avignon, and Versailles; but the facts were of less importance, and we contented ourselves with enumerating those dioceses in which facts of some consequence had transpired.

We shall now simply transcribe our statement, as it originally appeared, Vol. ii. p. 501; leaving our readers after the perusal of the foregoing evidence to judge whether we were not perfectly justified in making it.

"A strong movement in opposition to the Roman Catholic Church, and in favour of Protestantism, is taking place in the dioceses of Verdun, Châlons, Limoges, Poitiers, La Rochelle, Bordeaux, and Fréjus. In the last-named diocese, in which ten parishes have almost unanimously renounced Romanism, a Romish priest, the Abbé Roize, is among the converts, and takes an active part in preaching among his former parishioners. In the diocese of La Rochelle the number of parishes which desire to be placed under Protestant pastors, is stated at twenty-five. In the diocese of Limoges, the principal agent in producing these changes is M. Roussel, a Protestant minister, who has established a congregation at Limoges, and brought the entire population of Villefavard over to Protestantism, and against whom a prosecution has been directed on account of 'language injurious to a religion recognized by the state.' In the diocese of Bordeaux, the proprietor of an estate, who, with a number of his servants and tenants, had separated himself from the Roman Church, procured the services of a Protestant minister from the nearest consistory, and had divine service periodically celebrated at his château; when the local authorities interfered, and being unable to prohibit the assembly altogether, affixed to the door a list of the names of twenty-six Protestants, declaring, at the same time, their intention to proceed against any one who, not being included in the list, should nevertheless attend divine service there. The affair has created a considerable sensation in the neighbourhood, and is to be brought before a superior tribunal."

Nothing could be more consistent with the office of recording the leading events of the religious history of our own times, (which is the task we have proposed to ourselves in this department of our review,) than such a summary of events which had excited so much attention in France. The animus with which we drew up this summary, is yet further apparent from the concluding part of the paragraph:

"That Protestantism is, on the whole, progressing in France, is evident from a statistical statement made in the course of the debates in the Chambers during the last session. From this it appears, that at the close of the empire, in the year 1815, the number of Protestant ministers in France was 464; in the year 1830, it amounted to 527; and in the year 1843, to 677: the sum charged in the budget for their support was, under the empire, 306,000 francs; during the restoration it rose to 675,000 francs; and in the year 1843, it had reached the sum of 1,219,000 francs. The number of Protestant congregations without church or minister was stated at 111 at that time, but has probably much increased since."

The statistical data thus adduced in confirmation of the general statement, that Protestantism is on the increase in France, were at the time going the round of the Journals. They were derived from authentic sources, and have since been reproduced by the Ami de la Religion, January 30, 1845, from the Journal des Débats, without one syllable of question as to their accuracy, and with the additional information, that at the time of writing, within two years after the date of the above return, the number of ministers had been yet further increased, and was then upwards of seven hundred.

We cannot make room for the letters of the Vicars-General of the seven dioceses mentioned by us, to their correspondent at Agra, which were intended to bear out the assertion of the "Bengal Catholic Herald," that the statement in question was nothing more than an idle fabrication from beginning to end. They are as curious specimens in their way of the fortiter in re, as the accompanying remarks of the "Bengal Catholic Herald" are of the suaviter in modo. But our concern is not with either; we desire to keep out of reach of the fragrant missiles which the "Herald" and the "Advocate" hurl at each other, under the burning sun of India; and having amply justified the part taken by ourselves in this matter as chroniclers of contemporary events, we would suggest to the Vicars-General of the seven dioceses, that it would come with much better grace, and above all, with much greater force, if they were, even at this eleventh hour, to contradict, in the face of the French Protestant Journals, the statements made by them, than to send out their denials to the far East, where there is no one to answer their assertions.

ITALY. Death of the Pope.—Pope Gregory XVI. died suddenly at Rome, on Whit-Monday the 1st of June, between nine and ten in the morning, after a short illness of only a week's duration. He had been suffering for a few days from erysipelas in the left leg, but no alarming symptoms showed themselves till the night of the 31st of May. He had communicated early in the morning of that day, being the day of Pentecost. In the night, feeling the approach of death, he sent for his confessor: but before he could arrive, he made his last confession to one of the Prelates attached to his household, and received extreme unction.

Gregory XVI. was born at Belluno on the 18th of September, 1765; and was therefore in his eighty-first year. His name was Mauro Capellari; in early life he entered the order of the Benedictines of Camaldoli, in which he distinguished himself by his theological and philological erudition. He was made a Cardinal by Pope Leo XII. on the 13th of March, 1826, and at his death in 1829 would have been elected to the Pontificate, but for the influence of Austria. Within two years after, however, on the death of Pius VIII., his election was carried, and he succeeded to the papal chair on the 2nd of February, 1831. In his private character he was chiefly distinguished by his love of literature and of the arts. Of his public character the Ami de la Religion, adopting the language of the Quotidienne, thus speaks: "Gregory XVI. was the expression of that temperate Papacy, which seems to suit an age in which there is no public faith. Some desired that he should venture to represent the Papacy entirely detached from all, so called, temporal interests; determined to yield everything to the ambitious passions of the political world, and to rest content with a rosary and a wooden cross. It must be confessed that in this respect the most daring counsels were offered to Gregory XVI.; but fortunately Rome has not yet fallen under the empire of chimeras."

The Ami de la Religion entertains its readers on this occasion with an account of the ceremonies observed after the death of the Pope, and at the election of a successor. Immediately on the intelligence of the Pope's decease, the Cardinal Chamberlain proceeds to the chamber of death, where the annulus piscatoris is delivered up to him. This, and the seal used for sealing the bulls, are broken to pieces three days after. Twenty-four hours after death the body is embalmed, and in the evening of the third day conveyed to the Cathedral of St. Peter's with the same state which attended him during his lifetime in his solemn processions. There the body lies in state for three days, the people kissing the feet of the corpse through the railing behind which it is laid. The funeral ceremonies occupy nine days, reckoning from the day on which the body is removed to St. Peter's. After the funeral the mass of the Holy Ghost is chanted by the Dean of the College of Cardinals, and a preacher especially appointed exhorts the Cardinals to proceed without delay to the election of a successor. Thence the Cardinals proceed in procession to the conclave, and having been sworn to the observance of the "Apostolical Constitutions" and the laws of the conclave, enter upon the business of the election.

Originally the election of the bishops of Rome was conducted in the same way as that of other bishops; and the Roman people had a voice in it. In 1179, the third Lateran Council deprived both the clergy and the people of Rome of their ancient privileges, and vested the power of nominating the successor to the Papal see exclusively in the college of cardinals, making the validity of the election dependent on a majority of two-thirds of the entire number of votes. The cardinals exercised this power in the first instance without any restraint, meeting only at the time appointed for collecting the votes; an arrangement which gave so free a scope to intrigues, that through the impossibility of uniting in any one person a sufficient number of votes, the elections were often inconveniently protracted. At the death of Clement IV., in 1268, this evil grew to such a height, that the Papal see remained vacant for three entire years, in spite of the remonstrances of Father (afterwards Cardinal) Bonaventura, when at last the military governor of Viterbo, where the election was held, reduced the sacred college to unanimity by shutting up its members in the house in which they had assembled to vote, and, as this would not answer, taking the roof off the house. Under these circumstances, Gregory X. was elected in 1271, and to avoid the recurrence of a similar scandal, the Council of Lyons passed, in 1274, those rules by which the cardinals have ever since been shut up in conclave until the election is terminated. Originally the conclave used to be held wherever the Papal Court resided at the time when the vacancy occurred; but by degrees it became customary to hold it at Rome, except under extraordinary circumstances; formerly at the Vatican, and since the death of Pius VII. at the Quirinal.

The election may take place in one of three ways; either, first, by acclamation, or as it is also called "inspiration," without any formal process of voting; or, secondly, by compromise, the nomination being committed to the hands of one or more members of the college by common consent, it being found impossible to unite two-thirds of the votes for one man; or, thirdly, which is the more ordinary course, by scrutiny, and if that should not prove decisive, by accession; that is, by the concentration of votes, in one or more subsequent scrutinies, upon one or other of those who in the first scrutiny had obtained a large, but still insufficient number of votes. The scrutiny takes place twice a day, and day after day, until a decisive majority is obtained; after every scrutiny which does not give such a majority, the voting papers are thrown into wet straw, and burned in a small fire-place behind the altar of the Pauline chapel where the conclave is held, the smoke from which rising about noon, or in the evening, is an intimation to the people of Rome that no pope has as yet been elected.

When the scrutiny terminates in a decisive majority, the dean of the college, accompanied by the great officers of state of the order, places himself before the table of the cardinal on whom the election has fallen, and puts to him the question, "Do you agree to this canonical election of yourself to the Sovereign Pontificate." The question being answered in the affirmative, the election is completed; the new pope, in answer to a second question from the dean, declares what name he means to take; he is habited in the papal robes, and receives the homage of the assembled cardinals. The election is then proclaimed to the people from the grand balcony of the palace by one of the cardinal deacons; immediately after which, the firing of one hundred and one guns, and the ringing of bells from the 366 steeples of Rome, carry the news that "the chair of St. Peter" is again filled, all over the "Eternal City."

The sacred college consists at this moment of sixty-two cardinals, of whom three are French, three Austrians, one a Portuguese, one a Spaniard, one a Belgian, one, Cardinal Acton, though born at Naples, of English descent, and the rest Italians. We shall conclude this notice by transcribing the following curious reflections of the Ami de la Religion, on the intrigues which undeniably take place at every papal election, and which agree but ill with the high pretensions put forth by the Papacy. "It is in their private conversations (during the intervals of the sittings of the conclave), that the members of the sacred college discuss among themselves the claims of the cardinals who have the greatest chance of being raised to the pontifical throne. These secret negotiations, these goings to and fro, this conflict of contrary opinions, these reciprocal concessions, these sometimes very protracted fluctuations, these gains and losses of votes, constitute the dramatic and purely human part of the important proceedings of this assembly. Here that beautiful saying of Fenelon, 'L'homme marche et Dieu le mène,' finds its application. The Holy Ghost ceases not to aid his Church, and we entertain the firm confidence that He will graciously frustrate all intrigues, if there are any, or make them subservient to the choice of the worthiest pastor."

The election of the successor of Gregory XVI. took place on the 16th of June, after four scrutinies. The prelate on whom the election fell is Cardinal John-Maria Mastai-Ferretti, Archbishop of Imola. He has taken the name of Pius IX. He was born at Sinigaglia, on the 13th of May, 1792.

GERMANY.—Centenary of Luther's death. While the Protestants of Germany are upbraiding the Romanists with their excessive veneration for the saints of their calendar, and in their own practice allowing even the ancient festivals of the Church Catholic to fall into general neglect, they have, inconsistently enough, celebrated the centenary of Luther's death, on the 18th of February last, with a degree of pomp and solemnity which cannot but appear extravagant, especially when it is considered that Luther did not die the death of martyrdom, and that, however great his merits were in some respects, the rashness of his opinions and the violence of his conduct had no small share in causing that dissolution of Church order, and that licence of theological criti-eism and private judgment, of which the rationalistic and infidel excesses of the present day are the deplorable fruits. At Wittenberg the celebration was spread over the space of three days, divided into a "Vorfeier," on the 17th, the "Hauptfeier," on the 18th, and a "Nachfeier," on the 19th, and attended by a great concourse of strangers, including the king of Prussia, and several of the princes, ministers of state, and other civil and ecclesiastical officers, who thus made a kind of Lutheran pilgrimage to the tomb of the reformer. In other places, too, the localities connected with his personal history were made prominent objects in the arrangement of the solemnity; various relics, even to the pall which covered his coffin, were produced by their fortunate possessors, and at Berlin "the treasures connected with the memory of Luther," which are preserved in the Royal Library, were laid out, as if in imitation of the late exhibition at Trèves, in a public show which lasted for several days, and was visited by thousands; nay, in Erfurth, the performance of a "Jubilant Oratorio," entitled "The Glorification of Martin Luther," afforded a Protestant counterpart to the canonizations of the congregation of Rites. This idea was yet further improved by a lithograph published at Eisleben, which represents Luther standing in the clouds with a wreath of laurel on his head, between two angels with palm branches in their hands. He is looking down to the earth with evident complacency, and there beholds on one side John Ronge holding a candle to the pope, who is reading Ronge's letter to Bishop Arnoldi of Trèves, and on the other side Pastor Uhlich, who holds in his hand a paper with the superscription, "Protestant friends in Eisleben." Though this composition looks amazingly like a caricature, we believe it was got up by some zealous admirers of Luther in the most perfect good faith. No less curious, considering that the solemnity was appointed to celebrate the memory of a confessor of the Christian faith, was the performance, at the theatre at Dresden, expressly in honour of the day, of Lessing's infidel play Nathan der Weise. Of busts, portraits, and transparencies of Luther there was everywhere great abundance, both in the churches and in the streets; and medals commemorative of the day were struck and extensively sold. Illuminations, processions by torch-light, assemblies lighted up by coloured fires, protracted the solemnities into the night. In those parts of Germany which are under Roman Catholic governments, the celebration of the day was more or less obstructed; in Bavaria it was altogether prohibited, and the Protestants had to content themselves with the demonstration of closing their shops. Generally speaking, the festivities passed off more quietly than might have been expected, considering their somewhat motley character, and the excited state of the public mind in Germany on the subject of religion; in some places, however, the police was put under requisition for the maintenance of order; and in Nordhausen a transparency, put up by the "Friends of Light," which represented the town at sunrise, with the inscription, "God said, Let there be light; and there was light;" was demolished by a shower of stones. More appropriate to the occasion, and better calculated to do honour to the memory of Luther, is the collection in various parts, of considerable sums for founding, or, where they already existed, further endowing, schools and charitable institutions. Among these is one, "Martin's Foundation," at Erfurth, recently restored by the munificence of the king of Prussia, which deserves to be particularly noticed, on account of the multitude of objects which it comprises. They are thus enumerated: 1. A refuge for destitute boys. 2. A Sunday school for apprentices sent forth from the former. 3. A training school for the education of poor youths as schoolmasters. 4. A school of industry for girls intended to go out as maidservants. 5. A general school for children under the proper age for confirmation. 6. A fund to supply poor scholars with books and clothing. 7. A Sunday prayer meeting for young people. 8. A week-day school with four class teachers. 9. A school of industry for poor school girls. 10. The same for poor school boys. 11. A training school for domestic servants. 12. A soup fund for the support of 100 poor school children during winter. 13. A preparatory school for beginners. 14. A subsidiary school for those whose instruction has been neglected, especially for young criminals. 15. A school for carrying on the education of young artisans. 16. A general refuge for the education and penitential treatment of strangers and criminals of all sorts. If we might be excused so great a liberty, we would suggest the addition of No. 17, A plain school for teaching over-enlightened professors, doctors and pastors of the Protestant Church, the elements of the Christian faith, as they used to be taught in the good old days of Dr. Martin Luther.

Centenary of Pestalozzi.—Another centenary commemoration took place at Berlin, Cassel, and in several other places, both in Germany and Switzerland, on the 12th of January, the birth-day of Pestalozzi. As the date of his birth is differently stated, by some in 1745, by others in 1746, his disciples and admirers determined to celebrate the day in both years. The intention was to raise subscriptions for founding an agricultural orphan-school, on the plan of the establishment at Neuhof; but in consequence of the prominent part taken in the proposal by some of the leading rationalists of Germany, many who would gladly have contributed to such an institution, if established on Christian principles, withheld their co-operation, and the whole affair will probably end in a failure. The following letter from the king of Prussia, to the managers of the fund at Berlin, will be read with interest, as a testimony both to Christian truth, and the worth of Pestalozzi:—

"Being well acquainted with the character of Pestalozzi's endeavours, which had for their object the moral and intellectual improvement of the people, I could not but approve your intention of establishing an institution for the education of orphans, in honour of his memory; an undertaking which I had a right to assume would be set on foot and executed in conformity with the mind and spirit of Pestalozzi. But the spirit in which Pestalozzi lived and laboured, was a spirit of moral earnestness, of humility and self-denying love, of those Christian virtues, which under a higher impulse he practised all his life, although it was not till in his later years that he arrived at a definite and clear knowledge of the source from which he derived his strength. For I have heard from his own lips the confession, that he found in Christianity alone that consolation for the last days of his life, which he had before sought in vain in an erroneous direction. It is this spirit, therefore, that must give life and power to any undertaking for the relief of the material and spiritual wants of the people, which shall be worthy of the memory of that noble-hearted man, and a suitable expression of the gratitude due to him from his country. Unfortunately, however, at the late commemoration of Pestalozzi, under your management, views and tendencies were manifested, and put forth even in an offensive manner, which testified of a very different spirit, a spirit to which Pestalozzi was an entire stranger, and which affords me no guarantee that your undertaking will really promote the welfare of the people. Under these circumstances I am constrained for the present to refuse to your intended foundation the support which you have solicited at my hands by your petition of the 8th of January last; but I shall be happy to give to it my full sympathy and co-operation, whenever I shall be convinced that it is not intended to promote party purposes, which are foreign to the object itself, but simply and exclusively to assist in realizing the idea of educating orphans in a spirit of true Christian love and self-denial.

Evangelic Church Conference at Berlin.—The Synod, or rather the Congress of Deputies from the Protestant States of Germany, convoked at the suggestion of the King of Prussia¹, met on the 4th of January of the present year at Berlin, and continued its sittings till the 13th of February. It consisted of deputies from Prussia, Hanover, Würtemberg, Saxony, Baden, Hesse-Darmstadt, Hesse-Cassel, Nassau, Weimar, and the other smaller states, with the exception of Oldenburg and the free cities. These, and the two great Roman Catholic powers of Austria and Bavaria, refused to take any part in the deliberations. The number of deputies was thirty-one, representing twenty-six different states and principalities; they held altogether twenty-eight sittings of four or five hours' duration. The questions which they agreed in their preliminary sittings to take into consideration were in all four; 1. Whether it was desirable to continue these conferences at stated intervals, and if so, under what regulations, and for what purposes? 2. How the constitutional question of the Evangelic Church should be dealt with, due regard being had to existing circumstances? 3. Whether the attempt should be made to obtain uniformity of worship in the German Evangelic Church, without destroying the doctrinal or other peculiarities of particular Churches? 4. Whether the confessional question should be taken up, and to what extent?

The first question, the discussion of which occupied two sessions, was unanimously answered in the affirmative; reserving, however, the independence and right of self-government of the different Churches. It was proposed that under the title "the German Evangelic Church Conference," a similar Congress of Deputies should take place, at first every three, and afterwards every five years; the proceedings to be strictly confined to an interchange of communications on matters concerning the general interests of the Protestant Church in Germany, leaving the different governments and Churches free to make of the result of the conferences such use as they shall deem expedient. The place for holding the following conference, to be determined from time to time by the conference then sitting; and the next to be holden at Stuttgart.

The consideration of the second question, relative to the constitution of the German Evangelic Church, occupied the conference during seven sittings, and gave rise to much animated discussion. The view generally adopted was, that the constitution of the Church was a matter of secondary importance, and merely subsidiary to the right use of the word and sacraments, on which chiefly the well-being of the Church depends. Still it was acknowledged that a proper organization of the Church materially contributes to advance its interests. As regards the government of the Church by consistories (the existing form of Church government in most of the Protestant states of Germany), its advantages in producing uniformity of action, and preventing collisions between the temporal and the spiritual powers, were duly appreciated; but at the same time it was thought that it did not give a sufficient share in the government of the Church to the clergy and the people themselves; that it was calculated to diminish in them the sense of Church membership, and that it did not afford to the superior authority of the state a sufficient opportunity of becoming acquainted with the wants of the Church and the dispositions and wishes of its members. The experience of those provinces in which presbyteries and synods had been called into action, conjointly with, and in subordination to, the consistories, was considered favourable to an extension of that more popular form of Church government. It was agreed on all hands, that to restrict it where it already existed, was out of the question, and with the exception of one single vote, all united in recommending to the different governments the adoption of measures which would tend to give the clergy and the people generally a share in the administration of the affairs of the Church. The following suggestions on this subject were incorporated in the acts of the conference.

1. The congregation to elect lay elders, men of good report and communicants, out of a certain number of candidates, nominated in the first instance by the clergyman, and afterwards by the clergyman and elders conjointly; the elders so chosen to co-operate with the clergyman in quickening and preserving the moral and religious sense of the people, and in promoting the due observance of Sundays and holidays, and in maintaining good order during the celebration of Divine worship, to concur in all liturgical changes, and to have a voice in the election of deputies for the synod, and perhaps to take a part in the superintendence.

of schools and the management of the poor. The idea of a popular election of elders was, however, discountenanced by a great majority of the deputies.

2. Synods, consisting of both clerical and lay members, to be convoked at regular intervals of time; and according to circumstances and the extent of each state, the synods to be subdivided, if necessary, into general, provincial, and district synods. General synods to be presided over by a president of their own choice, and their proceedings superintended by a government commissary as the guardian of the rights of the temporal power. The synods to have only a consulting, not a deliberative or deciding voice in Church affairs; to give their opinion on measures proposed by the consistories, which might be abandoned if the voice of the synods was decidedly opposed to them; and to make suggestions as to changes, or remedies of existing evils, which might appear to them desirable. Some of the deputies, however, were of opinion that the synods ought to have a more direct and positive share in the government of the Church.

The third question, respecting the uniformity of worship, engaged the attention of the conference during six sittings. The opinions on this subject were still more conflicting than on the preceding question. After considerable discussion it was agreed that if it were practicable to introduce in some degree uniformity of worship, it would be desirable both as facilitating intercommunion, and as tending to satisfy the wishes of those who desire to see the liturgical indefiniteness which prevails in many parts of Germany put an end to. The consideration of the means, however, for attaining this object, which all acknowledged to be desirable, led to a great diversity of opinions. A majority of deputies united in the proposition for the appointment of a commission, whose business it should be, not only to determine certain general principles, but to undertake the actual arrangement of liturgical formularies, and of psalms and hymns of an approved character. The minority were of opinion that such a commission was altogether out of the question, and that the utmost that could be done, was to obtain instructions from the respective governments to their deputies at the next conference, authorizing them to enter into consultation as to the general principles to be followed in the composition of liturgical and psalmodical collections. Yet all agreed that it would be desirable even for those Churches who were satisfied with their present liturgical arrangements, to take a part in these deliberations and the measures to be founded upon them.

Last of all, the conference proceeded to deliberate upon the confessional question, with a preliminary understanding that no doctrinal discussions were to be admitted. The points for consideration were: 1. the validity of the symbolical books now in existence in the different Churches; 2. the obligation of the preachers to adhere to pure evangelic doctrine; 3. the mode of superintending the preachers as to their faithfulness in complying with this obligation. On the first point it was admitted on all hands that the symbolical books cannot be given up, and that the conference cannot undertake to modify them ; that they must continue in every Church to have such force and validity as has hitherto been attributed to them, and that with this even the adoption of a new common symbol could not interfere. The possibility of a new symbol as the joint expression of the faith of all the Churches being framed, was again acknowledged by all ; it being taken for granted that the form of the evangelic symbol need not at all times be unalterably the same, and that the evangelic Church has an undoubted right to develop itself further on the basis on which it stands. At the same time it was considered that the present was not the time for framing a new symbol, and that at all events the conference would be incompetent to do it, as it consisted of representatives, not of the different Churches, but of the different ecclesiastical governments. Again, it was agreed that the dissolution of the common bond of the Augustan confession was not to be contemplated. At the same time the right of each Church to maintain its own particular symbol by the side of the Augustan confession, and to determine the relation in which that and other symbols should stand to each other, was fully recognised. On the second point it was determined that the obligation of the preachers to adhere to pure evangelic doctrine must be maintained, as the condition of admission to the office of public teaching in the Church, and that with this view, in the first place, Holy Scripture is to be positively laid down, as is done in the symbolical books themselves, as the only source, and the absolute standard of Christian faith and conversation ; and in the next place, the mode of subscription to this principle, especially with regard to the relation in which the symbolical books stand to Holy Scripture, is to be left unaltered where it is now satisfactory, or if thought to require modification, is to be altered only with the concurrence of the established authorities in the respective Churches ; care being taken on the one hand not to encroach upon the freedom of belief and conscience which is the inalienable right of every Protestant ; and on the other hand, not to allow that freedom to degenerate into a license of individual teaching. Lastly, as to the mode of superintending the preachers, and guarding their faithfulness to their obligations, it was thought advisable that with all due strictness, great forbearance and mildness should be used, and methods of reconciliation repeatedly attempted before having recourse to ulterior measures ; and that the principal object should be to prevent polemical attacks upon the doctrine of the Evangelic Church before the people, and to provide for the edification of the congregations, by a pure and full preaching of the Word of God, in that evangelic spirit which pervades the symbolical books. By such a temperate course it was hoped that the power of truth would prevail in the end, and the Church escape safely from the agitation of these troublous times.

Such is the general outline of the labours of the conference ; but even this modicum of agreement is as yet problematic, as on the one hand several of the deputies handed in protests and separate votes on particular questions; and on the other hand, all the governments, in sending their deputies, have reserved to themselves the power of deliberating separately upon the results of the conference, and giving or refusing, as they shall see fit, their adhesion to the principles adopted by the majority of the assembly. On the whole, the interest of the conference consists chiefly in its having afforded an opportunity for the official and authentic disclosure of the many and great difficulties in which the Churches founded in Germany by Luther and Calvin are involved.

SWITZERLAND.—Religious Persecution in the Canton de Vaud.—Notwithstanding the attention and sympathy which the noble conduct of the ministers of the Canton de Vaud has universally excited, and the impossibility of filling up the numerous vacancies caused by the resignation of an overwhelming majority of the clerical body, the radical government of the Canton de Vaud continues to pursue its reckless career. The religious part of the community, which is for the most part attached to the secession ministry, is abandoned to the tender mercies of a ribald mob, and subjected to every species of ill-treatment. Scenes of the most brutal violence have been enacted both at Lausanne and in other places. A few examples may suffice to give an idea of the excesses which, with the open connivance of the authorities, are committed against those who are guilty of no other offence than that of assembling peaceably and with the utmost privacy for the performance of their religious duties. A small congregation assembled in February last, as early as five o'clock on Sunday morning, in the hope of escaping notice, in a country house in the neighbourhood of Lausanne; but by seven o'clock a body of men appeared at the door, and the first person that came out, when the assembly separated, was saluted with a blow from a cudgel, accompanied by the blasphemous exclamation, "Voilà pour Jésus-Christ." Fortunately there was a considerable proportion of males in the assembly, who with some difficulty succeeded in protecting the females. At Montricher fourteen persons assembled on the morning of Sunday, January the 18th, in the most unobtrusive manner, but a crowd assembled, and on their departure from the house, the members of the assembly were followed with hootings and throwing of stones. The master of the house, who held a subordinate office as forester and licensed vender of salt (a government monopoly), was in the afternoon of the very same Sunday summoned before the municipality, reprimanded, and dismissed from his offices. On his way there and back he was assailed by the mob with insults and missiles, and even guns were fired in the crowd. On the following Sunday some of the parties attempted to make their way to Morges, in the hope of being able to join the congregation there; but they were watched, and driven back to their houses by showers of stones. At Cour, near Lausanne, a party, consisting chiefly of ladies, had assembled in the house of a lady of property, well known for her beneficence, on a Communion Sunday; at the very moment when the minister was about to administer the Sacrament, the house was assailed by a shower of stones. While some of the gentlemen present made their way to Lausanne for assistance, the ladies escaped by the back to a neighbouring country-house; but they could not get to their own homes without a strong escort of gentlemen who hastened to their assistance, and protected them as well as they could from the violence of the mob. At Montreux, pastor Monnard, one of the most distinguished of the clergy of the Canton de Vaud, was expected to officiate in a congregation, which would have consisted of about 150 individuals, though, as the alarm was given in time, only about sixty actually came to the place of assembly. A little before the time of service the mob, who had obtained information of the proposed meeting, took possession of the parish engine, and as the worshippers arrived, they were successively drenched (this scene occurred in the middle of January), without distinction of age or sex. Among those who suffered most, were pastor Monnard, who was wet to the skin; an infirm old lady, and two invalids, who had come to reside in the village for the mildness of the climate. In the middle of the disturbance the juge de paix of the place, an old gentleman of eighty-four, attempted to interfere, but he was forced to retreat by the stream of water being directed right upon him. Still Divine worship was celebrated, the parties being determined to show that they were in earnest, and prepared to suffer any thing rather than allow their religious privileges to be taken away. What renders the whole transaction more scandalous, is the fact that the prefect had been apprized beforehand of the intentions of the mob, and yet neither he nor his officers made their appearance till the mischief had been perpetrated. Still more atrocious were the scenes which were enacted at Aran and at Échallens. In the former place a private house in which a few persons, not a dozen in all, had met on Sunday, the 1st of March, to read and pray together, was assailed by a set of lawless fellows, who forced their way in, tore the Bible and the Hymn-books to pieces, and then threw themselves upon the persons assembled, the greater part of them women, tied them with ropes and dragged them through the streets in fear of their lives; two of the women were taken in this state with ropes round their necks to a neighbouring village, where at last some parties came to their assistance, and released them from the clutches of their persecutors. At Échallens the fury of the mob was directed against the institution of Deaconesses or Protestant Sisters of Charity, established in that place. One of the rooms of the institution, which comprises a hospital, was used as a chapel, and in consequence of the events that had taken place, many of the inhabitants of Échallens repaired thither in preference to the church. On the 19th of April, the two Sunday services had been held as usual, and the inmates of the house, chiefly females and patients, were on the point of retiring to rest, when a mob of from forty to fifty men made its appearance in front of the establishment, which lies a little way out of the borough, armed with bludgeons and axes. Scouts having been placed on all the roads leading to the building, a shot was fired by way of signal, and the word of command given; upon which the whole body of assailants stormed the house, and having forced their way into the chapel, they tore the Bible, and demolished every part of the furniture; uttering the most horrible threats, declaring that they would have the life of the minister, who is resident director; and that they would throw both the patients and the sisters out of the windows. Fortunately the two physicians connected with the establishment obtained information of what was going forward, and collected among the inhabitants of Échallens, who are greatly benefited by the institution, a sufficient force to come to the rescue. This timely aid arrived just as the demolition of the chapel was completed, and drove off the mob; a guard was then left on the premises, which proved any thing but an unnecessary precaution, as some of the rioters returned in the middle of the night, and endeavoured to force an entrance. The institution has since been closed, and the sisters and patients have been dispersed.

Amidst all these disorders the government and its agents are looking on complacently; no means are taken either to prevent or to punish these outrages. If any demonstration of interference is made, it is delayed till the mischief has been effected; and punishment is inflicted, not on the rioters, but on their victims, who are told that if they choose to persist in a course which is evidently obnoxious to the people, they must take the consequences, and are justly to be held responsible for the disorders which their conduct occasions. In the last-mentioned case of Échallens, the inertness and indifference of the authorities were so scandalous, that the supreme tribunal at Lausanne deemed it its duty to order inquiry to be instituted; but scarcely had this order been given when the government interfered, and by intimidation induced the tribunal to quash its own order. The spirit which presides over the acts of the government may be gathered from the following passage from a speech delivered by M. Druey, the leader of the democratic party, and chief of the executive government, during the debates in the great council:—

“It is alleged that the government has attacked the freedom of religion. But the freedom of religion is a relative freedom. People ought to take care not to interfere with the freedom of others while they exercise their own, either by word or deed. If there is any irritation, it is not from opposition to certain individuals, but because those individuals think themselves better than other people, whom they look upon as damned, and pity them. When one hears children say to their parents: my poor father! my poor mother! is not that a most contemptuous proceeding, which must necessarily produce a reaction? Those who are attacked will defend themselves. If the Council of State has been obliged to take certain measures, it has not been through hatred of religious freedom, but with a view to avoid collisions. They say the domicile has been violated. But the Penal Code allows entrance into the domicile, in order to put a stop to great disorders. Much is said about aggressions on the freedom of religion; but is what takes place here, to be compared with what takes place in other countries? In England there is the greatest religious freedom; but that does not prevent a chapel being demolished now and then by the multitude, and you may think yourself well off if you escape a thwacking. But there is no such outcry raised about it ; the English are not such Sybarites ; they have not yet got out of the habit of boxing. And do you fancy, when the Vaudois have carried their Sybaritism so far, as to require to be put up in cotton, that they will be able to shed their blood for their country ? Let us be thankful, that there is as yet some energy left in Switzerland, some of that ancient vigour, that primitive savagery. The masses must preserve the power of the fist. Intellectual force is nothing if it does not descend into the arms ; even as physical force is to derive its strength from intellectual force."

Where such principles are propounded by the head of the executive, it is not surprising that the populace should be guilty of all sorts of outrages and excesses ; the only wonder is that such a government is tolerated in the civilized world. Not that the petty despots of Lausanne have been left altogether undisturbed in their career of iniquitous "savagery." They have met with rebuffs and remonstrances from more than one quarter. The president of the great Council of Zürich, M. Bluntschli, in his opening speech deplored that "the formerly flourishing condition of the Canton de Vaud had disappeared before a brutal revolution, which had within a few months brought matters to such a pass, that in a land where the word freedom is in every one's mouth, as well as in the motto of the national arms, the freedom of the evangelic Church is oppressed in a manner unequalled, except by the persecutions which the early Christians had to endure from the Roman emperors, or in modern times by the reign of terror of 1793." This home thrust excited the wrath of the democrats at Lausanne to the highest pitch ; and they addressed a letter, demanding satisfaction with many big words, to the Great Council of Zürich ; but they took nothing by their motion ; for M. Bluntschli having declared that what he had said, and was ready to maintain, was the utterance of his private, not his official opinion, the Great Council of Zürich quietly informed M. Druey and his fellow-complainants that the affair was no concern of theirs. Another broad hint is said to have been given to their high-mightinesses of Lausanne by the government of Geneva, to which they made application for a supply of ministers to fill the vacancies. The Genevese government replied they had at the moment only a few missionaries at their disposal, who were on the point of going out to preach the Gospel to the savages in New Zealand, but whom, in consideration of the present condition of the Canton de Vaud, the government would be happy to send, as they could do so without making any great change in their destination. Of a more serious character were the remonstrances addressed to M. Druey's government by the Prussian and the English cabinets. The occasion for these was afforded by the government of the Canton de Vaud itself, which carried its hypocrisy so far as to transmit to the representatives of the different courts of Europe a collection of documents in justification of its conduct ; which collection consisted, in fact, only of its own public acts.

omitting all the letters and other documents issued by the ministers, both before and after their secession from the establishment. The exact purport of the communication made by the Prussian ambassador has not transpired; on the contrary, the letters which passed between the British government and the Council of State of the Canton de Vaud have been published, and do equal credit to the moderation and to the firmness of the Foreign secretary and of his representative M. Morier. The latter having received the collection of documents, at once pointed out the omission of the documents which had emanated from the Church party, and required to be furnished with copies of them. The evidence being thus completed, the whole case was remitted to the government at home, and in reply a despatch from Lord Aberdeen was sent out, in which the course pursued by the government of Lausanne is freely reprehended as involving a dereliction of those first principles of civil and religious freedom, the maintenance of which distinguishes civilized Christian states; with an intimation, guarded however by the most positive assurances of respect for the sovereign rights of another state, that perseverance in that course might not improbably compromise the national independence of the entire Swiss nation. This remonstrance, which was transmitted to the Council of State on the 6th of February last, has, like all the others, hitherto remained without effect.

Meanwhile all assemblies for Divine worship, except in the national churches, have been prohibited in the chief places, and very generally throughout the Canton. But the national churches are but thinly attended; indeed in most places there are no ministers to officiate in them. An attempt on the part of the ministers who continue in office, to obtain from the government such terms as would enable their seceding brethren to resume their former stations, proved utterly abortive. The four classes of the Vaudois clergy were ordered to meet for the despatch of general business, and especially the choice of delegates for the examination and ordination of new ministers. Upon this M. Herzog, Professor of Divinity at the Academy of Lausanne, who would have been an ex-officio member of the board of examiners, resigned; a step by which the theological staff of the academy was reduced to one solitary professor. Nevertheless the board was appointed; but although it was understood that the examination would not be over rigorous, no more than twelve candidates presented themselves, of whom only two were students from the Canton de Vaud; and of these one withdrew of his own accord, and the other was rejected. Two of the strangers were in like manner turned away; so that the number of new pastors amounted in all only to eight.

While the difficulty of maintaining the National Establishment on the terms of the revolutionary government remains thus undiminished, the ministers who have resigned, continue silently to prepare the way for the reconstruction of their Church, independently of all connexion with the State. They published in February last an address to their parishioners, in which they intimated to them this their determination, and invited them to take courage under their present trials, and to remain faithful to the Church of their fathers; declaring that they do not in the abstract reject the idea of union with the State; but that such union must be dependent on this express condition, that the State is not to oppress the Church, any more than the Church to domineer over the State. This address has since been followed up by a solemn "declaration of their faith" before the world, in which they both explain the motives of their separation from the National Church, and define the position they intend hereafter to occupy. The document is as follows:—

"In the Name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost. Amen! The undersigned pastors and ministers of the Holy Gospel in the Canton de Vaud, who have adhered to the act of resignation determined upon on the 12th of November, 1845, and have thereby renounced their official relation to the State; to all Protestant and reformed Christian Churches, and to all the faithful of those Churches: Grace and peace be multiplied unto you from God our Father, and our Lord Jesus Christ.

"At the moment when, by reason of our remaining true to our faith, our Church, and our ministry, the ties which bound us to the State have been broken, we deem it incumbent on us to protest that not only we have not, by that act, separated ourselves from the communion of the Protestant and Reformed Churches, but that we have united ourselves to them more closely, forasmuch as we have fought for doctrines which are dear to them all; viz. the spiritual supremacy of Jesus Christ over his Church, and the independence and integrity of the ministry of the Gospel.

"Wherefore, we declare, before God and the Church, that our faith is the same as that of our fathers; faith, that is to say, in the Holy Scriptures, and in the doctrines therein contained, which doctrines were summed up by our Reformers in the dogmatic part, i.e. the first twenty-one chapters, of the Helvetic confession of faith, and are professed in the liturgy in use in our Churches.

"We declare that we are ready with the help of the Lord to make any further sacrifices to our belief in the doctrines, for the maintenance of which we have been compelled to separate from the State, viz. :—
1. The sovereign spiritual authority of Christ and of his word in the Church. 2. The divine institution of the ministry of the Gospel.

"We declare that we are, and desire to remain, in communion of faith and love with all Christian Churches, and with all the faithful who, without having the same expression of faith which we have, believe with us that they can be justified before God, and sanctified, only by faith in the all-powerful efficacy of the sacrifice and the entire work of Jesus Christ, the Son of God, God manifest in the flesh. Lastly, we declare, that it is our ardent desire to enter into more intimate and more frequent relation with all the Protestant and Reformed Churches, in order that we may work together with them for whatever may tend to realize the Unity of Evangelic Protestantism, and promote the advancement of the kingdom of God.

"Done and signed, to be sent to the Protestant and Reformed Churches of Christendom, Lausanne, April 21st, 1846."

4. Réponse à mes Adversaires, pour servir de suite au premier volume de l'ouvrage intitulé, 'Études Historiques, Politiques, et Morales sur l'État de la Société Européenne, vers le milieu du dix-neuvième siècle,' par le Prince de POLIGNAC. Paris, 1846.

HISTORY—a charming songstress in her youthful days, Clio gesta canens, clothing in sweet minstrelsy her legendary lore, and in her maturer years a stately dame, slow and careful in gathering her stores of knowledge, and grave in her delivery—has of late caught the infection of the times, travelling onwards with railroad speed, snatching up her information as she flies along, and dealing it out again as rapidly as she collects it, in journals and pamphlets without number, which she scatters in every direction to mark her passage. How should it be otherwise? The hurricane of changes that is sweeping over the world, leaves no time for reflection: events which formerly would have been spread over a succession of ages, are now crowded into the brief space of a single life. The fashion of our progress through time is as much altered, as that of our progress through space by the substitution of the lengthened train for the compact stage-coach, and the hissing locomotive for the team of neighing steeds. A day's journey on the top of a well-appointed, fast coach—a vulgar incident of life some years ago—has now become a kind of oasis of bygone pleasantness for memory to dwell upon; how prancingly the showy cattle of the first and the last stages did their work, as if it were mere play to them ; how at the foot of some steep ascent the passengers alighted, some to ease the horses and others to stretch their legs ; how over the level plain, and over hill and dale the coach rolled merrily onward, turning the country into a vast panorama with shifting scenes, of which the living guide-book on the coach-box did the honours ; and how, arrived at his journey's end, the traveller might, if he was so inclined, sit down and, while he sipped his tea, transfer to his note-book the impressions he had received and the pictures he had collected in his mind as he passed along. There was a pleasure, too, and plenty of fun, in marking the characteristic differences of the conveyances in different countries : the Diligence with its two rows of three horses abreast, its heavy-booted postilion, and its conductor à la militaire, who, if you took your seat in the impériale, would shorten the journey with stories of the grand capitaine and his campaigns ; the Eilwagen (like its French namesake lucus a non lucendo) with its unicorn team, and its discordant sounds of cracking whip and blowing horn and tausend Donnerwetter ; the Hauterer or Vetturino with his raw-boned hacks crawling at a snail's pace over the road, destroying the poetry of travel by the intrusive homeliness of his discourse, and the balmy sweetness of the air by the insufferable stench of his canaster. All these are fast passing away from the face of the earth, with their expressive features of varying nationality ; and in their place, whithersoever you direct your journey, whether you travel in Belgium or in France, in Italy or in Germany, or in good Old England, there is, or shortly will be, with hardly any perceptible difference, the broad, well-cushioned railroad-carriage, in which you stow yourself away like a piece of living luggage, to be hurled at a pace which does not permit your eye to rest on a single object, through dark tunnels under the hills, and on ugly banks across the valleys, where the happier traveller of former years feasted his eye on the beauteous face of nature ; and when you have reached your destination, you know no more of the country through which you have passed, than what may be gathered from the railroad bill which you obtained at the terminus along with your ticket.

And even so it is with our progress through time : the leisure of contemplation which our fathers enjoyed, while they acted their part on the world's stage, is not vouchsafed to their busier and, for that very reason, not wiser sons. Men are driven along as by the pressure of a crowd from behind, which leaves them no time to stop and consider whither they are going ; those that are in the front ranks, and supposed from their position to direct the movement, find it a hard matter to keep on their legs, and to prevent themselves from being thrown down and trampled on ; and the course which they take is determined, not by reflection or choice, but by the direction of the impulse by which they are pushed onward. The secret of this change in the aspect of the world and in the character of its movements is, that a power has been set in motion in the masses, which acts in the moral world with the same gigantic force as steam does in the physical world ; the power of the carnal, selfish intellect, developed and heated to high pressure temperature. That power, brought to bear upon every part of the social machinery, without the influence of religious principle to regulate and direct it, is every where endangering the ancient institutions which present obstacles to its progress, and scattering destruction and desolation around it. Its development has been so simultaneous, its results are being so rapidly communicated from country to country, that the distinctive features of national mind and character are fast disappearing before the influence of a cosmopolite civilization, or rather, we should say, perhaps, a cosmopolite barbarism ; for there is no greater savage than the intellectual savage, the savage of civilized life.

The peculiar character of that power, that which it exhibits every where and under every variety of circumstances, is an exclusive reliance on the intellect of man, an exclusive devotion to his material interests. It recognises no connexion between this world and another, so as to place the social aims and appliances, the theories and institutions of this world, in subordination to the higher purposes of that other world. It deals with religion as with a mere matter of private opinion, which is to be kept out of the calculation of legislatures and governments, except so far as the agreement of a considerable number of individuals in one and the same belief may give to that belief a certain social importance ; and accordingly, the numerical strength of any given creed is the measure of the countenance and support which it may be expedient to give to it. The difference between truth and error in matters of religion is as completely set aside as if no such difference existed ; Popery and Catholic truth are looked upon as two different systems of Christianity, just as the Linnæan and Natural Systems are two different systems of botany ; and their respective merits are discussed much in the same way as those of the narrow and the broad gauge. Of reverence for principles of revealed and eternal truth that infidel power knows nothing ; for the experience of past ages it has a sovereign contempt ; it pays honour only to its own crude speculations, and has confidence only in its own rash experiments.

This power, the growth of which dates about a century back, and which, confined in the first instance to the world of literature, is working its way more and more down into the masses, is evidently gathering strength in preparation for a tremendous struggle, which probably will constitute the final crisis of this world's existence, and which will have for its object entirely to annihilate every principle and every system which has directly or indirectly an origin higher than of this earth; to throw down every altar and every throne, and to proclaim the omniscience of reason and the omnipotence of the popular will; to abrogate every divine right as a treasonable offence against the sovereignty of man. Meanwhile, as in ordinary warfare skirmishes between the outposts, and onslaughts between the more advanced bodies of the hostile armies, precede the mighty battle in which the opposing hosts are drawn up in the fulness of their strength, and by which the fate of empires is finally decided, so before the last and universal conflict between the carnal power of the intellect and the spiritual power of religion, partial contests take place from time to time, and of these the first and fiercest was the fearful and bloody drama enacted in France half a century ago. After the license of anarchy had reached such a height as to render even the iron rod of military despotism a blessing, and after this despotism had in its turn rendered itself intolerable by its haughty and oppressive bearing, the opposing principle, which recognises a divine ordinance set over the affairs of men, seemed for a moment to regain its ascendancy; but the power of infidelity was only repressed and not subdued; it soon rose again triumphant, and prudently avoiding the excesses by which its former victory had been turned into defeat, it ranged itself under the self-imposed discipline of the Napoleon of Peace.

It is in this light that, after stripping them of all the adventitious incidents of circumstances and persons, the events must be regarded, which, as the works enumerated at the head of this article show, have become matter of history, before the ink has had time to dry, with which the ordinances of the 25th of July and the compact of the 9th of August were written. Whatever might have been the faults of the unhappy monarch who staked and lost his crown; whatever the errors of his ostensible ministers; whatever the insidious character of the secret influence by which both were directed; however upright, on the other hand, may be the intentions, however consummate the ability, however noble the bearing of the prince who took hold of the proffered reins of power, still the fact remains, that CHARLES X., by the grace of God, King of France, was the expression of the principle of a divine ordinance in church and state; and that LOUIS PHILIPPE, by the will of the people, King of the French, is the representative of the self-sufficiency of man in matters both of religion and of government. It is true that the religion, under the auspices of which Charles X. ruled and forfeited his kingdom, is a corrupt religion; and it may be that he strained his regal power beyond its legitimate compass; but the question at issue was not the truth of the faith which he maintained, or the legality of the acts of his government; it was against the very principle of a state religion of any kind whatever,—against the principle of a royal power which took its rise in the appointment of God, and not in the will of the people, that the nation rose under the auspices of leaders, who openly declared that France could and should have no peace until the principles of 1789 should become the basis of the constitution. This is equally apparent from the account of both the writers whose works are now lying before us, notwithstanding the general opposition of their views, and the personal bitterness with which they treat each other in their writings.

As regards M. Capefigue, he has no pretension to be the advocate of any principle, or to have any definite standard by which he weighs men and parties and their proceedings. Success appears to be the criterion by which he forms his estimates; his heart's allegiance is to the powers that be; not, however, because they are ordained of God, but simply because they are, and while they are, the powers. This point is urged against him with considerable effect by M. de Polignac, in his Réponse à mes Adversaires, in which, adverting to the epithet, tête foible, applied to him by M. Capefigue, he says:

“No doubt that author has never found himself compromised in any grave or serious political event, for, if I am not mistaken, after having been the faithful partisan of the restoration, to which he even gave the support of his pen in the Quotidienne and in other journals, while it had the wind of fortune in its favour, he abandoned its cause, and visited it with his wrath, in the very first days of its adversity; in one word, having always ranged himself on the side of the stronger, he could not but escape always from the dangers which accompany a reverse, and thus earn for himself the designation of a tête forte.”—Polignac, Réponse à mes Adversaires, p. 56.

The anecdotes which M. Capefigue tells of his childhood, when M. Anglès-Capefigue (whether his father, or another near relative, does not appear) fell a victim to the murderous excesses of the revolutionary bands at Marseilles, accounts for his instinctive detestation of all party violence; and his own statement, that in the course of his political career he has had the opportunity of seeing and hearing every shade of opinion, being admitted to the political circles of the different parties, marks him as a man whose principles are of no very decided cast. If he has any predilection for one system or set of men rather than another, it is for the administration which was displaced by M. de Polignac, towards whose chief, M. de Martignac, he appears to have entertained sentiments of great personal devotion; a circumstance which accounts in a great measure for the feeling of personal hostility with which he regards his successor. His religious views, though not Ultramontane, are those of a decided Romanist, and he agrees with M. de Polignac in charging the French Revolution upon Calvinism; but of the truths of religion he speaks occasionally in a somewhat staggering tone, which leaves it doubtful whether "Catholicism" is, to his mind, more than an eminently useful system of restraint upon the passions of mankind. In speaking of the condition of the working classes under the restoration, he says:

"Was it not frightful to think of the demoralization of the inferior classes of society? Who, then, could cast their minds into the mould of a social and moral system? Religious education, doubtless, could do it; that is to say, a teaching adapted to the want among them of morality and comfort. In taking popular instruction out of the hands of the ecclesiastical corporations, the Constituent Assembly had, I believe, committed an error; because the religious bodies bridled the passions at the same time that they imparted light. Men who labour much, and in the sweat of their brow, can hardly help feeling a certain irritation against the state of society which condemns them to incessant toil. The working man will therefore remain restless and insubordinate, unless the belief in a future life is inculcated upon him, unless obedience is made a matter of duty with him, unless the legends of heaven and hell are presented to his mind."—Capefigue, L'Europe depuis l'Avènement du roi Louis-Philippe, tom. i. p. 253, 254.

This, it must be confessed, does not sound very satisfactory as to M. Capefigue's own personal belief in those "legends," and savours more of political conservatism than of faith in matters of religion. In a writer who has taken in hand the history of a conflict in which religion bears so conspicuous a part, we hold this to be a material disqualification; but it is not the only one of which we have to complain. M. Capefigue has evidently had access to a very large mass of state papers and despatches, and through his acquaintance with men of different political parties, to many private channels of information. But instead of making use of these for the purpose of presenting his readers with characteristic sketches of the events he treats of, and of the men that took a part in them, bearing, by reason of the opportunities at his command, the stamp of authenticity, M. Capefigue is content to daub his pages with interminable transcripts of documents, connected together by incoherent fragments of narrative, and desultory trains of reflection, the most prominent quality of which is, what in his own language is expressively called platitude. Often, indeed, the transcripts are taken from documents already known to the public, by means of the journals and other records of the history of the times; but occasionally they are unpublished pieces, which M. Capefigue has the merit of making known for the first time. This merit he takes care the reader should not overlook, impressing him duly with the fact that all the secrets of the diplomatic world have been surveyed and scanned by the author who has undertaken to guide him through the mazes of contemporaneous history. "J'ai parcouru longtemps les archives des affaires étrangères, et la correspondance secrète des ambassadeurs." . . . "Un grand nombre de mémoires secrets étaient mis sous les yeux de Charles X.; j'en ai eu plusieurs dans mes mains." . . . "J'ai eu dans les mains les dépêches qui furent lues au conseil des ministres." . . . Such are some of the ever-recurring phrases by which M. Capefigue points out to his readers the vast extent and secret character of the materials which he has had at his disposal; materials which, if we are to believe him, are accessible to no one but himself; "C'est à l'aide d'une grande masse de faits et de renseignements, qui ME SONT PERSONNELS, que j'ai rédigé ce travail," he says, of his account of the Congress of Vienna. Now when an author gives extracts within inverted commas, it can hardly be supposed that they are not what they profess to be; when he makes a general statement of his own on the strength of what he has had dans les mains and sous les yeux, it would be unfair to suspect that, like Sheridan, he "has no bag," by the contents of which he might establish his assertions; and if the information to which M. Capefigue so refers, is all real and genuine, he is undoubtedly to be applauded for the extent of it which he has collected together. Yet after all,—and here it is where M. Capefigue's mistake lies,—to command an abundance of materials is one thing, to possess judgment and talent for using them properly, quite another thing. As a man does not become a painter by laying in a large stock of colours, so a man does not become a historian by poring over a large mass of documents; a truism copiously illustrated by the volumes of our author, between whom and a historian there is all the difference which there is between the scene-painter, who represents a certain set of objects agreeably to the stage directions, and the artist who embodies in his picture some high thought of the mind, to the setting forth of which every object he delineates is subservient. Yet even this fault, great as it is, is not the most serious which we have to find with M. Capefigue's performance. There is, in the very extent and depth of the secret information of which he boasts, a something that excites suspicion; it seems difficult to understand how it was possible for him to know all that he says he knows, so accurately and so certainly, even to the most private conversations of the potentates of Europe and their ministers of state, unless, indeed, we take M. Capefigue to be a kind of political Asmodeus, from whose scrutinizing glance no palace, no cabinet, no boudoir in Europe is secure. We honestly confess that, as we read through his volumes, we could not suppress an ugly suspicion of this nature, in spite of all our efforts to resist the temptation to such manifest uncharitableness; and we were not greatly surprised when we met, in M. de Polignac's "Réponse à mes Adversaires," with the following observation:

"One word more respecting the author in question and his book (L'Europe depuis l'Avènement du roi Louis-Philippe). In his historical account of the days of July, he gives the contents of letters to the king which he attributes to me, and which I declare I never wrote; he often makes me speak a language which I never held; he puts into the mouths of some members of the diplomatic corps words addressed to me which I never heard; in short, faithful to the system which he has adopted in his first historical libel on the restoration, he does more than write history, he invents it."—Polignac, Réponse à mes Adversaires, p. 57.

This is a sad blow indeed to the authenticity of M. Capefigue's statements; but it is by no means the rudest shock which the credibility of his historical anecdotes has to sustain. He inflicts occasionally upon himself far harder blows, by contradicting in one place distinctly what he has as distinctly asserted in another. One example, rather a curious one, may suffice. In the Histoire de la Restauration we have the following graphic account of the forebodings which filled the minds of the ministers in preparing their coup d'état.

"Men of sense and men of business do not play at coups d'état without having their minds greatly engrossed by the future; M. de Polignac, with his inconceivable levity, might deceive himself; but the sad and solemn tone which reigned during these discussions, clearly showed that several of the ministers felt the greatness of the dangers to which they were exposing the throne. Every moment some word or other escaped; some contemplated the portrait of Strafford, others dwelt complacently on the idea of a great act of self-devotion; all were aware of the responsibility which weighed upon them. This responsibility they were all willing to undergo, for they all affixed their signatures to the ordinances, as if they had felt it an honour to share the common danger."—Capefigue, Histoire de la Restauration, vol. iv. p. 251.

But what is the version which the same historian gives of the very same matter in another place, without assigning any reason for the change in his statement, and without any apparent cause, but his own "inconceivable levity" as a compiler of political chit-chat? In his history of Europe, since the accession of Louis Philippe, he argues that the Polignac ministry were acting under a firm conviction of the perfect legality of the course pursued by them, and then continues :

"So reasoned all the ministers, especially M. de Polignac; there was, therefore, no room for any one to heave sighs, to look at the portrait of Strafford (which was not in the Council Chamber), or to offer his head to the king in signing the government measures; if the ordinances were not considered absolutely legal, they were at least supposed to be strictly in accordance with the provisions of the constitutional charter."—Capefigue, l'Europe depuis l'Avènement du roi Louis-Philippe, vol. i. 321.

Such palpable contradictions necessarily destroy all confidence, if not in the author's veracity, at least in the accuracy of his information, and in the care which he has taken to select and arrange his materials; the more so as in other respects too traces of the greatest negligence and ignorance are apparent in his performances. Considering that M. Capefigue is *polyhistor*¹, in the least creditable sense of the word, one of those whose pen, as M. de Polignac appropriately quotes,—

"peut tous les mois, au moins, enfanter en volume,"

it is not to be expected that his writings should exhibit that careful digestion of materials, and that elaborate accuracy of diction, which are the result of adherence to the canon nonum prematur in annum. Still we might expect, that one who makes such high pretensions to an intimate knowledge of all the intricacies of European diplomacy, should not fall into ludicrous mistakes; as, for instance, when he gravely informs us that Lord Castlereagh calling Lord Stanhope "his honourable friend," in a debate on the occupation of France, was a clear proof that he was but too much disposed to adopt Lord Stanhope's policy; we might expect that he should not be guilty of mutilations of proper names, as when he speaks of the house of "Hoppe and Baring," of "Lord Witworth," the English envoy at Paris; of "Lord Fitz Sommerset," sent on a special mission to Madrid; and last, not least, of the conspiracy of "Thwiswold." We say nothing of Lord Vellington and the Wighs, because these, being properly spelled elsewhere, may be set down to the account of the printer; but we fear the same allowance cannot be made when he calls the king at arms héros d'armes, instead of héraut d'armes, as he ought to have written.

In spite of all these blemishes, great and small, however, the volumes of M. Capefigue will still be found, in the hands of those who know how to discriminate, valuable contributions to the history of our own times, especially as far as France is concerned; as they contain a vast quantity of the crude material, which minds better qualified for the task may hereafter work up in a manner more worthy to be dignified with the name of history.

Very different in character from M. Capefigue's demi-historical, demi-apocryphal compilations, is the work of Prince Polignac. However erroneous in some respects we may think the principle of which it is the expression, it has the merit of unfolding and upholding that principle with a consistency and loftiness of thought which reflects the highest credit upon the character of the author. It is just such a book as a man might be expected to write, who has staked his all and his very life itself on the maintenance of a principle which is with him an article of faith; and what is more, infinitely more, to the credit of the noble writer, there is not in it any of that bitterness and that violence which are so often allied with uncompromising adherence to certain principles. There are in his Réponse à mes Adversaires, passages which sufficiently show the prince's ability to handle the gall-dipped iron-pen of personal controversy, but they are few, and written upon great provocation. Among those who have laid themselves open to his castigation, M. Genoude, editor of the Gazette de France, and M. Capefigue, are the most conspicuous. The former touched at once his literary and his personal vanity to the quick, by applying the epithet insensé to his book, and taxing him with having "neither learned nor forgotten any thing;" whereupon M. de Polignac smartly retorts by telling M. Genoude, who, it seems, gloried in calling himself his "aide de camp" in the days of his power, that he at least cannot be charged with not having forgotten any thing, and goes on to put him in mind of a variety of circumstances, the recollection of which ought to have prevented the versatile editor from attacking his exiled patron in a style which says as little for his political consistency as it does for his personal gratitude. Of M. Capefigue, and the strictures on his productions, contained in the work of M. de Polignac, we have already spoken; he provoked the wrath of the ex-minister by his often-repeated allusions to his being an obstinate man, a tête faible, and above all, to his cold impassibility during the fearful conflict in which he involved the monarchy. A'propos of this last reproach, the prince mentions two interesting anecdotes which show, that however fatal his "impassibility" may have proved to the royal cause, it stood him in good stead for his personal preservation. As they are characteristic, both of M. de Polignac's temper of mind, and of the savage and sanguinary spirit which is still brooding in the hearts of the French patriots, we shall transcribe them in his own words:

"That author," he says, in allusion to M. Capefigue, the 'tête forte' who always sided with the stronger party, "might naturally be ignorant that in the presence of danger the features ought never to betray the anguish of the heart; the terrible events through which I have passed in my lifetime, have more than once confirmed this truth in my eyes. It is to this apparent impassibility that I stood again indebted for the preservation of my life, shortly after the revolution of July, when I was arrested alone in a secluded house a quarter of a league from Granville, by a score and a half of young patriots in a state of great exaltation armed with pistols and daggers. For the space of two hours I was detained by them, and while some of them plied me with the most insidious questions, I heard others near me say to each other in an under-tone, 'If we could get out of him but half a proof that he is the person whom we imagine we have caught, we would stick the knife into his heart.' My coolness, however, disappointed their expectation. Another and a still stronger instance of the same kind happened on the following day, when being conducted as a prisoner to Saint-Lô, I had arrived, accompanied by two members of the municipality of Granville, at Coutances, a town in Normandy, for the purpose of changing horses, and the population, which two days before had driven out all the authorities, sub-prefects, mayors, and gendarmes, on being maliciously informed of my arrival, all on a sudden surrounded my carriage with shouts for blood. From the midst of that mob, which in its ferment presented a lively image of the principle of popular sovereignty in all its purity, a man then stepped forward and cried, 'Be easy, he shan't escape us, I'll do for him.' The dress of the fellow was that of a journeyman butcher; he jumped on the step of the carriage, the door of which he opened, and presented himself before us with a large knife in his hand, looking with a ferocious eye for his victim. I was sitting on the front seat of the carriage, the knife of the assassin grazed my breast, and the least movement indicative of fear would have provoked murder. But, thanks to God, no movement was made; my companions imitated my impassibility, and the man withdrew in a state of uncertainty, saying, 'I don't know which to strike.' Meanwhile the horses had been put to, the postilion started them at a gallop, and got the carriage clear at the moment when a voice was heard advising the people to overturn the carriage in order to insure their vengeance. This shows how useful it is to be able sometimes to conceal under a calm exterior the tumultuous thoughts which are excited by the presence of a great danger."—Polignac, Réponse à ses Adversaires, pp. 56, 57.

Such scenes as these were certainly not calculated to inspire M. de Polignac with any very great admiration for the principle of the sovereignty of the people; but his opposition to that principle does not rest on antipathies engendered by personal causes; it is founded upon deep thought, and upon profound religious convictions—convictions which, as expressed by him, have far more in them of Catholic truth than of Romish error.

"There are," he says in the introduction of his work, "those who refuse to recognize, in the concatenation of the events which fill up the ages of the world, an action superior to that of man: perhaps it is their interest to deceive themselves; as for me, I here frankly declare that I am not one of those who reject the idea of a divine intervention in the affairs of this world. The hand of God rolls the ages before Him, but his wisdom controls the impulse which He gives to them; He is long-suffering because He is the Eternal; and if in his providence He permits crime here below, it is for the purpose of bringing out virtue in greater brightness; if He tolerates the extravagances of pride, it is for the purpose of demonstrating its impotence more clearly. In the midst, however, of the impassioned struggles which time brings with it, allays, and raises again, his fatherly eye marks and guides more especially that innermost feeling which warms the heart of his true children, which is purified through suffering, and forms in this place of exile the first bond of that love which afterwards is crowned with a blessed immortality. All the facts which in the course of ages group themselves apart from this divine feeling, belong to the earth, and partake of the frailty of their origin; the other facts only hang together, succeed without destroying each other, and present, so to speak, only the progressive development of one and the same action, which derives the principle of its strength and of its life from above.

"In truth, thrones and empires crumble; nations overwhelm each other; they change their habitation, their names, their laws, their language; but they advance, in a manner, only over heaps of ruins, the very remembrance of which history sometimes forgets to record. The religion of Christ alone outlives those ruins: this is the chain which connects one age with another, an indestructible chain, of which his enemies are unable to change either the strength or the durability; the daughter of heaven, but militant upon this earth, that religion takes a share in all our troubles and our sufferings; she offers her tears and the blood of her martyrs as a holocaust for us; but God upholds her in the conflict, inspires her with his breath, illumines her with his light; He does more, He fills her with his presence; He fixes his abode in the heart of the children which he reserves for her; for the heart of the Christian is here below the Lord's home."—Polignac, Etudes Historiques, &c., pp. 23, 24.

That a mind imbued with such convictions should in practical life be the advocate of the church as a national institution, and of the principle of legitimacy in politics, is to be expected; nor is there in the abstract views of M. de Polignac on church and state questions any thing but what the lovers of the church and monarchy in every country must heartily approve. The mistake into which he fell, was not that he held these principles, and that he opposed them to the infidel and democratic tendencies whose influence is as yet fearfully prevalent among the French people; it lay in this, that he identified his church principles with the Romish communion, and his principles of legitimacy with the impracticable notions and extravagant pretensions of the ancien régime, of which Charles X. was the royal incarnation. This was his fundamental error; the error from which even the bitter experience of his failure and his subsequent misfortunes has not delivered him. It was this error which led him to grasp with rather too eager a hand those reins of power which his subsequent conduct showed that he was unable to hold with the firmness and severity required by the fierceness of the opposition arrayed against him. And assuredly never did any man succeed to the possession of power, not only under greater personal disadvantages, but under circumstances more unfavourable. Upon this point the testimony of M. Capefigue is conclusive: he dates the ruin of the elder branch of the Bourbons as far back as the dissolution of the Villèle administration, of which at the close of its career he forms the following judgment:—

“ M. de Villèle may accuse himself of having inflicted a fatal blow upon the Bourbons of the elder branch. He wore out all the springs of government by overstraining them; he handed over to his successors all the arms of power in a wasted and decayed condition; henceforth there was nothing but concession; because every thing had been too violent, too completely at variance with law and opinion; every thing had been pushed to extremes; the country had been wantonly agitated. In consequence of the headlong adoption of a bad system, it had been necessary to strike down whatever offered any resistance; and as resistance spread more widely in proportion as the social order was more completely departed from, the result was, that every thing was struck down, and the hostility at last became universal. The legitimate influence of the government over the elections could no longer be exercised, on account of the manner in which it had been abused; in the provinces the power was no longer respected on account of the frauds which it had committed; the control over the journals was worn out by the strong abuse of the censorship; religion was powerless, the clergy were denounced as enemies; the crown was universally distrusted, and the country was clamorous for guarantees, because no faith was any longer placed in promises. What I find fault with M. de Villèle for is, that he rendered any government impossible after him: there lies the real cause of the ruin of the elder branch; it is not to be sought in any thing else. It began when the septennial ministry placed all in opposition against the monarchy. And what means of resistance to so mighty a movement did that ministry bequeath to its successors? A power which the feeble probity and the vacillating system of the Martignac ministry could neither raise nor strengthen in the eyes of the country."—Capefigue, Histoire de la Restauration, vol. iv. pp. 71, 72.

It sounds rather inconsistent with this view of the conditions which matters had been reduced by the Villèle administration, to hear M. Capefigue declare elsewhere, that even after the dissolution of the Chamber of Deputies by the Polignac ministry, and the re-election of the same hostile majority,

"Every thing was possible with a Martignac ministry; a cabinet guided by the loyal opinions of the Duke of Richelieu might have arranged every thing; M. Pasquier proposed a coalition ministry which would have brought back the defection votes; but nothing of the kind was done; and then nothing remained but to have recourse to extraordinary methods...."—Capefigue, L'Europe depuis l'Avènement du roi Louis-Philippe, vol. i. p. 314.

This assuredly was not the case; the Martignac ministry fell by its intrinsic weakness, by its want of a definite purpose; the system of concession had been tried, tried in vain and exhausted; there remained but one experiment to be made, and that was a return to decidedly monarchical principles; the accession of M. de Polignac to power was that experiment; in his hands and those of Charles X. it could not but fail; still it was a necessary experiment, the only alternative left to the crown in the condition to which the country had been reduced primarily by the ultramontane and royalist extravagances of the Villèle cabinet. But while in justice to Prince Polignac it must be admitted that he succeeded to an impracticable position, it cannot be denied that the difficulties of that position were much aggravated by the very fact of his appointment to the chief power, and by the manner in which he wielded that power. At a moment when the country was in a state of universal irritation and growing excitement, in consequence of a system of hostility on the part of the monarch, and the jesuitical clique by which he was surrounded, against the public rights guaranteed by the charter; when, moreover, a large and powerful party made its jealousy for the charter the pretext of an opposition whose real object it was to place the democratic element in the ascendant, it was surely unwise in the extreme, to select as the first adviser of the crown a man who in the very infancy of the constitutional monarchy had made himself conspicuous, by demurring to take the oath and his seat in the house of peers, on the ground of a decided objection to the terms of the charter. Such an appointment was calculated to create, among those who were sincerely attached to the existing constitution, a suspicion that the charter itself was to be tampered with ; while it afforded to the enemies of the constitution an excellent pretext for those measures of violent opposition, which ended in the overthrow of the monarchy and the triumph of their principles. But if the appointment of Prince Polignac was impolitic, the manner in which he executed the task he had undertaken was, if possible, still more ruinous to the cause of the monarchy. He had to deal with an implacably hostile principle, in opposition to which he meant to assert the divine right of royalty. To carry out this assertion successfully, it was absolutely necessary to strike a blow ; and if a blow was to be struck, it was essential that it should be struck effectually, with such energy and promptness, as would paralyse the opposition, and secure to Charles X. and his minister that dictatorial power of which they stood in need, and which they might possibly have used, as it is evident that Prince Polignac intended to use it, for the regeneration of society. Instead of this, however, the blow was struck in the clumsiest and feeblest manner possible. M. de Polignac boasts that the secret of the fatal ordinances was most scrupulously guarded, so much so, that he excuses the omission of a variety of precautionary measures which the government ought to have taken, by his unwillingness to do any thing which might give the alarm as to the course determined upon by the ministry ; and he makes it a matter of complaint and accusation against the liberal party, that they were in a state of complete organization, ready for resistance, the very moment the ordinances appeared. But although the specific measures comprehended in the ordinances were kept a profound secret, it was notorious, and had been so for a considerable time, that a coup d'état of some sort was in contemplation. Not only was the question of the expediency of a coup d'état, and of its possible results, freely canvassed in the political circles of Paris, but it became the subject of communications from the different European cabinets to the French king and his government. The opposition had therefore abundant notice and time to prepare for the day of conflict, at whatever moment, and upon whatever issue that conflict might take place.

The indiscretions of which Charles X. himself was guilty in this respect almost surpass belief. Even so far back as the close of the Martignac administration, the king had betrayed his arrière-pensée, of having recourse to force of arms, if the following anecdote told by M. Capéfigue may be relied on:—

“The chamber had proved violent and even factious on the occasion of the war budget. M. de Caux (the minister of war) had returned from it sad and thoughtful. ‘Well,’ said the king to M. de Caux, ‘how did you find the chamber?’ In a fit of ill-humour the minister replied, ‘Abominable!’ At these words Charles X. drew M. de Caux aside, and thus addressed him:—‘Well! you admit at last, M. de Caux, that this cannot go on any longer; may I depend on the army?’ and so saying he seized him by both hands. M. de Caux saw that he had committed an imprudence. ‘Sire,’ answered the minister, ‘the question is, for what purpose?’ ‘Unconditionally,’ replied the king. ‘If your majesty were to appeal to the army by pointing to the charter, and in the name of the charter, you would obtain absolute obedience; but apart from the charter, I can assure you, not; and this is how I prove it. I have had a statistical survey of the army drawn up: to say nothing of the non-commissioned officers and the common soldiers, I find that out of twenty thousand officers there are not five hundred who are gentlemen, and not one thousand who have a private income of 600 francs. With such materials, how can you enact the ancien régime?’ ‘The charter, the charter!’ continued the king, ‘who wants to violate that? No doubt it is an imperfect performance! but I shall respect it. As for the army, it has no business with the charter.’—Capéfigue, Histoire de la Restauration, vol. iv. p. 180.

Still more curious, as an indication that coming events were casting their shadows before them, is the conversation which took place some time before the July revolution, at a ball given to the king of Naples by the Duke of Orleans, between the Prince and M. de Salvandy, the account of which, coming from the pen of the latter statesman himself, possesses a more authentic character. M. de Salvandy had, in passing near the Duke, indulged himself in a jeu d’esprit, by observing to him, “This is quite Naples fashion, Monseigneur; we are dancing on a volcano.” Upon this the Duke laid hold of M. de Salvandy’s arm, and the following remarks were exchanged:—

“‘That there is a volcano,’ said his royal highness, ‘I believe with you; it is not, however, my fault; I shall not have to reproach myself that I did not endeavour to open the eyes of the king. . . . But what am I to do? nothing is listened to, and Heaven knows where all this will lead to!’—‘Very far, Monseigneur, I am persuaded.’—‘Certainly,’ replied his royal highness, ‘I do not know what may happen; I cannot tell where they will be six months hence; but I know my well where I shall be. In any event I intend to remain with my family in this palace; to have been driven into exile twice by the faults of other people is quite sufficient; I shall not be caught in the same way again. Whatever danger there may be, I shall not stir from this; I shall not separate my own and my children's destiny from that of my country; such is my fixed determination. I make no secret of my sentiments. Quite recently at Rosny, I have said very freely what I think of it all; and there, the king of Naples, who was with us, has formed a very correct estimate of our position. That prince, who is so broken down, though he is by four years my junior, is a man of great sense; external circumstances compel him to be an absolute king; but his inclinations are not that way, and he made some very judicious observations. A conversation of yours was mentioned at Rosny.'—'Monseigneur, I have said that they are undoing the monarchy; and I am equally convinced that the fall of the throne will compromise, perhaps for a century to come, the prosperity and liberty of France.'—'Regretting as much as you do,' continued the prince, 'the course in which the king is engaging himself, I am not quite as much afraid as you are of the results.' " . . . Capefigue, L'Europe depuis l'Avènement du roi Louis-Philippe, vol. i. pp. 184, 185.

This conversation, in which even the idea of a revolution, in imitation of the English Revolution of 1688, was introduced, shows to what extent the public mind was prepared for the course pursued by Charles X. and his ministers, and for the consequences which it was likely to entail. It was, therefore, childish, in such a state of the public mind, to imagine that secrecy as to the particular ordinances would enable the government to take the public mind by surprise, and give it the advantage of coming down upon its opponents before they had time to prepare themselves for resistance. That an unwillingness to contemplate beforehand scenes of bloodshed, a reluctance to engage in a decisive struggle, had their share in the irresolution displayed by M. de Polignac at the critical moment, and the inefficiency of his measures, there can be no doubt; and we feel that the man deserves to be honoured for much of what in the minister was highly blamable. Still there is a general character of what almost amounts to imbecility in the arrangements made for the execution of the ordinances, which clearly proves, that whatever might be the abilities of M. de Polignac in other respects, he was not destined by nature to be a contriver of coups d'état. At the very outset, the insertion of the ordinances in the Moniteur, without taking, at least simultaneously, steps for securing their immediate execution, was a fatal mistake; and no less so the total ignorance of the intentions of the ministry, in which all the officers of the government were kept, who derived their first knowledge of measures, in the execution of which their hearty and energetic co-operation was required, like the rest of the public, from the announcement in the official journal. Instead of making sure of the persons of those likely to take a leading part in a popular movement, if it had but been by means of an efficient surveillance; instead of making provision for the employment and support of the masses of workmen whom it was in the power of the rich manufacturers to discharge, and thereby to throw in a state of idleness and discontent into the general ferment, it was thought sufficient to have the playbills altered, so as to exclude performances likely to lead to political allusions and applications, and to keep the gates of the Palais Royal closed. The military, instead of being brought to act decisively in a body, were thrown in among the people in small detachments, and had time and opportunity afforded them for fraternizing with the insurgent population, while, at the same time, they were left exposed in the most cruel manner to hunger and thirst, by a total neglect in the victualling department. The subordinate agents, too, were ill chosen and ill directed. The measures of coercion against the journals were tardily and feebly enforced; so much so, that the fate of the kingdom hung for several hours upon the refusal of a journeyman locksmith to execute the orders of the police. The chief of the police of Paris, Prefect Mangin, after writing a few insignificant reports to the minister, made out a passport for himself under a false name, and decamped for Brussels early on the 29th; and Marshal Marmont, to whom the military command was entrusted, negotiated with those against whom it was his duty to have fought. The whole action of the executive was paralyzed at the very moment when it ought to have displayed all its powers with promptitude, energy, and firmness. From this reproach nothing that M. de Polignac alleges in his book can clear him; he planned a counter-revolution, but he had neither the sagacity nor the courage to carry it out; and all that he achieved, therefore, was to provoke to the uttermost the resentments of the liberal party and the populace.

But while historical truth requires this to be stated, it is not to be forgotten that M. de Polignac was forced into the position in which he found himself, by the infatuated old king, towards whom his loyalty knew no bounds; and that while he appears to have intended a speedy return to a regular system of government, looking upon the dictatorship assumed by the ordinances as upon quite a transient measure, he meant all along to confine himself within the strictest limits of legality. On this point he makes a triumphant defence, clearly proving, out of the mouths and by the acts of the opposite party, that the 14th article of the Charter, upon which the ordinances were founded, justified them in a legal point of view. We select, from the passages given by M. de Polignac, two which are remarkable, as coming from two of the ministers of the new dynasty. On the 29th of December, 1830, it appears that M. Guizot, in a speech addressed to the Chamber of Deputies, expressed himself on this point as follows :—

“ When the Charter appeared in 1814, what did the power do? It took care to set down in the preamble the word octroyé, “ granted,” and in the text, the 14th Article, which conferred the right of making ordinances for the safety of the State; that is to say, the power attributed to itself a right anterior to the Charter and independent of it; in other words, a sovereign, constituent, and absolute power.”—Polignac, Études Historiques, p. 338, note.

Still more decided, as to the legality of the ordinances, and the essentially illegal character of the constitutional changes effected by the July revolution, is the language of the Duke de Broglie, in the Chamber of Deputies, on the 5th of January, 1833 :—

“ Thus, in spite of the Charter and the laws, we expelled, in 1830, an irresponsible sovereign; and afterwards we banished for ever the members of his family and all their descendants, without having any legal grievance to allege against them; thus we impeached the ministers of Charles X. without authority, and, in the absence of any law, we made one expressly to meet their case, and gave it a retrospective effect.”—Ibid, p. 339, note.

The most conclusive, however, of all the proofs of the legality of the ordinances, is the fact, that in the revision of the Charter, previous to the accession of Louis-Philippe, the 14th article was actually expunged, on the ground of its leaving in the hands of the crown a power dangerous to the public liberties. M. de Polignac is, therefore, perfectly justified in asserting that it was not a violation of the Charter which cost Charles X. his crown, and endangered the heads of his ministers; they did what it was “ lawful ” for them to do; but assuredly they also did that which was not “ expedient.” Whether by other hands and other methods the crisis could have been avoided, is altogether a different question; nay, it seems doubtful whether, even if the royal cause had triumphed during the memorable days of July, it would have been possible to have carried on the government of a country in which principles so essentially hostile to the church and the monarchy had taken such deep root, and risen to such a fearful height of political influence, even in the higher, and especially in the wealthier classes of society. M. de Polignac himself seems to think, that the most complete success in putting down the riots which ended in revolution, would have left the country in an embarrassing and problematic position; and the whole of his argument goes to show, that sooner or later a conflict between the principle of divine right in Church and State, and the principle of religious neutrality and popular sovereignty, in other words, of infidelity and anarchy, must inevitably have ensued. The origin of this principle he traces back to Luther, Zwingli, Calvin, and the other leaders of the Reformation, whose advocacy of the right of private judgment was, in his opinion, the first fatal blow inflicted upon the recognition of divine authority either in religion or in politics. He sums up in a kind of pedigree the connexion in which he places the Reformation of the sixteenth century with the revolutionary and atheistical excesses of the eighteenth, inserting between the two, as the intermediate link, the scepticism and indifferentism of the seventeenth century. Of the character of the philosophical school which rose about the middle of the last century, M. de Polignac draws a powerful and, unhappily, not an exaggerated picture:—

“Nothing is more easy of proof than the conspiracy of the philosophism of the eighteenth century against the Catholic religion. Its end and its means have been disclosed to us by its disciples. Three of these may in some sort be considered as personifications of different parts of a system adopted by them all. Jean-Jacques Rousseau, by his insidious doubts, his false, vague, and contradictory reasonings, seems to have made it his business to demonstrate the incapacity of the human heart to believe in the truths of the Catholic religion; and, this incapacity being once acknowledged, faith became naturally extinct; a negative cannot form the basis of any religious belief. Voltaire, taking off the mask, attacks religion as a whole and in its details, he persecutes it with his scoffings, pursues it with his slanders, and in his satanic rage pours forth upon it, for want of argument, the gall of ridicule. Lastly, Diderot, more impetuous than the other two, sounding withal the note of victory before the end of the combat, sums up together the consequences of the philosophical system, of which he is the Séide, and preaches materialism, which he represents as the sublimation of human reason; but he was several years in advance of the events of his age; his voice, more prophetic than those of his friends, was not at first listened to with the same favour. And how indeed was it possible that in an intelligent nation that wretched axiom, the sum of all the philosophical principles of the fiery encyclopædist, could find acceptance, that “between man and his dog dress makes the only difference”?” Besides, Diderot was mistaken. When man degrades himself so far as to sink into materialism, it is not the peaceful instinct of the animal, which is the symbol of fidelity, that guides him; the rage of the tiger devours his soul. Proofs of this assertion will not be wanting.

“ If the hatred of this impious sect was in appearance directed chiefly against the Catholic religion, the reason is, that it well knew that the downfall of that religion, had it been possible, must have drawn after it the overthrow of every other religion; but notwithstanding the feigned patronage which the philosophers condescended to bestow, on certain occasions, on the Protestant doctrines, they were not in fact less the enemies of Protestantism than of Catholicism. All authority, of whatever kind, every check imposed upon the passions of man was hateful to them; whether the authority were religious, moral, or political, their object was to annihilate it altogether. We have only to listen to their principal adepts; they will inform us of the sentiments and projects of their sect.

“ These regenerators of society will teach us, in matters of religion, that the immortality of the soul is ‘ a mere barbarous and pernicious dogma, which leads to despair, and is incompatible with all legislation; ’ that the soul is ‘ not a being distinct from the body; ’ that the God of the Jews and Christians is nothing more than a chimera and a phantom; that they are tired of being told that twelve men were sufficient to establish Christianity, and that they mean to prove that one is sufficient to destroy it; having further in their impiety designated the Saviour of the world by the term l’infâme, they will be found encouraging each other in crushing l’infâme, rejoicing together over the contempt into which, as they say, l’infâme has fallen with all respectable people throughout Europe, and congratulating themselves on the speedy advent of the time, when cobblers, servant-girls and the canaille will be the only people that will still believe in the religion of Christ.

“ In point of morality they will teach us, that the ideas of justice and injustice, of virtue and vice, of glory and infamy, are purely arbitrary, and dependent on habit; that self-interest is the only and universal test of the merit of men’s actions; that the law which condemns married persons to live together after they have ceased to love each other, is a barbarous and cruel law; that the command laid upon children to love their parents, is a matter of education rather than of nature; that remorse is nothing more than the anticipation of the physical pains to which crime exposes us, and that a man who is above the law, commits without repentance the dishonest action which is useful to him.

“ Furthermore, with a view to overturn the order of society established in Europe, they will teach us, that the true monarchy is nothing more than a constitution invented for the purpose of corrupting the morals of the people and enslaving them; that if the authority of kings comes from God, it is in the same way as the diseases and plagues which afflict human kind; that kings are the chief hangmen of their subjects; that force and stupidity are the only origin of their thrones. One of them, apostrophising the kings, is heard to exclaim; ‘ You tigers, deified by other tigers, do you really think that you shall attain unto immortality ? And lastly, another indulges himself with a public expression of the wish 'to see the last of kings strangled with the entrails of the last of priests.'"—Polignac, Études Historiques, pp. 46—49.

All this mass of blasphemy, immorality, and rebellion, M. de Polignac shows, in a note in the appendix, to be faithfully compiled from the original writings of the philosophers themselves; and very justly argues that the sanguinary and brutal scenes of the French revolution were nothing more than the practical exemplification of those horrible doctrines. But M. de Polignac loses sight of an important fact, which it is not likely that he would notice, but which must be kept in view, in order to form a correct estimate of the primary causes which led ultimately to results so deplorable. He attributes, as we have seen, the rise of this vile and infidel philosophy to the Reformation; and on this point we differ from him toto cælo. We are not at all disposed to underrate the mischief which the principle of private judgment, asserted by some of the foreign reformers in all its crudity and arrogance, has caused in weakening men's faith in, and submission to, God's word and ordinance. We are aware that that principle, so asserted, leads of necessity to schism, and experience has abundantly proved, that schism, if it does not begin, invariably ends in heresy and unbelief. Yet even for this mischief we hold the Church of Rome to be responsible in the last instance, because it was she who by her corruptions, and her pertinacity in adhering to them, provoked the excesses into which the spirit of the Reformation, essentially a religious and a holy spirit, was betrayed. But in a far more direct manner do we hold the Church of Rome chargeable with the blasphemies and abominations which M. de Polignac has so forcibly condensed. It was not from Protestant communions, not from Protestant seats of learning, that the race of infidel philosophers sprang: they issued from the bosom of the Romish Church; the very chiefest among them was the disciple of the Jesuits, brought up in their learning and morality. And no wonder that the boundaries which divide right and wrong had no sanctity in his eyes. We have only to scan the moral theology of the Jesuits, and we shall find there, along with the infamous doctrine of probable opinions, the seed and the justification of all the enormities of which the philosophers of the eighteenth century were guilty in matters of religion, of morality, and of social order³. All the landmarks of the divine law, whether revealed or written in the heart, and all the foundations of faith in the truth of God's word, had long been removed by the presumptuous substitution of the alleged infallible authority of the Church of Rome, for the external historical evidences of Christianity, and its internal spiritual sanctions; and of the arbitrary decisions of the casuists pronounced in "the tribunal of penance," for the eternal principles of truth and holiness proclaimed by God himself in his holy word. The Romish Church had in the sixteenth century refused to be reformed; she had opposed to the remonstrances and the entreaties of those who could no longer brook her corruptions, nor hide under a bushel the light of God's truth which had broken in upon them, the deliberate affirmation of all the false principles on which her system was based, in the decrees of the Council of Trent, and the systematic endeavour to give to those principles a practical ascendancy in the affairs of Europe, by the establishment of the Jesuit Order. She was now in the eighteenth century made to eat the bitter "fruit of her own way;" she who had "despised all reproof," was now "filled with her own devices."

And as the solemn lesson of the sixteenth, so has the terrible lesson of the eighteenth century been lost upon her. No sooner has she regained her footing in the land laid desolate by the iniquity that had issued forth from her, than she exhibits her determination to resume the position formerly occupied, and to renew the pretensions formerly advanced, by her. She has passed through the discipline of affliction, but she has not been exercised by it; she has received no correction. When in the train of the combined armies of Europe Louis XVIII. returned twice to the throne of his ancestors, under the ægis of the Holy Alliance, that mystical league of crowned heads in defence of the divine right of kings, the restored sovereign felt that the stability of his throne and the success of the royal mission entrusted to his hands by the providence of God, depended on his accommodating himself, as far as was consistent with right principles and with his own dignity, to the altered spirit of the times, and to the wayward humour of a generation cradled in anarchy and reared amidst the din of arms. But he was not permitted to follow in peace and unmolested that course of conciliation, which alone could render the application of remedial measures for the healing of the wounds of the nation possible. He was surrounded, and by public opposition, by private remonstrance, and by the dexterous management of his personal foibles, drawn in spite of himself into a line of policy, the fatal results of which he foresaw and deplored. So sensible was he of the violence done to his own principles of government, that when the line of policy advocated by his brother was permanently forced upon him, he considered himself to have virtually abdicated the throne in his favour.

The reign of Charles X., therefore, virtually began at the identical period which M. Capefigue points out as the commencement of his ruin ; the formation of the Villèle ministry at the close of the year 1821. For more than eight years, with the short intermission of the Martignac ministry, which had recourse, when it was too late, to conciliatory methods, and thereby aggravated the difficulties in which it had found the country, did the congregationist party try the patience of a highly inflammable people, which had sucked hatred to the principles of that party with its mother's milk, under the auspices of a prince, who with many qualities that would have adorned his character in a private station, combined that superstitious tone of mind, and that invincible obstinacy, which constitute the bigot. That he was, as has been confidently stated, regularly affiliated to the Jesuit order, is perhaps improbable ; but that the system which he pursued was the system of that order, and that he pursued it not so much under the pressure of external influence, as by the impulse of a strong personal conviction, is indisputable. The character which this gave to the entire government of Charles X., is well described by M. Capefigue, whose testimony on this point may the more be relied on, as he is a decided partisan of the Romish Church, and an advocate, within certain limits, for her political ascendancy :—

“ Two causes principally contributed to the ruin of the crown ; in the first place, the clumsily organized supremacy which it was intended to give to the clergy, and the incomplete and mongrel attempts to re-establish an aristocracy ; in the second place, the pertinacity of Charles X. in retaining his ministry and the septennial chamber. The royal piety increased with advancing years ; a time arrives when the fear of death seizes and dominates a weak soul ; one has only to imagine clever and ambitious men turning to account this dread of a future life of torment and of anguish, bringing it face to face with some aberrations and follies of youth, and it is easy to understand how an ardent imagination may be carried away by the practices of religion, that sure refuge from the storms of life. I shall not repeat ignoble calumnies, and the rumours of sacred initiation and affiliation to the Jesuits, those lies which at a later period were reproduced in caricatures. Charles X. had a lively faith, a generous belief ; he lost himself, but he was not a hypocrite⁴. I have already said what the congregation was : at the accession of Charles X. it developed itself on a larger scale, attaching itself to the court and the ministry ; it was to be found in the council of state and in the privy council ; it secured for itself a special minister ; the Bishop of Hermopolis took the portfolio of worship, and although notions of gallicanism occasionally balanced the convictions of the prelate, his tendency was altogether favourable to the interests and opinions of the religious party. It will not be expected of me that I should pick up the thousand and one fooleries which have been hawked about France on the subject of the Jesuits ; filthy pamphlets were published ; every thing comes aright to the parties, provided they attain their purposes ; I leave in the dirt all those ' confessions ' and ' revelations ' which were put forth ; the factious need a bugbear ; the Jesuits were flung down to the people ; they were not only men of intelligence, activity and ardour, who obtained the mastery over society and over a royalty which they were about to bring to destruction, but in the eyes of the parties they were perverse men, and monsters in the category of human feeling. What then were these Jesuits, their statutes, their habits, their influence ? What mysterious and mighty influence did they exercise over the government ? A few fragments of the Jesuit order had united themselves together in France under the name Pères de la Foi. When Napoleon rebuilt the altars, their statutes, being reproduced from the ancient constitutions of the proscribed order, were denounced to the ministry of worship ; an order of M. Portalis decreed the dissolution of their establishment. All hope, however, was not lost ; the ingenious spirit of the Jesuits invented a thousand resources. Under the protection of Cardinal Fesch and of several bishops, they penetrated into the high saloons of the aristocracy and of the empire, as well as into the palaces of the old opposition of M. de Staël. At the restoration their position was changed ; the piety of Louis XVIII. was not profound enough to induce him to give effectual protection to the order of St. Ignatius ; nevertheless the royal ordinance which exempted the petits séminaires from the laws of the university, favoured the domination of the Pères de la Foi over the entire system of public education ; they had houses at Dôle, at Bordeaux, at Sainte-Anne-d'Auray, at Montmorillon, at Aix, at Forcalquier, at Vitry, under the central direction of Mont-Rouge and Saint-Acheul. Their strength consisted chiefly in that hierarchy of affiliation, by virtue of which they had protectors and supporters every where. The clever and powerful founder of this institution had in a manner called upon the whole human race to second the congregation which he had established. Under the vulgar name of jésuites à robe courte any layman could be admitted to take a part in the life and the spirit of the society. I cannot tell how many noble lords and distinguished men were affiliated to the Jesuits : it has been affirmed in some pamphlets of Charles X. himself. I believe that he who once was the noble and graceful Comte d'Artois, might have given, at the deathbed of a former mistress, a chivalrous promise to return to religious principles and ardent faith ; but between this repentance of the follies of youth, and an affiliation to the Jesuit order, a sort of donning of the religious habit, there was a distinction which the parties were unwilling to make. It is true, however, that all who surrounded the king, his most pious servants, the Duke of Montmorency, the Marquis of Rivière, that host of bishops and priests who supported his throne, rendered admirable service to the institute of the Jesuits. All worked together to extend its ramifications; not only all the children of the court and of the highest families, but all the sons of public functionaries, and all who looked for advancement, were sent to be educated by the Jesuits; for as soon as it was ascertained that the Jesuits exercised an influence over the government, they were adored as favourites. Around this aggregation others formed themselves, which were real emanations from it, and served as complements to it. The young men who did not become professed members of the society, formed themselves, on leaving the Jesuit schools, into affiliated associations for sound studies under the pious direction of M. de Montmorency; at a more advanced age they were recommended to associations for sound literature; they were incorporated in the immense association for the propagation of the faith, a kind of congregation in which the poor and the rich alike contributed at the low rate of five centimes a week. Workmen had the offer of entering the affiliated association of St. Joseph. The prisons also had a congregation of their own. All this was connected together and kept in admirable order. Nevertheless, I must not fail to mention, the society of Jesuits had lost that high character of civilization and intelligence which had formerly called it to such high destinies. One of the principal causes which had contributed to enlarge the circle of its conquests, was their indisputably high state of education, their scientific superiority over all then existing institutions; an elevation to which the modern Jesuits were far from having attained. Still St. Acheul and Mont-Rouge more especially were visited by the most purely devout portion of the court; they went thither for religious retreats, for seuaines, for recreations without number; there the fathers and the young novices were often seen around a rich billiard playing against noble antagonists, knights of the orders, or peers of the realm. Their protégés were every where; their affiliation extended to every branch of the government. The episcopate protected their order; the minister of ecclesiastical affairs, M. Frayssinous, lived with them almost on a footing of commensality; he used to go for retreats to Mont-Rouge. At court the Great Almonry was wholly theirs; M. de Latil favoured them openly. The friend and intimate confidant of royalty, M. de Latil had rapidly risen from an obscure position to the dignity of cardinal and the archbishopric of Reims. He was one of those prelates of ardent spirit destined to play a part in the great world, who in other times had troubled both the State and the Church. The chaplains of Princes, gentlemen such as MM. de Montmorency, de Blacas, de Rivière, loved the institute of the Jesuits; they would have looked upon the day of their public and avowed restoration as upon a great epoch in the annals of the monarchy: the sons of St. Ignatius had likewise brought under their influence the woman who governed Louis XVIII., in order to have the mastery over the mind of the old monarch. In every ministerial department the Jesuits had placed one of their friends: near the president of the council they had M. de Renneville, a young man who filled an important official department, but who at the same time never failed to attend to any recommendation from the chiefs of the religious association; at the ministry of the interior they had M. Franchet; at the police, M. Delavau; in the royal household, M. de Doudeauville; at the foreign office, M. de Damas; at the post-office, M. de Vaulchier; and by these means all was connected together, and the government offices were peopled with their creatures. With singular tact they never lost sight of each other throughout life; the superiors kept their eyes upon every one, even the humblest of their pupils; they assembled them together on the great annual solemnities, never ceasing to mould them to their common purpose. Several members of the Chamber of Peers were affiliated members of the holy order; in the Chamber of Deputies the order had the majority. An invisible hand directed all these wires, and dictated to the government the views it should adopt and the political course it should follow. Hence all those projects and measures derived from one common inspiration, which carried France out of the orbit of her national character, and suffered not her indifference to be at rest. I consider this secret action as one of the great causes of the downfall of the dynasty, not only by reason of what it actually effected, but by reason of the suspicions to which it gave rise. It became the stalking-horse for every species of accusation against the kingly power; the Jesuits were laid hold of for the purpose of making the government unpopular, they were made the objects of attack, with a view to disguise the blows aimed at the monarchy."—Capefigue, Histoire de la Restauration, vol. iii. pp. 364—368.

The origin of this fatal influence reaches high up in the history of the restoration; the machinations, of which the Pavillon Marsan formed the head-quarters, and which as early as 1818 assumed the audacious character of a conspiracy having for its object to obtain the abdication of Louis XVIII., were followed up with all the wiliness and perseverance which at all times have characterised the movements of the Jesuits. They overcame, after many ineffectual struggles, the better judgment and sounder principles of the elder Bourbon; and when his death placed the pupil of the Jesuits on the throne, the mask was prematurely thrown off in a moment of unguarded exultation. It was then that the various projects, which had been adjourned from time to time, for restoring to the clergy generally, and to the monastic orders in particular, and among them especially to the Jesuits, their ancient powers and privileges, were pressed forward; it was then that it was proposed to remove every remaining restriction (for much had already been done in this direction) by which the power of receiving bequests, especially death-bed bequests for religious foundations, was circumscribed; then that attempts were made to crush the freedom of religious discussion, by making attacks upon the religion of the state a high crime and misdemeanour; then that the persecuting spirit of the Romish Church was again exhibited in all its blood-thirsty hideousness, extorting from the king's government a project of law in which desecration of the holy vessels was made a capital offence, and the horrible punishment of the parricide decreed against him who should lay sacrilegious hands upon a consecrated wafer! It was then that a peer of France proposed to substitute for the black veil in which the face of criminals is enveloped when they are led out to execution, in the case of persons condemned to death for sacrilege, a red veil, with a view to give to the religion of Christ an additional sanction in the hearts of the people; then that the bench of bishops, unwilling that their votes should be lost for the support of this sanguinary measure, declared that, contrary to the ancient maxim, Clerici ne intersint vindictæ sanguinis, they would give their opinions and their suffrages, alleging that the question was not as to the application, but only as to the enactment of a law affecting human life; then that one of their number, Cardinal Bonald, horrified the Chamber by opposing to the remark of M. de Chateaubriand, that the character of the Christian religion was to pardon rather than to punish, the merciless reply: "If the good owe their life to society by way of service, the wicked owe it by way of example. A former speaker has observed that religion enjoins upon man the duty of forgiveness; but at the same time it enjoins upon the power the duty of punishing; for, says the Apostle, 'he beareth not the sword in vain.' The Saviour prayed for forgiveness for his murderers, but his Father heard Him not; nay, He extended the punishment upon an entire nation. As for sacrilege, by a sentence of death you remit it to its natural judge."

Such were the indications which the Church party gave of the spirit by which they were animated, when they imagined that the power had completely passed into their hands. A people sincerely attached to the principles of the Christian faith might by such exhibitions have been goaded into a reaction; how much more a nation which had scarcely emerged from the public profession of infidelity, the vast majority of which could see nothing but the mummeries of priestcraft in the ceremonies, for the protection of which the bloody axe of the guillotine was so clamorously invoked. But while a review of the pretensions and proceedings of the Congregationist or Jesuit party makes it evident that a reaction must have been the inevitable consequence of their senseless and wicked conduct, it is no less evident, on the other hand, that the spirit from which that reaction proceeded, is a spirit essentially evil, a spirit which, as it gives not to God the honour due unto his name, never can bring down a blessing upon human society. And to this side of the picture we must now turn, if we would obtain a correct view of the deplorable condition of France, given up to the conflicting influence of two evil and destructive principles, while in the place where truth ought to stand with healing in her wings, there is nothing but a miserable void. For this purpose we turn back again to the work of M. de Polignac, who after reviewing the different aspects under which France has exhibited herself at the different phases of her history since the revolution of 1789, in a series of spirited sketches⁵, sums up in the concluding chapter his judgment of her present political and social condition.

“‘If,’ he says, ‘we cast our eyes upon the country as a whole, we see a perpetually restless and diseased society, given up to a few empiricks, who consult it without listening to it, and prescribe for it without knowing or examining its ailment; every one individually sets himself up as supreme judge of the actions of others, and appeals to a sovereign will which is continually invoked and nowhere to be found; the electoral colleges carry the sceptre, the elective Chamber wears the crown, every thing is made to rest on the nation; the electors beget the deputies, and the deputies the laws, and the king-people, indignant to see its sovereign power concentrated in the hands of an exceedingly small number of its own subjects, rises every now and then to vindicate its injured rights, on which occasions it issues its decrees in the public streets by means of barricades, paving-stones, daggers and gunshots. This conflict of incongruous interests and rights creates in the nation a state of secret and constant perturbation, which renders it always dissatisfied with the present, and often careless of the future which it does not yet foresee or comprehend; on falling back upon itself, it finds within itself only individualities, whom no social tie links together for any common purpose; every where isolation reigns, and, following quickly in its wake, selfishness, rendered more intense by the religious eclecticism which the heads of the instructing body are propounding; and in consequence of this we see, in the moving panorama which this nation presents, opinions, wishes, interests, fears and hopes continually crossing, thwarting and opposing each other, often without motive and without result. The friend of to-day becomes to-morrow an enemy, and vice versa the fist that strikes to-day, is to-morrow extended as a friendly hand; the faces change their masks, the characters are inverted, the legitimists become liberals, and they in their turn cry up the restoration; it seems as if the entire population was thrown into a state of movement and agitation by the shaking of the fool's bell.

“But, it may be said, France presented nearly the same moral aspect under the restoration. I am very much disposed to admit this; and the consequence was, that the restoration did not last long; yet withal we must not forget that the elements of disorder were not then altogether the same. The dissolvent principle of the sovereignty of the people was not then the constituent basis of our society; the disorganising action of that principle was gradually introduced into it by its followers; it was then that the struggle began; some imprudent friends of the throne, seduced by brilliant theories, the consequences of which escaped their notice, aided, unknown to them, the triumph of the hostile principle; the monarchy succumbed. Now that principle is victorious, it is in the ascendant: it is acknowledged as the foundation stone of the institutions which rule the country; its rights are secured; in vain it is attempted to paralyze its action; it is always able to regain its strength and its ascendancy, but on condition of keeping society in a state of perpetual commotion; because rest is death to it.”—Polignac, Études Historiques, pp. 366—368.

But by far the most interesting part of the observations of

M. de Polignac on the present condition of France, is the view which he takes of the existing system of public education.

“ It makes one’s heart ache to see poor France given up into the hands of sceptical sophists, who are witty upon every subject, and do not show common sense in any thing. By the permission of Providence, the discussion of a question relative to public instruction has brought their evil will and their secret tendencies to light. Henceforth, at all events, the heads of families and the moral and religious part of the country must consider that they have had sufficient warning ; for our new philosophers have abundantly revealed their arrière-pensée. According to them the antiquity of the Church of France, which counts its centuries, is to render homage to the forty years’ existence of the present university, which alone comprehends the method of education suitable for the young ; a method which consists, as far as politics are concerned, in not considering the first revolution as a long continued crime, nor Bonaparte as an usurper overthrown by his own fault ; and as regards morals and religion, in respecting in the child the liberty of conscience ; whence it follows that you must let him wander about without guide, without advice, among all sorts of religious creeds, and all the ancient and modern systems of morals, from those of Epicurus and Plato to those of Locke and Spinoza, with which it is absolutely necessary that he should be made acquainted ; leaving him at a subsequent period to discriminate between error and truth, to choose whatever belief or system he likes, or, if it should so please him, to adopt none at all ; for which reason also the instruction in philosophy which gives a clear and distinct knowledge of natural and divine subjects, is to be left without control in the hands of that infallible university. That university affects surprise that the ministers of the living God, appointed by Him for teaching successive generations all moral and religious truth, should take offence at the erroneous and impious principles which the teachers of the university school seek to inculcate into the hearts of the young men. What right, indeed, has any one to doubt the moral and religious orthodoxy of these teachers, considering that several of them, with the approbation of their superiors, hesitate not to proclaim by word of mouth and in writing, that ‘ the question as to the existence of the soul is premature ;’ that ‘ Christianity has become extinct, and is nothing more but dust or a tomb,’ that the pretended divine revelations are ‘ nothing but human conjectures ;’ that the theology which suited formerly, is ‘ nowadays fit only for children ;’ that ‘ religion is the work of men,’ and other like doctrines. Our modern philosophers, with a view to give to their darling work a greater authority, pretend to revive the rights of the ancient French universities of the time of the monarchy ; but they purposely forget to mention, that at that period no other than Catholic teaching obtained in public instruction ; a professor who should have departed from it, would have been turned away in disgrace ; the discussion respecting the privilege of conferring degrees, attributed to the universities, was then quite a secondary question. It is really amusing to see, moreover, what pains these same philosophers take to place their university establishment under the patronage of the supposed virtues which they ascribe to its founder Bonaparte, who, a Turk in Egypt, and in Europe the jailor of the sovereign Pontiff, had considered the restoration of public worship merely as a political engine, and the colleges which he established, only as nurseries for training up citizens to the profession of arms ; and yet they have expunged by their own mere authority one of the fundamental articles of the institution which they patronize ; the article which laid down the precepts of the Catholic religion as the basis of the instruction to be imparted in the university. No doubt they prefer the teaching of a moral and religious eclecticism, or even of pantheism, for, as they say, liberty of conscience is, above all, to be respected in the child.

“What is the result? The child grown up to be a young man, accustomed to decide all the grave questions of morality and religion according to his tastes and his unbridled inclinations, reserves to himself very properly the same independence when the decision turns upon questions of politics and government, which are much less important than the former. Thence arise naturally conflicts of opinions, of wills, of rights, and, in a very short time, social disorder. What indeed are human laws in the eyes of those who trample the laws of God under foot? Thus is immorality of life engendered by immorality of teaching ; and what immorality of teaching can be greater than that of not daring to condemn moral and religious error in the presence of youth ?

“We have only to cast our eye upon the present state of France, in order to ascertain the depth of the evil which such a system of instruction has at last introduced even into the less enlightened classes of the population ; there irreligion calls forth the corruption of morals, and begets oblivion of the first social duties. Accordingly the number of crimes increases daily ; cases of theft, assassination, poisoning, are multiplied at a frightful rate ; and justice itself has lately been constrained to avow that, within the space of no more than ten years, society had been horror-struck by ninety-five parricides. In addition to these excesses, against which the French Criminal Code cannot prove otherwise than impotent, there is an extravagance of another kind, but of not less guilty a character, the disgust of life carried out into suicide ; never was self-murder more frequent in France than it is at present. Debauchery thinks to find in it a refuge from shame ; misfortune, an end to its suffering ; ennui, an oblivion of every thing in the abyss of annihilation ; even the veriest children sometimes endeavour to get rid of an existence which they find already too long. Life, in truth, is often no more than a heavy burden to him who concentrates in it all his hopes.”
—Polignac, Études Historiques, pp. 376—380.

Lest it should be supposed that the picture here drawn by Prince Polignac, of the demoralization of the rising generations of France, is exaggerated, we place side by side with it an extract from the account which M. Capefigue gives of the state of society within six years of the July Revolution, the latest period to which his work reaches down.

“At no period had there been more frequent attempts at self-destruction; and those who abandoned life in cold blood, in order to explore the strange mysteries of death, were not men of mature age, whose years had been steeped in fruitless pleasures or bitter delusions; they were, for the most part, young men, and especially young girls; every morning the journals announced five or six suicides; here lovers, scarcely emerged from childhood, locked in each other’s arms, sought a common grave in the waves, and their bodies were recognized a few miles lower down; there they flung themselves down upon the pavement from a roof, or from some high tower; or they opened their veins like the ancients; or they had recourse to suffocation by charcoal, that death-sleep into death. Suicide was especially common among frail creatures between the ages of seventeen and twenty-one; sometimes even children attempted their life with a feeble and trembling hand. Whence arose all this disgust, this disenchantment of life? From the absence of all spiritual ideas, from that materialistic system of doubt and sensuality, which, destroying the tints by which the illusions of life are coloured, made life appear like a bottomless abyss and a causeless result. There was no remedy for this disgust, no means of arresting the ennui of souls blighted by void and despair. The character of the new generation had been fashioned under the influence of plays and novels written against the regular state of the family and of society; boundless ambitions exhausted themselves at the first start; all was to be enjoyed hastily before plunging into annihilation. There was a zest and a pleasure in raising the cup to the lips and draining it at one draught. The “worm which dieth not” was every where, in the depth of the heart and under the fresh outside of earth’s fairest fruit; the imagination having presented to it so many pictures of exhausted vice, of darkened existence, of asphyxy, poison, assassination, had grown familiar with the tomb, in the eyes of some the end of every ill. Youth stands in need of faith for its preservation; if at its commencement life is without illusions, what has it left? nothing but a melancholy disgust, whence it seeks to penetrate the riddle of the tomb.” — Capefigue, L’Europe depuis l’Avènement du roi Louis-Philippe, vol. viii. pp. 260—262.

The close juxtaposition, not to say identification of “faith” and “illusion,” in this passage, is not calculated to inspire us with much confidence in that system of religious belief which the author professes, and which is proposed by him and others as the panacea for the moral disease which he so eloquently describes. But we must not digress. M. Capefigue goes on to illustrate his general statement by the particular circumstances of two cases, celebrated in the annals of French criminal jurisprudence, those of La Roncière and Lacenaire, and after tracing their connexion with the literature and the materialistic theories of the day, he thus proceeds:—

“ In this way was society delivered up to the sophists, as in the days of the deep decay of the Roman empire. Its pleasures, its amusements, its festivities savoured not a little of this absence of moral principle; the world was moving in the extremes of sensuality. The whole of this period is marked by open adulteries, by outrages upon the public morals, by the bestial condition of the lower classes; among whom there were scarcely any marriages, but cohabitation under the same roof, incest, worn out libertinism. According to statistical data which may be depended upon, the number of illegitimate children at Paris, equals that of children born in wedlock; the superabundance of vice overflows on all sides, and, as it were by way of compensation, one half of those who die, take shelter in the hospital during their last illness.”—Capefigue, l'Europe depuis l'Avènement du roi Louis-Philippe. vol. viii. pp. 264, 265.

Having thus corroborated the testimony of M. de Polignac by that of a historian less liable to the suspicion of hostility against the existing state of things, we now resume the thread of the Prince's reflections at the point where we interrupted them:—

“ When one beholds such scenes of depravity carried to such an excess in the heart of the society of France, one is indeed struck dumb with astonishment to hear one of the coryphées of the eclecticism of the university (M. Cousin) proclaim aloud, that it is the business of society to interfere in education, and to fashion it, as it were, after its own image. Is that erudite philosopher really ignorant that education is never to be moulded upon the image of any society? for every society is nothing more than an aggregate of men, and every man is by nature the slave of his passions; while, on the contrary, the object of education is to teach man to struggle against his inordinate affections, and not to listen and to yield to them.

“ At the sight of so monstrous a deviation from the laws enjoined by simple prudence, and from the first notions to which a knowledge of man's frailty leads, can it be a matter of surprise that the Church of France, afflicted and alarmed by the scandals likely to arise from it, should lift up her voice and endeavour to avert the evil which she foresees? Has she then no longer the mission of separating the chaff from the wheat, and of teaching those eternal truths of which she alone is the faithful depository? Is the faith of her people no longer committed to her, and is it not her first duty to enlighten and to sustain that faith, by preserving it from the snares of falsehood and seduction? No doubt she has no other weapon than the word; but that word ought to be authoritative, powerful, instant, for, in matters of moral and religious instruction, it is the echo of the word of God.”—Polignac, Annales Historiques, pp. 380, 381.

This eloquent appeal which M. de Polignac makes on behalf of the Church of France, a Church unhappily disqualified by her impregnation with popish corruptions for answering the call which the present state of society in that country makes upon her, and to fulfil the high destinies of a Christian Church placed among a godless people,—that same appeal we make on behalf of the Catholic Church of England. The same tendency to moral and social disorganization is corroding the vitals of our people. The same symptoms are developing themselves, though as yet in a less acute degree. Religious indifferentism, the fruit with us not only of the wide diffusion of an infidel philosophy under the garb of “useful knowledge,” but of the interminable gainsayings of a prolific sectarianism, is at the root of the disease under which the social system labours. The deadening effect which it produces upon the vital powers of the soul, is aggravated by the practical materialism of the age; a materialism far more ignoble than the theoretical materialism of speculative philosophy, because, while this refines upon abstruse questions from an unwillingness to believe in the reality of any thing but matter, the other—the practical materialism—debases the mind by teaching it to value and to love nothing but what is material, of the earth, earthy. Hence the utilitarian spirit of our social theories, the utilitarian character of our entire system of government and legislation; hence the reckless competition, the fraudulent trading, the gambling speculation, the jobbing corruption, the sordid love of pelf and the heartless selfishness, which pervade all classes of society, and set upon every occupation and every rank of life the base stamp of Mammon service. Hence, again, the gradual decay of the deeper and more ennobling studies, and the prostitution of literature, which, forgetful of her high origin, and lost to a sense of her own dignity, panders to a depraved taste, rendered daily more vicious by its influence. Minds of a loftier stamp, which cannot descend to the mercenary methods on which success in the race of life has become dependent, are ground between the upper and nether millstone of necessity and anxious care, while a public which has neither time for thought nor taste for food of a more solid or a more refined description, bestows its literary patronage on minds which make merchandize of their gifts in a host of ephemeral productions, whose only object is to divert the mind, and to beguile the hours of dull exhaustion which succeed the unhealthy excitement of an overstrained existence. And while this canker of moral and intellectual depravation is eating daily deeper into the national mind and character among the higher and middle classes, the lower classes of the population are living in a state of civilized helotism, forced to toil beyond measure for their daily subsistence, cut off from the means and opportunities of innocent and rational recreation, driven to drown the sense of their miserable existence in the stupefaction of animal indulgence, seasoned on the holy day of rest by the weekly supply of an infamous journalism, which fills their imagination with hatred and contempt for their rulers and teachers, and with images of cruelty and profligacy, taken from the melancholy annals of vice and crime. And while such is the wretched and hopeless condition of the parents, their children are growing up amidst ignorance and squalor, untaught, undisciplined, unblest, baptized but not christianized; the immoral example before their eyes, and the instinct of vice within their hearts, adding year after year to the impure and enervated multitude whose existence is brought under the notice of society only by the penal inflictions of the law, and by the, alas! too impotent voice of philanthropy; and all the while the action of the Church, the only power that can rescue and heal amidst such causes of moral degeneracy and spiritual perdition, is kept in abeyance, or nearly so, by the opposition of the principle of godless education, in accordance with the godless character of the age.

When, then, will the Church—by which term we understand not her clergy only, but her clergy and laity together—arise to assert her position as the instructress of the nation, her right to train, in the way he should go, every child which parental authority does not individually and expressly claim for the separate folds of popery and dissent? When will she rise to the height of her destiny, and oppose to the fearful and daily increasing invasion of infidelity, of error and superstition, that power of truth and love which the true Church of Christ alone can wield? When will she, laying aside the crotchets of antiquarian pedantry, the dulness of an erastian conservatism, and the treacherous dependence on wealth or political influence, lay hold on the national mind and heart of England, and with a tender sympathy for the sorrows of each individual heart, and a godly zeal for the salvation of each individual sinner, confound the shallowness and selfishness of the age by deep thought and generous feeling, such as the truth of Christ and his holy love can alone beget in the heart of man!

WITHIN the last year we have had two new biographies of Becket¹. We might have looked for a third; but the Littlemore Myths have come to an untimely end; the authorities of the communion to which the writers have joined themselves being, it would seem, by no means desirous that such productions should go forth to the world as from their own body, however willing they may have formerly been to welcome them as the testimonies of aliens. We must, consequently, be content to draw our information from less poetical sources.

It cannot be said that either of the late biographies is any great addition to our means of understanding the subject. Lord Campbell was not led to write the life of Becket by any especial interest in him. He has not singled him out as an eminent ecclesiastic, but has taken him in his turn, as one of a series of chancellors. The life is in quality such as might be expected,—a clear and lively sketch, written apparently in haste, with little reference to the original authorities, and without any very scrupulous acknowledgment of the author's obligations to his immediate informants. It is to Lord Campbell's credit, that, in a matter so little connected with his usual studies as the general question of Becket's merits, he does not pretend to dogmatize, but contents himself with a simple statement of such arguments as he has met with on either side.

¹ The prefix a, which has latterly been dignified with a French accent, appears to have originated in vulgar colloquial usage. See H. Wharton, quoted in Wordsworth's Eccl. Biog. i. 31. 3rd ed.

With Dr. Giles, too, St. Thomas was at first but one of a series; the eight volumes which stand at the head of our list being a portion of a very extensive undertaking—a complete republication of our early ecclesiastical writers, of which about forty volumes have already appeared. In the course of his labours as editor, it appears to have struck Dr. Giles that a work of some interest might be composed of extracts from the Becket correspondence and the narratives of the early biographers, with some slight additions of necessary connecting matter. The outward appearance of the book thus made—its sparse printing, the absence of an index, the scantiness and looseness of the references—at once indicate to the eye that the readers of the circulating libraries are the class for which it is intended. These may, we should think, find it readable enough; but we cannot rejoice that a book so little likely to influence them for good should have been manufactured for their special entertainment, or that one so little conducive towards a right estimate of the questions involved, should have been manufactured at all.

Dr. Giles's larger publication has utterly amazed us; for, not having examined the earlier volumes of the "Patres Ecclesie Anglicanæ," we had no idea of his style of editing. To do any thing like justice in the matter would require a far greater amount of labour than we are disposed to bestow on it, as our concern is rather with the hero than with the editor. We shall, therefore, content ourselves with saying, that if ever the learned librarian of Lambeth should have exhausted the humours of Fox and his editors, he may find Dr. Giles no unworthy successor to the honours of Messrs. Townsend and Cattley.

The most elaborate of late works on the subject is that which forms the fourth volume of Mr. Froude's "Remains." The papers were written at a time when the course of politics and of popular religion had excited the minds of many Churchmen to a state of continual and vehement protestation against whatever the world of latter times appeared to have agreed upon. Mr. Froude took up Becket as a man who had been slandered by lax and unsound writers. He had the twofold purpose of showing, (1) that the facts relating to the Archbishop had in many respects been misrepresented; and (2) that he had been judged on wrong principles. In some points Mr. Froude established his case; in others it is too apparent that he writes as a mere apologist, anxious rather to make out that his hero's conduct may have been right, than to ascertain whether it really was so. And while we acknowledge that Mr. Froude has, on the whole, the better of the adversaries whom he has chosen to encounter, we cannot but think that there were writers before him,—some of them contemporaries, and others of earlier date,—whose view of the case is more correct than his, as well as than that of Hume and Lyttelton.

No one who regards what is passing around him, and has any sense of the reality of things, would now write exactly as Mr. Froude and others wrote from seven to fifteen years ago. Not that the events of a later time have had any tendency to increase our confidence in statesmen; but they have shown us by most melancholy experience, that dangers from secular politicians are not our only dangers. We think, therefore, that the present time is more favourable, than that in which Mr. Froude wrote, for an impartial appreciation of the Becket controversy; we think that his view, and that of those who agree with him, is not one which ought longer to remain as the last that has been taken by English Churchmen.

While some of our late writers have bent themselves to enlist our religious sympathies on the side of Becket, a distinguished French historian has, as the reader is probably aware, endeavoured to give a wholly different colouring to the question. The Archbishop's troubles were, according to M. Thierry², a struggle, not of the ecclesiastical and the secular power, but of the Saxon and the Norman races. In his pages Becket is the representative of the Saxons—the people—asserting their cause against the oppressive descendants of the conquerors, and therefore upheld by their sympathy in his contest, and consecrated by their veneration after death. The Saxons are M. Thierry's universal solvent—like the Gnostics in Hammond's Commentary, or the Jews in "Coningsby." He finds the influence of race uttering itself every where; or, if he cannot find it, he has little scruple about making it. We shall have frequent occasion to advert to this theory,—which we believe to be utterly untrue, except with such qualifications as take away from it all that is peculiar or considerable.

Dr. Giles has added largely to the accessible materials for the history of Becket. The addition is not, indeed, of a value proportioned to its bulk; for the new letters of Foliot³ are for the most part of no great interest; the portions of Herbert of Bosham's life which were not already known through the Quadri-logus, consist mainly of tedious moralizing and rhetorical flourishes; his "Liber Melorum" is (as Dr. Giles appears painfully to feel) unreadable for any one but an editor; and much of the other new matter is merely a repetition of the old. Dr. Giles, however, has done well in publishing all this, and we only wish that he had edited it better. The life by Edward Grim, before known by the abridgement in Surius' "Acta Sanctorum," is now published at full length; one by Roger, the monk who waited on the Archbishop while resident at Pontigny, one by an unknown writer, from a MS. at Lambeth, and others of less importance, are said to be entirely new.

The chief original sources of information then are,—

1 and 2. The lives by Grim and Roger—animated and interesting narratives, but very incomplete accounts of Becket.

3. The life by William Fitzstephen, who describes himself as the archbishop's "fellow-citizen, chaplain, and messmate, remembrancer in his chancery, and reader of papers in his court, a witness of his trial at Northampton, and of his passion⁴." This is of greater pretension than the others, with some affectation of literature.

4. The life by Herbert of Bosham.

5. The "Quadrilogus," compiled from Herbert, William of Canterbury, John of Salisbury, and Alan of Tewkesbury, with a few passages from a fifth writer, Benedict, Abbot of Peterborough⁵.

6. The letters of Becket, Foliot, and their contemporaries⁶.

The popular story of Becket's birth is as follows. His father, Gilbert, became the captive of a Saracen in the Holy Land. The Saracen's daughter fell in love with him, aided him to escape, and some time after followed him to England—knowing but two words whereby she might help herself in her quest of him—the names of London and Gilbert. As she was wandering about Cheapside, "quasi bestia erratica," says Brompton⁷ (like a cow in a fremd loaning, as Scott might have translated it), vociferating her lover's name, and attended by a train of idle boys, she was recognised by Richard, the servant of Gilbert, and companion of his adventures. And the tale ends as it ought to end—in her baptism by the name of Matilda, which took place in St. Paul's, no less than six bishops sharing in the administration, her union with Gilbert, and the birth of a son, who was in due time to be developed into St. Thomas of Canterbury.

Dr. Giles sees “no reason to doubt”⁸ this story, and it is told without any show of misgiving by Thierry, by Froude, and by Michelet⁹. Mr. Turner also adopts it, although not without some doubts¹; and the assumption of its truth has been made to account for various things, such as the character of Matilda's devotion, her son's social position, his vehement “oriental” temperament, nay, the delicacy and whiteness of his hands².

As to some of the details, authors are not quite agreed. One represents Gilbert as a gentleman travelling for the improvement of his mind—like Lord Lindsay or Mr. Eliot Warburton; others make him a crusading knight. Sir James Mackintosh (who, however, only argues for the possibility of the story, not for its truth,) supposes him a trader, journeying in the way of business³. M. Thierry boldly turns him into an exemplification of the Saxon theory. Gilbert, he says⁴, was one of those Saxons who, “yielding to the necessity of a subsistence,” took service under Norman masters, and thus, in some inferior capacity, he attended an anonymous knight to the Holy Land. If we desire proof of this, the historian refers us to Brompton, who represents Gilbert as a penitential pilgrim, attended by a servant of his own,—and to the Scotch ballad of “Young Bekie” (once familiar to London streets through the travestie entitled “Lord Bateman”), in which he figures as a lord of castles and broad lands, impelled to rove by an enlightened curiosity!

The marriage, we learn from M. Thierry, made a great noise⁵, as well it might. It is, however, remarkable that no sound or echo of this noise reached the contemporaries who lived in intimacy with the offspring of the union, and wrote his life, such as Grim and Roger, Herbert and Fitzstephen. These, and other early writers, while they mention the parents of the Saint, while they describe their station and characters, say nothing whatever that could imply any peculiarity in their history—that Gilbert had ever been in the East, whether as master or as servant, as inquiring traveller, crusader, palmer, or merchant; or that Matilda was other than the home-born child of Christian parents. In short, the story is a fiction, unsupported by any authorities rich merchant, his kinsman⁴, according to some writers, while Fitzstephen places him with the sheriff of London. He was soon to emerge from such employment.

Two Norman ecclesiastics, who used to lodge in his father's house, were struck with the young man's promise, and became the means of introducing him into the household of Theobald, Archbishop of Canterbury, who, as we have seen, is represented by Fitzstephen as ready to welcome him for his father's sake. This event is dated by Dr. Giles about 1145, the twenty-seventh year of Becket's life.

He advanced rapidly in the favour of his patron, yet not without exciting some envy. Roger de Pont l'Evêque, an eminent clerk of the Archbishop's train, had all that malignant hatred of rising merit for which Mr. Fitzwarren's cook is infamous in every nursery. Twice was our ecclesiastical Whittington driven by the persecutions of Roger to flee from his master's roof; and twice he was led back, not, (like his civic antitype,) by the persuasions of vocal bells, telling of high destinies in store for him, but by the good offices of the primate's brother, Walter, Archdeacon of Canterbury.

In 1147, this friend was promoted to the bishopric of Rochester, and Roger succeeded him in the archdeaconry. By this time, however, it is probable that Becket was able to keep his own ground. Preferment flowed in on him rapidly, and from various quarters. He held the living of St. Mary-le-Strand, and that of Otford, in Kent; he was a prebendary of St. Paul's and of Lincoln. Finding himself inferior in learning to some of the clerks around him, he obtained leave to study in the then famous law schools of Bologna, (where Gratian was professor,) and Auxerre. He was employed by the archbishop in various delicate missions to Rome and elsewhere, especially one in which he procured a bull prohibiting the coronation of Eustace, son of King Stephen⁵.

Roger was raised to the archbishopric of York in 1153 or 1154⁶, and Becket became archdeacon in his room. The office gave him the first place among the clergy after the bishops and abbots⁷, with an income of a hundred pounds a-year.

In the end of 1154, King Stephen died, and was succeeded by Henry II. The troubles of the late reign had been favourable to the advancement of the Church in secular power, and its chiefs had ground for apprehending that what had been gained under cover of confusion, might be lost on the restoration of order. It might be assumed that a king of twenty-two years of age would be open to impressions from either party, and as it was certain that some important persons were prepared to influence him against the Church, it seemed advisable that a counteracting influence should be provided. By the recommendation of Theobald, and with the concurrence of Philip, bishop of Bayeux, and the politic Arnulph, bishop of Lisieux, the Archdeacon of Canterbury was introduced into the court. We may suppose that his exertions in the matter of Eustace, so important towards securing Henry's peaceable succession, were not forgotten; and he well knew how to improve the favourable impression created by his own services and the influence of his patrons. He is described to us as tall and handsome in person, of eloquent and witty speech, an accomplished chess-player, a master in hunting, hawking, and all manly exercises. With such outward advantages, and with great talents and solid acquirements to back them, it was no wonder if he soon gained an ascendant over the mind of the young king; and in the first year of the reign he was raised to the dignity of chancellor^a.

The history of the chancellorship, and of the various functions which were connected with it at different periods, has been so lately brought before the general reader by Lord Campbell and his reviewers, that we may fairly hold ourselves excused from entering on the subject. Becket was, during his tenure of the office, the king's chief confidant and adviser; and as such he is entitled to a large share of the praise which is due to the measures then taken for improving the state of the country. Many castles which had sprung up during the troubled reign of Stephen, to the injury of the crown and the oppression of the people, were razed to the ground—the chancellor assisting in the execution as well as in the counsel. Robbers were put down, families were reinstated in possessions of which they had been wrongfully deprived, agriculture and other peaceful arts began to flourish anew, and one great ecclesiastical abuse—the practice of keeping bishoprics and abbeys long vacant, for the sake of securing for the crown the profits during vacancy—was mitigated, if not abandoned^b.

^a The appointment is variously dated from 1155, (the first year,) to 1158, (the fourth). Our learned friend, already mentioned, says, "The Great Roll of the first year no longer exists; but in that of the second year I find positive evidence that he was chancellor, and quite sufficient by reference to satisfy me that he was chancellor in the first year." Foliot charges him with having bought the office, "certâ licitatione propositâ." Epist. 194.

^b We take the liberty of inserting the qualification, although it is not found in our authors. For the proceedings at Northampton showed that very large sums must have been received from vacant preferments by Becket, who, as chancellor

The private intercourse of the sovereign with his chancellor was on the most intimate footing. When serious business was over, says Fitzstephen, they played together like boys of the same age¹; they were companions in all manner of diversions; and often, when the chancellor was at dinner, entertaining, as his custom was, a splendid party of nobles, knights, and others, the king would step in without ceremony, in returning from the chase, and would either drink a cup and begone, or jump over the table, and seat himself as a guest.

In addition to the chancellorship, Henry conferred on Becket the wardenship of the castles of Eye and Berkhamstead—the former with 140 knights attached to it; and to his ecclesiastical preferments were now added the provostship of Beverley and the prebend of Hastings. In those days the chancellor was not a patron, but a receiver of benefices; and such were Becket's popularity and influence, that, according to Fitzstephen, he might, by merely asking for things as they fell vacant, have become, in time, the one sole incumbent of all church preferment²!

Fitzstephen rises above himself in describing the chancellor's state. The troops of attendants—the profusion of gold and silver plate,—the sumptuous fare,—the throngs of knights and nobles who enjoyed his magnificent hospitality,—the daily supply of rushes in winter, and of green branches in summer, that those who could not find room on the benches might not soil their dress by sitting on a bare floor—the voluntary homage of many barons—the eagerness of distinguished parents to place their sons in a household which was reckoned the best school of noble breeding, and of which even the heir-apparent of the kingdom was an inmate—these and other circumstances are dwelt on by the ex-secretary in a style which leads us to suspect that, although had the custody of them; and much of the money which supplied his lavish expenditure was doubtless derived from this source.

² Dr. Giles endeavours to excuse the monstrous accumulation of preferments which his hero enjoyed, while he was yet not a priest. "If," says the biographer, "it should seem strange that he held some of these appointments even before he was in deacon's orders, it must be remembered that the deacon was not the lowest ordained person in the Church at that period. The distinctions between clerics and laics was such that the subordinate ranks of the clergy were fully competent to instructing the ignorant people committed to their charge." (i. 37.) We had not expected to find a writer of Dr. Giles's opinions propounding that instruction is the only thing to be administered by a Christian pastor; and indeed the context seems to intimate that by instructing is meant keeping them in ignorance. The real state of things appears to have been, that such prosperous ecclesiastics as Becket regarded their parishes merely as sources of income, and devolved the care of them on some poor clerk, or monk of a neighbouring house. The system, whatever it may have been, was evidently one of prodigious abuses; and these abuses Becket, when he came out in the character of a general reformer, made no attempt whatever to remedy.

he had followed his patron in the more spiritual part of his career, his memory was by no means unwilling to revert to the splendours of which he had been an admiring partaker while the saint was as yet a child of this world.

The most signal display of Becket's magnificence, however, was, when in 1159 he went on an embassy to France, in order to ask the Princess Margaret in marriage for his royal pupil³. Fitzstephen's account of this reads like a fairy tale. The carriages drawn by five horses each; the huge train of clerks, knights, men-at-arms, falconers with their hawks, huntsmen with their dogs, and domestics of all kinds; the menagerie of strange beasts; the fierce mastiffs which guarded each waggon; the apes mounted on every sumpter horse; the grooms riding "in English fashion;" the prodigious apparatus of plate, chapel-furniture, cooking-utensils; the barrels of beer; the chests of books, money, clothes, and provisions—altogether formed such a sight as had never before been seen along the road. From castles and cottages, from villages and towns, crowds of natives rushed forth, with shoulders shrugged, hands uplifted, and eyes distended in blank wonderment—asking, as well they might, with strange French exclamations, who might be the chief of all this marvellous procession; and on hearing that it was the King of England's chancellor, they were lost in speculation as to what the master must be, if the officer's equipage were so magnificent.

His behaviour at Paris was in keeping. The king, whose custom it was to pay all expenses of ambassadors, had ordered the Parisians to sell no provisions to the Englishmen; but Becket was aware of this, and had sent out disguised purveyors, who bought up enormous quantities from the towns and villages around, so that on arriving at his lodgings in the Temple, he found them stored, at his own cost, with three days' provision for a thousand men. All Paris was astonished by the sumptuousness of his table; a dish of eels which cost a hundred shillings "sterlingorum," was long after famous. He distributed splendid gifts with a lavish hand. In short, the Duke of Northumberland, at the coronation of Charles X., was but a faint shadow of the ambassador-extraordinary of Henry the Second.

A less amicable expedition into France followed shortly after. The Queen of England, Eleanor, had been the wife of the French king, Louis VII., from whom she was divorced on his return from the crusade. By an agreement between Louis and the Count of St. Gilles, the latter had been allowed to retain the duchy of Toulouse, which he had before held under some sort of conveyance from Eleanor's father⁴. The condition of the agreement was, that the territory should be regarded as the dowry of a French princess, whom the count had married; and Henry now contended that, as Eleanor was not benefited by the arrangement, her right to the duchy revived on her divorce. By the chancellor's advice, an important novelty was introduced in levying the troops for the enforcement of Henry's claim; the personal services of the king's vassals being commuted for a scutage, or rate levied on every knight's fee, in order to the payment of mercenaries. The town of Cahors was taken, but the attempt on Toulouse was unsuccessful.

Becket led to the war seven hundred knights at his own expense. They were distinguished on every occasion, and he himself at their head. Among other exploits, he unhorsed in single combat a valiant French knight, Engelram de Trie, and carried off his horse as a trophy. Dr. Giles, of course, is disposed to defend the performance of such deeds by a high ecclesiastical dignitary, on the ground that it was not without precedents⁵. The fact, however, is evident, that, besides being contrary to many canons⁶, such acts were felt by Becket's contemporaries, even while they admired his gallantry, to be inconsistent with his profession and position.

Notwithstanding this, however, public opinion had already fixed on the king's favourite as the most likely person to succeed on a vacancy in the see of Canterbury; and soon after the death of Theobald, which took place in April, 1161, it appeared that such was Henry's intention. The chancellor was about to take leave of him at Falaise, for the purpose of proceeding into England on political business, when the king told him that the chief object of his journey had not yet been mentioned—that he was to be Archbishop of Canterbury. The chancellor, it is related⁷, drew Henry's attention to the gay and secular dress which he had on, as a proof of his unfitness for the highest spiritual office; he declared, that if he should become archbishop, their friendship must turn into bitter enmity. It may have been¹ that the smile which accompanied the words was intended to counteract their effect; at least, it is certain that Henry did not take them seriously, but continued to suppose that in promoting Becket, he was forwarding his own views of policy in the affairs of the Church. The chancellor is said to have declared on other occasions his unwillingness to undertake the burden of the primacy, and at last to have given way only at the solicitation of the pope's legate, Cardinal Henry of Pisa.

⁵ Dr. Giles tells us that "a vast interval was supposed to lie between the deacon's and the priest's offices, so wide indeed, that the former was at liberty to act, in almost every respect, as a layman." i. 68. It is not for us to reconcile this with what we have quoted in the note, p. 10.

The vacancy lasted above a year. It was not until May, 1162, that a deputation of three bishops, with Richard de Luci, grand-justiciary of the realm, arrived at Canterbury, bearing the king's license to the monks for the election of an archbishop, and his recommendation of Becket as a candidate².

Here, as in many other parts of the history, there is a discrepancy between the accounts of the old biographers; each, apparently, making such a statement as he conceived to be most for the honour of his hero. Thus while one represents the monks as hesitating to elect Becket only because he was not, like former archbishops, a monk, and as delighted with the nomination of a person otherwise so admirable³, we are told by others, that his character was fully discussed, and his courtly and secular habits freely handled by objectors⁴.

It is evident, in any case, that there was some difficulty in winning over the monks, and we may suppose that some part of the time before the arrival of the commissioners had been spent in secret negotiations with them⁵. All passed off well, however, at Canterbury, and a day was fixed on which the prior and monks should complete the election at Westminster, in presence of the bishops (who claimed a share in the choice of a primate), and of the temporal great men of the kingdom.

The election was unanimous, but not without some previous show of opposition from a personage who will be often mentioned in the sequel—Gilbert Foliot. He was of a family which had been settled in England since the Conquest, and is described as at this time "an aged man," of much learning, one "who never tasted flesh or wine," and who increased his austerities in proportion as he rose to more eminent station⁶. He had been prior of Clugny, and abbot successively of Abbeville and Gloucester. He was now bishop of Hereford, and a few months later was translated to London. His character for sanctity was high, and his influence great. Mr. Froude describes him (p. 38) as the chief of the "religionist party;" but we cannot help thinking that in the description of this party there are certain elements derived from the nineteenth century, which tend to give an untrue impression as to Foliot's character. On this point, Dr. Giles is (for once) not the echo of Mr. Froude, and remarks that, "notwithstanding his opposition to Becket," Foliot is shown by his correspondence to have "entertained no mean opinion of the privileges of the clergy in general, and especially of the see of Canterbury".

The chief value of the new letters is, indeed, that they help us to understand the writer's character, as accumulated letters must do, however unimportant in other respects. He appears in them as a busy man; somewhat fond of meddling in the affairs of his neighbours; not altogether above an occasional job; an adroit spiritual flatterer of persons in high station; well-intentioned in the main, but too fond of scheming and of politic expedients. We cannot bring ourselves to agree in Archdeacon Churton's description of him as "a wise and moderate man, who acted in honest prudence"; rather, indeed, a want of straightforward honesty appears to us the main defect of his character⁷.

That Foliot opposed the election of Becket is certain; but the circumstances are variously stated. His enemies ascribe his opposition to envy, and represent him as wishing to get the archbishopric for himself. This imputation he strongly denies in a letter written to Becket at a later time¹. If he had sought the office, he argues, the most important person to be gained was the chancellor,—the king's chief counsellor and favourite; and he appeals to Becket whether any application had ever been made to him. He declares his only reasons to have been a desire of the Church's welfare, and a wish that her rights should not be violated by the intrusion of a person so notoriously unfit as the king's nominee. The withdrawal of his opposition is attributed by his adversaries to chagrin at finding that the baseness of his motives was generally seen through, and that therefore no one would second him. His own statement is very different—that he yielded to nothing less than a threat of banishment against himself and all his kindred². It is stated in a letter of John of Salisbury to Becket, that Foliot was the only person who did not express pleasure at the nomination; that he was soon shamed out of his opposition, and then was one of the first to vote for Becket, and the loudest in praise of the election. Whether this be as conclusive as Mr. Froude (p. 592) supposes, or not, we may observe, that if Foliot congratulated Becket in the manner described, his insincerity cannot have been greater than that which prompted the Archbishop soon after to write to him two exceedingly flattering letters on the subject of his translation to London³. And we may add, that the tone in which Becket's elevation is spoken of by his partisans in different parts of their narratives is not very consistent. Foliot's objections may have arisen from base and selfish feelings, but surely there might have been an opposition free from evil motive, and nowise deserving of infamy; since any one who, on the ground of the candidate's previous character, and of the manner in which the election was controlled, should have set himself against (what is said to have been) the universal acclamation in its favour, would have done nothing else than what was afterwards done by Becket himself, when he resigned his archbishopric into the hands of the pope, as an office to which he had attained unworthily and irregularly.

² Exilio crudeliter addicti sumus, nec solum persona nostra, sed et domus patris mei, et conjuncta nobis affinitas et cognatio tota.—Ep. 194, S. T. C. v. 268. This letter was first published by Lord Lyttelton, who supposes that it and others were omitted by Lupus on account of their unfavourable bearing on the character of Becket. Its genuineness has been impugned by Mr. Berington, but is sufficiently vindicated by Mr. Turner, i. 233. Mr. Froude, without going into that question, considers himself entitled to disbelieve what is stated in the letter, on the ground that it was not a private communication, but a "published pamphlet," intended to vindicate the writer and asperse Becket, at a time when the latter was banished and all communication with him forbidden. ³ Giles, i. 145—158.

On the way to Canterbury, after the election, Becket desired Herbert of Bosham to report to him what men should say of him, and to admonish him of his faults⁴. He had made choice of a monitor who was not likely to trouble him with frequent expositions.

The archbishop-elect was ordained priest at Canterbury by his old friend the Bishop of Rochester, on the Saturday after Whitsunday, 1162; and on the octave (which from that date was celebrated in England as Trinity Sunday⁵) he was consecrated by Henry, Bishop of Winchester, brother of the late King Stephen.

The promotion of Becket to the archbishopric was followed, as every reader knows, by a change in his manner of life; but there is a question as to the nature of this change—what was its extent, and how was it managed? It is commonly supposed to have been something extremely sudden, violent, and conspicuous; that Becket had hitherto been altogether a man of the world in appearance, and now all at once threw himself into a course of ostentatious asceticism. The late apologists, on the other hand, endeavour to prove that this is an exaggeration in both ways; that while chancellor he showed a sense of his duties as an ecclesiastic, and his life was pure to a degree then unusual; that the alteration of his habits was gradual, and was carefully guarded from every thing that might savour of ostentation.

The scorn and indignation bestowed by these apologists on the writers who have chimed in with the popular belief, and have assisted in propagating it, appears to us somewhat unfair. For the Becket of the popular belief, whether true or false, is no invention of Fox, or Lyttelton, or Hume, or Goldsmith, or Exeter Hall. He is a tradition derived from his admirers of the days before the Reformation; and those who in a mistaken spirit of admiration originated that ideal which is so offensive to Protestant tastes are the parties on whom the falsification ought to be charged. The notion of an abrupt change is more congenial than the other to the spirit of vulgar religionism—popish as well as puritanical. Even in the contemporary biographers and panegyrists there is language which might seem to intimate such a change⁶, although their more particular details may serve to correct our interpretation of it. But when Thomas of Canterbury was raised to the rank of a saint, he became, according to the principles of those days, fair game for the fancy of his admirers. Imaginary adventures were ascribed to him—and even as we have seen, a mythical origin, as was the case with ancient demigods. The accounts of his life were studded with a profusion of miracles; his character was idealized at will; and that which is now treated as a slander of his enemies, was in fact the expression of the reverence of his devotees. It was his admirers, even his contemporary admirers, who dwelt on the particulars of his mortifications, without marking the process by which he may have gradually increased them; it was they who insisted on the frequent discipline, on the shirt of hair with its verminous population, hourly inflicting on the saint a torment, in comparison of which the sufferings of his martyrdom were but a trifle⁷. The suddenness of his change was even enshrined as a glorious fact in narratives which became a part of the service of the Church⁸. In short, the ostentation is the only part of the prevailing idea which is to be referred to the moderns, and this is rather an inference (surely very colourable) than an invention.

The popular notion, however, is considerably wrong. What Becket's more private habits were in the days of his chancellorship, we cannot very confidently say. He was, we are told, (and we may easily believe it,) munificent in his almsgiving, as in his other expenditure⁹. His purity has been impeached, but, the biographers assure us, unjustly; and various stories are told in his purgation¹⁰. As to this, indeed, it would seem from the statement of one friend, that the most secular period of his life—the chancellorship—was more blameless than some earlier portions of it¹¹. And it is said, that in the days of his splendour he was in the habit of subjecting himself to constant discipline; Fitzstephen

But even if Grim and Fitzstephen were false witnesses, the fact is not to be slurred over, that Becket's contemporaries dwelt on this as a token of sanctity.

furnishing us with the very names of the flagellators at London and at Canterbury.

The archbishop's course of life, however, was to be stricter than the chancellor's. It is, indeed, a mistake to suppose that he cast off all outward pomp; and when M. Thierry¹ tells us, that within a few days after his consecration he had "stripped off his rich attire, disfurnished his sumptuous palace, broken with his noble familiars, and allied himself with the poor, the beggars, and the Saxons," the misstatement in favour of the writer's theory is altogether ludicrous. What palace was it that Becket unfurnished? We presume that he removed from that which he had previously occupied; but if the meaning be that the archiepiscopal residence in his time was worse furnished or kept up than in Theobald's, (which is the only meaning that would be relevant,) we are amply assured of the contrary—that his establishment was more splendid than that of any former archbishop. And while it is true that he paid especial attention to the poor, and that some of this class daily fed in his hall, the rest of what is stated in this passage appears to be pure invention. He was, indeed, soon involved in quarrels with various nobles; but this was not from any enmity of Saxon against Norman, or of one class against another; but because these individuals interfered with what he regarded as the rights of his see; and the mention of Saxons is here, as in many other places, a gratuitous insertion of M. Thierry.

Herbert describes the order of the archbishop's hall. Near him sat his clerks; at some distance sat his knights and men-at-arms, that their unlettered ears might not be annoyed by the sound of the Latin books which were read aloud for the edification of the clergy. The food was plentiful, and of the best kind; and so far was the archbishop from limiting his company to beggars and Saxons, that his enemies accused him of having about him "not men of religion, but lettered nobles". "All the gifts of grace in him," says Grim, "were so veiled by outward pride, that even when he was archbishop, one would have supposed him a man who lived for nothing but the pomp of this world".

His own habits were now severe. He slept little, and ate sparingly. His usual drink was water, in which hay⁴ had been boiled to render it unpalatable. He devoted much of his time to religious study. Nor do we see any reason (except the general untruthfulness of the early biographers) to doubt that his use of the hair shirt dates from the beginning of his archiepiscopate. His liberality in almsgiving is much insisted on by his contemporaries. Theobald, it is said, doubled the alms of the former archbishop, and Thomas doubled Theobald's; when, however, it is stated, after much detail, that a tenth of his income sufficed for this quadrupled almsgiving, we cannot help drawing some inferences not quite consistent with the idea of "medieval" charity which is now generally current to the disparagement of our own.

Much is said (as we have already intimated) of the pains which Becket took to conceal his sanctity. The dishes served up to him were of the most delicate kind, and his abstinence was exercised in the matter of quantity, by which means it might the better escape notice. Herbert⁵ tells a story of a stranger monk, who was one day observed to smile at the daintiness of the archbishop's food. "If I mistake not, brother," said the archbishop, somewhat nettled, "there is more of greediness in your eating of your beans than in mine of this pheasant." And the biographer goes on to say that the censor, although he did not care for delicacies, was noted, during his stay at Canterbury, as "revera avidus comedo grossiorum."

A similar concealment was practised in the matter of dress. "He wished," says Grim⁶, "to avoid men's eyes until the new plant which Divine grace had set in his breast should be more deeply rooted, so that it need not fear the blasts of the world; and therefore he did not at first change his attire." It was not until one of his attendants had been told in a dream to warn him against retaining a secular dress, and until he found that the monks murmured at his wearing it in the choir, that he assumed another habit. "His outward appearance," says Fitzstephen⁷, "was like the multitude; but within all was different." And Herbert tells us that his dress was gay during the first year, and afterwards respectable and grave, "ita ut nec exquisitæ essent sordes, nec affectatæ deliciæ."⁸ Over the cilice, he wore a monk's habit, as Abbot of the Monastery of Canterbury, and above this the dress of a canon, so that he might be in conformity with the clerks⁹.

In almsgiving, too, he is said to have studied secrecy. Besides those deeds which might be done before men without any especial profession of sanctity, he had, we are told, thirteen poor men privately introduced into his apartments every evening. He washed and kissed their feet, regaled them with a plentiful meal, during which he himself waited on them, and sent them away with a present to each of four pieces of silver.

This last part of the story, we must think, throws suspicion on all the rest. The daily taking in of beggars, foot-washing, feeding, and giving of silver, could not be carried on without becoming known. "The fame of them," says Lord Lyttelton¹, "was increased by the affectation of secrecy;" and such ~~must~~ have been the consequence, whether intended or otherwise. And in all likelihood some part of the other observances also got abroad. It might be, indeed, that no one but the Saint's confessor or his chamberlain saw his hair shirt while he lived; but might not whispers of it be spread, whether through the one or two who were in the secret, or from mere surmise? Other saints had been discovered to have practised secret austerities; what more probable than that the like should be assumed by a religious party with respect to one whom it was disposed to look up to?

But was the Archbishop in all this acting the part of a hypocrite? We believe nothing of the kind.

The motive of the prelates who introduced him to the king was, as we have seen, a hope that, by the influence which he was likely to gain, he might secure the interest of the Church; and some of the biographers tell us that he always kept this object in view. They represent him as continually averting measures which were intended against the Church, and as becoming an unwilling instrument of such as he could not prevent, in order that by taking the execution into his own hands he might make it press less heavily on his brethren than it would otherwise have done.

However this be, it is certain that he showed no outward sign of unwillingness to join in the king's measures; nay, that he was generally regarded as the instigator of them. In the war of Toulouse, especially, he was supposed to have advised the imposition of a peculiarly heavy tax on the clergy; and so secret was the fact of his having been really adverse to it, that Theobald threatened to excommunicate him at the time, that Foliot long after charged him with having "plunged a sword into the bosom of his mother the Church," by the exaction, and the Bishop of

In procuring the chancellor's election to the primacy, Henry supposed, of course, that he should continue to find him a ready agent of his will, especially in matters relating to the Church³. Becket is said, indeed, as we have seen, to have declared that, if the promotion should take place, his friendship with the king would be changed into enmity; but it is certain that, whether from the manner in which the words were spoken, or from whatever other reason, Henry did not believe them, and went on without any apprehension.

His surprise, therefore, was great at receiving, as the first communication from the new archbishop, a request that he would provide himself with another chancellor. What was the motive of this? The office of chancellor was not considered incompatible with that of a bishop, either on account of its nature or on account of the labour attached to it. Bishops and archbishops had held it before, and were to hold it in later times. The chancellorship must, indeed, have been less splendid and stirring in the hands of the archbishop than it had been in those of the archdeacon, but there was nothing in its proper duties which might not very well be reconciled with his new function. At least, if the offices were incompatible, the time for declaring them so was ill chosen. On the one hand, Becket might have stated his conviction to Henry, before the irrevocable step of raising him to the primacy had been taken; or, on the other, he might have waited until he should be able to say from experience that one man could not suffice for the two duties. The resignation was, in truth, nothing less than a declaration of what Michelet calls "the duality of religion and the state"⁴. The archbishop could no longer serve the king as his officer; he must be independent⁵.

² See Froude, 578. There is another particular charge of acting against the Church, which Lord Lyttelton has brought forward, and Mr. Froude, (followed, of course, by Dr. Giles,) has undertaken to refute,—that in a dispute between the Bishop of Chichester and the abbot of Battle, the chancellor put himself forward to assert the king's power as divine against that of the pope as "ab hominibus concessa." We are not concerned to answer Mr. Froude's argument (575—7); but we must except against his inference that Becket must have been clear, because he afterwards referred to the case as an instance of Henry's oppression. Never, perhaps, was a man less capable than Becket of viewing his own conduct and position dispassionately. It would have been quite according to his character to reprobate, as if he were altogether guiltless, an act in which he had been a chief instrument.

Henry could not but feel that he was deceived. Not a word had the chancellor breathed as to retiring from his service, until by the king's earnest exertion he had been seated on the throne of Canterbury; and then all at once the "duality" was proclaimed. Becket was no longer the servant of the Crown, but purely the representative of the Church; he was independent of the king; he might become his antagonist; and this seemed very like a preparation for coming forth as such.

While, however, he was so eager to divest himself of the chancellorship, he was in no hurry to give up another preferment, which to many eyes appeared less reconcilable with his new dignity—the archdeaconry of his own diocese; and it was not until after much delay, and at the king's repeated instance, that he was brought to do so. The panegyric biographers in general omit this passage of the story. Dr. Giles, of course, is disposed to defend his hero. "This is," he says, "another point of which modern historians have availed themselves to malign his character; but the account of the affair which has come down to us is so meagre, that it may be difficult to ascribe to the affair its true character." Perhaps it is not the truest inference to suppose that Becket's conduct in the matter was blameless, because his eulogists thought it well to suppress all notice of it. The fact may possibly have been as Archdeacon Churton states in his excellent little work on our early Church history⁶, that Becket "may have acted as he did solely from an unwillingness to appoint a friend of the king's to be Archdeacon of Canterbury." Certain it is, that Geoffrey Ridel, the person eventually appointed, was a friend of Henry, and proved to be an enemy of the Archbishop; but we cannot think that Archdeacon Churton's is the necessary construction of the passage in Diceto, who, without saying any thing of Ridel, or of the king's wish to recommend him as successor, merely tells us that Becket for a time put off transferring the archdeaconry, and then, "transtulit tandem, sicut rex petiit."⁷ On the other hand, we do not believe, with Mr. Turner, that a love of the considerable emoluments attached to the office was his motive, or even one of his motives, for wishing to retain it. His whole history declares that he was not grasping as to money.

The Archbishop's next acts were of a nature to make numerous and important enemies. Many of the possessions of his see had been alienated to lay hands, and these he determined to resume,—in order, according to Grim, that he might be able to increase his charities, but more probably, we think, that he might assert the rights of his office to the full extent in which he conceived them.

The transfer had probably, in many cases, been wrongful and informal, and if so, there were courts which might have been appealed to for redress. But Becket was at no time fond of quiet and tardy measures; he proceeded at once, by main force, to oust the farmers and seize the lands, declaring that no one had any right to call him to account for such proceedings. The two most famous cases in which a resumption was attempted, were both connected with grants of William the Conqueror. In the one, the Archbishop claimed the custody of Rochester Castle, on the ground that it had been bestowed on his predecessor; in the other, he required Roger, Earl of Clare, to do him homage for the castle and honour of Tunbridge, although the earl's family had for almost a century held it of the Crown, having originally acquired it from the Conqueror in exchange for a possession in Normandy⁸. Fitzstephen states that Becket had fortified himself with the king's permission before entering on the resumptions. If so, there can be little doubt that the license was acted on in a way which Henry had not anticipated.

The two cases just mentioned, so curiously connected and contrasted, gave indication of an alarming principle. Every thing that had ever been given to the Church was to be claimed; nothing that had been parted with was to be abandoned. Documents were to be valid or worthless according as they made for or against the claims. Nobles and knights, nay, the king himself, began to feel themselves insecure in their possessions. Courtly clerks, and those who depended on lay patrons, trembled lest they should be ejected from their preferments without any prospect of acquiring others. There was no lack of unfriendly suggestors to point out to Henry the dangerous nature of the new primate's doings.

About Christmas, 1162, the king landed at Southampton, and Becket went with young Henry, who was still under his charge, to meet him. The accounts of their interview are contradictory in the extreme. Herbert represents the king's behaviour as most cordial, while Diceto speaks of it as showing by its coolness that the days of the Archbishop's favour were over⁹. Henry was gratified, says Dr. Giles, to find that his nominee was in high repute for piety; he put on an air of contempt, says M. Thierry, "at seeing in a monk's frock the man whom he had made so much of when attired as a Norman courtier, with dagger at his side, plumed cap on his head, and boots with their long points turned back like rams' horns." The accounts of the impression made on the spectators are, of course, equally irreconcilable¹.

¹ It appears to have been on this occasion that Henry procured the resignation of the archdeaconry.

Whatever the king's demeanour may have been at Southampton, it is certain that he still left his heir-apparent in the archbishop's hands; and when, on setting out for the Council of Tours not long after, Becket restored the royal pupil to his father, it is said by Herbert that they spent some days together in the most friendly manner².

The chief object of the council, which met in May, 1163, was to declare in behalf of Alexander III., against the antipope Octavian, who was supported by the Emperor of Germany. Both on his journey and at the council, Becket was received with the most distinguished honours. It is said by William of Newbury, that on this occasion he resigned his archbishopric into the pope's hands, on the ground of having been irregularly advanced to the dignity, and that the pope graciously restored it; but probability is with the statements of other writers, who refer the incident to a later date. It appears that Becket attempted when at Tours to procure the canonization of his predecessor Anselm,—a prelate who had many claims to such an honour, but whose enrolment in the catalogue of saints at this time must have seemed like a canonization of resistance to the temporal power, and especially to the sovereign of England. The pope was not prepared for such a measure, nor was Anselm canonized until the reign of Henry VII.

Ever since the elevation of Becket to the primacy, persons had not been wanting who attempted to influence the king against him; but, soon after his return from Tours, there fell out some things which might have sufficed to provoke Henry without any commentary from the whisperers of the court. We cannot tell in what order they occurred, nor does it greatly matter.

One of these affairs is not quite fairly represented by Dr. Giles³. "The Church of Eynesford," he tells us, "was in the gift of the see of Canterbury, and had been bestowed by Becket on one of his clerks, whose name was Lawrence. The lord of the manor of Eynesford, whose name was William, objecting to his right of nomination, expelled Lawrence's people." The biographer ought in justice to have stated the ground of William's objection, viz., that the archbishop's claim of patronage was something altogether new to him. It was founded on a principle, which, if ever allowed, had long been dormant—that the archbishop had a right to bestow all churches which were situated on the manors of his tenants. Becket may have been in the right, but he certainly was the aggressor; and lest we should be too much shocked at the violence of William's proceedings, it ought to be remembered, that not only were they in the usual style of the rough-handed barons of that age, but that the primate had just given examples of precisely similar violence in cases of disputed possession.

² By a mistranslation of Herbert, Dr. Giles places this meeting at "Rumel," i. e. we presume, Romney; for in geographical names Dr. Giles never attempts to correct the errors of the old copyists, or to identify the places which are mentioned.

William was a tenant of the king, as well as of the archbishop; and when excommunicated by the one, he appealed to the other. Henry ordered Becket to absolve him, reminding him that the king's tenants-in-chief ought not to be excommunicated without an intimation to the sovereign⁴. The archbishop for a time stood on his rights, declaring that the king had nothing to do with excommunication or absolution; but at length, with a very ill grace, which left no sense of obligation, he agreed to do as was required.

In another case, the primate appeared as a sort of Hampden. The king proposed, in a council at Woodstock, to add to his revenue certain monies which had been customarily paid to the sheriffs throughout England,—a sum of two shillings on every hide of land⁵. Becket stood forward to oppose the proposal. The money, he said, was not paid as a due, but voluntarily, and might be refused if the sheriffs and their attendants did not behave to the satisfaction of the payers. The king swore his favourite oath that it should go to the exchequer; the primate swore, with equal vehemence, that not a shilling should be paid for his lands so long as he should be the possessor of them. This opposition defeated the project; and so, says Grim, the king was led, out of ill-will towards the archbishop, to turn his anger against the clergy.

He was not long without a very fair pretext for interfering with them. A number of outrages had lately been perpetrated by persons in holy orders. It was said that within ten years more than a hundred murders had been committed by clerks who were still alive; and without insisting on the exact statistical accuracy of this statement (which Dr. Lingard thinks it worth while to assail), we have abundant evidence that the "disorderly manners of men in orders"⁶,—"homicides, thieves, robbers, assassins, and practisers of other atrocities"⁷,—had become a crying nuisance. The Church tribunals claimed exclusive jurisdiction over clerks in cases of every kind; and thus these "tonsured demons, workmen of the devil, clerks in name only, but belonging to Satan's portion⁸," were exempted from the judgment of the secular courts. The exemption extended to the minor orders; and there had grown up a prodigious multitude of "acephalous" clerks, without title, duty, or regular home, who led a roving, disreputable life, and were ready for any violence.

⁵ This seems to be what has been described as "a revival of the odious tax known by the name of danegelt."—(Lingard, ii. 206.) But it does not appear that Henry wished to add to the burdens of the people; he meant only to make the payment compulsory (which it probably was in effect before,) and to alter its destination.

The king wished to put an end to this system, by subjecting clerical offenders to the same jurisdiction with other criminals. He required that clerks accused of any outrage should be tried in his own courts; that on conviction they should be degraded by the Church, and then should be remanded to the secular power, for the execution of the sentence passed on them. The archbishop strenuously opposed these proposals; and on this quarrel turned the whole of the subsequent history.

On the one side, it was argued that the ecclesiastical discipline had been proved altogether inadequate to check the excesses of the clergy; that the punishments of the spiritual court were not fitted to deter persons inclined to offences of the kind in question. "Those," it was said, "would care little for a loss of orders [the heaviest of all the spiritual sentences], whom a regard for their orders could not restrain from the perpetration of such enormities. In proportion to their superior dignity and privileges, their criminality was greater than that of other men, and their punishment ought rather to be more than less. It would be a strange novelty in law, and a truly novel fashion of sanctity, if the privileges of the clergy should thus be made a screen for villanies, by which the peace of kingdoms is disturbed, the justice of kings outraged, and all that is holy profaned⁹."

The arguments on the other side were of various kinds. No one, it was said, ought to be twice punished for the same offence,—as clerks would be, if in addition to degradation they had to undergo the doom of the secular court. Clerks degraded for one offence would afterwards be in the condition of laymen, and liable to the usual punishments of laymen for future misdemeanours [so that they had but one life more than other men]; but degradation was the utmost that could be allowed for one crime.

There were many arguments from Scripture, some of them strangely unfortunate. Those which seem most likely to have told were founded on a restriction to the clergy of what in truth would have been equally applicable to all Christians,—as where it was said that it would be shocking to touch the life or limbs of those for whom Christ had died.

The main strength of the cause, however, was probably in the department of ecclesiastical law—a department more beyond the cognizance of ordinary persons than either abstract reason or Scripture. We are told, however, that even in that day the king's side was not without its learned canonists¹; and we know, whether the uncritical twelfth century knew it or not, that the authorities on which the Archbishop relied were in reality altogether futile.

“Gratian,” says Fleury, “inserted in his Decretum [which was published in the reign of Stephen] novel maxims concerning the immunity of the clergy, as to which he maintains that they may not in any case be judged by laymen. In proof of this he cites several articles of the false decretals, and the pretended law of Theodosius, adopted by Charlemagne, in order to extend excessively the jurisdiction of the bishops. With these he combines a mutilated article from a novel of Justinian, which, as a whole, says the very contrary. This constitution, thus altered, however, was St. Thomas of Canterbury's chief ground for resisting the king of England with the firmness which drew on him persecution and martyrdom².”

Nothing, as appears to us, can be plainer than that the Archbishop's cause was decidedly wrong; and it is not without considerable surprise that we have read some of the late apologies on this subject. As to the question of Scripture and primitive usage, it is manifest that the directions to admonish an offending brother, to “hear the Church,” to settle differences “before the saints, and not before unbelievers,” were intended for all Christians, not for the clergy alone; nor had they any thing to do with questions as to the nature or amount of punishment for such crimes as robbery and murder. It was, therefore, a most strange abuse to found on them a claim of comparative impunity for clerks who should be guilty of such outrages.

The question of ecclesiastical law in general, and that of earlier English law, may be considered as decided against the immunities by the judgment of the best authorities. There is, however, a charter of William the Conqueror, on which Mr. Froude and his copyist rely, by which the jurisdiction over the clergy was given to the spiritual courts³. But, as has been remarked by

² Hist. Eccl. vol. v. p. 5. Collier discusses the question with his usual honesty, vol. i. p. 372, and concludes against the immunities, from primitive and early English example, as well as on grounds of reason.

Southey⁴, the mention of this grant is not to the purpose,—since Becket is never found to have appealed to it, and would have scorned such ground as altogether beneath his pretensions. He claimed the immunities as an inherent right of the clergy.

As to what is said of the severity of ecclesiastical punishments—for example, that some clerks were sentenced by the spiritual courts to deprivation of all their dignities, and confinement in a monastery for life under a strict system of penance—it is clear that this is far from meeting the case. The ecclesiastical discipline would seem to have been much neglected, and, at all events, it was found insufficient to restrain from frequent crime. Whatever it may have been, it is certain that it was looked on, by both clergy and laity, as less severe than the secular punishments; and it is certain that it was grievously ineffective.

We need hardly advert to the fallacy of Michelet⁵, who tells us that “the ecclesiastical jurisdiction was in those days an anchor of safety;” that “the Church was almost the only way by which the despised races of the vanquished could recover any degree of ascendancy;” that “the liberties of the Church were then those of the world;”—or to that of Dr. Giles, who endeavours to recommend his hero as a kindred spirit to modern philanthropists and mitigators of the criminal code⁶. It was not for the elevation of the oppressed Saxons that Becket laboured. It was not to mitigate the barbarous punishments which were in that age usual, and perhaps necessary. It was to establish a difference between the clergy and all others. Mr. Froude, indeed, is right in denying the truth of the opinion which he ascribes to “Protestant historians”—that “the Archbishop could have been influenced by no motive but a wish to secure impunity to offending clergymen;” but the real charge is different from this—that he set up and obstinately maintained, as a right of the Church, a claim which was without any real foundation, and which in its working had been proved to be most pernicious, not only to the public peace, but to the character of the clergy themselves.

There was no pretence that the secular courts were likely to deal unfairly with clerks who might be accused before them. There was no attempt on their part to meddle with matters which were properly of spiritual cognizance. It was not one of those cases in which it is necessary to distinguish between the worthlessness of a party, and the principle involved in his cause. None but persons duly convicted of crime were in any danger from Henry’s intended reforms. The question was simply, whether clerks should enjoy a comparative impunity for offences against the public peace; and Becket judged it his duty, as representative of the clergy, to insist that they should. As long as Henry could have any pretence for saying (whether with oath, "per oculos Dei," or in more innocent form) that the clergy were especially favoured, so long was there a ground for complaint on the part of the secular power, and of the people.

The king summoned the bishops and abbots to meet him at Westminster in October, 1163, and laid before them his views of necessary reforms. He complained that the immunities hindered the execution of his coronation oath, to do justice and correct offenders⁸, and he desired the concurrence of the assembled dignitaries in the measures which he proposed for the remedy of the prevailing evils. The clergy withdrew in order to consult, and the subject was discussed with arguments such as we have given above. The bishops were at first inclined to yield, but were swayed by Becket's forcibly representing the case as one of duty to the Church and faithfulness to their trust. On returning to the king, the prelates declared that they were not at liberty to give an unequalled assent to his demands. Henry asked whether they would obey the customs of his ancestors. The archbishop replied that they would, "saving their order," and the bishops severally made the same declaration, with the single exception of Hilary of Chichester, who thought to get over the difficulty by substituting the words bonâ fide for salvo ordine. This change, instead of appeasing the king, added to his exasperation. He burst out into violent abuse of Hilary, and abruptly left the council. The unlucky conciliator suffered from both sides; as the bishops were retiring to their lodgings, the primate sharply rebuked him for the concession which he had made without consulting his brethren. Next morning, Henry sent to demand of Becket a surrender of Eye and Berkhamstead, and left London without again seeing the clergy.

The prelates in general were alarmed, and dreaded a breach with the king. Intrigue, too, was busy among them. Arnulph, Bishop of Lisieux, came over from Normandy at this time, and, by way of ingratiating himself with Henry, under whose displeasure he had lately been, he suggested that the king should form a party among the clergy, as the most effectual means of thwarting the primate. Roger of York, Becket's old enemy, Hilary of Chichester, and Foliot, lately translated to London, were easily won, and others were by no means disposed to follow the archbishop in all his courses¹. A secret agreement was made, we do not know with how many bishops, by which they gave up the obnoxious reservation. "Thus," says Fitzstephen, "those who had the highest reputation for learning, became most ready to oppress the liberty of the Church;" and Grim imputes to these prelates the blame of the king's proceedings; for how, he asks, should the king suspect himself to be in the wrong, when all but the archbishop were with him²?

⁹ This reservation was made in oaths of fealty. Lingard, ii. 214. But Henry might complain that it was now attempted to interpret it as implying the immunities, which he had not before supposed to be included.

The king's influence among the clergy soon manifested itself in various acts of opposition to the primate. The Archbishop of York revived some ancient pretensions of his see as the rival of Canterbury; Clarembald, abbot of St. Augustine's, claimed exemption from the archbishop's jurisdiction, and required that Becket should give him the pastoral benediction in his own monastery, without exacting any profession or promise of obedience³; and Foliot claimed independence of Canterbury, on the ground of the ancient ecclesiastical eminence of London, which John of Salisbury represents him as deducing from the days when it was the seat of a Flamen of Jupiter!

Assiduous attempts were made to win over Becket to compliance with the king's wishes. The danger of the Church—the character of Henry—the archbishop's old friendship with him, and the hope which he might have of recovering all his influence with increase, if these quarrels could be got over—such arguments were continually pressed on him. It was urged, too, that although the king was desirous, for the sake of his own honour, that the bishops should publicly withdraw their reservation, he had no intention to take advantage of this to the prejudice of their obligations and the rights of the Church.

The archbishop remained firm, until he was at last prevailed on by the solicitations of the pope's envoy, who professed to have his master's authority for advising compliance. Grim seems to throw doubt on the truth of the envoy's assertion⁴; the fact probably was, as Lord Lyttelton suggests⁵, that the pope had in general terms directed him to recommend conciliatory measures, but had no intention that such concessions should be made. Becket, however, was persuaded, and intimated his submission to the king, who required that, as the refusal had been public, the assent should be equally so.

The council of Clarendon met in consequence in the end of January, 1164. The business lasted three days, but it is impossible, amid contradictory reports, to ascertain in what order it was transacted.

Becket professed that he did not know the particulars of what was required under the title of ancient customs or royal dignities. A number of regulations were recited, which professed to have been in force until the confusions of Stephen's reign,—in order, as Grim represents the king to have said, that no one in after time might presume to charge him with introducing novelties. Another biographer tells us that Henry himself knew no more of the ancient laws than Becket, and that matter adverse to the Church was inserted by his ill-disposed adherents.

The constitutions of Clarendon bear very hardly on what were supposed to be the rights of the Church. All questions of presentation to benefices were to be decided in the king's courts. Clerks accused of crimes were to be dealt with in the manner already mentioned. No bishop or other clergyman was to leave the kingdom without the king's license. (This was a check on appeals to the pope.) The king's tenants in chief, and the members of his household, were not to be excommunicated without his leave. The king was to have the power of compelling the archbishop to do justice to suitors in his court. The patronage of sees, abbeys, &c., was brought more completely under the king's control than before. The sons of rustics (M. Thierry's Saxons) were not to be ordained without the consent of their lord.

On these and the other items the archbishop remarked as they were read one by one. Of that which went to subject the clergy to secular courts, he declared that now Christ was to be judged anew before Pilate. The matter, he found, was worse than he had imagined when he promised to conform; and he resolved to refuse compliance. The bishops stood by him in his refusal, and Henry was enraged beyond measure. As the ecclesiastics were sitting in deliberation, armed knights rushed into their conclave, with drawn swords and furious gestures, threatening death to all who should persist in opposing the king's will. The bishops of Salisbury and Norwich, who were at this time especially obnoxious to Henry, in terror besought Becket to relent. The earls of Cornwall and Leicester joined their entreaties, saying that they apprehended some unheard-of violence. "It is," he answered, "nothing new or unheard of, if it should be our lot to die for the rights of the Church; for this a multitude of saints has taught us, both by word and by example⁶." The Grand Master of the Templars, and another eminent member of the order, fell at his feet, embraced his knees, and promised, on their salvation, that if he would but submit, he should never hear more of the customs. The Archbishop withdrew for a short time, and on returning said to his brethren, "It is God's will that I should perjure myself; for the present I submit and incur perjury, to repent hereafter as I may⁷."

He promised in the hearing of all, to keep the laws "legitimè et fide bonâ," and charged the other bishops to do the like. It was then required that he should set his seal to the constitutions; an act by which he would, according to the notions of the time, have bound himself to them more thoroughly than by his verbal promise: he required time for consideration. The parchment on which the constitutions were written was divided into three parts; the king took one, the Archbishop of York another, and Becket took the third. This would naturally have been construed as an act of approval; but some of the biographers tell us that he gave it the character of a protest, declaring that he took the deed as "a voucher for the cause which he maintained," and an information as to the measures against which he was bound to contend⁸.

The admirers of Becket do not pretend to justify his conduct on this occasion. It is compared by the contemporaries to the falls of David and St. Peter, and he himself was ashamed of it, even at the time. "I know," he is reported to have said, "that what we have been doing must be condemned, unless a good intent were an excuse for a blamable act⁹;" and as he went with his train to Winchester after the council, he for a long time kept a melancholy silence, and at length, on being addressed by Herbert of Bosham, burst out into bitter lamentations, weeping profusely as he traced the calamities which had come on the Church to the promotion of a person so unworthy as himself to the office of its chief pastor¹.

⁷ Foliot, i. 172. Dr. Lingard attempts to throw suspicion on this statement, on the ground of the source from which it comes—the letter which we have already noticed. But even if that letter were a forgery, the accounts of the biographers bear it out in all essential points as to what took place at Clarendon, except that Foliot names Jocelin of Salisbury as having stood firm with the other bishops.

Those who think unfavourably of Becket, exult over the conduct which his friends do not defend. We cannot but think the reprobation of it in which some writers indulge is somewhat exaggerated. It was marked rather by weakness and vacillation than by deliberate perfidy. He yielded to the urgency of others, against his own judgment, and that for the sake of averting immediate danger from others rather than from himself. Neither can we fully agree in the measure of reprobation which Lord Lyttelton² bestows on the next acts of the archbishop, when he suspended himself from saying mass until he should receive the pope's pardon for what he had done, and yet joined with other prelates, by the king's desire, in requesting the papal sanction for the constitutions. To this his own approval was, of course, subject, and without it the constitutions were null in the opinion of High Churchmen (so to speak). That Becket should join in the application to the pope, seems, therefore, a necessary consequence of what he had before done; while his private suit for absolution was the result of his feeling that his assent had been wrong or questionable. His position was a most unhappy one, in which it was impossible to do right. We cannot much wonder that he acted as he did; and we shall do well to lay the chief weight of our blame rather on some earlier things, than on what was almost an unavoidable result of them.

The pope returned an indulgent answer to the request of absolution. He desired the archbishop to resume the offices of the altar, and to confess to some skilful spiritual guide whatever might weigh on his conscience. He refused to confirm the constitutions, but by way of softening his refusal he granted Henry's request, that the Archbishop of York should be appointed legate over all England³.

In the meantime, Becket's enemies were not idle. Herbert divides them into three species, which he compares respectively to gnats, bees, and scorpions⁴; and to these he afterwards adds "fat bulls of Basan"—the hostile bishops—and their "calves," or clerks. The gnats and bees buzzed into the king's ears a tale of slighting words, which the primate was said to have spoken in contempt of his youth, unsteadiness, and violent temper; and in consequence of this Henry refused to see him when he presented himself at the doors of Woodstock palace. Becket then resolved to go to the pope, in defiance of the king, and contempt of the constitutions⁵. He twice attempted to cross the sea, but was obliged to put back; on the second occasion he returned to Canterbury by night, just in time to save his effects from seizure by the king's officers.

He now again sought an interview with Henry, and was received with decorum, although with an evident lack of cordiality. Henry relaxed so far as to ask him with a smile whether one kingdom had not room for both, and desired him to govern his province without further thought of going abroad. Becket proceeded to fulfil this injunction, but not, we should suppose, in a manner likely to lessen the king's irritation.

"He aroused himself," says Herbert, "and with a prophet's mattock⁶ plucked up, pulled down, scattered, and rooted out whatsoever he found planted amiss in the garden of the Lord. His hand rested not, his eye spared not; whatsoever was naughty, whatsoever rough, whatsoever wicked, he not only assailed with a prophet's mattock, but with the axe of the gospel he cut it down. Of the royal and ecclesiastical customs, he observed such as were good; but those which had been brought in for the dishonour of the clergy he pruned away as bastard shoots, that they should not strike their roots deep⁷."

In such proceedings the time passed on until the month of October, (1164), when the primate was summoned to answer before a council or parliament at Northampton for his behaviour in the case of John the Marshal, one of the king's retainers.

³ There was some misunderstanding as to this—Becket remonstrated against the grant, as trenching on the privileges of Canterbury. The pope assured him that he had no intention of slighting him; that the legation was granted on conditions, &c. It came to nothing in the end.

He arrived on Tuesday, the 7th of the month, and lodged in the monastery of St. Andrew. Next morning he had an interview with the king, who redressed the wrong done by some of his people in occupying a house intended for the archbishop's train, but did not offer the usual kiss, although Becket made demonstration of his willingness to receive it.

The case of John the Marshal was then entered on. The king had made a constitution, that if any one having a suit in his lord's court should find, after the first or second day of the trial, that things were going against him, he might, on swearing that injustice was done him, remove the cause into the king's court. By virtue of this, John appealed from the archbishop's court in a suit relating to the manor of Pagaham (probably Peckham, near Tunbridge). On the day appointed for Becket to answer to the charge of injustice, he did not attend in person, but sent four knights, with letters from himself and the sheriff of Kent, in which it was stated that John had failed in his evidence, and that his oath on removing the case had been made, not (as was usual) on reliques of saints or on the gospels, but on a tropary* which he produced from under his cloak. The archbishop had not assigned any sufficient reason for his non-appearance, and therefore was now called on to answer for treason. His defence was not admitted, and on the second day of the council it was adjudged that he was "at the king's mercy;" a phrase implying forfeiture of all his effects, unless the king should be pleased (as was usual in such cases) to accept a fine instead. He was fined 500*l*. The prelates and the barons each endeavoured to shift on the other the duty of pronouncing the sentence, until the king in anger charged the Bishop of Winchester to perform the task^o.

Henry, however, had not yet done with Becket. His own wish would have been to attack him on subjects connected with the ecclesiastical privileges; but he was dissuaded from this, on the ground that the bishops might probably be unwilling to take a part against what was considered to be the cause of the Church. He therefore attempted to crush the archbishop by charges of a personal kind. First, there was a demand of 300*l*. which had been received by him as warden of Eye and Berkhamstead. He replied that he had spent that sum and more in the repairs of these and other castles, but that money should not be a bar to his agreement with the king, and therefore he would give sureties for the payment. Then came a charge about two sums of 500*l.* each—the one lent by Henry, the other borrowed by the chancellor on the king's security, in the war of Toulouse. Becket affirmed that the first 500*l.* was a gift; but it was decided that as he could not prove this he must refund the money. For this also he gave securities.

* Troparium, so called from containing tropes, which were properly certain versicles sung before the introit in the service of the mass (Dufresne). Mr. Turner makes this a "book of songs," and is followed by Mr. Froude. Dr. Giles still further improves it into "a jest-book!"

^o Becket's biographers delight in tales of judgments on his opponents, much after the same fashion as Mr. Huntington, S. S. in his autobiography. Thus here we are told by Grim that John lost two sons for whom he had intended to provide out of the Church's patrimony, and himself died within the year.—S. T. C. i. 40.

These demands were followed by one of more alarming magnitude,—that he should account for the revenues of vacant sees and abbeys, including those of the archbishopric during its vacancy, which had come into his hands during his chancellorship. The amount is variously stated. The "Quadrilogus" (which is very inaccurately printed) makes Herbert rate it at two hundred and thirty thousand marks; in Dr. Giles's edition, his words are "about thirty thousand;" while others speak of it as forty-four thousand. The archbishop replied that he had not received notice to answer to any charge except that in the matter of John the Marshal, and requested leave to confer with his brethren.

On the morning of the fourth day (Saturday, October 10), a consultation was held accordingly. The Bishop of Winchester advised that the king's avarice should be gratified, and himself proceeded to the court with an offer of 2000 marks; but this was refused. The bishops resumed their deliberations. Some advised Becket to plead, that at the time of his election an express declaration of his discharge from all secular obligations had been required by the Bishop of Winchester, on the part of the Church, and had been granted, in the king's name, by Prince Henry and the justiciary, De Luci. Others, among whom Foliot and Hilary of Chichester were conspicuous, advised him to place his see in the king's hands, and submit himself to his mercy. At length the Bishops of London and Rochester were sent to the king, with a request that he would allow the archbishop to defer his answer for a day. Foliot is accused of having falsified the message, leading the king to suppose that an answer of submission might be reckoned on.

The archbishop did not quit his monastery on the Sunday. During the following night, anxiety brought on an attack of an illness to which he was subject. The king, suspecting that the illness was feigned, sent to ask whether he would appear and would give bail to stand a trial as to the revenues. He answered that, whether well or sick, he would appear on the following day. In the meantime, he was told that Henry was swearing, with even more than usual vehemence, that some of the courtiers had conspired to kill him, and that the king had declared an intention of either putting him to death, or depriving him of his eyes and tongue, and committing him to prison for life¹. Most of this appears to have been a mere invention, and the rest greatly exaggerated.

The 13th of October, Tuesday, was the last and most memorable day of the council². By the advice of his confessor, the archbishop in the morning celebrated the mass of St. Stephen, beginning with the introit, Etenim sederunt principes, ("Princes sat and spake against me.") This was forthwith reported at court, with the commentary (surely very warrantable, although some writers treat it as the suggestion of bitter malice), that Becket intended a parallel between himself and the protomartyr³. It was his intention to proceed to the castle barefooted, wearing his pontificals, and with his cross in his hand; but at the entreaty of his friends he unwillingly gave up this, and went on horseback, wearing his ordinary dress, with a stole over it⁴. Crowds of people, supposing that he was going to his death, prostrated themselves as he passed, and besought his blessing. On dismounting at the gate, he took his cross from the attendant who had borne it, and entered the hall in which the bishops were assembled. The sight of the cross in his hand alarmed them. They seem to have considered it as a braving of the king, a claiming for himself the character of a champion of Christ against the power and violence of His enemies. The Bishop of Hereford requested leave to carry the cross for him, but the offer was declined. Hugh of Nunant, Archdeacon of Lisieux, who attended in the archbishop's company, remonstrated with Foliot on the impropriety of suffering him to retain it. "My good friend," was the answer, "he was always a fool, and always will be one." Foliot, however, endeavoured to wrest the cross out of the archbishop's hands, and a somewhat unseemly struggle ensued, in which Becket, being the younger and stronger man, had the better. He then sat down, still holding the cross in his hands. Foliot prayed him to lay it aside, representing that the king would regard it as a sword drawn against him. The archbishop replied, that the king's sword was an instrument of war, but that his was a sign of peace, and therefore he would not let it go.

² By Alan and others it is strangely said to have been the hundredth anniversary of the Norman invasion.

⁴ So Fitzst. and Roger state. Modern writers for the most part have followed less accurate authorities, which represent him as having retained his pontificals.

Roger of York was the last prelate who entered the hall. His wish was to make it thus appear as if he had not been concerned in advising the king's proceedings. His cross was borne before him—the pope's order that he should not use it beyond his own province, being for the present eluded by an appeal.

The king throughout the day remained in an inner chamber. The bishops were summoned into his presence, and Becket was left in the hall, with his clerks beside him. Herbert took the opportunity of advising that, if any violence were attempted, he should resort to excommunication. Fitzstephen reproved this counsel, and advised him rather to follow the saints and martyrs of old, in patient endurance and forgiveness of enemies. One of the king's officers interrupted Fitzstephen, and told him that he must not speak to the archbishop, whereupon he significantly pointed to the cross,—an action of which Becket long after reminded him.

The bishops told the king that the primate had rebuked them for joining in judgment against him; that he complained of the fine of 500*l.* as unjust, seeing that custom had fixed in every county a commutation for goods and chattels forfeited to the king's mercy, and this in the county of Kent, where the property of the see lay, was only forty shillings; that he had forbidden them to take any further part in the proceedings against him, and had appealed to the pope. Two earls were sent to ask Becket whether it were true that he had acted thus, contrary to his duty as the king's liegeman, and especially to his oath that he would observe the constitutions of Clarendon, one of which was, that bishops should attend the king in all trials, except such as involved life. They also asked him, whether he would give in the accounts of his chancellorship, and abide a judgment. He replied with firmness, that he had been summoned to answer for the affair of John the Marshal alone, and ought not to have been called to defend himself against any other charge; that in secular offices he had served the king faithfully, had spent all the revenues in his service, and had even contracted debts for it; that he had received an acquittance for all such matters at the time of his election; that he had made his appeal against being judged by the bishops, and would keep to it, placing himself and the Church under the protection of the pope. The earls withdrew, and some of those who were near the archbishop began to talk aloud, by way of intimidating him, of oppressions and barbarous acts of violence which had been done by kings and nobles against contumacious ecclesiastics.

The king endeavoured to force the bishops to join in judging the primate. They pleaded the prohibition which had been laid on them. Roger of York retired, as if to avoid the sight of something shocking which might be expected. Some of the bishops tried to prevail on Becket to relent; but he was inflexible.

At length an expedient was devised. The king ceased to insist that the bishops should join in the judgment, on condition that they should appeal to the pope against the prohibition. They returned to the hall; and Hilary of Chichester, in their name, told the archbishop that as he and they had pledged themselves to the constitutions, and he had now violated his oath, they held him as perjured, renounced their obedience to him, and appealed against him.

There was some curious casuistry in Becket's reply. The first of duties, he said, is that to God. The stipulations made at Clarendon involved a reservation of the Church's rights. Nothing against these can be observed in fide bonâ or legitimè, nor can an infringement of the Church's privileges be part of the "dignities" of a Christian king. The pope had sent back the constitutions rather with reprobation than approbation⁵. "If," he continued, "we fell at Clarendon, we ought now to rise again. If we there swore wrongly, unlawful oaths are not to be observed."

The bishops then withdrew. The barons came into the hall, and the Earl of Leicester was proceeding to pronounce sentence, when the archbishop interrupted him. He repeated his objections to the proceedings, and declared that, as the soul is more worthy than the body, and as the son must not doom the father, he declined all judgment from a secular tribunal, and referred his cause to the pope, who alone was competent to judge him.

Raising his cross aloft, he proceeded slowly down the hall. A tumult of reproachful voices arose. The archbishop's foot struck by chance against some firewood which lay in his way; and on this the uproar became louder than before. Ranulph de Broc and Earl Hamelin, the king's bastard brother, called him perjured and traitor. He reminded de Broc that one of his near relations had been hanged (the like of which, says a biographer, had never befallen any of the Becket⁶); and to Hamelin he applied the most hateful terms, adding that but, for his orders, he would prove him a liar on his own person.

The gate of the castle was found to be locked. One of the archbishop's attendants hastily took down a bunch of keys which was hanging near; and the first that he tried was found to fit the lock—not without somewhat of a miracle, if we believe the biographers.

⁶ Quadr. i. 34.

The multitude without the castle received the archbishop with enthusiasm. He rode through the crowded streets, with his cross in his hand, bestowing his benediction as he passed⁷. On reaching St. Andrew's monastery, he prayed, and deposited his cross in the chapel; and then, finding that the usual companions of his table had disappeared through fear, he entertained (of course, with an intended reference to the parables,) as many of the crowd as could find room.

In the book which was read aloud at supper, the text "when they persecute you in one city, flee ye to another," occurred. The eyes of the archbishop met Herbert's, as if the words suggested the same thought to both.

The bishops of London and Chichester soon after appeared, and proposed that the archbishop should make his peace by resigning two manors to the king; he sternly refused to alienate the property of the Church. He then sent two bishops to beg that he might be allowed to go abroad. They found the king in very good humour, but he deferred his answer until next day, and Becket was soon after told by two eminent noblemen that some great mischief was intended against him.

He signified his intention of passing the night in the chapel, and his bed was made behind the high altar. In the meantime, the means of escape were provided; horses were in waiting without the walls; and in the middle of the night the archbishop left Northampton.

In the history of Becket, as in that of Mahomet, the flight (or hegira) is a remarkable point. Here, therefore, we shall pause for a time.

⁷ If we understand Fitzstephen rightly, he took up Herbert of Boham behind him.

- ART. III.—1. A Chronological Introduction to the History of the Church : being a new inquiry into the true dates of the birth and death of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, &c. By the Rev. SAMUEL FARMAR JARVIS, D.D., LL.D. London : Cleaver, 1844. 8vo.
2. Ordo Sæclorum. A Treatise on the Chronology of the Holy Scriptures, &c. By the Rev. HENRY BROWNE, M.A., Principal of the Diocesan College, Chichester, &c. London : J. W. Parker. 1844.

THE uncertainty of history, and of that essential part of it, especially, which is called chronology, is a common matter of complaint; and much of late years has been done to encourage the suspicion, that after all there is no such thing, to any great extent, as authentic history, and that all the researches made by the industry of the present generation, and by the learning of those which are past, tend but to perplex, not to inform. Such, doubtless, must be the opinion of those, who, having studied history either under the bias of some partial theory, or with the same degree of diligence that one reads a romance, have been suddenly arrested by some of those apparent contradictions which a more enlarged view of the subject often presents. They will either question the newly presented facts, or mistrust the imperfect information already obtained : but their minds, untrained to the rigid and diligent pursuit of truth, and enfeebled by theorizing, will in mere indolence conceive those difficulties to be insuperable contradictions, which a more severe and enlarged contemplation of the great objects before them would regard as temporary obscurities, capable of eventual solution.

The fact is, that so far from having reason to complain of uncertainty in the study of the annals of the world, it is a matter of astonishment to find how many sources of definite information actually exist, reaching even to the most dark and distant periods of time. The providence of God, according to His uniform system of operation, has made the curiosity, and even the superstitions of mankind, the instruments for conveying to the latest ages the knowledge of things which happened in the earliest. First, we have the ancient traditions, which for a long time supplied the place of history. These often speak with a wonderful consistency and confidence, which may not be lightly gainsaid, and, when taken in connexion with materials of a more definite kind, do indeed form a most important element in human knowledge. But there is another element of far more certainty and importance. We mean that stronghold of chronology, the observations of the signs in the heavens, the recurrence of those comets and eclipses, which never failed to make an impression on the awe-struck memories of the ancients, and consequently have become landmarks to the historian. It is thus that the nightly observations of simple shepherds, and the superstitions of priests and augurs, alike tended towards a great design of which they were wholly unconscious. It is thus that, in a far more extended sense than is commonly understood, the heavenly bodies have become to mankind for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and for years; the guides to that history of the divine government of the world, that universal system of retribution and reward, that scheme of trial, of redemption, of restoration, which began at the creation, and shall receive its completion only when the earth, the scene of this awful drama, shall cease to be.

In every nation of the world, to whom writing, whether hieroglyphical or alphabetic, has been known, we find a providential provision for recording the lapse of time; all the several systems being founded upon astronomical observation, more or less accurate. And in all these instances the want of exact correspondence of the solar with the lunar and the diurnal revolution have been felt, and attempts at adjustment made. These approximations to scientific exactness are wonderful, and ought to afford a strong presumption of divine care, in guiding the imperfect knowledge of mankind to some great eventual use, not yet accomplished. To use the words of Dr. Jarvis,— gods of which presided over their secular employments, served as a balance whereby to regulate the movements of their chronology."—p. 97.

“ We are apt to undervalue the science of the ancients. We ought rather to look upon them with respect and admiration. It is truly astonishing that, with their imperfect instruments, they arrived at so much accuracy in their astronomical calculations. The very want of instruments led to an intensity of observation much greater than ours. As the savage inhabitant of the forest, without a compass, marks his course through the pathless wilds with an accuracy far beyond that of the civilized man, so, at a very early period of the world's history, did even barbarous nations learn, by the rising and the setting of the constellations, to regulate the course of the year. However rude, therefore, the Romans under Romulus may have been, it was impossible for them to depart greatly from the tropical year, because they watched the constellations, and connected with their rising and setting the seasons of agriculture, and the times of their religious festivals. Any aberration would be quickly perceived, and the very observances of a religion, the

The same remarks are applicable to the chronology of other early nations. Abundant means, however, are supplied for the correction of any one system of chronology. For example: the most important events in the annals of the world do not depend, for their verification, upon one series of annals only. Several independent and synchronous series still exist, which are mutually corroborative or corrective. And, above all, we have the sacred records, to which the ultimate appeal, even in secular chronology, must be made, as the balance wheel, or, more properly, the main spring of the whole. And we may be certain that sacred chronology will prove in the end, after all the resources of profane history and all the appliances of human science have been exhausted, the irrefragable index to accurate chronological truth.

It is obvious, indeed, that many difficulties are still in the way. A large portion of these, however, has proceeded, not from the inadequacy of ancient testimony, if rightly applied, but from its abuse; the falsification by interested persons, in later ages, of the guileless traditions of earlier times; the indulgence in conjectures or fanciful theories, carelessly enunciated, or as carelessly taken for facts, or unfairly insinuated; to which must be added, the defects in ancient science. The latter we may expect to unravel as true knowledge advances towards perfection: theories and conjectures must yield to facts, which time, aided by the true guidance of Scripture and of the faithful monuments of antiquity, will establish. Other difficulties proceed from our still imperfect knowledge of some of the languages and records of antiquity, as in Egypt, and the numerous questions of difficult solution involved in the monuments of that extraordinary people. In short, many phenomena still occur apparently at variance with established facts; but there is every hope that truth and patience will in the end adjust these to their proper places, will separate the specious from the genuine, and will ultimately show that the real facts of history, however contradictory to present appearances, are actually the component parts of one universal system.

If the cause of revelation and the true principles of our Church are to be maintained, these great ends cannot be accomplished, humanly speaking, but by the rigid adherence to truth for its own sake, and to the unbiassed examination of evidence in all matters which demand its application. It is, therefore, that we feel cordial satisfaction in recognizing the spirit which has guided both those learned writers whose chronological works are at the head of our article. They are alike distinguished by the qualifications of discursive and profound learning, patient research, and scrupulous diligence in the induction and collocation of facts. They are alike earnest supporters of Catholic Christianity, and while repudiating the theoretical licentiousness of modern Germany, and the vagaries of a mythical theology, are reverently impressed with the mysteries of Divine Providence, whose ways it has been their honest endeavour to vindicate. These two volumes are the result of that well-digested erudition which has ever been the handmaid of sound theology.

The dangerous tendencies of the fascinating way of studying, or rather dreaming about history, now so popular, are well exposed by Mr. Browne:—

“That there exists among us at this day a vast amount of scepticism, openly avowed or working in secret, and unconsciously, no one doubts who has attentively watched the procedure of our popular literature. . . . I am not travelling far from those bearings of the question which directly concern ourselves, in selecting two distinct systems of continental scepticism, as the highest exponents of the sort of unbelief which is afloat amongst ourselves. There exist among us the elements, at least, of the ‘historical scepticism,’ which, even when it professes a belief in the divine origin of the Mosaic and Christian systems, regards their historical documents as matters of the same kind with the earlier profane history, out of which the truth of facts is to be reconstructed by the critical processes of the schools of Niebuhr and Müller: it being assumed that both the Old and New Testament contain more of legend and popular traditions than of true pragmatic history. And have we not among us the germs, at least, of the very different ‘mystical systems’ of Schleiermacher and Strauss, in which objective facts are treated as the mere vehicles or disguises of the subjective idea? whether true or false it matters not, since the truth resides, as Schleiermacher teaches, in the religious sentiment which they excite and express, or, as Strauss maintains, in the philosophical doctrines to which they are evidently capable of being attached.”—p. 20.

Dr. Jarvis is equally opposed to such dangerous methods, as will appear from the following extract from his Introduction:—

“In the prosecution of this plan, the rules which the writer lays down for his guidance are the following. 1. To take nothing for granted. Every necessary question, from beginning to end, must be examined on its own merits, and decided by acknowledged authorities from history, verified, when the case allows it, by astronomical observations and arithmetical computation. 2. With regard to all such questions conjecture is never to be allowed. In the adjustment of a series of events, where the truth is to be arrived at by approximation, and in the absence of positive testimony, probabilities are to be weighed. But in all cases they are carefully to be distinguished as probabilities only. . .

3. No theory before examination is to be assumed. Testimony is to be followed whithersoever it may lead. The two great objects to be constantly kept in view must be the investigation of truth for its own sake, and the lucid communication of that truth to others. 4. In the examination of testimony, the original author is, if possible, to be consulted. . . . 5. The testimony of original witnesses is, as far as possible, to be laid before the reader, in the very language of each witness." . . . pp. 4, 5.

Had these writers done no more than enunciate such timely cautions and sound principles as those just cited, they would have rendered an important service; for it is fearfully evident, that the disregard for strict truth is fast gaining ground, and, we fear, becoming a characteristic of the generation. But they have beneficially acted upon their own principles, and that upon a most extensive scale. It is a circumstance of no small value to the cause of truth, that these two works were undertaken altogether independently of one another, by members of different and distant branches of the same communion. Dr. Jarvis comes forward as the accredited official of the Anglo-American Church; having been appointed in 1838, by the general convention of that Church, their historiographer. His volume is recommended by the intrinsic weight of their special approbation. It is intended to be the introduction to a general ecclesiastical history, a want in our theological apparatus which has long been felt, there being none of unexceptionable character, fit for the general student. The simplicity and clearness, dispassionate judgment, and patient learning evinced by Dr. Jarvis argue well for the sequel, and seem fully to justify the choice of the fathers of the American Church. And surely it speaks well for the energetic vitality of that branch of our communion, that, occupied as its clergy universally are in parochial and other active duties, they can afford, not only to republish the voluminous theology of England, but to furnish from their own more limited horæ subsecivæ works, for which all the appliances of a learned leisure would apparently be required.

Mr. Browne's "most learned work," as Dr. Jarvis justly styles it, has been, like some of the most important of English theology, a voluntary labour. It is one highly appropriate to his station, as head of one of the newly established ecclesiastical colleges of our country.

The object of Dr. Jarvis's book is limited to two points, both of fundamental importance to ecclesiastical history, namely, the establishing the true date of the Nativity, and that of the Passion of our Lord.

The period embraced by his inquiry, which it was necessary to examine in order to adjust these two cardinal dates, extends from the year 776 B.C. to A.D. 238 of the commonly [received] Christian era. In order to this end, he examines, in the first place, the Grecian system of chronology, (the Olympiads, &c., and that ancient rectification of prior systems, the Metonic Cycle ;) then, guided by Varro and Censorinus, the authentic records of Roman chronology, comparing and sifting the testimony of ancient authors, and applying the rules of astronomical calculation for the adjustment of apparent discrepancies in documents of unquestionable authority, such as the Consular, or Capitoline marbles. The results of this most laborious but lucid inquiry are these. First, that our Lord “Made his solemn entry into Jerusalem on Palm Sunday, the 21st of March, which was the tenth day of the Jewish month Nisan ; that he was betrayed by Judas Iscariot on Wednesday evening the 24th of March ; that he celebrated the Passover, and instituted the Sacrament of the Eucharist on Thursday evening, March 25 ; that he was crucified on Friday evening, the 26th, and that he rose from the grave on Easter Sunday, March the 28th. This great event took place in the 4741st year of the Julian period, in the ninth month of the fourth year of the 201st Olympiad, in the last month of the 780th year of Rome, the seventy-third year of the Julian Calendar, the twenty-eighth of the modern Christian era : in the nineteenth year of the associate reign of Tiberius, and the fifteenth year of his sole reign, when Lucius Rubellius Geminus and Caius Fufius Geminus were consuls.”—p. 461.

Secondly, that our Lord

“Was born” (six years before the common era), “on the twenty-fifth of December, in the 4707th year of the Julian period, the sixth month of the third year of the 193rd Olympiad, on the fifth day of the ninth month of the 747th year of Rome, the thirty-ninth year of the Julian Calendar, when D. Lælius Balbus and C. Anstius Vetus were consuls ; on the twenty-third day in the fourth month of the twenty-sixth year after the battle of Actium ; about the tenth day of the seventh month of the thirty-fifth year of Herod, from the time he was made king by the Roman senate ; and exactly, as Orosius states the fact, though he has erred in the date in the very same year in which Augustus shut the temple of Janus, the third time, in token of UNIVERSAL PEACE.”—p. 563.

It plainly appears from the very terms of these two extracts, what a careful examination of various concurrent events, what a thorough investigation of secular and sacred history, ab initio, must have been required to arrive at these conclusions. The author has laid before his readers, in the clearest manner, the data upon which he proceeds, and when it is alleged that, both by the synthetic and analytic method, the results are brought into perfect concord, by a writer who had no favourite theory to establish, the student of sacred history ought to be à priori disposed to trust so careful a guide.

There are some circumstances connected with the establishment of the last-mentioned of these two important dates, in which we are glad to have our views confirmed by the sanction of Dr. Jarvis's opinion. The first is, the refutation of Sir Isaac Newton's gratuitous hypothesis, that the date of our Lord's birth, as of that of other Christian holy days, was arbitrarily affixed by Christians in a late age, at certain cardinal points of the year, or on days which had been appropriated, in the Roman calendar, to certain heathen festivals. While doing all justice to the supreme excellence of Newton in his own proper department, and to his high moral and religious qualities, he justly animadverts upon his shallowness in history, in which, like the historians of our day, he was prone to make facts bend to theories. Dr. Hales has, we think, successfully confuted his reasoning with respect to the regal chronology of Rome. As able a confutation of his ecclesiastical chronology, respecting our Lord's birth, will be found in Dr. Jarvis's work: in which the important fact is clearly proved, that the early Christian Church differed from us in their computation of the nativity, not from indifference, (as Newton most strangely surmises,) but from ignorance. And as appears from St. Chrysostom's homily, quoted by Dr. Jarvis at length, (p. 541,) the approved date was actually adopted afterwards by the Greek Church, after reference had been made to the Roman archives. The testimony is abundant, that both from the "Acts of Pilate," and from other documents, the Romans had sufficient records of the precise time of this great event: and our author has done a most important service, indeed, to the Church, by vindicating the accuracy of this testimony; to which the most ancient Christian writers, Justin Martyr being foremost, confidently appealed.

It would be impossible, in the limit of an article like the present, to attempt an analysis of a work, whose very essence consists in minute astronomical calculations and adjustments. We cannot even pretend to give a skeleton of either his or Mr. Browne's work; and must, therefore, be content, after giving a very general idea of the objects of each, to observe upon a few more prominent particulars.

We must, then, observe that Dr. Jarvis has greatly facilitated the labours, not only of tyros, but of advanced students in chronology, by giving at length the various tables of the ancient systems. The Olympiads (p. 22), the calendar of the year of Romulus, according to Censorinus and Macrobius (p. 63), and various other Roman calendars (pp. 77—87); one in particular (p. 122), in which the whole period of the Olympiads, from the first to the 257th, is given, as well in the Olympic year of Censorinus as in those of the Julian period, in the years from the foundation of Rome, in those of the era of Nabonassar, of Julius Cæsar's and Augustus's reformed calendars, and of the vulgar Christian era. Two consular tables are given ; one from the birth of Augustus to the death of Tiberius, in which the celebrated Fasti Consulares are placed in parallel columns with the chronicles of Idatius, Dion Cassius, Cassiodorus, and the Chronicon Paschale, and compared with other historical and monumental records. The second table (pp. 272—282) is given in an ascending series, from the year in which the Christian historian Censorinus wrote (A. D. 238), to that of Christ's crucifixion (A. D. 28, vulgar era). In the latter list, where the Capitoline records are wanting, the fourfold authority of Cassiodorus, Victorius, Idatius, and the Chronicon Paschale, are compared, and the discrepancies between each are reconciled. In pp. 469—477, are full tables, comprehending every day of the three years of our Lord's ministry ; and at the end is a new harmony of the Gospels, and a synoptical table of the period embraced in the work, in which a condensed view is given of its results.

We can afford but a brief remark or two upon these tables. In his adjustment of the Roman year, Dr. Jarvis shows, that the original year of Romulus consisted, not of ten months, as Varro held ; but, as Plutarch and Licinius Macer. &c., thought, of twelve. No documentary evidence was extant in Varro's day, to prove his opinion, which indeed seems to have been founded on the fact, that December was then the tenth, and, as it was therefore falsely concluded, the last month in the year. All presumptive evidence is against this opinion. There is no sign of it in the old Greek or Egyptian years, from either of which nations the various Italian tribes derived their chronology, and which consisted of twelve months. And if the year had consisted of but ten months, then in five years they would have travelled backwards through all the seasons, which would have been utterly inconsistent with the ancient Roman festivals, appropriated as these were to the various seasons.

The history of the intercalations, and the various attempts, both secular and ecclesiastical, to regulate the calendar, is a matter of the greatest interest to philosophy and religion. These are explained by Dr. Jarvis with his usual clearness. The Metonic cycle of nineteen years, invented 430 years before Christ, was among the principal of these, and formed the foundation for the subsequent ecclesiastical arrangement of the golden numbers. This cycle, Dr. Hales thinks, was probably derived from the Jews, according to Anatolius. It seems at least in accordance with the perfection of the Jewish theocracy, that their system of intercalation should have been perfect; and there appears, therefore, strong ground for Dr. Hales's opinion (vol. i. p. 66), that the Passover was calculated from, and consequently the year regulated by, the true conjunction, or new moon, not from the first appearance of the new moon, as the later Rabbins imagined. But this system (which was in all likelihood corrupted in after times) was always of but limited use; and secular chronology would have been thrown into utter confusion, had it not been for the successive rectifications made, first by Julius Cæsar, and afterwards by Augustus. The providential ordering of these chronological arrangements is well observed upon by Dr. Jarvis—

“To the contemplative Christian it is interesting to observe, that among the arrangements of Divine Providence for the entrance of our blessed Lord into the world, that of the correct admeasurement of time seems to have been one. The system which prevailed through the whole Roman empire, on the authority of Augustus Cæsar, was not brought to its greatest accuracy, till the time had arrived, in which the Desire of all nations was to make his appearance among men.”—p. 115.

In the consular chronology he has followed Bianchini, who is opposed to Petavius in some important respects. And in this branch of his subject he avows a difference of opinion both with Mr. Clinton and Mr. Browne (p. x.); whose work, however, had not appeared, till his own was ready for the press. He also differs from the latter in calculating the reign of Tiberius (Luke iii. 1), from the beginning of his associate government with Augustus, not from his sole reign. This view, taken also by Mr. Greswell, Mr. Browne opposes, on the ground that none of the early ecclesiastical writers so understood it; that there is no vestige of the associate reign to be found on any coins, and that St. Luke would not have used language so likely to be misunderstood by the Roman officer to whom he addressed his Gospel. We think, however, that these objections, which have to a certain degree their weight, are overruled, not only by the known fact, that Tiberius was so associated in the provinces, but by the perfect harmony which Dr. Jarvis's opinion in this respect establishes with the authentic notes of time and history. “Where facts,” he observes, “are found to arrange themselves so harmoniously, without any effort to support a system, or to weave a theory, they must be truth.” Another difference is to be remarked in his assigning three years, not one, as Mr. Browne does, to our Lord's ministry, and, consequently, reckoning four Passovers, instead of two, during that period. We consider Dr. Jarvis's opinion, that which is commonly held, the true one. Again, he does not consider authentic the tradition of the times of the successive courses of the Jewish priests in the Temple, upon which Mr. Browne (pp. 33, 34) builds one of his arguments for the adjustment of the time when the angel appeared to Zacharias, and, consequently of our Lord's Nativity. This argument, supported by the Mishna and by Scaliger, takes for granted, first, that the day when the first course commenced can be certainly ascertained; secondly, that the twenty-four courses were preserved in uninterrupted order from the time of David, who regulated them. Dr. Jarvis, in answering Scaliger (p. 558), observes, that we not only are without evidence on the first point, but that the book of Nehemiah (chap. xii.) contradicts the second; since, after the Captivity, there were but twenty-one or twenty-two courses; as Bishop Patrick also remarks. When Josephus says, that David's division of the priestly courses continued even to the destruction of the Temple, his words apply to the general system only. That the details of the Temple-service were in many respects interrupted is plain, from the extinction of some of the Levitical families, as those of the Kohathite and Merarite singers. Bishop Pearson also, in his tract called "Christ's Birth not mis-timed," holds that this continuation of the cycle of David cannot be proved.

There is another important question upon which these two writers are at variance, namely, the celebration of the last passover by our Lord before his Passion. It is well known that a difficulty exists upon this point; since St. John (xviii. 28) mentions that, the morning after our Lord had celebrated it, the Jews had not yet eaten it; which must make us adopt one of four alternatives. The first is that of Dr. Hales, namely, that our Lord kept the true time; the Jews, from a mistake in calculation, which he shows not to be in itself improbable, the wrong one. But this solution is open to the very serious objection, that, in order to celebrate the passover, it was necessary to have the victim slain by the priests, which they could not have permitted, except upon the proper day. The second theory is Mr. Browne's, that our Lord advisedly anticipated the regular day (p. 63), which of course is liable to the same objection as the first. Dr. Jarvis's opinion is, that a diversity of practice was allowed. We think, however, that the fourth opinion, that of Lightfoot, is the most probable (though all are beset with difficulties), namely, that "the passover," in the above-mentioned passage of St. John, does not mean the paschal lamb, but what was called the chagigah, a supplemental part of the paschal feast, eaten the following or fifteenth day.

All these differences of opinion have been mentioned, in order to show what embarrassments beset the science of chronology, even when investigated by men of the greatest acuteness and candour. The truth, however, of revelation is not in the least affected by these difficulties, which are incidental to all history, and mainly arise from the discordancies in the systems of ancient chronology, which it is a work of the utmost labour to adjust. The actual existence of the facts of the Gospel, however we may be perplexed about their exact time and sequence, are amply proved by the undesigned and even unwilling testimony of heathens, and by such a consent of Christians as is plainly seen to be artless, unsystematic, and utterly wanting in concert or combination. If, however, the science of chronology be pursued still further in the spirit of inquiry manifested by both Dr. Jarvis and Mr. Browne, there is every hope that a clear adjustment will eventually be made of those points on which they differ, and that the integrity and ingenuousness so conspicuous in both will make them desirous of aiming at such an adjustment in a spirit of mutual respect. Meantime we would strongly recommend the study of both volumes, in connexion with those of Hales and Clinton, to all who are desirous of mastering the facts of ecclesiastical history, and of avoiding the enticing bewilderments of speculation.

It is with great regret that we must part with Dr. Jarvis after such an inadequate notice, and must altogether omit any observations upon his "harmony of the Gospels," which forms the termination of his work.

We must now pass on to Mr. Browne's book. The object of this is more comprehensive than that of Dr. Jarvis. It takes in the whole extent of the chronology of the Holy Scriptures, as far as this relates to the history of the Church, terminating with the Acts and Epistles. From the consideration of unfulfilled prophecy he altogether abstains, holding the ancient doctrine, that prophecy can never be understood till it is fulfilled. But, in the adjustment of the scriptural history from the flood downwards, he has followed the same principles which guided Dr. Jarvis, namely, the careful consideration of testimony, wherever found, and strict matter-of-fact calculation upon astronomical principles. The remarkable feature of the book, however, which its title designates, and is unfolded in the introduction, is this, that the process of strict investigation suggested to the author's mind a result, which it would be unjust to call a theory ; for, if his premises be correct, it is a simple matter of fact, which at once is made clear to the eye of the reader ; and we are quite sure that no author was ever less disposed to accommodate facts to theories. This result we shall endeavour to explain in a few words. It appears, according to Mr. Browne, that a system has been observed in the Divine economy of times and seasons so extremely regular as to leave no doubt of design. Such a phenomenon will be allowed to be à priori probable, by all who acknowledge the great analogy between the course of nature and the course of Providence. The facts accordingly are stated to be these:—From the creation to the deluge (according to Mr. Browne's calculation) is a period of 1655 years; from the exode to the conflagration of the second temple (A.D. 70) is a similar date of 1655 years. Again: the Israelites were forty years in the wilderness; and then succeeded a period of 450 years of Judges, beginning with Joshua; the whole being a period of seven times seventy years. Then there are forty years from Samuel, the first of the prophets, till the accession of David, succeeded by 450 years of kings; and then seventy years of captivity, the seventh part of the preceding period. From the flood to the promise to Abraham was a period of 430 years; from the promise to the Exode a similar period. And again (to mention no other instances), between the crucifixion and the destruction of Jerusalem there was an interval of forty years, a term which Mr. Browne (p. 372) considers explanatory of the "sign of the Prophet Jonas," who gave warning for forty days of the destruction of Nineveh.

Now to the most cursory reader of the Bible it must be obvious, and it has often been a subject of remark, that certain numbers, as seven and its multiples, and forty, are of such frequent occurrence, as manifestly to indicate design. The number of forty days or years generally indicates a state of transition, or an interval between two great and distinct periods of history: as in the times indicated above, in the forty days preceding our Lord's ministry, when He fasted in the wilderness, and in the forty days which intervened between His resurrection and His ascension. Mr. Browne has made a legitimate use of the indications afforded by Holy Scripture, to marshal and develop these phenomena, and to deduce from them a sublime system indeed, a course of providential ordinance, as regular as that which brings round the seasons, and governs the revolutions of the stars of heaven. It must surely be the natural impulse of devout and generous minds, to wish the author success in the establishing of his proofs, so

"That to the height of this great argument
He may assert Eternal Providence,
And vindicate the ways of God to men."

Mr. Browne treats his subject in an ascending order, beginning with the adjustment of our Lord's nativity, and terminating with the highest point of mundane chronology, the creation. Each several portion of his work is bounded by events, the dates of which are cardinal to the general scheme ; but, while having this great object in view, he at the same time fulfils the further object of determining the historical and literary chronology of the Scriptures in detail, even when these details do not immediately influence the general question.

One of the most difficult points of sacred chronology is the filling up of the chasms which occasionally occur where no record of time is to be found in the sacred text. Our author has shewn a laudable anxiety to clear up the difficulties in these respects, by comparing Scripture with Scripture, and by avoiding as far as possible any conjectural supplements of time. Of his skill, and as we think, success in this method of investigation, there is a beautiful instance in the 5th chapter, (pp. 254—259,) where he elucidates, by a close and ingenious argument, St. Paul's statement in Acts xiii. 18—22. The periods of the apostle are, forty years in the wilderness, 450 years of Judges till Samuel, and then a period of forty years to David. Many critics, among them Mr. Clinton, (with whom Mr. Browne generally agrees,) understands St. Paul to speak of periods which are not consecutive, and accordingly Mr. Clinton supplies two conjectural periods, one of twenty-seven years, (i. e. from the death of Moses to the first servitude under the Philistines,) and another of twelve years, preceding Saul's election. Mr. Browne avoids both these conjectural chasms, by showing the continuity of St. Paul's chronology ; viz., forty years in the wilderness ; then sixty years (from the death of Moses) ; which last, together with 390 years of Judges from their first servitude, collected from the Bible narrative, make up a period of 450 years : the second period of St. Paul. This second period extends to the emancipation of the Israelites, and their solemn humiliation on the day of Mizpeh (1 Sam. viii.), being the emphatic period of Samuel's ministry ; while the last period of St. Paul is the forty years extending from that day to the reign of David. By this simple elucidation, this much controverted period is exactly adjusted with the time of David's reign (b.c. 1057 or 6), and that of the Exode, which Mr. Browne has established on grounds altogether independent of this intermediate argument.

It appears to us evident that there exists conclusive grounds for his theory as to the providential periods of 490 years. But the case is different with respect to the parallelism of the longer periods of 1655 years ; i. e. the interval between the Creation and the Deluge, and that from the Exode to the conflagration of the second temple. The parallelism will be altogether vitiated, if either Mr. Browne's cardinal date of our Lord's nativity should prove unsound, or if the longer chronology of the Septuagint prove correct, in opposition to the shorter one of the Hebrew. Now between the principal modern theories respecting the Nativity are the following discrepancies. Mr. Browne and Dr. Hales place it five years before the vulgar era; Dr. Jarvis, with Kepler, Cappellus, and Dodwell, six; and Archbishop Usher, four. Still the difference is not so great, when considered in relation to so great a number of years, but that there is, in any view of the case, a very near approximation to the sublime theory supported in this volume.

The question, however, of the antediluvian genealogies does not appear to have received so lucid and careful a solution from Mr. Browne as he assumes in his seventh chapter (pp. 330—358). He has supported his view with his usual ability; but, after all, we must consider him, in this respect, as merely an able advocate of the side of a question still sub judice. It is well known that a most remarkable difference exists between the Hebrew text and the Septuagint version, with respect to the lives of the antediluvian and many of the postdiluvian patriarchs; the difference being mainly this, that out of seventeen successive generations, from Adam to Serug inclusive, thirteen are each one hundred years longer in the Septuagint than in the Hebrew: that is, each patriarch is represented as having lived one hundred years longer before the birth of his son; while the sum of each antediluvian life is the same in each; consequently the residues (the period, that is, of life, after the birth of the recorded son,) must altogether differ in the Hebrew and the Septuagint. The difference is so systematic and uniform, that the alteration of the original reading made in either the Hebrew or in the Septuagint must have been designed: in other words, the Scriptures must have been deliberately tampered with. It is utterly impossible the difference can have arisen from the mistakes of transcribers, or the omission of numerical characters: the difference in the residues is sufficient to refute such a solution. Now, so difficult has it been to find an adequate cause to urge either Jews or Greeks to so daring a forgery, that some of our profoundest biblical scholars (as Bishop Walton in his Prolegomena) have left the question undecided. We cannot, of course, afford to enter into the difficulties of the question that arise from the examination of the text, but must confine ourselves to the external argument.

Mr. Browne argues that the corruption could not have originated with the Jews, because, first, they were so very scrupulous with respect to preserving the integrity of the sacred text; secondly, they wanted an adequate motive. He combats the alleged motive, namely, their desire to neutralize the prevailing belief, that the Messiah would appear in the sixth millenary of the world, by making it appear that the world had not attained to that age at the time of our Lord's Nativity; an object which would be secured by the curtailment of the patriarchal generations. But he considers it likely that the Alexandrine translators were induced to make the alteration from a fear of incurring the ridicule of the Egyptians, who, priding themselves upon their own remote antiquity, would laugh at such short annals as those of the Jews. Now it appears to us that Mr. Browne, in his observations, has not done justice to the arguments on the contrary side, so ably stated by Dr. Hales in the first volume of his Chronology (vol. i. pp. 273—283, second 8vo. edition), who holds to the opinion of the earliest Fathers of the Church, with the exception of the fanciful Origen, and St. Jerome (whose bias in favour of Jewish integrity is well known), and a few others. Dr. Hales shows that the mutilation of the Scriptures by the Jews had been asserted by Justin Martyr and by Ephrem Syrus; and the investigations of later times have proved them to be by no means such careful guardians of the sacred text as they pretend. In this, as in other matters, they have strained at a gnat and swallowed a camel. Their evil motive is asserted both by Ephrem Syrus and Abulfaragi; and of the prevalence of the tradition there are strong indications. There was a comparative facility, too, for corrupting the Hebrew Scriptures, since, during the second century (when he supposes the alteration to have taken place), they were confined to a portion merely of the Jews; the Christians, and a large number of the Jews themselves, using the Septuagint, which was far more generally diffused, and therefore the less liable to designed mutilation. As for the imputation on the Septuagint translators, that is a mere surmise, unsupported by evidence. The alteration made would not have been sufficient to overcome the ridicule of the Egyptians, of whose extravagant computations this extended chronology still must have fallen very short. Besides, it is, we think, evident, on a careful examination of the LXX version, that its compilers were scrupulously accurate in keeping to the text before them, however corrupt it may have sometimes been, so as, in many passages, rather to give an unintelligible translation, than to alter from conjecture a letter of their copy. And it is evident that the Pentateuch is one of the most correctly translated parts of the version. But besides, Philo of Alexandria, in the Apostles' age, asserts the fidelity of the Greek version. Josephus never hints at any discrepancy between the Hebrew and the Greek, even when writing on the subject of chronology. Theophilus of Antioch, in the second century, follows the longer computation ; and from his omission of the second Cainan, it is evident he did not copy from the Septuagint. The Targum of Jonathan, and some other Rabbinical books, follow the longer computation. So that we have no notice whatever taken by the Jews or early Christians of any such glaring discrepancy, which, standing as it does, in the very front of Holy Scripture, must have been obtrusively palpable. The presumption, therefore, of a mutilation subsequent, at least, to Christ's Advent, appears to us very strong indeed.

Josephus, in his computation, is well known not to have been consistent. In his first computation he mainly agrees with the Septuagint (rejecting, however, the second Cainan), while, in a subsequent part of his work, there are statements in accordance with the shorter Jewish computation. Mr. Browne's argument, that the text of Josephus has been tampered with in his genealogy, is met by a statement of at least equal weight by Dr. Halcs, that his latter summary has been altered by Judaizing editors. These arguments may be fairly balanced.

We might add to these arguments the opinion of Dr. Kennicott, who considers the Jews to have been the original corrupters ; and he ably brings forward an argument to be drawn from the Hebrew text against itself. Though the ages of six antediluvians are regularly shorter, yet the remaining three, the sixth, eighth, and ninth, much exceed the ages of the other six. Whereas in the LXX these three ages are regular and consistent with the other six. "The truth seems to be clearly this, that if they dropped the centuries of the ages of Jared, Methuselah, and Lamech, before they begat children, and added them to the remainder of their lives, they must, by this reckoning, have extended their lives beyond the flood." He quotes the assertions of Eusebius and Jacob Edessenus, that, in the 7th century, Hebrew copies existed with the longer numbers.

We have dwelt the longer upon this point, because it is one upon which a considerable part of Mr. Browne's theory depends ; and we must express a hope that, in his next edition, he will give it at least a more detailed examination. Nothing, we repeat, is further from our minds than a notion that Mr. Browne has had any conscious bias to make facts bend to theories. Still, perhaps, there never was a great theory, like his, started, and successfully established in many of its details, which its constructor, however wise and conscientious, was not insensibly led to push beyond its legitimate bounds. The success of demonstration, or at least of strong presumptive evidence in some details, induces a spirit of theorizing, which at the beginning of the investigation was carefully eschewed. This tendency is inseparable, perhaps, from human nature ; and we would therefore respectfully entreat Mr. Browne to re-consider this portion of his work, in which he certainly has not strengthened his position with his usual care.

But we cannot leave this part of the subject without a word on the manner in which this learned writer, so ready in general to do justice to the merits of others, has spoken of one to whom our age is so largely indebted as the author referred to above, Dr. Hales. "At the close of the last century," he says, "Dr. Hales followed in the same track (i. e. of Vossius and Jackson), pretending, however, to re-construct the genuine Alexandrian text from that of Josephus." What force Mr. Browne means to affix to the word pretending, we know not. That its most obvious sense, however, is one of an injurious kind, cannot be denied ; and in speaking of a venerable, learned, and most candid critic, more guarded language ought to have been used. Dr. Hales' fair and elaborate argument, and ingenious attempt at the rectification of a very perplexed text (in accordance, we must say, with common sense and sound criticism), little deserves a notice which at least appears somewhat contemptuous. His work on chronology has doubtless its faults ; it is far too verbose and digressive, and might well have been contracted to half its size, nor does his conjectural criticism evince much skill in that particular department of scholarship. But for profound learning, for accurate collation of facts, for fulness of information, and for sincere and guileless piety, Dr. Hales is inferior to no writer of our generation, and second to none in the science of chronology.

It is with regret that we have made these strictures, which are still quite consistent with sincere respect for the learned writer. And (although we must decline entering into the controversy in any degree whatever) it is with no less regret that we must animadvert upon the tone used by Mr. Browne towards one of our profoundest scholars, Mr. Greswell, whose labours, independently of any chronological question, have so signally enriched our theology. Mr. Browne ought by this time to have known too well the great perplexities attending the details of chronology to be so very severe upon any error real or supposed committed by others. We shall merely observe upon the controversy itself, that we do not think Mr. Greswell's general system so much affected by the point in dispute, as Mr. Browne supposes ; while upon some others, as that of the associate reign of Tiberius, we think Mr. Greswell and Dr. Jarvis are right.

The second part of Mr. Browne's work contains first, "Institutes of Chronology," a compendium of the technical apparatus requisite for the study ; secondly, the remarks on Mr. Greswell's scheme alluded to above ; thirdly, the chronographies of the Assyrians, Chaldeans, and Egyptians, compared with the Scriptures ; then, a harmony of part of the gospels ; and lastly, a beautiful and interesting essay on prophecy.

On these parts of his book but a few words can be said. As to the Egyptian chronology, Mr. Browne's remarks, advanced with great modesty and caution, are striking and valuable. He justly suspects the ancient lists of dynasties to have been corrupted by the priests, in order to invalidate the urgent claims of Scripture history. This may be one solution of the discordance observable between the lists given by Manetho, Syncellus, Eratosthenes, and Herodotus ; which are clearly irreconcilable upon any ordinary hypothesis. Mr. Browne, on commencing his inquiry, says,—

“ Of the monuments I shall make but sparing use : I am not competent to express a critical judgment respecting their value as documents of chronology ; but I cannot help suspecting that in the present state of hieroglyphical knowledge, their indications must be too precarious to be relied upon for constructive purposes.”—p. 572.

In this misgiving we fully participate. Whatever degree of certainty is to be attributed to hieroglyphical knowledge, the further questions remain, how can we be assured that many of these records are not forgeries by priests of much later times ? and what certain tests have we of the antiquity and genuineness of monuments ? and how can it be proved (indeed, we have yet seen no proof that is demonstrative) that the phonetic system of writing was not introduced into Egypt in comparatively recent times ? Indeed, we are strongly of opinion, that no real and consistent light can be thrown upon Egyptian history, till some unquestionable records of the Israelites are discovered among its monuments, a discovery of which we are far from despairing ; and that, till testimony connected with the sacred annals be found, nothing certain will be known of that extraordinary people.

In his views as to the interpretation of prophecy, Mr. Browne agrees mainly with Mr. Maitland, in adhering to the literal system. Without pronouncing upon the merits of a very disputed question, it must be allowed that the masters in this school have, at least, done this great service to the cause of truth, by recalling us to more careful and exact statements and examinations of facts, and by repressing the wild and licentious interpretation of Holy Scripture.

We would beg particularly to refer our readers to the beginning of his fifth section (p. 663), and the essay on the nature, intent, and complex structure of prophecy, in which he shows the whole of Scripture to discharge a prophetic office. It is one of the many passages in which the author relieves the dryness of chronological inquiries by great beauty of style, justness of thought, and soundness of critical scholarship.

It is much, however, to be regretted, that the arrangement of his work is not more commodious. It is too much broken up with Appendices ; and had it been diffused into two volumes with larger type, it would have been far more convenient for use and reference. But, above all, there is a sad want of a good Index, a want under which Dr. Jarvis's book also labours. A good Index is, indeed, at all times rare, but the total want of one in a work of reference like Mr. Browne's is a serious defect. Indeed, we cannot but wish that men of learning would, in pity to their less gifted disciples, condescend to bestow a little time upon an appendage which, doubtless, implies some drudgery on the part of the authors, but would be well repaid by the gratitude of their readers.

ART. IV.—The Principles of Political Economy; with some Inquiries respecting their application, and a Sketch of the Rise and Progress of the Science. By J. R. MACCULLOCH, Esq. A New Edition, enlarged and corrected throughout. Edinburgh: W. Tait. London: Longman.

WE remember attending, several years ago, a meeting which was held for the discussion of questions of Political Economy, when, among other subjects proposed for consideration, the following was fixed upon for the evening's debate: "What progress has the Science of Political Economy made since the days of Adam Smith?"

We recollect being at the time particularly struck by the sentiments which were expressed on the occasion by one of the party present, who took a leading part in the debate. The gentleman to whom we allude was himself an author of some celebrity, who had written on the subject. He was generally looked up to as an authority in such matters; and the opinion which he gave we think worth recording, not only on account of its general bearing on the nature and methods of this science, but because of the light which it throws upon the views of the school to which he evidently belonged, and of which Mr. Macculloch (whose work we are about to consider) is the most famed living disciple and expositor.

This gentleman, then, after having noticed the able and useful works of Messrs. Say, Stoich, and Sismondi, in which the subject had been treated more methodically than in the Inquiry into the Wealth of Nations, and having adverted to the more important contributions of Mr. Malthus, in his Essays on Population and Rent, concluded his survey by declaring his conviction that Mr. Ricardo, in his celebrated treatise, had completed all that, prior to his time, remained to be done, and had thoroughly exhausted the subject. In his (this gentleman's) judgment, we were now in possession of a full, satisfactory, and perfect theory of political economy. Nothing further was left us to inquire into.

It is, perhaps, needless to say that the majority of those who were present on the occasion did not much sympathize with these views. The general current of feeling ran quite the other way. Some considered that there were yet several questions which required further elucidation and development, and nearly all seemed to agree that it was difficult to prescribe limits to a subject embracing so many topics, and extending over so wide a field of inquiry.

Notwithstanding, however, this general expression of dissent from his opinion, it cannot be supposed that one so conversant with the subject as that gentleman was judged to be had taken it up on light grounds, or that there did not exist some good reasons which might account for his having been led to entertain such views.

These reasons we have used our best endeavours to discover, and the course of our reflections has led us to what we conceive to be the true explanation of them. They appear to us to have their root and origin in the peculiar mode of investigation which has been pursued by this modern school of economists. The subject has been treated by them as one, the knowledge of which is to be acquired by reasoning from premises which are assumed as certain and incontrovertible first principles. This method of inquiry characterizes their writings, is interwoven with their system, and gives a mathematical cast to all their conclusions. The evil of this method is, that it leads to premature generalizations, and to incomplete, and therefore erroneous, views of the truths which it professes to establish.

There is, however, something so captivating in the ease and neatness with which important questions appear to be settled by this method of treating them, that it has been extolled and acted upon by other writers, who differ from this school in many important particulars, but who, in this respect, seem to have been carried away by the influence of their example. "The foundations of political economy (says the author of the article in the Encyclop. Metropol.) consist of a few general propositions deduced from observations or experience." And again:—"This science depends more on reasoning than on observation. If economists had been aware that its principal difficulty consists, not in the ascertainment of its facts, but on the use of its terms, they would have directed their attention to the selection and consistent use of an accurate nomenclature."

Now, if it be true that the propositions of political economy are few in number, which they must needs be if they are founded on the definitions of half a dozen terms, the conclusions to be wrought out of them cannot be very many; and even if those data were more numerous than they are here represented to be, as soon as the results of them are worked out, there must be an end of the whole subject. There is nothing further to seek for. Such a system carries its own natural termination along with it; and that termination cannot be very remote. So, doubtless, thought the speaker who delivered the opinion to which we have referred. He could not but perceive that there must be a necessary limit to deductions drawn from such scanty materials. That limit he thought we had reached; and we look upon his declaration in no other light than as an avowal, on his part, that the à priori method of investigation, adopted by himself and others, had done for the science all that it was capable of doing,—that it could go no further. We had arrived at its ultimate point.

This, too, we are free to confess, is our own conviction. No further progress can, we think, be now made in the science by following up the system of those economists. Deduction has achieved for us all that it can; we fear that it has frequently led us astray. If we would acquire a further insight into the subject, we must invert the order of procedure; we must try what induction will do. Instead of making axioms and definitions the basis of our reasonings, as has been heretofore done, we must begin by studying the economic form and structure of society, and so build up our system upon the solid foundation of experimental knowledge. It is by this means only that we can hope to arrive at results which will be found to accord with things as they are, and that will enable us to form any anticipations regarding the future which have a chance of being realized¹.

Mr. Macculloch, however, in the statement of his principles, and his ordinary method of reasoning from them, belongs to the deductive school of political economy, and there we must follow him. The examination of his book will afford us an opportunity of judging what are the doctrines which are to be obtained by this method, and what reliance is to be placed on them.

This work has passed through three editions. It is written throughout in a clear, popular, and unaffected style. Although mainly founded upon the system of Mr. Ricardo, it nevertheless contains some important variations from the views of that original writer, in which we think Mr. Macculloch has not always been successful. In one or two instances, indeed, he seems to have quite misunderstood the doctrine of his master, and has himself fallen into inconsistencies and even contradictions in his attempt to set up new views of his own. These we shall have occasion to notice as we proceed.

Adopting the language of Mr. Mill², Mr. Macculloch sets out by stating, that what domestic economy is to a single family, political economy is to the state.

This may perhaps accord with the original meaning of the expression. It may apply to the view taken of the subject by the French economists, who invented the name, and have written upon wealth, as though their designs were to lay down the rules of an art, rather than explain the principles of a science. Modern writers, however, confine it to this latter sense only. But, however applied, it is at best a very vague and ill-chosen analogy. It points to no immediate or specific subject, nor in any way refers to what it is meant to include or exclude. Hence it is difficult to define its limits, which are in a great measure arbitrary.

According to Mr. Macculloch it is

"The science of the laws which regulate the production, distribution, and consumption of those articles or products which have exchangeable value, and are either necessary, useful, or agreeable to man." (p. 1.)

This definition, however, though true in the main, is not altogether free from objection. First it refers to value, before we are told what value is; and, secondly, it does not confine itself to material products, which we conceive to be a very necessary limitation, the want of which is sure to create confusion. In common discourse wealth always refers to what is tangible, and capable of transmission from one owner to another. The rules which apply to such things are, for the most part, inapplicable to those which are immaterial and intangible, however useful or necessary these latter may be. We therefore think that the sort of wealth which forms the subject-matter of political economy is more correctly represented as consisting of *those material objects which are appropriated by man before they are used or consumed*³. This definition excludes what exists in unlimited quantity, and therefore unsusceptible of appropriation, and also what does exist in limited quantity, but is useless, and therefore not worth appropriation.

It is one of Mr. Macculloch's tenets, that labour is the sole source of wealth, to the exclusion of land and capital, the co-operation of which appears to be equally essential. In reply to a remark made in the "Quarterly Review," that the earth is a source of wealth, because it furnishes the materials to work upon, which have a value independently of the labour bestowed upon them, Mr. Macculloch answers (page 62), that it would be as correct to say that the earth was the source of pictures and statues, because it furnished the materials made use of by painters and statuaries. But as no such arts could possibly exist without the subjects on which they are to be exercised, and that those subjects are appropriated prior to the use that is made of them by the artist, if language have any meaning at all, the earth from which they are derived is unquestionably a source of wealth.

The love of generalization, and the desire to reduce every thing to a single principle, has led Mr. Macculloch into other still more important deviations from the ordinary language of political economy, in the use and application of his terms. It is well known that in the production of wealth natural agents bear an important part. In most instances we are able to avail ourselves of their gratuitous services, in which case, although they increase the quantity or improve the quality of what is produced, they add nothing to its value. In some cases, however, their assistance must be paid for, e. g. when time is required for their operation, and then they must necessarily add to the value as well as to the quantity or quality of the work, or the production would be abandoned as profitless. Mr. Macculloch will not allow that they are in any case sources of wealth or value. He says,

“It may be thought that this principle (viz. labour being the sole source of wealth and value) is at variance with what is observed to take place in the production of certain descriptions of commodities. Thus if a cask of new wine be kept for a definite period, or till it arrives at maturity, it will acquire a higher value. Now as the change produced in the wine is entirely brought about by the operation of natural agents, and as without the change the wine would have no higher value, it has been contended that this is a case in which the labour of natural agents is plainly productive of an increased value. But it is easy to see that this is a mistake. The cask of wine is a capital, or is the result of the labours employed in cultivating, gathering, pressing, and otherwise preparing the grapes from which it has been made. But it is necessary, in order to give time for the processes of fermentation, decomposition, &c. to effect the desired changes in the wine, that it should be laid aside until they are completed. The producer of wine would not, however, employ his capital in this way unless it were to yield him the same return that is derived from the capital employed in other businesses. And hence it follows, that though the processes carried on by nature render the wine more desirable, or bestow on it a greater degree of utility, they add nothing to its value, the additional value which is acquired being a consequence of the profit accruing on the capital required to enable the processes being carried on.”—p. 355.

In the former part of the above passage it is said that, without the change occasioned by the natural agent, the wine would have no additional value; but in the latter part it is said, that these natural agents add nothing to the value of the wine. The increase of its value is attributed to the profit upon the capital employed, which Mr. Macculloch considers as synonymous with so much additional labour being bestowed upon it; for in the paragraph immediately following this passage we are told, that capital is accumulated labour; and as accumulated labour is the result of immediate labour, the additional profit, which adds to the value of the wine, is to be considered as so much additional labour. This, to be sure, is rather a roundabout way of endeavouring to prove that profits are labour. It may be thought by some to be very ingenious reasoning, but to us it appears to involve as gross an abuse of terms as can well be conceived. That the additional value is a profit to the wine-merchant, proportioned to the time of his keeping the wine, we allow. That this profit is additional labour bestowed on the wine is what we cannot allow. There are two conditions necessary for the wine to acquire the additional value;—1. the improvement of its flavour; 2. the time required for it. If the flavour could be acquired at once, or if by keeping it it does not improve (an accident which not unfrequently occurs) it would command no higher price. It is, therefore, correct to say that we pay for natural agents, when they require time for their operations.

Adam Smith, who used the term wealth in its popular sense, as denoting material commodities, drew an important distinction between the labour which was employed in the production of such things, and that which, however useful or desirable, did not realize itself in those palpable subjects. The former he denominated productive, and the latter unproductive labour; that is, unproductive of what he considered to constitute wealth. Nothing can well be simpler than this classification, nor clearer than the reason adduced in support of it. Instead, however, of viewing it as the consistent and necessary consequence of confining wealth to material objects, and therefore one which he was not bound to adopt (who uses that term without any such limitation), Mr. Macculloch can perceive no distinction between these two sorts of labour; he can discern not the smallest difference between them (p. 536), and utterly denies that any such exists. And yet what intelligible idea is it possible to form of the produce of the labour of the menial servant, of the public functionary, of the physician, of the lawyer? Where are the wages, rent, and profits into which their produce is divided? and, if they be nowhere to be found, does not this very fact of itself establish the distinction which he denies?

Again; it is usual to give to that portion of the stock of a country which is employed productively, or with a view to profit, the name of capital, which, for the sake of greater perspicuity, Adam Smith has distinguished into two kinds, fixed and circulating; meaning by fixed capital such as always continues in possession of the owner, and by circulating capital, such as yields him a profit only when he parts with or sells it. The talent and dexterity acquired by the workman, and used by him productively, is likewise considered by Adam Smith as a capital fixed and realized in his person.

Mr. Macculloch, however, not only makes a cross division on this subject, by representing fixed or circulating capital as determined by different degrees of durability, instead of being determined by its continuance or non-continuance in the hands of those who produce or use it, but he likewise comprises under the head capital (page 96) whatever is available for the support of human beings; and further on (pages 116 and 356), strange to say, he includes in it the very human beings themselves,—not simply their talent and ingenuity productively employed, but the very persons of the individuals who possess those qualities.

These innovations on the accustomed meaning of terms which had been already fixed are worse than useless. If persevered in, they lead to confusion, and if abandoned to inconsistency. Mr. Macculloch is sometimes driven to one or the other of these alternatives; for instance, his observations on the uses and advantages of capital are very just and proper, but they apply to it only in its ordinary sense. He remarks:—

1. That it enables work to be executed which could not otherwise be executed.

2. That it enables it to be executed better and more expeditiously.

3. That it saves labour.

All this is perfectly true; but how can it be predicated of food, or of man, whose labour it is said to save?

On this same subject, the employment of capital, there occurs the following passage:

“Had it been a law of nature that the quantity of produce obtained from industrious undertakings should merely suffice to replace that which had been expended in carrying them on, society would have made no progress, and man would have continued in the state in which he was originally placed. But the established order of things is widely different. It is constituted so that in the vast majority of cases more wealth or produce is obtained, through the agency of a given quantity of labour, than is required to carry on that labour. This surplus or excess of produce has been denominated profit, and it is from it that capital is wholly derived.”—p. 103.

It is obvious that no land can be cultivated for the purpose of procuring food, unless it will return a larger amount of sustenance than is required in order to maintain the cultivators; and the excess produced above their necessary maintenance is the absolute limit to any rent or profit which it is capable of yielding. But in no other department of human industry is this principle at all applicable. There is, in the majority of cases, no more connexion between the quantity of the things produced and the quantity of the things consumed in the process of production, than there is between yards of cloth and gallons of wine. The only possible means of comparing the one with the other is by their value, and not by their quantity. We cannot, therefore, agree with Mr. Macculloch in his doctrine, that profit is occasioned by an excess of the quantity produced over and above the quantity consumed. It is not always true of the produce of the land; for the varying value of the crop must often make the quantity necessary to put into motion the labour that has produced it, greater or less than the quantity actually consumed in the production. In the one case the profit will be greater than the excess of quantity produced, and in the other case it will fall below it. Thus, if to produce 120 quarters of corn it has cost 100 quarters, the excess will be twenty quarters; but if, owing to a rise of price, when those 120 quarters are brought to market, ninety-five quarters should be sufficient to put into motion the same quantity of labour as that employed in the production of the whole 120 quarters, instead of twenty quarters, the profit will be increased to twenty-five quarters; or if, on the other hand, owing to a fall of price, 105 quarters should be required to command that same quantity of labour, the profit will be reduced to fifteen quarters. In other sorts of industry, the quantities produced and those consumed relate, for the most part, to perfectly different subjects, which are obviously incommensurable by each other; so that profits must depend upon the excess of value, and not upon the excess of quantity produced.

It seems to be a favourite tenet of Mr. Macculloch, and one which he has taken much pains to inculcate, that the power to accumulate in a country depends altogether upon the rate of profit.

“Seeing, therefore, that capital is produced out of the excess of the produce realized by those who engage in industrious undertakings, over and above the produce necessarily expended in carrying them on, it plainly follows that the means of amassing capital will be greatest where this excess is greatest, or, in other words, that they will be greatest where the rate of profit is greatest.”—p. 105.

If, on the rise or fall of profit, other things remained the same, this doctrine would of course be true; but, in the progress of society, it is very rarely the case that other things do remain the same. The very circumstances which diminish the rate of profit (unless temporarily) increase rent, stated wages, and derivative incomes, which are all sources of accumulation, and in our own country especially very largely so. It happens, therefore, that practically the augmentations that are made to capital are often the greatest where the rate of profit is the lowest.

Even if profits were the sole, or even chief fund out of which a nation could add to its capital, its power of accumulation from this source must depend upon the mass of its profits, and not upon their rate. If in one country profits are ten per cent., and in another fifteen per cent., yet if the capital in the former be double what it is in the latter, its power of augmenting its capital will, cæteris paribus, be as twenty to fifteen.

Mr. Macculloch has a long chapter on the subject of glut. We are certainly as little apprehensive as himself that a glut is ever likely to be brought about by the substitution of machinery for human labour. It is the fall of commodities below their cost of production that is ruinous to the producer, and not their fall in consequence of a diminution of the cost. A fall from the latter cause is an universal benefit, since it puts the article to which it applies within the reach of those who could not before obtain it, and that without any abatement of profit to the producer. Such a fall, too, is usually attended by an increase of the quantity demanded and consumed, so that the total value sold is greater than it was before. A fall, however, arising from the over-supply of a commodity of which the cost has not been reduced, is a totally different thing, and the question is, whether or not such a fall can possibly be general.

In arguing against this possibility, Mr. Macculloch has propounded some things which we could hardly have expected to have proceeded from the pen of a man of sense. He says,—

“In exerting his productive powers, every man intends either to consume the entire produce of his labours himself, or to exchange it, or a portion of it, for such commodities or services as he wishes to obtain from others. Suppose now that he directly consumes every thing he produces; it is obvious that in such a case there can be no glut or excess; for to suppose that commodities intended for direct consumption by the producers may be in excess, is equivalent to supposing that production may be carried on without a motive,—that there may be an effect without a cause. When individuals, instead of directly consuming the produce of their industry, offer it in exchange for others, their miscalculations may occasion a glut. Should A for example produce commodities and offer them in exchange to B or C, who is unable to furnish him with those he wished to obtain, he will have miscalculated; and there will be a glut. He should, it is obvious, have offered his commodities to others, or have applied himself to the production of those which he wanted. This, however, is an error that will speedily be rectified; for, if he find that he cannot attain his object by prosecuting his present employment, he will forthwith set about changing it, producing in time to come such commodities only as he may find a merchant for, or as he means to consume himself."—p. 192.

Now, in a state of society in which the division of labour is carried to its utmost extent,—where each one confines himself, or pretty nearly so, to a single branch of business, and exchanges the produce of his one species of industry, either for labour or for the various produce of many other kinds of industry,—how is it possible for a man directly to consume himself every thing he produces? and, if he could so consume it, what would become of his capital which is vested in it? Or, again, how is he to follow Mr. Macculloch's recommendation, and apply himself to the production of the other things he may want? Is he to quit a business to which he has been perhaps all his life accustomed, in order to take up others of which he knows little or nothing; or, in other words, to make himself a Jack of all trades; in doing which it is pretty certain that he would become master of none? But supposing these difficulties to be got over, and that he had both the will and capability of undertaking some new employment, from whence is he to derive the means of doing it, seeing that his capital is locked up in an article which is either wholly unsaleable, or which he cannot dispose of but at such a sacrifice as must render his continuance in his own trade by far the least evil of the two? Reasonings like these, on the part of theoretical writers, which bid defiance to common sense and experience, are calculated to bring the science into contempt, and make practical men turn away from it in disgust.

The following passage is less objectionable. We quote it, because it shows more clearly wherein the fallacy upon this question lies:

"It is clear, therefore, that a universally increased facility of production can never be the cause of a permanent overloading of the market. Suppose that the amount of capital and labour engaged in different employments is adjusted according to the effectual demand, and that they are all yielding the same net profit. If the productive powers of labour were universally increased, the commodities produced would all preserve the same relation to each other. Double or treble the quantity of one commodity would be given for double or treble the quantity of every other commodity. There would be a general augmentation of the wealth of the society, but there would be no excess of commodities in the market; the increased equivalents on the one side being balanced by a corresponding increase on the other."—p. 193.

Mr. Macculloch evidently imagines that, so long as commodities all preserve the same relation to each other, they must all continue to yield the same net profit. He does not perceive that this profit may vary, that it may be increased or decreased on the whole mass of commodities generally, without affecting their relative value. This is precisely the error into which Mr. Mill has fallen on this subject, and which is founded upon a total misconception as to the nature of demand and supply.

"What is it," says Mr. Mill, "that is necessarily meant when we say that the supply and the demand are accommodated to one another? It is this: that goods which have been produced by a certain quantity of labour, exchange for goods which have been produced by an equal quantity of labour. Let this proposition be duly attended to, and all the rest will be clear."

Now as the rise and fall of profit do not (according to Mr. Mill's own doctrine, adopted by him from Mr. Ricardo,) affect the relative value of commodities, so neither (upon the principle set forth in the above extract) can it affect the proportion between the demand and supply in Mr. Mill's sense of those terms; and yet, according to their ordinary meaning, no rise or fall could possibly take place in profits either generally or in reference to particular commodities only, without some change having taken place in the relation between the demand and the supply to account for it. Upon this mistaken interpretation of those terms, however, it is, that Mr. Mill has founded his denial of the possibility of a general glut. An excessive supply of some commodities implies, in his view, an excessive demand for others. He has failed to perceive that they may all preserve a due proportion to each other, and yet all be in excess. Their relative value may be the same, when they are all selling at money prices which are insufficient to defray the cost of their production.

Mr. Mill, and those who have adopted his theory on this subject, have not sufficiently considered that men do not practically barter their goods with each other; but they first exchange them for money, and afterwards exchange that money for other goods. Now it occasionally happens, that owing to a scarcity of money, originating, perhaps, in causes peculiar to the currency, or in over-speculation, or in an union of both causes, a general apprehension exists on the part of dealers of a probable fall of prices. Under this impression all rush to the market together, and are eager to convert their goods into money, but are not equally anxious to convert their money again into goods. The natural and inevitable consequence is the very fall which they apprehended, attended with an increased difficulty of selling, and terminating in a complete stagnation of business, or what is called a general glut. This, at the time being, is a state of overproduction, that is, of production beyond a remunerative demand, or such a demand as will satisfy the conditions of the cost⁵.

We pass on to the consideration of the question of value.

Mr. Macculloch's doctrine on this subject seems to be a modification of that of Mr. Ricardo, to whose work we must refer, in order thoroughly to understand it.

Mr. Ricardo's opening chapter commences with the following proposition: "The value of commodities, or the proportion in which they will exchange for each other, depends upon the relative quantities of labour employed in their production."

Now here the term value is used as synonymous with the proportion in which commodities exchange for each other. But a little further on (in the same chapter) we are told that commodities rise in value with every increase of labour required to produce them, and fall with every diminution of such labour.

"If," says Mr. Ricardo, "the quantity of labour realized in commodities regulate their exchangeable value, every increase of the quantity of labour must augment the value of that commodity on which it is exercised, as every diminution must lower it."

In conformity with this statement, if all commodities could be produced with one-half the labour that is now bestowed on them, they would fall in value one-half (a doctrine which Mr. Ricardo has still more clearly stated in other parts of his work, as for instance in his remarks on Mons. Say); but, as this circumstance would not alter the proportion in which they would exchange with each other, it is clear that Mr. Ricardo has here used the term value in a sense different from that in which he explained it at the outset of his work. In the latter instance he considers it with reference to cost, and the moment we refer value to cost there is an end of saying that it is a mere relation of one commodity to another. In chap. xx., edit. 3, his remarks on Mons. Say are as follows:

"According to Mons. Say, if the difficulty of producing cloth were to double, it would be doubled in value, to which I give my fullest assent; but if there were any peculiar facility in producing other commodities, and no increased difficulty in producing cloth, and cloth should exchange for double the quantity of commodities, Mons. Say would still say that cloth had doubled in value, whereas, according to my view of the subject, he should say, that cloth retained its former value, and these particular commodities had fallen to half their former value."

Now if value were merely a relation of one thing to another—of the cloth to those other things, Mons. Say would have been justified in his conclusion. The change of relation between them, simply as such, is as correctly expressed by saying that cloth had risen, as by saying that the other things had fallen. Mr. Ricardo's criticism upon this passage is therefore well founded only on the supposition that the additional labour required to produce the cloth had occasioned a rise, not only of its relative, but likewise of its positive or absolute value.

We so far agree, therefore, with Mr. Ricardo, that we hold value to be expressive of cost, and not simply to mean a relation between different commodities.

But here we come to an important point, on which a great deal hinges. Mr. Ricardo has satisfactorily shown, after Adam Smith, that equal quantities of the same kind of labour can alone constitute or represent equal degrees or amounts of sacrifice, and that, consequently, labour is the sole measure of cost; but value, it is to be observed, in its popular sense (which we hold to be the true sense, and that in which it is generally used by Adam Smith) is the sacrifice which the purchaser of a commodity is able and willing to make in order to acquire it, or more simply, it is the cost to the purchaser and not the cost to the producer; and hence the value of every commodity must be measured by the quantity of labour or of labour's worth which the purchaser gives or puts forth in order to acquire it, and not by that which the producer has already put forth or bestowed upon its production⁶.

If Mr. Ricardo had reasoned thus (which would have been perfectly consistent with his own statement regarding the measure of cost) his doctrine would have exactly accorded with that of Adam Smith; since the quantity of labour which the purchaser gives for a commodity is identical with that which it will command⁷.

⁶ Mr. Senior has noticed this fundamental error of Mr. Ricardo in confounding cost with value.

⁷ The following we take to be the reasons why Adam Smith's doctrine in this matter has never obtained universal assent. 1st. In stating the quantity of

Instead, however, of viewing the subject in this, which seems to us to be its true light, he has used the term value sometimes as denoting the original cost of a commodity, and at other times as expressing its relation to others. It is this which has thrown so much obscurity into his writings, and puzzled his readers.

In endeavouring to avoid some of these inconsistencies, Mr. Macculloch has, we think, fallen into others.

He distinguishes value into two kinds, exchangeable or marketable value, which he measures by the quantity of labour or of any thing else for which a commodity will exchange, and cost or real value, which he estimates by the positive quantity of labour that is required to produce the commodity and bring it to market.

“We must carefully distinguish between the exchangeable value of an article, or the quantity of produce or labour for which it will exchange and its cost, or as it is sometimes termed, its real value; meaning by cost or real value, the quantity of labour originally required to produce or acquire an article.”—p. 297.

The difference between these two quantities of labour he states to consist of profits.

“It is material to observe that, speaking generally, commodities uniformly exchange for or buy more labour, or the produce of more labour, than was required for their production. Unless such were the case, a capitalist would have no motive to lay out stock on the employment of labour, for his profit depends on his getting back the produce of a greater quantity of labour than he advances.”—p. 303.

A little further on, however, he says,—

“The cost or real value of commodities—denominated by Smith and Garnier natural or necessary price, is, as already seen, identical with the quantity of labour required to produce them, and bring them to market.”—p. 312.

Now, as Smith and Garnier's natural or necessary price most certainly includes profits (as upon Mr. Macculloch's own prinlabour which a commodity would command as the measure of its value, he did not clearly explain the reason of it, viz., its identity with the quantity which the purchaser must sacrifice in order to obtain that commodity. 2ndly. He had previously spoken of value, as consisting in the power of purchasing, from which some have inferred (Mr. Buchanan, for instance, in his edition of the “Wealth of Nations”) that, in proposing labour as its measure, he was alluding to a measure of exchangeability, and not a measure of cost. Most of the exceptions made to Adam Smith's standard have been grounded on this misapprehension; Mr. Buchanan's, for instance, in his edition of the “Wealth of Nations.” 3rdly. In his digression on the value of silver he has taken corn instead of labour as his measure, which, in all probability, must have arisen from his inability to obtain accurate prices of labour at the times at which he wished to institute the comparison.

ciple, stated at p. 303 above quoted, it ought to do), the cost or real value, here referred to by him as identical with it, must include them also. But in his original definition of those terms he had expressly excluded them.

Again; it is said (p. 303 above quoted) that the capitalist's profit depends on his getting back the produce of a greater quantity of labour than he advances. But how does this consist with the doctrine elsewhere taught throughout the work, viz. that commodities which are the produce of equal quantities of labour are equal in value, and will exchange with each other? Mr. Macculloch has here unavoidably confounded a greater quantity of labour with the produce of that greater quantity. If profits were twenty per cent, the produce of ten hours' labour ought to exchange in the market for twelve hours' labour, but certainly not for the produce of twelve hours' labour; for such produce, at the same rate of profit, ought to be worth fourteen hours' labour. This confusion of the two meanings not only applies to the particular paragraph from which the above passage is taken, but pervades Mr. Macculloch's reasoning generally throughout his work; and it is further kept up and fostered by the use of an expression ambiguous in itself—the word cost being usually understood to mean the producing cost, and the word value the purchasing cost.

It seems almost unaccountable how Mr. Macculloch could have fallen into this mistake, seeing that he had cautioned his readers against it (p. 297), and had further charged it upon Adam Smith.

“The statement made above shows the error of the opinion held by Dr. Smith, that the quantity of labour required to produce any article ought to be taken as the measure of the quantity for which it would exchange.”—p. 304.

Mr. Macculloch has not furnished us with any extract from the “Wealth of Nations” in support of this charge, and we are not acquainted with any statement of Adam Smith which justifies it. In the sixth chapter of his first book, on the component parts of the price of commodities, these two quantities of labour are said to be identical only when labour is the sole agent in the production, and where, consequently, the whole produce resolves itself into wages. When a commodity sells for precisely what it has cost in labour (or in money representing that labour), it is self-evident that the producing and the purchasing labour must be equal quantities. In all other cases, where there exist profit or rent, or either of them, Adam Smith distinctly states that the latter must exceed the former.

But to return to Mr. Macculloch.—If his phrase, cost or real value, be meant to include profits, it cannot be measured, as (p. 297) he states it to be, by the quantity of labour originally employed in the production, which (p. 203) is said to exclude them. If, on the other hand, the phrase is meant to exclude profits, he has confounded the real value of a commodity with its cost, and made it to be less than its exchangeable value, which does include profits. Interpret it which way we will, there is confusion and inconsistency⁸.

The difficulties with which the subject of value has been encumbered, and which have led to so many conclusions at variance with each other, have their origin in these different significations which have been attached to this most important word. It is simple enough, if we confine it to mean "The estimation in which commodities are held as determined by the sacrifice that must be made by the purchaser in order to acquire them," this being in reality what men in their ordinary transactions of bargain and sale understand by it, and what Adam Smith, notwithstanding the occasional vagueness of his language, evidently had in view when he proposed labour as its measure.

This word value is so important in this its ordinary sense, that

⁸ In the first edition this doctrine is somewhat differently stated, though in substance the same. It is there said (p. 215), that when the demand and supply of commodities is equal, then exchangeable value is identical with real value: but a little further on it is stated (p. 221) that the former usually exceeds the latter, the difference between them consisting of profits: and (p. 223) there occurs the following passage:—

"Dr. Smith seems to have thought that it might be said either that the real value of A is to the real value of B as the quantity of labour required to produce A is to that required to produce B; or that the real value of A is to the real value of B as the quantity of labour for which A will exchange is to the quantity for which B will exchange. But the difference between these two propositions is, in most cases, nothing less than the difference between what is true and what is false; and it is to Mr. Ricardo's sagacity, in distinguishing between them, and in showing that while the first is undeniably correct, the second, instead of being an equivalent proposition, is frequently opposed to the first, and, consequently, quite inaccurate, that the science is indebted for one of its greatest improvements."

According to this doctrine of Mr. Macculloch's, things are not proportioned to others to which they are manifestly equal. Thus if a and b represent the quantity of labour which A and B have respectively cost, and a' and b' the quantity for which they will respectively exchange, it would, Mr. Macculloch thinks, be true to say that $A : B :: a : b$, but it would not be true to say that $A : B :: a' : b'$.

Now whether a' and b' represent labour, or corn, or cloth, or gold, or silver, or any thing else, so long as $A = a$, and $B = a$, it must necessarily be true that $A : B :: a' : b'$. Mr. Macculloch has quite misunderstood Mr. Ricardo's doctrine. Mr. Ricardo did indeed assert the former of the above propositions, but he never denied the latter. What he did deny was, that the labour for which a commodity would exchange was a better measure of its absolute value than any thing else for which it would exchange: a just remark, if by value is meant mere exchangeability, but not so if it is used to express sacrifice, as Adam Smith used it.

if there existed no such word, or it were otherwise applied, we should be under the necessity of inventing one to supply the want of it. Suppose, for instance, that all commodities exchanged with each other, in proportion to the quantity of labour bestowed on their production, according to Mr. Ricardo's theory,—that there were absolutely no exception whatever to this rule, and that the term value were confined to express that relation (as indeed some authors have wished so to confine it), it would not be the less necessary for us to inquire into the sacrifice which the purchaser must make in order to acquire them, and to ascertain what is the measure of that sacrifice. Without this previous knowledge, it is very certain that we could not arrive at correct views as to the circumstances which determine the division of the produce into its component parts. We hold that it is a fundamental error in Mr. Ricardo's system that he did not so consider it. He commences his celebrated work with this statement:—"The inquiry to which I wish to draw the reader's attention relates to the effect of the variations in the relative value of commodities, and not in their absolute value⁹." And yet he could not write half a dozen pages without referring to the latter, as we have already seen. This reference of value to cost was no doubt a step in the right direction, but by applying the term to the sacrifice made by the producer, instead of to that which is made by the purchaser, Mr. Ricardo has been led out of the right track, after having been in it, and has ended by giving a twofold meaning to the word, neither of which agrees with its ordinary signification.

Mr. Macculloch has a chapter on the effect of fluctuations in wages and profits, on the relative value of commodities; the object of which is to show that countries possessing great facilities of production, by their use of machinery, are enabled successfully to compete with other countries in which the price of labour is cheaper: in other words, that a high rate of money wages is no disadvantage to a country which has those facilities. His statements on this subject (which are taken from Mr. Ricardo, who first noticed the circumstance,) are ingenious, though rather more mystified than the occasion required; for the simple truth, however disguised by the mode of putting it, is this,—that when machinery is substituted for human labour, the value of the commodity must resolve itself more into profits and less into wages; and if, under these circumstances, profits fall and wages rise, as the former constitute the larger portion of the two, the fall of the former will overbalance the rise of the latter, and the commodity will fall in price, notwithstanding the rise of wages.

That such is the case it is easy to show ; but some preliminary observations must first be made.

1. It is necessary to remark, that abstraction being made of taxes, rates, tithes, or rent (where any such are due), the joint produce of labour and capital is divided into two parts ; one of which goes to repay the advance of the labourer's wages, and the other constitutes the profits of his employer's capital. It is obvious, therefore, that (the quantity of the produce remaining the same) the share of wages cannot be augmented but by a diminution of profits, and vice versâ ; and hence Mr. Ricardo's celebrated proposition, that high wages occasion low profits, and low wages high profits ; in which the terms high and low are used, not in their ordinary sense, as expressing a large or small amount, but as implying greater or less proportions.

2. The principle that commodities exchange with each other, in proportion to the quantity of labour employed to produce them (which is another of Mr. Ricardo's chief propositions), can be true only on the supposition that equal proportions of fixed capital are employed on all of them, subject to the same wear and tear, and expense of maintenance, and of the same degree of durability ; and, further, that they are brought to market in the same space of time. The slightest variation in any one of these conditions must occasion an exception to the rule, as Mr. Ricardo himself fully allowed ; and the cases being extremely rare where all these circumstances agree, the rule, however true in theory, is quite inapplicable in practice ; the more common case being that commodities, produced by very different proportions of labour¹ and fixed capital, are equal to each other in their exchangeable value. These things being premised, the point to be now considered is, what effect has the rise or fall of wages, or profit, on the relative value of commodities, which are compounded of those different proportions of labour and capital, or on their respective exchangeabilities.

As the real state of things is very different from the one here supposed, if all the conclusions of his book were true, they could not be expected to agree with experience.

It is evident that a change of the proportion, in which the same amount of produce is divided between wages and profits, may be occasioned by a fall or rise in the price of the produce, while money wages remain the same, or by a rise or fall of money wages, while the price of the produce remains the same. In other words, it may be the effect of a change in the value of the produce, or of a change in the value of money, estimating them both in labour.

We shall begin with the former supposition, and assume the case of three commodities, viz.—A, produced without any fixed capital, and B and C, both compounded of labour and fixed capital, in such proportions that they are divided between wages and profits as follows, viz. :—

	Wages in Produce or Money.	Profits in Produce or Money.	Total of Produce in Money.
A	90	10	100
B	50	50	100
C	10	90	100

They are now equal to each other in exchangeable value, but they will cease to be so on a change taking place in the rate of profit. Suppose profits to fall fifty per cent. below what they are above stated to be ; the division will then be as follows :—

	Wages.		Profits.		Total.
	In Produce.	In Money.	In Produce.	In Money.	Of Produce.	In Money.
A	94.7	£90	5.3	£5	100	£95
B	66.6	£50	33.4	£25	100	£75
C	18.2	£10	81.8	£45	100	£55

So that a fall of profits to one half of what they were, which would reduce the price of A five per cent., would reduce that of B twenty-five per cent., and that of C forty-five per cent.

If we take the other supposition (which is Mr. Ricardo's adopted by Mr. Macculloch) of a rise of money-wages, which for the sake of illustration we shall assume to be five per cent., the first result will be as follows :—

	Wages in Produce or Money.	Profits in Produce or Money.	Total of Produce in Money.
A	94.5	5.5	100
B	52.5	47.5	100
C	10.5	89.5	100

But as the rate of profit would then be lower on A than on B, and still lower on C, this state of things could not last. Either the price of A must rise (which it certainly would if the profits on it were below their ordinary rate) or in order to equalize them the price of B must fall, and that of C fall still more.

If the price of A remained the same, the new division and prices in order to put profits on an equality would be as follows :—

	Wages.		Profits.		Totals.
	In Produce.	In Money.	In Produce.	In Money.	Of Produce.	In Money.
A	94.5	94.5	5.5	5.5	100	100
B	65.5	52.5	34.5	27.5	100	80
C	17.5	10.5	82.5	49.5	100	60

In this case the rise of wages of five per cent. which did not affect A, would cause B to fall twenty per cent. and C forty per cent.

This second form of statement, founded on the rise of wages instead of the fall of prices, is less in accordance with what commonly occurs, and is therefore more paradoxical than the first. They are, however, essentially the same in their effect, as may be seen by comparing them together, and had corresponding ratios been taken, both might have been made to coincide exactly as to divisions of the produce, only they would have been expressed in different values of money.

As the rise of five per cent. in wages in the case of A is equivalent to a fall of between forty and fifty per cent. on profits, and as profits could not bear this reduction, supposing them to have been previously no higher than their ordinary rate, it would happen in point of fact that the price of A would rise. This is what is found practically to take place. When wages rise, commodities in which the proportion of labour is great and that of fixed capital small, rise in price. Those in which the proportion of labour is small and that of fixed capital great, fall in price, and those between the two remain stationary.

Changes in the distribution of the produce are, as we have already said, much more commonly occasioned by the rise or fall of prices than by the rise or fall of wages. The rise of money-wages is in fact a fall in the value of money, and a fall of wages a rise in its value². Such changes in the value of money rarely take place without a previous change having taken place in the value of commodities, labour being much more steady in its price than the mass of commodities, and being usually the last to rise when the quantity of money is increased, and the last to fall when it is diminished. It must indeed be obvious that no one would employ labour at a higher money rate, unless he could at the same time obtain the ordinary profit, as determined by the causes which govern profits, and which we shall by-and-by advert to.

It is further important to observe, that wages considered in the above light, that is, as a proportion of the produce, though they have a necessary connexion with profits, have very little to do with the real condition of the labourers, as we shall proceed to show. We have just seen that in the division of the same quantity or value of the produce, the labourer's share is always augmented by the fall or diminished by the rise of profits: but when the produce itself or its value is increased or diminished, wages may remain the same in amount while their proportion is altered, or they may increase in amount while their proportion remains the same. Thus, if out of 1000 quarters of corn, 800 were to go to wages and 200 to profits; and that the produce should be increased to 1500 quarters, of which 800 went to wages and 700 to profits; the amount of wages would be the same, but their proportion would be different in the two cases: if, on the other hand, 1200 should go to wages and 300 to profits, wages would be increased in their amount, but would be the same as to their proportion. The result would obviously be the same if the above figures represented money prices or values instead of quantities of produce.

But the sum total of the labourer's earnings, on which his real condition depends, cannot be ascertained either by the proportion of his share, or by its amount; for the increase or diminution of both may be, and, indeed, frequently is overbalanced by the diminution or increase of employment, so that an augmentation of the labourer's total earnings is often found to co-exist with a reduction of his proportionate wages, and vice versa. The reason of this, though not immediately apparent, is not difficult to discover. The rise of prices and profits, which is the common effect of a brisk demand for commodities, although it necessarily diminishes proportional wages, gives fuller employment to the labouring classes, which more than compensates for the reduction of their share; while a slack demand, which depresses prices and profits, is attended with precisely the opposite effect. If, for instance, when the proportion of wages is reduced one-third, the quantity of employment is doubled,—that the workman is occupied six hours in the day or six days in the week, instead of three hours or three days, his total earnings must be greater and his condition improved.

This is a point of the utmost importance in regard to wages. It has been noticed by Sir Edward West³, by Mr. Malthus⁴, by Mr. Senior⁵, but has been quite overlooked by Mr. Ricardo, and Mr. Macculloch seems to have been so little aware of any such circumstances affecting wages, that on his evidence given before the Parliamentary Committee on Artizans and Machinery in 1824, he unhesitatingly expressed his conviction that the working classes were always the worse off when their employers earned the highest profits, their wages being in that case invariably the *lowest*⁶, and appears to have imbued the committee with the same belief, as may be seen by reference to their report. However contrary to the fact this opinion may be, it is notwithstanding a perfectly legitimate deduction from the doctrine of proportional wages, as propounded by Mr. Ricardo, who participated in the like error, to which he was in all probability led by his unfortunate adoption of the terms high and low to express proportions⁷.

⁷ See on this subject Encyclop. Metropol. Art. Pol. Econ. p. 190.

This opinion of Mr. Macculloch, it is true, is not repeated in the volume before us; but, on the other hand, no allusion whatever is made to the greater or less plenty of employment as influencing the amount of the labourer's actual wages apart from their rate, and which has so powerful an effect in meliorating or deteriorating his real condition.

In regard to their rate, besides the proportional division we have been considering, there is yet farther to inquire into the circumstances which determine the natural or necessary rate and the market rate of wages.

The natural or necessary rate is defined by Mr. Macculloch after Mr. Ricardo (p. 385) to be the lowest limit required for the support of the labourer and his family,—the sine quâ non of their existence as expressed in money, it must be just so much as will enable them to purchase that minimum quantity of subsistence. By Mr. Malthus and some other writers it is alleged that this is a most unnatural rate, because it can never occur in a natural state of things. The natural or necessary rate has been considered by that writer to be the rate necessary to supply the market with the required quantity of labour, according to the ordinary or average demand for it^{*}.

It is not of importance to determine which of these two definitions is the more correct. On both sides it is agreed that this necessary rate of wages must depend upon the cost of producing those articles of the labourer's subsistence which are indispensable according to the one or the other of those standards; and which standards are not only themselves different in different countries, but likewise different in the same country at different times; seeing that what is not indispensable at one era of civilization, or in one country or climate, may become indispensable at another era of civilization, or in another country or climate.

The actual or market rate of wages is represented by Mr. Macculloch (p. 379) as being determined by the proportion which capital bears to population; but taking capital in his own wide (and, as we think, improper) sense, it does not form the sole fund that is applicable to the maintenance of labour. This fund consists of a variety of revenues, collected together from various sources, of which capital is, no doubt, a most important, but not the only one. In our own country, the whole class of labourers, termed by Adam Smith unproductive, are maintained by what he considers to be revenue and not capital; and in other countries, where the use of capital is scarcely known, even productive labourers are maintained by revenues of their own creation : so that the market rate of wages, instead of being determined by the ratio between capital and population, is determined by the proportion which the aggregate fund for the maintenance of labour bears to the whole number of those amongst whom it has to be divided.

Whatever augments the value of that fund, i. e. its labour's worth, or power of commanding labour, must augment the demand for labour, and vice versâ. No increased demand for labour can arise merely from adding to the quantity of articles composing that fund, unless at the same time its value be increased also. Such increase of quantity alone would augment the share of each labourer for the time being, but it would not put into motion a larger quantity of labour.

On the subject of rent Mr. Macculloch adopts the theory of Mr. Ricardo, and ascribes it exclusively to the necessity of having recourse, in the progress of society, to lands of a continually decreasing fertility. The earth is supposed in its natural state to consist of different gradations of soil, represented by Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, &c. varying from the most fertile, or that which yields a large surplus, to the least fertile, or that which yields barely enough to remunerate the labour bestowed upon it. The best description of soil, or No. 1, is supposed to be the first occupied. When it is fully cultivated, and that recourse must be had to No. 2, rent commences on No. 1, and when recourse is had to No. 3, rent commences on No. 2, and rises on No. 1, and so on, every descent to a worse soil causing a rise of rent upon all the other soils above it, and by a necessary consequence, a fall of agricultural profit.

“On the first settling of any country abounding in large tracts of unappropriated land, no rent is paid ; and for this obvious reason, that no person will pay rent for what may be procured in unlimited quantities for nothing. Thus in Australia, where there is an ample supply of unappropriated land, rent, in the proper and scientific sense of the word, will not be heard of until the best lands have become private property and been occupied. Suppose, however, this comes to be the case, and that the population has increased, so that the demand for raw produce can no longer be supplied by the culture of the best lands ; under these circumstances it is plain that population will become stationary, unless the price of corn and other raw produce rises so as to enable inferior lands to be cultivated.

“Suppose now that the price rises so as to pay the expense of raising corn on soils which in return for the same expenditure that would yield 100 quarters on lands of the first quality, will only yield 90 quarters ; it is plain it will then be indifferent to a farmer whether he pay a rent of ten quarters for the first quality of land, or farm the second quality, which is unappropriated and open, without paying any rent. If the population went on increasing, lands which would yield only 80, 70, 60, 50, 40 quarters in return for the same expenditure that had raised 100 quarters on the best lands, might be successively brought under cultivation. And when recourse has been had to these inferior lands, the corn rent of those that are superior will plainly be equal to the difference between the quantity of produce obtained from them and the quantity obtained from the worst quality under tillage. Suppose, for example, that the worst quality cultivated yields 60 quarters, then the rent of the first quality will be 40 quarters, or $100 - 60$: the rent of the second quality will, in like manner, be equal to the difference between 90 and 60, or 30 quarters ; the rent of the third quality will be equal to $80 - 60$, or 20 quarters, and so on ; the produce raised on the last land cultivated, or by means of the capital last applied to the soil, being all the while sold at its necessary price, or at that price which is merely sufficient to cover the cost of production, including therein the ordinary rate of profit on the capital of the cultivator."—p. 440.

"Rent, therefore, in so far as it is a return for the use of the soil, and not for the capital laid out in improvements, results entirely from the necessity of resorting, as population increases, to soils of a decreasing fertility, or of applying capital to the old land with a less return. It varies inversely as the produce obtained by means of the capital and labour employed in cultivation, increasing when the profits of agriculture diminish, and diminishing when they increase."—p. 443.

This view of the origin of rent is certainly ingenious and plausible ; but it is founded upon a pure fiction. It assumes two things ; 1st, that land is usually unappropriated before it is taken into cultivation ; and 2ndly, that the most fertile soils are the first cultivated, and afterwards the 2nd, 3rd, 4th, 5th, &c. qualities in regular succession.

Now, it is a matter of historical fact, that (except in the rare case of new and uninhabited colonies) the land has been from time immemorial appropriated, and that the owners have invariably exacted a rent for permission to cultivate it. This has been fully established by Mr. Jones, in his valuable Essay on Rents ; a work with which we presume Mr. Macculloch to be unacquainted, as he makes no mention of it⁹.

Then, as to the different gradations of soil ; there are, no doubt, lands of almost every degree of fertility, and the more fertile will always yield the larger rent ; but which are the most fertile, it must frequently be difficult to determine prior to their being taken into cultivation.

⁹ This essay is, by the way, the only English modern work on Political Economy, with which we are acquainted, in which the inductive method of inquiry has been strictly and professedly followed. We have often inquired of our booksellers when the other expected volumes on wages and profits are to make their appearance, but have never been able to learn.

Sometimes lands not naturally fertile, become so by culture and good management. The Mauritius, when in possession of the French, was but a barren rock. It produced nothing. Port Louis was a large emporium of merchandize, dependent for its subsistence wholly on foreign supplies, which it obtained almost exclusively from the Isle of Bourbon. The cession of this latter colony to France, compelled the inhabitants of the former one (which remained in the possession of England) to seek elsewhere for the means of their maintenance. They at first began scratching the surface of their hard ground as a hopeless experiment; but by dint of labour and perseverance, they have succeeded in producing a sugar which vies with that of the West Indies, and, for some purposes, is preferred to it. The county of Norfolk was formerly among the least fertile of English provinces. The introduction of the turnip husbandry has raised it above the level of many others to which it was before considered to be inferior. Instances might be multiplied, all tending to show that different degrees of fertility manifest themselves only in the progress of cultivation, and cannot frequently be ascertained prior to it.

There appears, therefore, to be no good ground for asserting that the best sorts are always the first cultivated, and then the next best, and so on in regular succession. Even in new colonies, such as Australia, to which Mr. Macculloch refers, as a type of the rest of the world, the lands the most contiguous to the original settlements would in all probability be the first cultivated, without reference to the degree of their fertility.

But the different gradations of fertility, on which Mr. Macculloch lays so much stress as the sole cause of rent, are, in fact, not essential to its existence. If the whole surface of the soil were of equal fertility (provided it yielded any surplus), a rent would, notwithstanding, be exacted and paid for its use. The land is an instrument, more or less productive, of which the owner, in right of his ownership, takes advantage as far as he can. It, therefore, partakes of the nature of a monopoly, though it differs from an ordinary monopoly, in that it arises from natural instead of artificial means. An article, which is selling at a monopoly price, falls when the monopoly is given up; but if the landlord gave up his rent, the price of the produce would not fall, for that price is determined by causes which are not affected by the payment or non-payment of rent.

When it is stated by Mr. Ricardo and Mr. Macculloch that rent arises solely from the necessity of resorting to inferior soils, in order to procure the requisite supply, the question naturally arises, What is the requisite supply? Does it not altogether depend upon the demand?—that is, upon the sacrifice the community are disposed to make, or, in other words, the price they are willing to pay in order to obtain food. The land being limited in its extent, the pressure of population against subsistence, and the increasing demand for it, tends to raise its price in the progress of society, and to maintain it above what is sufficient to pay the ordinary profit. The extra profit is rent. If lands are cultivated which do not yield this extra profit, they can, of course, pay no rent. But it is not the cost of production upon such soils which governs the price of raw produce; it is, on the contrary, the price which determines what soils can and what cannot be profitably cultivated. This appears to be partly admitted by Mr. Macculloch in the foregoing extract; but he seems to have frequently lost sight of it, and to have reasoned as though he considered cultivation of the worse lands to be the cause, instead, as it really is, the consequence of the greater demand or higher price.

The amount of rent, then, which different descriptions of land will yield to the owner, is just so much as will leave farming profits in all of them upon an equality; and, consequently, the payment of rent does not affect the quantity or value of what remains to be divided between wages and profits. On this point there appears to be no difference of opinion.

In treating of profits, Mr. Macculloch states (p. 492) that they are affected by the three following causes:—1. The rise or fall of (proportional) wages. 2. The increase or diminution of taxes affecting capital. 3. The greater or less productiveness of industry. Now, the greater productiveness of industry upon the land, although it may add to the farmer's profits during the currency of his lease, at the expiration of it usually goes to the landlord, in the shape of an addition to his rent; and the greater productiveness in manufacturing industry (except in the case of a patent or a monopoly) lowers the price, in proportion to the reduced cost, but does not add to profits. If hats can be produced at half their former cost, and fall at the same time to one-half their former price, the hat-maker gets no higher rate of profit than he did before. The division between wages and profits, on which their rate depends, is not altered. The producer benefits by the diminution of cost, in common with every other consumer, but in no other way.

It was the opinion of Adam Smith, that the accumulation of capital was the immediate cause of the fall of profits. "When (he says) the stocks of many rich merchants are turned into the same trade, their mutual competition tends to lower its profit; and when there is the like increase of stock in all the different trades carried on in the same society, the same competition must produce the same effect in all."

Mr. Macculloch denies this doctrine, and contends that accumulation creates its own demand, provided all commodities go on increasing pari passu. He allows, indeed, that the increase of capital in any one branch of industry, would have the effect of lowering profits in that particular branch, but he considers that the augmentation of capital in all, instead of lowering the rate of profit in them, would raise it in the one that was depressed.

His reasoning on this subject (p. 492) is founded upon the same error as that which we before noticed in his treating of gluts. Mr. Macculloch fancies that the fall of profit on any one commodity is occasioned by its not exchanging with the same quantity of others as it did before, and that when by their increase this proportion is restored, profits in all will be as before. But here he has forgotten that profits do not depend upon the proportion in which commodities exchange with each other, but upon the proportion in which they are divided between wages and profits, or (given the produce) upon the proportion which goes to the labourer, or is required to replace the cost. This latter proportion may be altered, while the former proportion, or the respective exchangeabilities of commodities may not be affected at all, excepting in so far as they are produced by different combinations of labour and fixed capital, as previously shown.

As, however, the rate of profits does not unquestionably fall in the progress of society, the great question on this part of the subject is, to what cause is their gradual decline to be attributed?

Mr. Macculloch considers it to be occasioned chiefly by the necessity of having recourse to soils of less fertility; to the same cause, in short, as that to which he attributes the gradual rise and increase of rent.

"It is the taxation, and the necessity under which a growing society is placed of resorting to soils of less fertility to obtain supplies of food, that are the principal causes of that reduction in the rates of profit which usually take places in advanced periods."

Rent, in his view, was originally profit. It is, therefore, taken out of profit, and all additions to it are abstractions from this same fund.

To us the doctrine taught on this subject by Adam Smith appears to be the true one. There is in every society a certain state of the demand which determines the price of every thing. This demand consists of the offer of labour's worth on the part of those who have the means of commanding labour (i. e., who possess money, or what is easily convertible into it), in exchange for its produce. If this offer be not sufficient to cover the cost of production, and give some excess above it, as profit on the capital employed, the production itself will cease. But between this lowest degree and the highest, which the fertility of the soil will admit of, there may be every variety in the rate of profit; nor does there seem any principle which can determine where the resting point shall be, except the state of the supply as compared with the demand. The supply at any particular time is a given quantity, but the demand depends upon a great variety of circumstances, and mainly upon the proportion existing between the productive and unproductive consumers, or between those who make or buy in order to sell again, and those who buy solely for the purposes of use and consumption, a proportion which is very different in different countries and in different states of society. The diminution in the cost of production, increased facilities of communication, the lowering of import duties, and the repeal of prohibitions, have the effect of increasing the general demand, for they open new markets; while whatever impedes intercourse, and throws difficulties in the way of interchange, must have the effect of diminishing the demand. Mr. Macculloch lays great stress on the decreasing productiveness of the soil, as accounting for the fall of profits in the progress of society. But why should any lands be cultivated at a less profit than previously, unless the state of the demand had already lowered the rate of profit, so as to render the cultivation of those lands as good a return to capital as any other mode of employing it would be at the time. If any more profitable mode of investing such capital existed, we may be sure that the lands which yield that less return, would not be cultivated. We are therefore driven to inquire why those higher rates of profit no longer exist, or why the owners of capital are obliged to content themselves with a lower rate; and to this we can find no other answer than that the increasing abundance of products compared with the demand for them, establishes on the whole mass a lower average rate of profit, and by consequence an increase of proportional wages, or of that share of the produce which goes to cover the original cost of the production; so that, in fact, the rate both of profits and of proportional wages, is governed by the demand for this produce.

Our views, therefore, respecting the natural course of wages, rents, and profits in the progress of society, differ very materially from those which are set forth in the work before us. To ascertain the laws which determine this distribution of the produce into those three primary groups is, as has been justly stated by

Mr. Ricardo, the principal problem in political economy. It is the consummation of the science. By the mode of inquiry which Mr. Macculloch has adopted, by his having drawn conclusions from terms to which he has ascribed a meaning of his own, and taken views of value which are inconsistent with each other, he has, as it appears to us, precluded himself from the possibility of correctly solving this problem.

Respecting this distribution, Mr. Macculloch has, in his edition of the "Wealth of Nations," added the following note to the 6th chap. of the first book :—

"The doctrine laid down in this chapter, that the value of commodities in the advanced stages of society varies according to the variations of rent, profit, and wages, is fundamentally erroneous. The variations alluded to merely affect the distribution of commodities, or the proportions in which they are divided among the three great classes, of landlords, capitalists, and labourers, and have nothing to do with their value, or their power to exchange for, or buy each other, or labour."

Here we are formally told by Mr. Macculloch that the distribution of the produce has nothing to do with its value, yet he has written a long chapter in order to explain the effect which alterations in the rates of wages and profits have upon the relative exchangeabilities of commodities (i. e. upon their value in his own sense of that term), and it is impossible that any such alterations can take place, the quantity of produce remaining the same, without at the same time increasing or diminishing the quantity of labour for which that produce will exchange (Adam Smith's standard of value); so that in whatever light we view value, the above passage contains statements equally at variance with the fact. After this it is needless to add a word more in proof of our assertion, that Mr. Macculloch has on this subject fallen into the grossest inconsistency and contradiction.

We have devoted so large a portion of our space to the consideration of the above important questions, that we have no room left to enter into a detailed examination of the other matters treated in this volume. It would, however, be unfair towards Mr. Macculloch to dwell solely upon what appears to be objectionable in his work, and to leave wholly unnoticed the many valuable and useful parts of it, which are written in the true spirit of the science, and are calculated to advance the knowledge of it.

We are glad to find any thing to commend in Mr. Macculloch's book. His introductory sketch of the rise and progress of the science is of itself a very interesting little tract. We have already spoken favourably of the style in which his work is written, and we have now to add that, in this later edition, he has introduced several new chapters upon collateral topics, more or less connected with the main subject, and containing much historical and other useful information, interspersed with many excellent and judicious observations.

We are too little acquainted with the working of the New Poor Law, to say whether his extreme hostility to the present system is founded upon just grounds or not. At any rate his remarks upon it seem to be dictated by a feeling of sympathy in behalf of those who are obliged to resort to this last resource of misery and destitution, and on that account are deserving of every attention and respect.

Generally speaking, Mr. Macculloch has, on these collateral and incidental subjects, written well, because he has grounded his views regarding them on facts and experience, which have led him to just conclusions; while on those questions which relate to the fundamental and essential principles of the science he has written ill, because he has founded his reasonings on hypothetical and inconsistent data, which have led him into the adoption of a false system of doctrines.

The promulgation, however, of these doctrines being the chief aim and object of the work, we may venture to predict that when the subject comes to be more generally studied and understood, this book, in spite of the valuable and useful information it contains, will cease to be considered as a safe guide to be put into the hands of those who are desirous of making themselves acquainted with the true principles of political economy.

Other treatises will, no doubt, by-and-by arise, founded upon broader views and a more comprehensive basis of facts, in which the true theory of distribution (the germ of which is to be found in Adam Smith's great work) will be more fully developed and firmly established; and the doctrines of Mr. Macculloch, which will not stand the test of an appeal to facts, will share the common fate of all other ingenious but unsound theories, and be gradually neglected and forgotten.

ART. V.—On the means of rendering more efficient the Education of the People: a Letter to the Lord Bishop of St. David's, by WALTER FARQUHAR HOOK, D.D., Vicar of Leeds. Eighth Edition. London: Murray, 1846, pp. 71.

THE subject on which Dr. Hook treats in the present publication is one of vast importance. The author's character, his experience, his learning, his ability, and, above all, his position in the Church, give him a special right to speak upon it, and add great weight to what he says; and it is clear that he has spoken to a very attentive audience, from the EIGHT EDITIONS which have been called for of his pamphlet, within the brief space of three months.

The country is much indebted to him for the abundant and incontrovertible evidence which he has adduced, to show that it is "impossible for voluntary association to meet the wants of the nation by a sufficient supply of school-rooms and competent masters" (p. 21), and that without the aid of the STATE, "we cannot succeed in the great object which every patriot, as well as every Christian, has at heart" (p. 32), and no one, we think, can have perused his pages, without feeling satisfied that if England desires to enjoy the blessings of public peace and prosperity, she must maintain and increase her efforts for the moral and religious training of the young of the lower orders of the community.

There are many, perhaps, who did not stand in need of the statistical details with which Dr. Hook has presented us, to convince us of this proposition; and for ourselves, we confess that we are, and always have been, of that class of persons who regard it as the paramount duty of a Christian State to provide for the education of its poor; and knowing how extensively poverty, ignorance, and crime prevail among us, especially in our large towns, we have long been persuaded that it is the imperative duty of the Legislature of England to make every exertion in its power to promote the cause of National Education.

This being the case, we were fully prepared for the declaration of the noble individual who now holds the chief place in Her Majesty's Government. In his letter to the electors of the city of London, and in his address to them on his re-election, Lord John Russell states, that the question of national education urgently demands the attention of Parliament; and on the 17th of July last, in his place in the House of Commons, he said, that “after all the voluntary efforts that had been made by individuals, yet the amount of ignorance in this country, the want of education, the degree to which the Gospel is entirely a sealed book, is a most lamentable fact; but the disgrace is light in comparison with the evil itself which we have to deplore.” And he concluded his speech with the following remarkable words:—“Sir, I have already said I do not wish to enter much into this subject now, but I can assure the House that it is a subject to which I shall pay the most constant attention; and I do trust that when it comes before the House again, I may have some statement to make that will show that the pains I have taken have not been in vain.”

We cannot forbear recording the important and gratifying fact, that on the same day on which this declaration was made, and probably in consequence of it, the sum of 100,000*l.* was voted for public education,—a larger amount, we believe, than has ever been given on any previous occasion for the same purpose¹.

On the whole, then, considering the exigencies of the country, considering also the declarations of the present first minister of the crown, and the dispositions and acts of the legislature, we find ourselves arrived at Dr. Hook’s conclusion—a conclusion, by the way, propounded to the world by the National Society in its first circular in 1811, that we “live in an age when the question is, not whether, but how, the poor are to be educated.”—(p. 5).

To this enquiry, as most of our readers are aware, it has been Dr. Hook’s endeavour to furnish a reply in the pamphlet now under review.

Before we proceed to examine the plan which he offers for the consideration of the public, we would first request leave to make a remark on the title of his work. It is described as a Letter to the Lord Bishop of St. David’s, “On the means of rendering more efficient the Education of the People.” This, we would respectfully submit, is a misnomer. His pamphlet does not treat on the education of the people, but of the poor. The poor, as well as the nobility and gentry, are a part, a most important part, of the people, but they are not the people; and it appears to us a serious error to call them so: and in our opinion it is specially incumbent on the clergy to abstain from all expressions which may give the poor a false notion of their position, and render them discontented with it. To flatter the poor that they are the people, seems to be the characteristic of a demagogue; and, of all demagogues, religious ones are the worst.

The National Society calls itself a Society incorporated “for the Education of the Poor ;” and we honour it for its frankness in this respect; Dr. Hook, on the other hand, reminds us too much of the man, “qui credidit ingens Pauperiem vitium ;” he appears to wish to disguise their poverty from the class for whom he calls on the State to provide, although their poverty is the very thing which constitutes their claim to such provision. We shall see, before we close these remarks, that it is indispensable that in treating this subject we should have a clear view of the particular class concerning which we are writing; but even though no special reason existed for such distinctness in the present case, yet our readers will agree with us that it is as necessary for the politician as it is for the historian² to call things by their right names—τὰ σῦκα σῦκα, τὴν σκάφην σκάφην λέγειν.

We proceed now to describe Dr. Hook’s plan for the education of the poor of England and Wales.

I. First, he wisely lays it down as an unquestionable axiom, that there can be no education, worthy of the name, without a religious basis (pp. 5, 6).

II. He maintains with equal justice, that this basis must be a doctrinal one; that is, it must be built not on moral generalities, but on the special dogmas of Christianity. He affirms that when persons “talk of an education based on a system of morals divested of all doctrine,” and call this a religious education, “they seek to deceive themselves as well as us, and utter a falsehood.” (p. 35).

On this subject his observations appear to us to be excellent; and we beg to transcribe them for the gratification of our readers.

“All really Christian persons must stand opposed to any system of education which being professedly based upon this general religion, which is no religion, will in fact unchristianize the country. To separate the morality of the Gospel from the doctrines of the Gospel, every one who knows what the Gospel is knows to be impossible. The doctrines of grace and of good works are so interwoven that they must stand or fall together. Faith and works, doctrine and morality, are like body and soul; the pretended mother may be willing to divide them, they who know what the Gospel is, like the true mother before the throne of Solomon, will suffer any affliction before they will consent to it. Satan could devise no scheme for the extirpation of Christianity more crafty or more sure than this, which would substitute a system of morals for religion. The generality of mankind content themselves always with the lowest degree of religion, which will silence their conscience and aid their self-deception: they desire to believe as little as they may without peril to their souls, and to do only what the majority of their neighbours say they must. On this general religion, which is no religion,—on this semblance of religion, this shadow put for the substance,—the majority of the people of England will, under such a system of education, be taught to rest as sufficient. Instructed that this will suffice, they will proceed no further. They will be brought up to suppose that Christian doctrine is a thing indifferent, an exercise for the ingenuity of theologians, but of no practical importance. They will thus be educated in a state of indifference to the Christian religion; indifference will lead to contempt; contempt to hostility.”—pp. 35, 36.

III. He affirms that the State of England cannot and ought not to give a religious education, and that “all parties will combine to resist any State education, which is professedly religious.”—p. 36. This he maintains on the following grounds, which we trust our readers will carefully consider:—

1. De jure. If the State attempts to inculcate religion, it must teach, or cause to be taught, a particular form of it. But this, he argues, it has no right to do; for, says he (p. 38), “The ~~taxes~~ are collected from persons of all religions, and cannot be fairly expended for the exclusive maintenance of one. To call upon Parliament to vote any money for the exclusive support of the Church of England, is to call upon Parliament to do what is unjust. The Church has no more claim for exclusive pecuniary aid from the State, or for any pecuniary aid at all, than is possessed by any other of those many corporations with which our country abounds.” “It is, therefore (he says), abundantly clear that the State cannot give a religious education, as the word religion is understood by unsophisticated minds.”—p. 38.

2. De facto. This question of the inability of the State to give a religious education (he affirms) is already decided. There cannot (he asserts, p. 37) “be any objection on the part of the Church to admit Dissenters to an equality in this respect; because, so far as education is concerned, this question is already settled: the State does assist both the Church and Dissent at the present time.”

On this important subject he adds, and we request special attention to his words,—

“The notion is now exploded which once prevailed, that the Church of England has an exclusive claim to pecuniary support, on the ground of its being the Establishment. Those who, like myself, are called High Churchmen, have little or no sympathy with mere Establishmentarians. In what way the Church of England is established, even in this portion of the British empire, it is very difficult to say. Our ancestors endowed the Church, not by legislative enactment, but by the piety of individuals; even royal benefactors acted in their individual, not their corporate, capacity, and their grants have been protected, like property devised to other corporations, by the legislature. At the Conquest the bishops were, on account of the lands they held, made barons, and invested with the rights, as well as the responsibilities, of feudal lords. It is as barons, not as bishops, that seats in the House of Lords are held by some of our prelates; not by all, for a portion of our hierarchy, eminently distinguished for learning, zeal, and piety, the colonial bishops, are excluded. The Church thus endowed and protected, was once the Church of the whole nation: it was corrupted in the middle ages: it was reformed; and, as the old Catholic Church reformed, it remains among us to this day, one of the great corporations of the land.”—p. 37.

Let us now observe the results deduced by Dr. Hook from these principles as affirmed by himself. He proposes—

I. That the Lord President of the Privy Council should license Normal schools, whether of the Church or Dissent, for training masters.—p. 65.

That the government should appoint a board of examiners, who should give diplomas (p. 67); and that no master should be allowed to teach in a State school, without previous training in one of the Normal schools above specified.—p. 67.

II. That literary or secular Primary schools—16,625 in number—for the education of the poor, should be established by the State throughout England and Wales.—p. 26, 67.

That in these schools “literary and scientific instruction only should be given by the masters appointed by the government.”—p. 40.

But that it should be “required of every child to bring, on the Monday of every week, a certificate of his having attended the Sunday school of his parish church, or some place of worship legally licensed, and also of his having attended for similar religious instruction at some period set apart during the week” (p. 40); and that thus “religious instruction should be secured to the children in accordance with those traditions, whether of Church or of Dissent, which they have received from their parents.”—p. 41.

That, “to effect this object, there should be attached to every school thus established by the State a class-room, in which the clergyman of the parish, or his deputies, might give religious instruction to his people, on the afternoons of every Wednesday and Friday; another class-room being provided for a similar purpose for dissenting ministers.”—p. 41.

That “the supervision of these State secular schools should rest with the county magistrates and lay-inspectors appointed by the Committee of Privy Council.”

That these schools should be supported from “a local fund raised by a county rate, and from parliamentary grants.”—p. 67.

That “the books to be used should be selected or prepared under the direction of the Committee of Privy Council.”—p. 68.

That the annual outlay to be thus levied would be as follows, p. 26:—

16,625	Schools with salaries of 100 l. to principal teachers	£1,662,500
16,625	Schools, for general annual expenses, 30 l. each	498,750
8,312	Schools with two apprentices, at 15 l. each, or 30 l.	249,360
8,312	Schools with three apprentices, at 15 l. each or 45 l.	374,040
Total general outlay on elementary schools		£2,784,650

“The expenses of Normal schools would average 50*l.* annually for each student, or for two thousand candidate masters, 100,000*l.*, and for one thousand mistresses, in training, 50,000*l.*”—p. 27.

Then, “that if twenty Normal schools (the number required) were established for masters, and ten for mistresses, 450,000*l.* would be required for the fabric and furniture of Normal schools alone. Then, again, 16,625 elementary school buildings for 160 scholars, with a master’s dwelling, would each cost 500*l.* (or 8,312,500*l.*), or upwards of eight millions.”

On the whole, then, Dr. Hook would demand, for the accomplishment of his plan, a grant of eight millions in the first instance; and nearly three millions annually to be raised by a county rate, or voted by Parliament.

On the other hand, supposing his schools to be well attended, and to be aided by voluntary subscriptions, he anticipates an annual revenue from those two sources of 1,862,000*l.*—p. 27.

Such, then, are the details of the system now proposed by Dr. Hook, for “rendering more efficient the means for the education of the” poor.

We observe upon it, in the first place, that this is no new plan of education, even in our own country.

In the year 1835, or thereabouts, a Presbyterian gentleman, an advocate of the Scotch bar, came from Edinburgh to London with a vehement desire to educate the people of England. He brought with him recommendations from Professor Pillans, and Messrs. Chambers, and Messrs. Combe, and other distinguished educationists. He was a friend of Mr. Maclaren, editor of the Scotsman newspaper³. Having alighted in London, he hastened to the House of Commons, where he found a select committee for education in Ireland sitting; and, strange to say, this Scotch gentleman was pressed by this Irish committee to give evidence on English education. He informed the committee (we quote his words) that⁴ “France was getting forward in education, and would perhaps get ahead of us;” that educational matters were in a very prosperous state in⁵ Prussia; and, proh pudor! “that no class of people in England is well educated at present.” He was full of indignation against what he was pleased to call the “monastic system”⁶ of Eton, Winchester, and all our great schools; he abhorred “flogging”⁷; he would extirpate “fagging;” he hated “taking places;” and writing Greek and Latin verses was what he specially eschewed. He wished “that” the dead languages” were buried. He would purify Oxford and Cambridge by a special commission; and though he had never been in Ireland, he lauded the Belfast⁸ Academical Institution to the skies. He would have every one compelled¹ to go to school; and no persons should be taught any religion that they did not approve. He would have Mr. Buckingham’s “baths and airing-grounds” established by Act of Parliament. He would set up parochial libraries and stock them with² Messrs. Chambers’ publications: and he would build parochial laboratories and furnish them with Dr. Reid’s “pneumatic trough” and³ Mr. Chambers’ “cheap air-pump.” He explained to the committee the meaning of “perceptive Christianity”⁴, and drew a clear distinction between an educator and educationist⁵: he was of the latter class. In short, since the days of Hippias the Eleian,—saving, perhaps, the Abbé Sièyes of Paris,—no one seems yet to have appeared equally qualified with him to reform education and to regenerate the world.

The House of Commons appears to have been duly sensible of the honour conferred on it by the presence of this distinguished educationist, and ordered his evidence to be printed in an Appendix to the Report of the Committee on Irish Education for 1835,—where it occupies no less than EIGHTY-FIVE FOLIO PAGES.

Having recently perused this Scotch evidence before this Irish committee on English education, we were much surprised to find that the learned witness whom we have just introduced to our readers has anticipated nearly all of Dr. Hook's suggestions for improving national instruction. If Mr. Joseph Lancaster could have made any thing like so strong a case for claiming priority of invention of the monitorial system against Dr. Bell,—about which system, by the way, the world seems now quite as much disposed to quarrel who shall be the first to destroy it, as forty years ago they were to contend to whom should be assigned the honour of having originated it,—as Mr. James Simpson can establish for precedence of Dr. Hook in the discovery of the sacred-and-secular-severance system of instruction, what an Io Pæan would have been sounded by all the Lancasterians of the land! The plan propounded by the Vicar of Leeds must, on the common principle of sum cuique, be called the SIMPSONIAN SYSTEM of education. Let us proceed to show this.

First, Mr. Simpson says (p. 149): “I would wish to see, 1st, a Minister of Instruction; 2nd, a Board of Commissioners with the power of establishing schools, and sole power of appointing teachers. When I say schools, I mean not only Elementary schools, but also Normal schools for training masters; and there should be Examinators of the teachers from these Normal schools, on their trials for licences. To the Board of Commissioners I would leave the appointment of Inspectors of schools. We should thus have a Minister of Instruction, the National Board of Education, the Board of Examinators, and the Inspectors.”

Here we have pretty much Dr. Hook's educational organization. His diplomas are also forestalled (p. 154): “All teachers,” says Mr. Simpson, “should attend the national Normal schools, and receive what the French call the brevet de capacité.”

Now for the assessment for the foundation and maintenance of schools: “I would not give the parish any discretion whether or not a school shall be established; and the expenses of the schools should be provided for by the parishes, or the localities in general where they are situated” (pp. 164, 165).

And next for the main feature of Dr. Hook's scheme, viz. his device, secernere sacra profanis, one would say that Dr. Hook has almost transcribed Mr. Simpson's words. Mr. Simpson says

(p. 156, 157), "The teachers of the Elementary schools, it is proposed, shall be secular teachers, and no more; they should not be required to teach revealed religion; but, more, they should not be permitted to do so. There shall be other and much better provision for it: it shall be imparted to the young, not by the elementary teacher, but by the proper religious teachers, the clergy of the different persuasions."

And again (p. 185): "I would, as I have said, secularize secular education wholly, but at the same time make a most perfect provision for education in revealed religion, by allotting to every elementary school both secular and religious instruction, but under different teachers and at separate hours."

Again (p. 187): "The pupil shall have a teacher of secular knowledge, and he shall have a teacher of revealed religion, at a separate hour, and the teacher of religion shall be the minister of his persuasion; so that the ministers of religion shall be bound to take upon them the religious training of the young."

So remarkable is the coincidence between the evidence of Mr. Simpson before the Irish committee and the letter of Dr. Hook to the Bishop of St. David's, that we are almost inclined to doubt whether the Presbyterian advocate may not bring an action for literary plagiarism against the Anglican divine.

But to proceed. Happily for England, the Simpsonian system, now republished by Dr. Hook, need not be encountered by abstract reasoning. It has already been tried in other countries, particularly in France. That country seems to be like a political laboratory, in which experiments are made in educational and ecclesiastical chemistry for the benefit of England, if she will be wise enough to profit by them. Let us then examine the results which this system has produced on the other side of the Channel.

It is well known to many of our readers that the Emperor Napoleon founded the French University in 1806, and that this university consists of twenty-seven académies, formed of a large number of colleges or schools planted throughout the whole of France. If we may use the comparison, France is the university garden, these academies are its parterres, and the schools are intended to be its flowers. These schools are conducted by masters breveted by the government Board of Examiners, and appointed by the Minister of Instruction. They are to secondary instruction what Dr. Hook's teachers would be to primary. Indeed, as we shall see, France must be Dr. Hook's educational Utopia. He would be much happier at Lyons than at Leeds. In France the State does not pretend to give religious instruction in its great schools: it appoints teachers who have *no religion*⁶; and it appears to think that they do not require any, for they have only secular instruction to give. Let the schoolmaster say nothing about religion, and let the clergy of the different creeds attend to that,—this is the theory of Dr. Hook, and this is the practice of France. Hence the race of aumôniers (or chaplains) attached to the French schools. The bell rings on a Wednesday afternoon in the Collège Royal; enter the Romanist aumônier to hear confessions; enter the Lutheran aumônier to give a lecture on the Augsburg Confession; enter the Calvinist aumônier to read a homily on Calvin's Institutes or the Catechism of Geneva;—and the boys whose parents are of no particular religion are let loose to go and climb poles in the callisthenic gymnasium, or to take a dip in the Ecole de Natation.

But this is too serious a matter to be treated lightly. It is as clear to almost all the world in France, as the midday sun in its bright sky, that this Simpsonian system of education has produced there a race of youthful infidels. The celebrated Abbé de la Mennais said in his famous letter⁷ to the Minister of Instruction in 1823, “Une race impie, dépravée, révolutionnaire se forme sous l'influence de l'université;” and he did not scruple to speak of the State schools as “les séminaires de l'athéisme et le vestibule de l'enfer.”

So lately as last year, M. le Vicomte de Cormenin (no fanatic, but a shrewd man of the world,) thus wrote⁸: “Do our schools give any moral education to their pupils?”—“No.”—“Why not?”—“That is the business of the parents.”—“Any religious education?”—“No.”—“Why not?”—“That is the business of the clergy,—but we have chaplains in our schools.”—“You may have what you like, but you have no religion there: your schools are not made for it, and they have none.” Let Dr. Hook's admirers observe this.

In corroboration of this assertion it is scarcely necessary to refer to the testimony of the French⁹ Episcopate, who have been unanimous in condemning this State system of education, since we may presume that their judgment is familiar to most of our readers, especially now that the question of national education has been agitated so warmly at the recent elections in France, and has been the pierre de touche of so many candidates for the Chamber just assembled.

But we should not be doing justice to those energetic persons who are labouring day and night in France to abrogate a law which Dr. Hook would enact in England, if we did not advert to the testimony of those very parties (Dr. Hook's religious teachers of various persuasions) who represent and conduct the spiritual instruction of these schools. The Chaplains of the State schools of France thus expressed themselves in an official report in 1830 concerning the result of their labours; and every succeeding year has only added fresh evidence to show the justice of their complaints.

"The Chaplains (say they concerning themselves) are in a state of despondency which no language can express, on account of the utter futility of their labours, although they have spared no pains to render them effectual.

"When the scholastic career of the pupils is finished, of those who quit a school of about four hundred students, there is only about one pupil a-year who believes the doctrines, and discharges the duties, of religion¹."

ONE IN FOUR HUNDRED! Such is the result of the spiritual and secular separation system in the schools of France!

Let Dr. Hook add this fact to his statistical tables, in which he calls on us to vote EIGHT MILLIONS sterling, and THREE MILLIONS per annum for the establishment of similar schools in this country,—to produce one Christian in four hundred!

But this is not all. Dr. Hook's plan of national education has been tried in France, not only in secondary instruction, but in primary also, that is, precisely in that kind of instruction which is now under consideration; and in which he would establish it in England and Wales, at the outlay we have just mentioned, and to the subversion of what is already established in that department of education.

In the summer of 1831, M. Victor Cousin, the celebrated professor and publicist, visited Berlin, where he had two interviews with Baron von Altenstein, the Prussian Minister of Instruction. He had also frequent conversations with M. Schulze, one of the minister's confidential counsellors. The result of M. Cousin's conferences and inquiries was a Report on National Education, addressed by him to M. le Comte de Montalivet, the then Minister of Instruction in France². In it M. Cousin informs the Minister that every parent in Prussia is compelled to send his children to school; that each gemeinde, commune, or parish, is obliged to maintain a primary school: that the masters of these schools are trained in Normal Schools—of which there is one in every department—supported partly by local and partly by State funds: that after they have been trained for a competent time in these Normal Schools, the would-be masters are examined by a government board, and, if approved by it, receive a brevet or diploma from the Minister of Instruction.

Now for the main point. How is religious instruction provided for in the Prussian schools? As a State, Prussia does endeavour to give some religious instruction, and where it can, dogmatic instruction: therefore it does not desire to unite children of different religious persuasions; but in many cases it maintains separate schools of different communions in the same parish; but where this does not appear to be feasible it imparts only general religious instruction, and leaves special doctrinal instruction to be inculcated by the pastors of the various creeds, or by the parents of the children.

In national education, therefore, Prussia has no national religion; but from its mode of acting it appears that it would have one, if it could.

It is a fact well worthy of notice, as showing how complete the mechanical organization of instruction is in that country, that in 1831 the number of children between the ages of 7 and 14, the approved schoolable period, was 2,043,030, and that the number actually schooled in the State schools was no less than 2,021,421, so that there were only 21,609 children unschooled; and this number at least (it may be reasonably supposed) was provided for in private schools³: so that it would appear that every child who could be educated was educated. In fact, the whole kingdom was one great school—one vast mind-manufactory. Beside this, lists⁴, we hear, are kept with such scrupulous accuracy, that His Prussian Majesty can know, at a moment's notice, which of his juvenile subjects has been guilty of missing school on any given day in any year in any of the most obscure villages of his dominions. Playing truant is a high state misdemeanour; an affaire de l'ee-majesté. These lists, we are assured, are often appealed to in courts of justice; not to prove or disprove alibis, but as evidence of character.

Yet, alas! after all these painful and fatiguing processes of intellectual cotton-spinning, we find, to our inexpressible grief and dismay, that superstition and infidelity are widely prevalent in Prussia. No less than a million and a half of human beings—nearly as many as the school-going population—went last year on a pilgrimage to the Holy Coat at Trêves; and how many more Prussian subjects are now joining with M.M. Ronge and Czerski⁵, and the Friends of Light, as they are called, in their ungodly crusade against revealed religion, and in their fanatical rhapsodies against public peace and order, we are not able to tell. The recent Address (Oct. 2, 1845) of the municipality⁶ of Berlin to the sovereign seated on his throne, an address which can only be characterized as a manifesto of Deism, and this from the municipal body of the capital of that great kingdom, “where every child is obliged to go to school,” speaks volumes for the state of the public mind in that country after all the educational drilling it has received, and fills us with an involuntary shudder at the very names of Primary schools, Normal schools, Model schools, School-inspectors, and Ministers of Public Instruction.

We are led from these observations on Prussian schools to recross the Rhine, and to recur to our former topic,—primary education in France.

The year after the appearance of M. Cousin's Report, M. Guizot became Minister of Instruction in that country, and in June, 1833, was passed the law by which primary instruction in France is now regulated.

This legislative act embodied most of the recommendations of M. Cousin's Report.

By it⁷ :—

1. Every commune or parish is compelled to maintain (either by itself alone or jointly with other communes) a primary school.

2. The chef-lieu of every department (in the same manner) must maintain a Normal or Training school.

3. Every parochial school is under a local school-committee composed of the Maire, the Procureur du Roi, the Ministers of the various religions (licensed by the State), and one or more notables of the parish.

4. It is also subject to a county committee (comité d'arrondissement), consisting of the Maire of the chef-lieu or county town, one of the justices of the peace, one of the ministers of the different religions, a professor or schoolmaster, a parochial schoolmaster, and three notables of the arrondissement, all under the presidency of the sub-prefect of the department.

⁵ Our readers will find a circumstantial account of their proceedings, with documents, in our third volume, p. 495, sqq.

⁷ We cite from the official “Guide des Ecoles Primaires,” published by authority, Paris, 1842.

5. The masters of the Primary schools are appointed by this committee, at the nomination of the municipal council of the commune in which the school is. Previously to his appointment the master must have obtained a certificat de moralité from the mayor and three town councillors of the parish where he has resided for three years: he must have also been examined by a board of seven examiners nominated by the Minister of Instruction, and have received a brevet de capacité from them; and, lastly, having been appointed as above specified, and having taken an oath of fidelity to the king, the charter, and the laws, he receives an arrêté d'institution from the Minister of Instruction, and is installed by the rector of the académie in which the school is.

6. The comité d'arrondissement inspects all the schools in its district, and forwards an annual report of their condition to the prefect of the département and to the Minister of Public Instruction; it has also the power of reprimanding incompetent or negligent masters, and suspending them from their functions.

In addition to this, there is a government inspector in each département, and a sub-inspector in every arrondissement; all of them nominated by the Minister of Instruction, and bound to make an annual report concerning the state of the schools to the rector of the académie, and to the prefect of the département in which the school is; and this report is forwarded to the Council of Education in Paris, and there read.

So much for the material and personal organization of the Primary schools of France; let us now examine their method of religious instruction.

“The wishes of the parents (says the law of June 1833) shall be consulted and followed in all that concerns the participation of their children in the religious instruction of the school.”

“Parents shall be invited (says the ministerial circular of Nov. 1835) to give religious instruction themselves, or by means of the ministers of their religion (that religion being—in the words of the Conseil Royal of June 1837—Romanist, Lutheran, Calvinistic, or Jewish; these, and no other, being licensed by the state); and for this purpose the children shall be conducted on certain days and at fixed hours to the respective places of worship in which such instruction is given.”

In practice the religious instruction given by the state school-master is of so little account, that “in each parochial school (says the Abbé Dieulin¹) the religious exercises of the pupils are under the control of the clergy, and as soon as that ceases or flags, the teaching of the primary schools becomes wholly secular” (devient tout-à-fait séculier). Such, then, is the condition of the parochial schools in France with respect to religious education.

Let us now pause for a few moments, and review the leading characteristics of this system as now detailed.

1. In almost every one of the 37,000 communes or parishes of France there exists a Primary school, governed by an instructor trained in a State Normal school, licensed and appointed by the secular power, and responsible to it.

2. The parochial school is supported by a parochial tax and by a small payment from the children ; it is under secular inspection, and the books used in it are authorized by a secular board of education.

3. The master is entirely independent of the pastor of the parish and of the bishop of the diocese ; and the school has no connexion with any religious body, except so far as that the ministers of the various creeds have access to the school to give religious instruction, and that the pupils are enjoined to resort to them for it, and that the ministers are members of the school committee.

Let us now consider the results. It might, we think, be anticipated, that the parochial schoolmaster, having no connexion with the parochial pastor, and having a commission to teach from the crown, and the subjects of his teaching being of a more utilitarian, marketable, and ostentatious character than those of the clergyman, he would, even, perhaps, in spite of himself, become a rival of the pastor of the parish, and that thus the Church and State would be exhibited in every parish of France in an attitude, not of friendly alliance with each other, but of jealous antagonism.

Suppose also the case of a young master fresh from his Normal school, proud of belonging to the corps enseignant of the nation, armed with his certificat de moralité from M. le Maire in one hand, and with his brevet de capacité and his arrêté d'institution from M. le Ministre in the other, brimful of big notions of the vast importance of his calcul and dessin linéaire, and not less persuaded, we fear, of the comparative unimportance of the doctrines and practice of Christianity, because he is not required to teach the one or to exercise the other⁹. Suppose him also making himself of great importance and renown to the villagers¹ by his skill in surveying, and map-making, and gauging, and well-sinking, and billiard-playing, and speechifying at clubs,—suppose him a daily frequenters of the café and cabaret, a reader of the Constitutionnel, and an admirer of M. Michelet,—what chance, we should like Dr. Hook to tell us, would the poor village Curé, with his Catéchisme, his Petit-Paroissien, and his Journées du Chrétien,—be he as pious as Vincent de Paul and as learned as Thomas Aquinas,—have against M. l'Instituteur de l'Ecole Primaire?

Suppose, again, the said instituteur to be a person of sceptical opinions and licentious habits,—and it is in vain for Dr. Hook to flatter himself that he would be removed,—who, we ask, would remove him? The bishop could not, the curé could not, and the secular authorities, we have too much reason to believe, would not; for, we ask, has M. Quinet been removed? has M. Mickiewicz been removed, although they have uttered blasphemous rhapsodies against Christianity, not in an obscure village, but in their public lecture-rooms in the Collège de France, in the very capital of the Empire? No. A secular educating body would take no cognizance of the religious opinions of the parish schoolmaster; and he would be a thorn in the side of the parish priest, and would do infinitely more mischief among the parishioners in a week than the pastor could repair in a year.

In our humble opinion, M. Guizot, by his education bill of 1833 (founded, as we have said, on M. Cousin's rapport), has taken incalculable pains to represent on a large scale, mutatis mutandis, the celebrated dialogue in the “Clouds” of Aristophanes, where the² two game-cocks (emblems of the Gallie race) are brought on the stage as the representatives and champions of the new and old systems of education³, to peck and spur at one another for the diversion of the public. On the French educational stage there stands on one side the juvenile secular Gallus,— on the other side, impar congressus, is the veteran ecclesiastical bird, having moulted his feathers and looking dark and dusty. The result, we fear, is generally the same in France as it was at Athens in the play. And now Dr. Hook would establish a similar cockpit in every village in England.

Sustulit in digitos, primoresque erigit ungues⁴,—

Perhaps, however, it may be said that we are drawing an imaginary picture. To our minds, considering the materials Dr. Hook puts together, the result is as clearly evident as if we saw it now visibly realized before our bodily eyes; for as South⁶ said,—and he was a keen observer of things,—“It is a pestilential design to attempt to disjoin the civil and ecclesiastical interest, which are of that nature, that it is to be feared that they cannot be divided but they will prove opposite, and, not resting on a bare diversity, will quickly rise into a contrariety ;” and so we say now; Dr. Hook’s severance of secular and sacred would soon become hostility of one to the other.

But we must not speculate on probabilities. “M. Guerry (says the “Edinburgh Review”) some time ago scandalized the friends of education (in France) by asserting that the number of persons annually charged with offences against the laws in France varied in the several departments with the number of persons who had received the elements of instruction. It is undoubtedly true that the amount of legal crime does appear to keep pace with the amount of primary instruction.” M. Guerry’s moral map, in which the districts where schools and crimes are most numerous are coloured with a dark tint, has, we fear, not changed its hue for the better since the bill of 1833 has been in full operation. In the last Compte rendu de la justice criminelle in France we are informed, that since 1826 to 1843 the population⁷ of France has increased seven per cent., and that crime has augmented in the same period at least EIGHTEEN PER CENT⁸ !

⁹ The following are the remarks of the Univers (10 Aug. 1845) in introducing these statistics to its readers:—

“Nous allons mettre sous leurs yeux les chiffres; ils verront comment cette société, fille de la philosophie du dix-huitième siècle, répond à ces enseignements dont on vante tant l’efficacité et surtout la moralité. Nous savons bien qu’on nous accusera de calomnier la civilisation : que nous importe ! Nous répondrons à nos adversaires qu’il y a à nos yeux une civilisation salubre, utile à tous, et à la grandeur des peuples et au bien-être des individus, civilisation qui met à côté du droit le devoir, à côté du bonheur le courage, la résignation, l’honnêteté ; qui ne prêche pas seulement à l’homme le culte de ses appétits, mais qui lui enseigne toutes les vertus et tous les devoirs ; cette civilisation est mère de tous les progrès : elle maintient l’ordre, raffermi l’homme contre l’adversité, concilie l’existence des gouvernements avec les droits des peuples : en un mot, elle guérit et soulage, non pas avec des géôles et des carcans, mais avec des paroles bienfaisantes, avec la morale de l’Evangile.—Cette civilisation repose sur la religion et sur le respect dû à ses enseignements.

“Nous la désirons, et nous poursuivons de tous nos efforts son avènement ; mais

But to come nearer to the point, namely, the character of the primary schoolmaster, and his relation to the pastor of the parish.

In a recent publication of Monseigneur Parisis¹, the eloquent Bishop of Langres, we find a melancholy description of the condition of French parishes, in consequence of the bad conduct and pernicious influence of the State schoolmaster. After entering into some lamentable details on this subject, he says², “I have not inspected all the Primary schools in France, but, to judge from what I know, there are certainly more than TEN THOUSAND Catholic villages more or less in the state of suffering which I have described ;” that is, nearly a third of the whole !

It is a well-known fact that, in consequence of this condition of things, many of the parochial clergy of France have kept aloof from the State schools, or abandoned them in despair, and the schools have become completely secular, that is to say, in the end, hostile to Religion and the Church, and nurseries of impiety and anarchy.

We would therefore beg leave to submit to Dr. Hook this question, “Suppose him to have expended his eight millions, and to have obtained his grant of three millions a year, for his State schools, is he certain that he can ensure the attendance of the parochial³ clergy upon any of them ?”

Such then has been the practical working in France of the system of primary education, which Dr. Hook proposes to “render universal” in England and Wales. Dr. Hook expresses an earnest *desire*⁴ to place the education of the people in the same à côté de cette civilisation il y en a une autre qui, prêchant à l'homme ses droits, ne lui parle de ses devoirs que pour le pousser à l'esprit d'insubordination et de révolte ; qui le prend au berceau, pour le battre par tous les vents du scepticisme et de l'égoïsme ; qui, s'adressant à son esprit, néglige sa conscience, sa raison, son cœur. Cette civilisation n'est point notre fait. Nous ne cesserons de la combattre, soit qu'elle atteigne les classes aisées de la société, soit qu'elle s'infilte dans les classes inférieures, car ses fruits seront amers partout.

advantageous position as education in other countries ; and among them he specifies France !

We think that, after the details now presented to our readers, we may confidently affirm that (thanks be to Divine Providence and to the bishops and parochial clergy of England, and to those excellent individuals who instituted and have maintained the National Society) England, with all her deficiencies,—and we do not pretend to disguise them, indeed we confess that they are great and manifold,—is in an infinitely more healthy and prosperous state in all that concerns National Education than France ; and we cannot find words to express our astonishment that Dr. Hook should speak “ of placing us in the same advantageous position with it.” The same advantageous position with France ! Divided parishes, disaffected people, insubordinate children, sceptical schoolmasters, and despairing pastors ; education unsanctified and unchristianized, and religion despised ;—these are the egregious advantages which he would bestow upon us at the cost of three millions a year : and all this under the name of “ rendering more efficient the education of the people ! ”

We have already expressed our regret that Dr. Hook should have employed the term people in his title-page for the poor ; and we have now to complain that he mystifies himself and us by the use he makes of the word education.

The advantages of which he speaks, whatever they may be in the matter of instruction, (and we doubt very much whether the French system possesses any even in this respect,) are no advantages at all, but very much the reverse in the way of education. A child may be instructed by that system, but cannot be educated by it. Where the secular is separated from the sacred—where it is independent of it, and indifferent or opposed to it, there may be instruction, but there cannot be EDUCATION. In education the secular must be subordinate to the sacred, must be dependent on it, must be subsidiary to it, must be tributary to it ; must be informed, animated, enlightened, guided, governed, inspired, elevated, consecrated by it. And therefore, for our own part, when we turn our eyes from France, and fix them on our own country ; when instead of an école primaire, with its State schoolmaster and communal committee—standing like a neighbourless hut on a wild and barren moor, in a wilderness of moral and religious isolation—we look at one of our own parish schools shaded by the trees of the village churchyard, and the object of solemn care and religious interest to its master and to the parish priest, both working together with one heart ; when we see it visited by him, its children catechized by him, loved by him, blessed by him, and not only cared for by him, but also by the members of his family, his wife, his daughters, instructed by them in simple psalmody, and taught to praise God joyfully in His house; when we see them assembled together in cheerful holyday groups on a summer's day upon the lawn of the parsonage on their annual festivity, and enjoying the pleasures derived from love tempered by respect; we know not how to describe our joy and gratitude, that England has as yet been preserved from the miserable advantages which Dr. Hook would give us; and we do not hesitate to say, that one single English school, such as we have now described, is a greater national blessing, and more likely to draw down God's mercies upon a country, than all the thirty thousand écoles primaires of France, with the Minister of Public Instruction at their head. For our part, we had rather go back to the days of Shenstone's School-mistress, with her horn-book, and Sternhold and Hopkins, her elbow chair, and her birchen-tree, than forward to the Simpsonian era, so earnestly yearned for by Dr. Hook.

At the grand concours in the French capital of the great schools of Paris and Versailles on August 12 of the present year, M. Guizot, at his entrance into the grande salle du concours, at the Sorbonne, was greeted by the students with the revolutionary airs of the Marseillaise and Parisienne; a pretty strong practical proof of the moral and political working of the French system of education; and he was also saluted with the following verse from the opera of Charles V.:—

to which, in spite of Dr. Hook's arguments, we would beg leave to re-echo, “Jamais en Angleterre la France n'enseignera.”

But we must not stop here. Dr. Hook's system is not only quite as bad as the French one, but it is much worse. First, in its destructiveness. In 1833, M. Guizot had almost a clear field to deal with in the matter of primary education. France was almost a tabula rasa, and he might put what schools he liked, wherever he liked, without disturbing any body. But in England, in 1846, the case is widely different. It was very properly objected, in 1808, to Mr. Whitbread's Bill for the Education of the Lower Orders, that he did not seem to be aware “that there were any schools existing in England.” Dr. Hook does something rather more unjustifiable than this. He ignores the being of many that *do exist*¹, and treats the rest as if they existed to very little or no purpose. At this time there are about TEN THOUSAND Church schools existing in England, with nearly a MILLION scholars⁶; and now here comes Dr. Hook, and, like another Julian, would secularize or annihilate these institutions; we say, annihilate, for he would destroy them in their character as Church schools. He would build 16,625 State schools, to be maintained at a cost of about three millions inclusive of voluntary contributions, which he anticipates will be transferred from existing Church schools to future State schools. Thus he would sap the foundations of the Church schools; which, in order to exist at all, will, he supposes, become State schools. This, we venture to say, neither M. Guizot, nor any statesman in the world, would ever have dreamt of doing, whatever his opinion might be of what is abstractedly best for education. He would have been too well satisfied with what already exists, and too apprehensive of the results of so sweeping a change, which is no less than an attempt to revolutionize the whole scholastic constitution of the country.

Next, Dr. Hook's plan is worse than the French system in respect to instruction.

In France, a primary schoolmaster, as master, is not necessarily irreligious. He is required to teach the catechism of the diocese, bien entendu to those who are willing to learn it. This is something, though not much; and in practice, as we have seen, it amounts to very little. But Dr. Hook's masters, as masters, are compelled to know nothing of religion. They are all to be at liberty to live, as it were, at any time before the Christian era; but they must never cross the threshold of Anno Domini One. Now what we would here say to Dr. Hook is this: It is absurd to think that you can tell your master, "You must not teach religion," and to think that you can stop there. No. By not teaching religion, he must teach irreligion. There is atheism in his silence.

How, we would ask, for instance, can he teach geography, or astronomy, or husbandry, without speaking of God? No heathen ever did, and no true Christian ever will. How can he teach history, especially English history, without dwelling on the doctrines of Christianity? By the mere secular mode of teaching these subjects, he must make his pupils deists, and himself too, if he is not one already; and when you have created some 16,000 deistical teachers, will you then think that you can "educate the people?"

But it may be said, Dr. Hook provides a remedy against all this. And what is it? Why, on the Wednesday and Friday afternoons, the teachers of various persuasions are to present themselves at the school door, and to show the children twice a-week how much religious strife there is in the parish, and what a variety of opinions in the world on the subject of Christianity, and teach them thereby to debate and quarrel about it, instead of believing and practising it. These teachers are to sort the scholars into sects, and to carry off each his own dozen or half-dozen of juvenile followers into the Babel-room to be attached to the school, and there give them for an hour or more a most lively practical picture of the confusion of tongues. “No religion taught here on a Monday,—and a hundred on a Wednesday!” Such is to be the inscription over the door of Dr. Hook’s State schools. Pantheons on a Friday, and something for which England has not got a word on a Thursday and Saturday. Whether the religion of the Wednesdays and Fridays, or the irreligion of the rest of the week, would be most effective in producing a race of freethinkers, is, in our opinion, a problem very difficult to solve; taken both together, they would be irresistible.

Let us refresh ourselves for a minute from the sadness and weariness of spirit which such a prospect produces, by considering the advantages of our present system, as contrasted with that which is proposed. Lord Bacon says well, that religion is aroma scientiarum, and every one who has had any experience in teaching must confess, that it is only by being enabled to mingle a holy fragrance with secular instruction that he can render it sweet to his scholars or himself. Without it, it becomes an odour of death unto death. We would put it, therefore, to Dr. Hook, whether he would condemn the poor children of England to be deprived of all the fresh and palatable mental food which they enjoy, and to be fed only on secular husks from the hand of their schoolmasters; and whether the nauseous fare said to be administered to their bodies in some of our union workhouses, is not the only fit type of such instruction as this⁷.

⁷ What our great poet of the present day has said concerning the study of Roman Antiquities, may be applied to all “literary and secular instruction:”—

“How profitless the relics that we cull,
 Troubling the last holds of ambitious Rome,
 Unless they chasten fancies that presume
 Too high, or idle agitations lull!
 Of the world’s flatteries if the brain be full,
 To have no seat for thought were better doom,
 Like this old helmet, or the eyeless skull
 Of him who gloried in its nodding plume.
Heaven out of view, our wishes, what are they?
 Our fond regrets, insatiate in their grasp!
 The sage’s theory! the poet’s lay!—
 Mere fibulæ without a robe to clasp;
 Obsolete lamps, whose light no time recalls;
 Urns without ashes, tearless lacrymals!”

Would he, we ask, also deprive them of the spiritual benefit they derive from religious instruction conveyed by means of secular subjects of teaching? No one, we think, can doubt that religion is often much more successfully inculcated by a teacher when treating on a secular subject than on a religious one. A master, with a Homer before him, can often instil Christianity, softly and gently, into the mind of a pupil, who is almost insensible to direct appeals from the Catechism, or even from the Bible. Many a teacher can bear witness to the wisdom of St. Paul in taking his text from the Altar to the Unknown God. And yet Dr. Hook would rob the poor of this religious advantage derived from secular instruction, and he would shut out religion from one of its main avenues into their heart! And this is "education for the people!"

Besides, when he separates secular from religious instruction, Dr. Hook appears to forget the very important truth, that religious education,—what Solomon calls the training up a child "in the way he should go,"—is a practical thing⁸; and that, though it requires religious instruction in the fundamental principles of Christianity, it does not consist in it. It consists in the constant application of these principles to the management of the temper, and to the government of the behaviour. Religious education consists in bringing religion to bear on the daily life of the child. But, if the schoolmaster is never allowed to appeal to religion, he cannot apply religious motives and precepts to the formation of his pupil's habits; he can only offer him worldly maxims and objects; and he must therefore lead him to form the irreligious habit of regulating his actions by the opinions of men, and not by the law of God. This is unchristian education: and its bad effects cannot be counteracted by an hour or two of religious instruction two days in the week.

But now we have another question to put to Dr. Hook, Whence will you get your schoolmasters? What man, with a soul fitting him to be a master, would ever consent to teach in any one of these 16,000 schools, where he is never to open his lips about religion? Would not any one with the spirit of a Christian or of a man infinitely prefer breaking stones on the high-road, to such heartless, joyless, godless drudgery as this?

"Great God! I'd rather be A pagan, suckled in a creed out-worn," than one of your state schoolmasters, with an atheistical muzzle on my mouth. You have therefore deprived yourself of the only class of persons fit to teach schools, by this your act of severing secular from sacred instruction. You have proscribed all the Christian young men of England from ever becoming schoolmasters. The Church may shut up her training schools, Stanley Grove may disband its pupils, Battersea may close its doors, Westminster may deserve your sarcasms, and become useless; for you will have deprived them of their occupation by secularizing the profession of a teacher. And now what class of persons have you left yourself for your State schools? Just those who are unfit to teach in any school at all; and who ought to be deprived of the office of schoolmaster, if they should have ever been permitted to intrude into it; those who either think their Christianity to be like their coat and waistcoat, an article which may be put off whenever they please, or who have no Christianity at all. With 16,000 such masters as these planted throughout the country, we should soon have a race of juvenile Chartists in every parish of England. And these are the masters for whom you would uproot our present teachers, to set them in their room!

But this is not all. Dr. Hook is a Churchman; he styles himself "a high Churchman," (why should any one call himself names?) but, whether high or low, as a Churchman he must be desirous of unity: he must wish that schismatics should be emancipated from their schism, and heretics from their heresy; and yet he proposes a measure which would stereotype heresy and schism for ever! Instead of saying with St. Paul, "Be ye all of one mind," "Let there be no divisions among you;" he says, "Be ye all of different minds," and "Let the divisions which now exist among you be perpetuated for ever!" And, not content with speaking thus in his own person, he calls on the Legislature to enforce his principle by Act of Parliament.

If he says that he has taken things as they are, that he does not make divisions, but finds them, we would humbly submit to him that it would be better to endeavour to make things better than they are, and to heal divisions rather than to render them incurable. We respectfully suggest to him that he has no right to say to the dissenters, "Be dissenters, you and your children, until doomsday;" and that he is guilty of an act of grievous cruelty to them and their posterity in blocking up the road for their return to the unity of the Church. How different was the language and conduct of St. Augustine! When the dissenters of his day asked him, why he was so eager for their restoration to the bosom of the Church, when they said, "Quid nos vultis?"

quid nos quæritis?" he replied, "Quasi non ipsa causa sit quare eos velimus et quare quæramus, quia errant et pereunt. Quia in errore es, revocare volo."—"Sic volo errare, (said the dissenter,) sic volo perire."—"Sic vis errare! (was the reply,) sic vis perire! Quanto melius, Ego NOLO!" And again, in another place, "Quærimus vos, quia peristis, ut de inventis gaudeamus de quibus perditis dolebamus¹." This was language worthy of a Christian bishop. What would St. Augustine have said to Dr. Hook's plan for "securing" religious instruction to the children of dissenters in accordance with the traditions of their parents?" If this could ever be called Anglican churchmanship,—let alone high churchmanship,—it would, in our opinion, be the severest calamity that ever befell the Church of England.

Does Dr. Hook believe in the pastoral commission⁴ of the Church? Does he believe that Christ said to her, "Go teach all nations?" Does he believe that the same divine voice which said, "Feed My sheep," said also, "Feed My lambs?" and that, if the former command is addressed to her, so is the latter? that, in a word, the Christian School is by divine institution connected with, dependent on, and subsidiary to, the Christian Church, and that, what God has united, it is not for man to put asunder? How then, we would earnestly inquire, how can he reconcile it to himself to advise the Church to be false to her pastoral commission, and to give up her lambs,—not the less the object of her regards and her anxiety because they have strayed,—to the jaws of the wolf and to the carelessness of the hireling? Is this her fidelity to Christ? this her imitation of the good Shepherd? How can any one recommend the spouse of Christ to resemble the false mother and to be willing to divide the child, and thus convict herself of falsehood? Again, we ask, is this churchmanship?

But further. How, we would also ask, can Dr. Hook call on his brethren, the priests and deacons of the Church, to co-operate in a system founded on falsehood; that is, instituted on the assumption that every self-consecrated teacher has an equal right to feed Christ's flock with the divinely appointed pastors thereof? He speaks of this compromise being a *sacrifice*⁵, not of principle, but of prejudice. Has it then come to this, that it is a prejudice to "magnify the office" which Christ has instituted for the salvation of souls? is not, rather, an officer of Christ guilty of great presumption when he betrays that which Christ commits to his trust and charges him diligently to keep? Is it, after all, a prejudice to obey Scripture, and to “mark those who cause divisions among us, and to avoid them?”—“to withdraw from those who walk disorderly and not after apostolic tradition?”—“to note them?”—“to have no company with them?”—“to turn away from them?” Dr. Hook knows, from Polycarp⁶, that St. John would not go into the same public bathing-house with Cerinthus, and dissuaded others from doing so; and does he think that he would have gone twice a-week to teach with modern Cerinthians in the same school? Let us be charitable to schismatics, by all means; but is it any work of charity to unite with them in the work of education? We trow not. It is an act of injustice towards them. It is flattering them to their destruction, and “spreading a net for their feet.”

Let us now consider Dr. Hook’s plan in its relation to statesmen and the State.

Dr. Hook comes forward and assures the State, that “it cannot’ give a religious education,” that it is in vain for it to try; that “all parties’ will combine to resist any State education which is professedly religious;” that the State cannot ascertain what religious truth is; that it has no national religion, and that it ought not to have any, for “the taxes’ are collected from persons of all religious persuasions, and cannot be fairly expended on the exclusive maintenance of one;” and that therefore the State, if it wishes religious instruction to be given in the schools for the lower orders, must call in the aid, not of any one class of religious teachers, but of all.

To these unwarrantable assertions we reply, in the words of St. Augustine¹, “Non te timeo; non enim potes evertere tribunal Christi, et tuum constituere.” You cannot overthrow Christ’s judgment-seat, and plant your own in its place. Christ has commanded “all kings to bow down before Him,” and “all nations to do Him service;” and all who do not so will be placed as His enemies under His feet at the great day of doom: “All nations that will not serve Him shall perish.” He has ordered that kings and queens should be the “nursing fathers and nursing mothers” of His Church, and it is their duty to be so, whatever you may think or say. Will then Dr. Hook affirm that it is impossible for England to do what Christ enjoins all nations to perform?

Will he dictate to England another law contrary to that of Christ? Will he, a minister of Christ, bound to "charge others to teach no other doctrine" but His, advise his country not to be a Solomon, not to pray to God for wisdom to judge aright, not to transcribe His Holy Word, not to act according to its dictates, not to exercise its reason and to examine the evidence of the case, and to *discern the true mother*², and to give her the whole child,—no, to do none of these things,—but to divide it into a hundred atoms;—yes, even to be a Herod, and murder Christ's Innocents?

Let him consider, we entreat him, what a miserable, what an ignominious confession he calls upon England to make,—that she cannot discern the truth, and must not even be as good as Pilate and inquire, "What is truth?" that, so far from "buying the truth and selling it not," she must barter away the truth she already possesses, she must destroy her Church-schools, to found sceptical seminaries in their place; and that, instead of holding in her own hands, in the sight of all men, the symbols of the true faith, she must become a toll-collector of tickets³ every Monday morning in her schools, to ascertain that her children have been at all possible varieties of conventicular meetings on the previous Sunday! Heaven forbid that she should ever lend an ear to such counsel as this! We would address ourselves to Dr. Hook, and say—"Let us examine the reasons on which you ground it. You assert that England has no religious establishment. Let us waive, for the present, the question de facto, and consider that de jure. If it is true, then, that she has not a religious establishment,—we reply,—she ought not to allow herself to rest for a moment before she has one, for she cannot hope to prosper without one. "Our great metaphysician and divine," as you justly call him⁴, Bishop Butler, affirms⁵ that "a constitution of a civil government without

"It is to be remarked further, that the value of any particular religious establishment is not to be estimated merely by what it is in itself, but also by what it is in comparison with those of other nations; a comparison which will sufficiently teach us not to expect perfection in human things. And, what is still more material, the value of our own ought to be very much heightened in our esteem by considering what it is a security from; I mean that great corruption of Christianity—Popery, which is ever hard at work to bring us again under its yoke." Bishop Butler, Sermon on the King's Accession.

a religious establishment is a chimerical project, of which there is no example, and which, leaving the generality without guide and instruction, must leave religion to be sunk and forgotten among them, and, at the same time, give full scope to superstition and the gloom of enthusiasm."—"An established religion is the universal voice of nature," says Bishop Warburton⁶. "The consecration of the State by a State Religion is necessary", we do not consider it as convenient, but as essential, to a State," says Mr. Burke. You may, perhaps, say, in answer to all this, that "those who like yourself are called High Churchmen, have little or no sympathy with mere⁷ Establishmentarians." Of "~~mere~~ Establishmentarians," as you style them, we know nothing; we do not believe in their existence; we suppose that all who affirm, or ever have affirmed, the necessity of a religious establishment to a State, have done so on account of its religious uses, both public and private; and because it is the Divine will that States should be consecrated by religion, and because they cannot hope for God's blessing without it. So that, when you say you have no sympathy with mere Establishmentarians, you say you have no sympathy with men in the moon. But if you mean that you have no sympathy with Establishmentarians (as indeed seems to be the case), then we leave it to you to consider whether it is not a greater misfortune to you to have little or no sympathy with Bishop Butler, Bishop Warburton, and Mr. Burke, than it is to them to "have little or no sympathy" with Dr. Hook.

But to examine further your *reasons*⁸ for this want of sympathy with them. You said "that the taxes are collected from persons of all religions, and cannot be fairly expended for the exclusive maintenance of one." And you lay it down very confidently, that "to call upon Parliament to vote any money for the exclusive support of the Church of England, is to call upon Parliament to do what is unjust."

We lately met with this argument in a book, also on the "Education of the People," written by an excellent lady⁹, who has done much for the cause of instruction, and we confess that we were greatly surprised to see so shallow a sophism in so respectable a work. But to meet with it in the pages of an experienced writer like Dr. Hook is what indeed has exhausted all our faculties of amazement.

² Mrs. Tuckfield, p. 40. "As Dissenters pay taxes, I think they may reasonably expect that government should assist them in forming separate schools." Mrs. Tuckfield has in a very sensible manner protested, by anticipation, against Dr. Hook's plan (ibid. p. 38), as follows: "I have never been able to make up my mind to like the plan of receiving children of all different persuasions in the same schools, on the principle of professing to avoid doctrinal instruction, except that given by the ministers of each different sect on particular days, or particular hours. I feel persuaded such a plan, if it were really practicable, would in this country, under existing circumstances, have very injurious results; such a school would become a hot-bed for little juvenile controversialists, who would very soon compare notes, with respect to their religious teachers, and neither learn nor believe any thing distinctly. I do not see how we can conscientiously order any schoolmaster to refrain from

Let us first observe that this proposition is a general one, and does not affect England more than any other nation, or England more now than at any other time: but it is predicated concerning all nations at all times. Since, also, in any nation that ever existed, the citizens have never been all of one and the same mind concerning religion; since there ever have been and ever will be dissenters in every public community; therefore no State has ever been justified, or ever will be justified, in voting a single shilling for religion! All governments which have done so have been guilty of iniquity. Thus, for instance, the Parliament of England, when it voted the erection of fifty new churches, which it described³ “as a work so much for the honour of God, the spiritual welfare of her Majesty’s subjects, the interest of the Established Church, and the glory of her Majesty’s reign,” did not what was pious and noble, but what was unjust! What a strange proposition is this!

If Dr. Hook had given this important subject any adequate consideration, he would have perceived that there is not the slightest ground for maintaining that the payment of taxes on the part of subjects creates any obligation on the part of rulers to endow the opinions of those who pay. We pay taxes to the governing power, in token of our subjection to it, and in order that it may have the means of protecting our property and persons, and of upholding the dignity of the State, and providing for its welfare, and as a remuneration for its service in so doing. In consequence of this payment we are entitled to liberty and protection, in mind, body, and estate; but the State is not under any obligation, on the ground of our paying taxes, to go further than protection, and to proceed to encourage and endow our opinions: and whatever opinions it may encourage, it does so not because they are ours, but because they are in accordance with the Divine will, and conducive to the general good. All this is clearly laid down by all respectable writers who have treated upon taxes; from Puffendorf⁴, Grotius, and Gerhard, down to our own Blackstone.

touching on any doctrinal point, or how, conscientiously, he can obey such orders, unless he denies the practical efficacy on the heart of some of those cardinal doctrines which appear to me the corner-stone of Christianity.”

⁴ PUFFENDORF de Officio Civis, ii. xv. Alterum jus imperantis in hoc consistit, ut possit particulam aliquam de subditorum bonis tributi aut rectigalis nomine decerpere. Cum enim civium vita et fortuna sint defendenda, oportet ut hi conferant

It is also most distinctly taught in Scripture. Christ commands the Jews to pay tribute to Cæsar. Why? Because they were Cæsar's subjects; not because he encouraged their opinions, or in order that he might do so. Again: St. Paul commands Christians to pay tribute⁶ to Nero. Nero burnt Christians, but we never hear that he expended a single denarius of the taxes collected from them in maintaining their religion. But St. Paul did not think that they were therefore exempt from paying taxes to Nero, the heathen, the persecutor. No. And why were they ordered by the apostle to pay them! Because, as he tells them, the higher Powers "are God's⁶ ministers, attending continually on this very thing," that is, on the execution of justice and on the maintenance of peace; that those subject to their sway may be enabled to "lead quiet and peaceable lives in all godliness and honesty⁷."

We would proceed further, and say, that since the civil power is bound to take care "ne quid detrimenti Respublica capiat," and since nothing so disturbs the peace and impairs the stability of a State as divisions and factions in religion, and nothing so much strengthens it as religious unity, therefore the legislators of a country, to whom salus populi is suprema lex, would be neglecting their first duty to those who pay taxes, they would not be guarding them with that defence and protection which they owe them, if they were to endow different religions, instead of maintaining one.

Perhaps Dr. Hook will allow us to submit to him the following authorities on this subject. If he has "little or no sympathy" with the authors above cited, perhaps he may look with more indulgence on these.

Lord Bolingbroke says⁸, that "to make government effectual, there must be religion; this religion must be national; and the national religion must be maintained in reputation, in reverence." And in the *Edinburgh Review*⁹ we read as follows:—"We grant unde sumptus ad eum finem necessarii tolerentur. GROTIUS de Jure Belli et Pacis, i. 11. § vii. 12. Tributa ut solvamus honestum est, atque etiam præceptum conscientiam obligans, ut Paulus Apostolus explicat; tributorum autem fins est ut potestates publicæ habeant unde sumptum faciant ad bonos tuendos et coercendos malos. that it is proper for the legislature, in its paternal care for the people, to provide for them the benefits of religious instruction and public worship, by the establishment of a national Church; and an ample provision ought to be made for the clergy who devote themselves to this important service. But if any persons, after having contributed the share which the law requires from them for the support of the established clergy, choose to provide other ministers for themselves, Government has no interest to prevent or molest them." And again¹, "To a well-supported national establishment, effectually discharging its duties, we are very sincere friends. If any man, after he has paid his contribution to this great security for the existence of religion in any shape, chooses to adopt a religion of his own, that man should be permitted to do so without let or molestation. We apologize to men of sense for sentiments so trite."

Lord Bolingbroke and the Edinburgh reviewers little dreamt of the time when they should be accused of injustice by an Anglican Churchman for maintaining the cause of an established Church!

But, further, Dr. Hook objects to the application of taxes to the exclusive maintenance of one religion. And what does he himself all the while propose to do? He will not give a shilling of the public money to religion, and will vote eight millions at once, and three millions annually, to promote irreligion! Let him not reply, that it is to promote what we call irreligion, but what is education. This answer, even if it were true, will serve him nothing: for by his theory of taxation "it is unjust" that we should be taxed to maintain what we disapprove. If then it is a persecution of Dissenters to apply taxes partly collected from them to promote Church education, how much more outrageous an act of persecution is it of Churchmen, ay, and of Dissenters too, to make them contribute, we know not how many millions, not for the establishment of any thing, but for the dis-establishment of all things!

We now return to the question de facto. Have we an Established Church, or have we not?

Dr. Hook says that it is idle to argue the question de jure, for that we do not possess a religious establishment. "It is a pure fiction," he says (p. 38), "to assert that the State by any Act of Parliament has established the Church of England, or any other form of Christianity to which it is exclusively bound to render pecuniary support, or to afford any other support, than such as every class of Her Majesty's subjects have a right to demand.

And again, p. 37: "Nor, again, can there be any objection on the part of the State to admit Dissenters to an equality in respect to State support; because, so far as education is concerned, the question is already settled. The State does assist both the Church and Dissent" "(i.e. through the British and Foreign School Society) at the present time."

In reply to these allegations, we repeat, in the first place, that if England is without a religious establishment, she ought to lose no time in establishing religion,—yes, in establishing the religion which is true: and we are disposed to think that Dr. Hook would be better employed in assisting her to do so, than in attempting to persuade her that she cannot perform the duty which is laid upon her by God.

But is it true that she has no established religion? It seems to us very strange, that our greatest statesmen and divines should have supposed that she had a national Church, and should have regarded it as one of our greatest national blessings, and that it should have been reserved to Dr. Hook to discover that they had been lauding Divine Providence for a phantom which has no existence but in their dreams. It is also wonderful that we should have had to sustain so many attacks from our dissenting brethren², Romanist and Protestant³, on the ground of ours being a mere parliamentary religion, and that none of the advocates of the Church of England should have ever had the wit to discover that we have no State establishment at all. And what is strangest of all is, that Dr. Hook himself, who at present "has no sympathy with mere Establishmentarians," and questions the existence of an Establishment, should a few years ago⁴ have told us, that "to dissolve the religious establishment of this country would be, as it were, to tear the sun from the centre of our social system."

But where is the Act of Parliament, now asks Dr. Hook⁵, "which has established the Church?" Where, we ask in reply, is the Act of Parliament which has established the monarchy, or the peerage, or the commons of the realm? Where is the Act of Parliament which has established the sun or the sea? The clergy of the Church (as Henry Wharton says⁶) “was anciently accounted, and really was, not the third, but the first estate of the realm,” and was anterior to Acts of Parliament, and aided in framing them, just as the Christian episcopate is prior to Church synods and canons, and forms the one and frames the other. And Dr. Hook might as well ask us for a Church Decretal establishing episcopacy, as for a State Act of Parliament establishing the Church. But if he asks for Acts of Parliament recognizing and maintaining the Church, we can supply him with some hundreds. For example, let him refer to the Statute of Provisors in 1350, which declares that “the Holy Church of England was founded in the Estate of Prelacy, and the Kings of England were wont to have the greatest part of their Council of Bishops and Clerks’;” let him look at the Act of Uniformity of 1662,—of Union between England and Scotland in 1706,—of Union between England and Ireland in 1800,—and even at the Roman Catholic Relief Bill in 1829,—in all which the Church of England is declared to be inviolably settled and established. Let him examine the Sovereign’s *Coronation*⁷ Oath, by which the kings and queens of England bind themselves to maintain “the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel, and the Protestant reformed religion as is established by law, and to preserve unto the bishops and clergy of the Church all such rights and privileges as appertain to them.” Let him, we say, consult these documents, and not ask for an Act of Parliament establishing that which has aided in making Acts of Parliament in England ever since there were Parliaments.

“It is as barons,” says Dr. Hook, “not as bishops,” that seats in the House of Lords are held by our English prelates. At the Conquest the bishops, on account of the lands they held, were made barons,” and thus he accounts for their legislative position in the Imperial Parliament. He founds it on their lands, and dates it from the Conquest. If this be true, we are greatly puzzled

⁷ 25 Ed. III. St. 6.

⁸ Bishop Marsh in his celebrated discourse, entitled “The National Religion the foundation of National Education,” preached at St. Paul’s in 1811, says, page 28, “We are now concerned with the facts; that there is a religion by law established in this country, that the State has allied itself with the Church of England, that for the security of this Church provision has been made, not only by repeated acts of parliament, but by his Majesty’s coronation oath.”

to discover how the bishops of the new creation—Oxford, Peterborough, Gloucester, some five hundred years after the Conquest—found their way into the House of Lords. Lord Hale¹ would have told Dr. Hook that the English bishops sit by immemorial usage in the House of Lords by virtue of their episcopal dignity; and Archbishop Laud, with whom we hope Dr. Hook has some sympathy,—strenuous Establishmentarian as the archbishop was²,—affirms, in his answer to Lord Say and Sele³, that “bishops have had their votes in parliaments and in making laws ever since there were parliaments, or any thing that resembled them, in this kingdom,”—and this was some centuries before the Conquest.

We need not follow Dr. Hook in his argument, that if the Church of England “claims a right to the exclusive education of the people, the bishops are bound to go down to the House of Lords and seek powers to sell their estates and provide funds for national education;” for that “it would be better to have a pauperized hierarchy than an uneducated people” (p. 39); and “never could the hierarchy be more respectable than when pauperized in such a cause.”

Many a man, we perceive, in these days sets himself up to be an episcopus episcoporum besides the Pope of Rome. We regret that Dr. Hook should have taken this office on himself. The bishops will doubtless do what is best for the Church and the people without his admonitions. In the meantime, for our own parts, looking at the manner in which episcopal revenues are, for the most part, expended by their possessors, namely, in promoting the erection of churches, and schools, and training-colleges,—to say nothing of contributions for missions abroad,—looking also at the effect produced by these contributions in eliciting others from lay and other quarters, and considering the great probability, yes, the certainty, that if bishops did not give largely, nothing, or next to nothing, would be given by any one to pious uses, we feel persuaded that a “pauperized hierarchy” would be one of the most sure recipes for “an uneducated people.”

¹ Burn's Eccles. Law. (Ed. Lond. 1842. vol. i. p. 217.)—Unto all which may be added what Lord Hale delivers, in a manuscript treatise touching the right of the crown, as set forth by the very learned Dr. Warburton, Bishop of Gloucester, in his “Alliance between Church and State,” p. 131, as follows:—“The bishops sit in the House of Peers by usage and custom; which I therefore call usage, because they had it not by express charter, for then we should find some. Neither had they it by tenure; for regularly their tenure was in free alms, and not per baroniam; and therefore it is clear they were not barons in respect of their possessions, but their possessions were called baronies, because they were the possessions of customary barons. Besides, it is evident that the writ of summons usually went electo et confirmato, before any restitution of the temporalities; so that their possessions were not the cause of their summons. Neither are they barons by prescription; for it is evident that as well the lately erected bishops, as Gloucester, Oxon, &c., had voice in parliament, and yet erected within time of memory and without any special words in the creation thereof to entitle them to it. So that it is a privilege by usage annexed to the episcopal dignity within the realm; not to their order, which they acquire by consecration; nor to their persons, for in respect of their persons they are not barons, nor to be tried as barons; but to their incorporation and dignity episcopal.”

In a selfish age they who contend for the honourable maintenance of bishops and clergy are imagined, by worldly-minded people, to contend for wealth for its own sake. Wherefore we will express what we think on this subject in the words of one who was as far removed from ambition and covetousness as he was eminent for charity, simplicity, and wisdom⁴: “In a Bishop great liberality, great hospitality, actions in every kind great, are looked for; and for actions which must be great mean instruments will not serve. Men are but men, what room soever amongst men they hold. If, therefore, the measure of their worldly abilities be beneath that proportion which their calling does make to be looked for at their hands, a stronger inducement it is than, perhaps, men are aware of unto evil and corrupt dealing for supply of that defect. For which cause we must needs think it a thing necessary unto the common good of the Church, that great jurisdiction being granted unto bishops over others, a state of wealth proportionable should likewise be provided for them. Where wealth is had in so great admiration, as generally in this golden age it is, that without it angelical perfections are not able to deliver from extreme contempt, surely to make bishops poorer than they are were to make them of less account and estimation than they should be. Wherefore if detriment and dishonour do grow to religion, to God, to His Church, when the public account which is made of the chief of the clergy decays, how should it be but in this respect, for the good of religion, of God, of his Church, that the wealth of bishops be carefully preserved from further diminution?”

We regret to find that Dr. Hook lends his sanction to the low, common-place cant (we can call it by no better name), which makes an invidious and un-catholic distinction between the bishops and parochial priesthood, by calling the latter “the working clergy,” (p. 16, 50,) as if the head and the heart do no work, because they do not the same work as the hands and the feet; and as if all the clergy are not working clergy, each in his own order.

For our own parts we greatly lament that our reverend prelates are compelled to be working clergy to a degree, and in a manner, not the most suitable to their position in the Church. We deeply deplore that the tendency of events in our own country, in late years, has been to deprive the highest order of clergy of those opportunities of reading, meditation, conference, and prayer, which are most deserving of the name of work in themselves, and which serve to render all other work most profitable to the Church and most conducive to God's glory. We regret that the bishops of England are compelled to be working clergy in the mere material sense of the term; and we are persuaded that more work could be done by the Church, and done in a better manner and spirit, if they had less manual and mechanical drudgery to do. For this reason we are very desirous to see a great increase in the numbers of our Episcopate.

But to return to the question, Have we a religious establishment in England? Dr. Hook says, "The State does assist both Church and Dissent at the present time" with parliamentary grants for education, and, therefore, the principle of No-established religion has, he argues, "been already conceded"; the question, as far as education is concerned, is," he says, "already settled." Conceded, we ask, by whom? Settled by whom?

Not by the Legislature, not by the Church. We are fully aware that grants have been made by Parliament for education, and that part of these grants has been dispensed through the British and Foreign School Society, and that it is a rule of this Society, that "No creed shall be taught in its schools;" and still more, that this Society has pledged itself to exert itself to the utmost "to exclude from all schools aided by Parliament the formularies of any particular church." In a word, that Society's creed is,—to have no creed, and to suffer no one else to have any. This being the case, we do not hesitate to say, that when Parliament votes money for education to be dispensed by this Society, it does violate the principle of an Establishment; and they who approve that grant, and yet contend for an establishment, seem to us to be guilty of a manifest absurdity. We are altogether of Dr. Paley's mind in this point, that "The notion of a religious establishment comprehends three things:—A clergy, or an order of men secluded from other professions to attend upon the offices of religion; a legal provision for the maintenance of the clergy; and the confining of that provision to the teachers of a particular sect of Christianity. If any one of these three things be wanting; if there be no clergy, as amongst the Quakers; or if the clergy have no other provision than what they derive from the voluntary contribution of their hearers; or if the provision which the laws assign to the support of religion be extended to various sects and denominations of Christians; there exists no national religion or established church, according to the sense which these terms are usually made to convey⁷."

Let us suppose, for argument's sake, that the principle of No-establishment has been conceded by the Legislature, by its grants to the British and Foreign School Society. We then say that the question is, not whether it has been conceded, but whether it is right. According to Dr. Hook's mode of arguing, States can have no repentance. Reformation is impossible. How would he, with his principle, that any act of the Legislature, however bad, is to be like the laws of the Medes and Persians which alter not—how, we ask, with this principle, would he now have in England what he rightly calls the "old Catholic Church reformed from middle age corruptions?" "The principle" of Popery had been conceded. "The question had been settled," and we must have been all Papists to doomsday, and Dr. Hook would have been now saying mass at Leeds, instead of vindicating "the old Catholic Church reformed." If, then, the principle of No-establishment has been conceded by the grant to the British and Foreign Society, and if this principle is a false and pernicious one, then by all means let it be reformed; and let Dr. Hook employ himself in correcting the evil, instead of calling upon us to propagate and perpetuate it.

But has this principle been conceded by the State? He says, "Yes; it is conceded by this grant." We affirm, on the other hand, that the contrary principle, that of an Established Church, is directly asserted by the Legislature in numberless statutes, some of which we have already cited, and by the nation in the coronation oath, so that we have affirmations against concessions, rules against exceptions; and what after all is conceded by the State is, that it "halts between two opinions;" and if Dr. Hook has the spirit of an Elijah, he will ask it, "Why it does so?" Besides, whatever the State has done, the Church can never concede that a commonwealth can prosper without a national religion. She may be compelled to suffer evil, but she can never be forced to do it. The State may be untrue to her, and she may be compelled to tolerate ills at its hands ; but she may not, therefore, be false to the State, and flatter it that it can endow various creeds and be guiltless. If the Church were to concede this, she would be a false witness and prophecy lies ; she would be faithless to her Divine Head. Whatever, therefore, any of her lay members, or even her clergy, may do, she can never approve the grant of public money to the British and Foreign School Society, or recognize any national teacher of religion but herself. And if she ever should make such a concession (as Dr. Hook says has been made for her), then every true son of the Church would rise up and remind her that she was giving away what she had no right to give away ; for the commission to teach is hers to execute, but it is CHRIST'S alone to give.

We will now bring these remarks to a close : but before doing so we would request leave to address ourselves, in respectful terms, first to the State, and next to the Church ; or rather, in more correct language, to the people of England, first in their civil, and next in their religious capacity.

We take for granted that unity in true religion is the strongest preservative of public peace. In England we are too apt to speak of Churchmen and Dissenters as if they had no bonds of unity between them, but were like two distinct and antagonist races of human beings, whereas they are joined by the ties, not only of humanity and citizenship, but also of certain articles of the true faith, which they hold in common.

This being so, there appear to be foundations for a fabric of amity and union, if both parties will “labour for peace,” and not for division ; and will endeavour to be of one mind, and to maintain the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace.

For this purpose we would provide an adequate supply of places of worship, of learned and pious clergy, and of Church schools and Church schoolmasters ; and we cherish a confident hope that by these means our unhappy divisions would, in a great measure, be healed, and we should become an united people.

We do not doubt that every enlightened and sober-minded man among our dissenting brethren would approve, yes, and would promote, this design : we are sure that as citizens they must desire unity, and as Christians they must pray for it, as Christ did ; and though the individual Dissenter may prefer his own form of doctrine or worship to that of the Church, yet since he differs as much, or more, from other Dissenters of other denominations as he does from the Church, and since there is no one form of Christianity in this country which can compete even in the *numerical*⁹ strength of its adherents with the Church, the truly liberal and conscientious Dissenter will, for the sake of UNITY, desire its prosperity, and promote its advancement. He may, indeed, wish that those points in which he differs from the Church were the doctrines of the Church, but he cannot desire that those articles of faith in which he agrees with the Church, and by virtue of which he is himself, in a certain sense, a member of the Church, were not taught by the Church, or that DIVISION were endowed by the State instead of UNITY.

Let us now address ourselves, with all due respect and submission, to our civil rulers.

It is usual to speak of the education question in this country as one of difficulty. For our own part we cannot in any way participate in this language. The question now before us is, to our minds, an exceedingly simple one, if we do not approach it with a determination beforehand to make it difficult. Dr. Hook, as we said at the beginning of this article, has somewhat perplexed it by calling it the question of the education of the people, whereas it is the question of the education of the poor. This simplifies the matter exceedingly. Among the middle classes dissent has made considerable inroads, but there are few nominal Dissenters, and fewer real ones, among the poor; the poor belong either to the Church, or to no Church. "The great mass of the parents of the destitute children," (says Mr. Cotton in his evidence before the Committee on Education¹;) "who are commonly called Dissenters, have very little feeling on doctrinal points at all; and care very little on the subject, provided their children have the benefit of instruction." Mr. Dorsey was asked by the same committee² whether there were many Unitarians in the working classes, to which he replied, "Extremely few: I have had, I suppose, since I commenced teaching, 1000 children, and I have only had six Unitarians." On the whole, it is too true, (as Mr. Bowles³ said in one of his excellent pamphlets on education,) especially in large towns, "that the persons who stand most in need of education, are in general too indifferent on the subject of religion to care what kind of religious instruction their offspring receives." Hence the question of education of the poor is a very simple one. Their poverty entitles them to education from the State. Education to be a blessing, and not a bane, must be religious, must be doctrinal. The poor have a right, therefore, to be educated in the doctrines of some Christian community: and since the Church is the branch of the universal Church planted in these realms; since it is Christ's institution; since it is the religious community of the nation, established by law; since it is the community of the great majority of the people, therefore there is no one Christian community by which the poor ought to be educated, or can be educated, but the Church. We therefore conclude, that the Church ought to be enabled by the State to educate the poor.

We would also observe, that all other methods of educating the poor, except by means of the Church, have failed; and thus the problem has become much simpler than it formerly was. The "general religion system," or rather, as Dr. Hook justly calls it, (p. 35,) the no-religion system, has been tried and failed; the secular-and-sacred-severance system has also been tried and failed; and thus by the method of exhaustions we are brought to the Church system of education; which, we are persuaded, will never fail. Without the Church, especially in England, where the Church has TEN THOUSAND SCHOOLS, it is impossible for the State to educate the poor; with the Church, and by the Church, it may educate them all.

Another facility offered to the statesman for making Church education universal, arises from the nature of Church instruction. What is the symbolum concordiæ which binds Church schools together? The Catechism. And what is the Catechism? Simply the Apostles' Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Lord's Prayer, and the doctrine of the two Sacraments. If the Catechism were like the Creed of Pius IV., adding twelve new articles to the Nicene Creed, and imposing them as necessary to salvation; or if it were like the Westminster Catechism, discussing the most abstruse questions of theology, such as predestination, free will, and final perseverance, then the State would have great difficulty in making Church teaching universal. But seeing Catechisms are necessary in education (and let any one who doubts this look at the results now produced in Germany by their abandonment); and seeing that the Church Catechism is what it is, seeing also that it is not imposed on the pupil in our Church schools, to be subscribed by him as an article of faith, but received by him from the teacher, on the principle (without which there can be no education,) that oportet discentem credere, and with a full understanding that licet edocto judicare; we are satisfied, that if men will only set themselves to labour for peace, and not for party, they will find no difficulty whatever in educating the poor of England together in the same schools, from one end of the land to the other,—we mean in the schools of the Church.

Here is a glorious result proposed to all: one worth living for, yes, and worth dying for: and the statesman who brings it about, or labours to do so, will confer an inestimable benefit on his country, and will earn immortal renown, not only on earth, but in heaven.

In the last place, let us be allowed to say one word to the Church.

Dr. Hook would lead the Church of England into the same false position in which the Church of France now stands. At the French Revolution of 1830, the Charte decreed the equality of three religions, Romanism, Lutheranism, and Calvinism, to which was soon, alas! added a fourth, Judaism. All these are now endowed by the French State.

In an evil hour the Church of France accepted the Revolutionary Charte as her watchword, because, like Dr. Hook's plan, it promised liberty of teaching (Liberté d'Enseignement) to all. "We plead our cause (said the Church champion in the House of Peers, M. de Montalembert)—we plead our cause, with one of our hands on the Gospel, and with the other on the Charte." He might as well have said, "with the other on the Koran."

The bishops of that Church have been unhappily deluded into using the same language, in the vain hope, as it seems, of making their cause popular with the democracy; and instead of asserting their own inalienable right, and indispensable duty, to teach, by virtue and obligation of their pastoral commission from Christ, they put forward a miserable plea for liberty to teach, derived from the Charte of July!

Let us mark the consequence. Having thus abandoned the ground of right and duty, they contend in vain for that of liberty. "You have renounced your right to teach," says the State to the Church. "Education is too serious a matter to be left free to every speculating adventurer. I must take it into my own hands. The State must be the Church."

And so it has become. Witness the present condition of secondary and primary education in France, as described in the preceding pages.

What further has been the result? Not merely separation of Church and State, but bitter hostility between them; in fact, a deadly civil war, by which no party can be the gainer, except that of Popery and Infidelity ;

“ Bella geri placuit, nullos habitura triumphos.”

Let the Church and State of England take warning from this example, and not engage in a conflict by which nothing can be won, and every thing may be lost.

Taught by this practical lesson, let not the Church abandon an iota of her claim to be the religious teacher of the nation. Let her admit no partner in this sacred office. If she consents to divide the child, she proves herself a false mother. Yes, we repeat, let her maintain her right to be recognized as the religious teacher of the nation, first, as being the Church of the majority of the people; secondly, as being the Church established by law; thirdly, and above all, as being the branch of Christ's Church planted in this country. On these grounds let her claim aid and encouragement from the State, to enable her to perform the great work of national education, no less on the State's behalf than on her own; and blessed will those statesmen be, who lend a willing ear to her claim !

We close these remarks with the words of one who, from his office as Poet Laureate, has a special right to address the CROWN and the COUNTRY, and who from his wisdom and genius is entitled to a respectful hearing from the WORLD.

“ Hail to the crown by Freedom shaped—to gird
An English sovereign's brow ! and to the throne
Whereon he sits ! Whose deep foundations lie
In veneration and the people's love ;
Whose steps are equity, whose seat is law.
—Hail to the STATE of England ! And conjoin
With this a salutation as devout,
Made to the spiritual Fabric of her CHURCH ;
Founded in truth ; by blood of Martyrdom
Cemented ; by the hands of Wisdom reared
In beauty of Holiness, with ordered pomp,
Decent, and unreprieved. The voice that greets
The majesty of both, shall pray for both ;
That, mutually protected and sustained,
They may endure long as the sea surrounds
This favoured land, or sunshine warms her soil ⁴. ”

⁴ “ The Excursion.” Book VI. London, 1832. “ Church-yard among the Mountains.”—p. 199.

Speaking of the right of the Poor to religious EDUCATION by State provision, he says,

“ This sacred right is fruitlessly announced,
This universal plea in vain addressed,
To eyes and ears of parents who themselves
Did, in the time of their necessity,
Urge it in vain ; and therefore, like a prayer
That from the humblest floor ascends to heaven,
It mounts to reach the STATE’s parental ear ;
Who, if indeed she own a mother’s heart,
And be not most unfeelingly devoid
Of gratitude to Providence, will grant
The unquestionable good ; which ENGLAND, safe
From interference of external force,
May grant at leisure ; without risk incurred
That, what in wisdom for herself she doth,
Others shall e’er be able to undo ‘.”

A letter addressed by the late Chief Baron of the Exchequer to Lord Ashley, in 1839, seems to us deserving of serious attention at the present time, on account of the station and authority of the writer, and also as stating very clearly the rights and duties of the Church and State in the great matter of national education. We therefore subjoin it for the consideration of our readers by way of Postscript :—

“ Dear Lord Ashley,

“ I send herewith my first subscription to the National School Society. The lateness of this subscription is the result of circumstances purely accidental, and not of any change effected by recent publications, or by any other recent occurrence, in those opinions which induced me to take an active and public part in support of the society. Those opinions are contained in the following propositions :—

“ 1. That man is by nature a moral and religious as well as an intellectual being ; and that the cultivation of his intellect, without a simultaneous development and direction of his moral and religious sentiment, would make his intelligence a source of evil instead of benefit to his race.

“ 2. That the endowment, that is to say, the establishment of a national religion, and the uniformity of religious observances and opinions, as far as it can be attained without violating the liberty of conscience, are very great public advantages.

“ 3. That the Church of England, independently of the advantage which it now possesses of being already established and moulded up with our civil institutions, is more tolerant, has a better foundation in truth, and is of greater utility, than any other form of religion that could be substituted in its place.

“ 4. That the clergy of the Church of England, already the authorized teachers of the national religion, are better qualified, by their attainments and their high moral character, to be the teachers of every part of useful knowledge than any other class of persons who could be appointed for that purpose.

“ 5. That though it is an essential part of toleration to permit those who dissent from the religion of the state to educate their children after their own fashion, there ought not to be any system of education at the national expense that does not comprehend, as an essential part of it, instruction in the established religion. To tolerate is one thing—to cherish and to propagate quite another. The sower of good seed, though he may not separate or gather the tares before the harvest, is not enjoined to sow them with the good seed.

“ 6. That the application of the national funds, for the propagation of any but the national religion, is an exception from a general principle, to be justified only by some obvious political necessity of expediency.

“ 7. That the application of the national funds for the propagation of any other than the established religion, merely to secure the political interest of a party, however it may be masked under the specious names of toleration and liberty of conscience, is, in effect, nothing less than treachery to the state and to the sovereign.

“ 8. That no restraint or political exclusion should take place on account of any religious opinions or observances, except when they lead to the depravation of morals, or characterize some political hostility to our social institutions. The aberrations of conscience, when they turn upon the fashion of a button, or the form of a dialogue, are of no importance; but when they lead to the destruction of life, or property, or liberty, or take the form of avowed hostility to the State, they will justify, if they do not imperiously demand, exclusion from all political powers.

“ These principles, formed in early life, and corroborated by the reflections and experience of maturer age, I think it my duty in the present times not only to avow, but steadily to act upon. I shall, therefore, endeavour to support the Society, with the most anxious wishes for its success.

“ I am, my dear Lord, &c.,

“ ABINGER.”

NOTE.

The document referred to in p. 139, is of so important a character, that we print it entire, with the king's reply, both in a French translation. Our readers may there learn not to be too sanguine about the results of what some persons have been pleased to call a perfect system of educational organization.

“Sire, les mouvements qui, dans ces derniers temps, se sont manifestés dans notre Eglise, semblent devoir tellement fixer la sérieuse attention des hommes dévoués à leurs pays, que, dans nos rapports relatifs aux églises de la ville, nous n'avons pas cru convenable de nous dispenser de les prendre en considération, ainsi qu'il est de notre devoir. Si, par suite de ces motifs, nous osons nous adresser avec le plus profond respect à Sa Majesté en personne, et lui exposer très-humblement nos vues, nos désirs et nos prières, nous le faisons dans l'intime conviction que ces mouvements ne sont pas des symptômes éphémères, mais qu'ils révèlent une nouvelle phase dans le développement intellectuel de la nation. D'un autre côté, non moins profondément convaincus que, dans notre vie nationale, dont le principal élément est la fidélité du peuple à son monarque, tout mouvement progressif ne peut se développer dans des conditions salutaires, s'il n'est dirigé par la prévoyance et l'intervention de Votre Majesté ; nous pensons que, de cette manière, il peut s'identifier avec l'Etat même, et concourir à la prospérité publique. Dans l'Eglise évangélique, les questions religieuses, qui pendant longtemps ont excité l'intérêt général, et qui étaient plutôt du domaine de la vie privée que de la vie publique, font maintenant invasion et jouent le premier rôle dans la vie nationale.

“La diversité des vues et des croyances religieuses qui jusqu'à présent n'ont été diamétralement opposées que dans les régions scientifiques, et y ont donné naissance à plusieurs tentatives de transactions, apparaît maintenant dans la vie politique et dans l'Eglise. Ces croyances diverses se montrent maintenant sous l'aspect de partis religieux. Il en est surtout deux qui sont opposés à notre Eglise : l'un s'attache à l'ancienne tradition et s'appuie sur elle comme sur son droit historique, se considérant comme la seule Eglise évangélique et la revendiquant comme sa propriété exclusive ; l'autre parti affirme avec assurance que le Saint-Esprit, qui constitue, maintient et gouverne la véritable Eglise, n'est lié ni à Rome, ni à la lettre de la tradition. L'Ecriture et les symboles sont les témoignages des premiers chrétiens et de l'Eglise qui se forme. Œuvres des hommes, ils attestent et proclament la foi des hommes, et, ainsi, la conception et la forme portent l'empreinte du caractère de l'époque et des auteurs de ces témoignages. Ce n'est pas là que réside la vérité absolue, mais c'est l'esprit de vérité, de sainteté et d'amour qui agit et se meut éternellement dans l'humanité. Celui qui s'est manifesté au monde par les auteurs des saintes Ecritures est aussi, par nous et en nous, l'interprète de ces mêmes Ecritures et le juge de leur vérité.

nisme, mais nous savons aussi que ce christianisme éternel, invariable dans son essence, se renouvelle dans le cœur humain, qu'il suit le développement de l'esprit de l'homme dans l'histoire, et revêt les formes nouvelles de la pensée, de la parole, ainsi que celles de l'existence de l'organisation de l'Eglise, à laquelle il donne l'expression et la vie. Nous estimons sans doute la tradition ; nous écoutons ses enseignements, et nous nous formons à sa discipline ; mais nous devons reconnaître à tout chrétien le droit et le devoir de s'approprier, par la liberté d'examen, la vérité chrétienne qui lui est offerte sous une forme déterminée, comme fait extérieur dans la tradition de l'Eglise. La vie chrétienne et la liberté évangélique ne sont possibles qu'à ces seules conditions.

“ Aussi regardons-nous comme une erreur dangereuse de prétendre restreindre l'esprit divin dans l'humanité, de l'attacher à des formes et à des formules prescrites, et de vouloir en faire dépendre la félicité chrétienne, comme si la vérité éternelle résidait dans ces mêmes formules. En outre, il y a encore, selon nous, plus de gravité à porter cette erreur jusqu'à contester à ceux qui pensent autrement, la libre manifestation de leurs convictions et leur droit de rester dans le sein de l'Eglise. Nous sommes placés, en ce qui concerne nos convictions religieuses, à la limite d'un temps ancien et nouveau, et nous nous trouvons dans cette crise. Ce que des hommes profonds ont annoncé depuis longtemps, à savoir que ce siècle ne s'écoulerait pas sans que la vie religieuse et ecclésiastique de votre peuple reçût une forme nouvelle, semble vouloir s'accomplir. La science a écarté beaucoup de formes et d'idées dans lesquelles s'est exprimée la conscience religieuse des temps primitifs du christianisme et plus tard de la science. Mais la science a également développé et mis en lumière ce qui existait déjà dans une forme plus obscure dans l'esprit du peuple.

“ Nous avons la conviction que Jésus-Christ est hier et aujourd'hui et dans l'éternité, la base de notre félicité et le maître de son Eglise, mais que ce maître n'est autre chose que l'esprit de Jésus-Christ en nous ; l'esprit de sainteté et d'amour ; que tous ceux qui en sont animés sont des enfants de Dieu et complètement libres. Cette conscience plus ou moins développée remplit notre temps, et la crise dans laquelle nous nous trouvons nous paraît consister précisément en ce que le sentiment religieux tend à s'exprimer dans une forme nouvelle la vérité éternelle du christianisme qu'il ne peut abandonner sans se désavouer lui-même, et que cependant il ne peut mettre d'accord dans la forme où la doctrine la lui présente avec tout ce qu'on doit d'ailleurs considérer comme vérité.

“ Notre temps se trouvant à ce point de développement, un parti réagit au sein de notre Eglise contre ces efforts. Ce parti craint que la perte des vases sacrés n'entraîne la perte de leur contenu, celle de la lettre, celle de l'esprit, celle du dogme, celle de la croyance, du sentiment et de l'amour chrétien, et enfin que la ruine de la religion n'entraîne celle de l'Etat. Redoutant ce danger, il croit ne pouvoir trouver son salut que dans le dogme de l'Eglise, et le saisit comme ancre de son espérance. Il identifie le dogme et le christianisme, la lettre et l'esprit, la forme et l'essence. La vérité chrétienne, il ne la voit que dans l'Ecriture et les livres symboliques, et l'homme doit l'accepter et la reconnaître, et voilà ce qu'il appelle croire. La croyance vivace au christianisme, qui vit éternellement dans le cœur et dans l'esprit de ses enfants, ce parti en fait une croyance à la confession de l'Eglise. Il ne considère pas comme vrais membres de l'Eglise et ses seuls repré-sentants ceux qui sont remplis de l'esprit du Christ, et le prouvent par leur vie et leurs actions ; mais ceux qui sont animés de l'esprit de l'Eglise de ce parti et qui le prouvent en reconnaissant la confession de l'Eglise.

“Ce parti n'hésite pas, en laissant de côté tout amour chrétien, de qualifier la confession de l'Eglise de blasphémateurs hardis qu'elle n'est pas obligée de souffrir, même extérieurement, au milieu d'elle, que par suite de son profond abaissement.

“L'organe de ce parti, c'est la Gazette de l'Eglise évangélique, publiée ici par le professeur Hengstenberg ; on peut le comparer au judaïsme à la naissance du christianisme et à l'Eglise de Rome à l'époque de la réformation. Par suite de cette erreur fondamentale que la vérité chrétienne n'est contenue que dans la forme traditionnelle, n'est qu'un objet extérieur de la croyance, et non pas l'essence vraie et la plus intime de l'homme, ce parti perd la vérité même et reçoit là, en place de la vérité, sa forme et son apparence ; au lieu de la liberté il a l'esclavage ; au lieu de l'Evangile le dogme, et au lieu du protestantisme le principe du catholicisme. Nous sommes bien loin de condamner les hommes de cette tendance comme tels, au contraire, nous reconnaissons qu'eux aussi cherchent la vérité, mais leur principe est contraire à l'essence du protestantisme ainsi qu'au développement et à la conscience de notre temps. Aussi ne sommes-nous pas étonnés que l'opinion publique se prononce contre eux, et que les tendances pratiques aient provoqué des protestations ouvertes.

“Nous reconnaissons devant Votre Majesté royale, avec un respect profond et la sincérité que nous devons à Votre Majesté, comme fidèles sujets et représentants de la bourgeoisie, que ces protestations et les excitations qui s'y rattachent nous paraissent mériter une sérieuse appréciation. Une opinion et une direction dogmatique seule peut bien de nos jours provoquer une polémique littéraire, mais non, comme c'est le cas ici, occuper la presse quotidienne et remuer les masses. Bien plus, ces excitations ne nous paraissent venir que de la crainte et de l'opinion que les autorités de Votre Majesté auxquelles la direction de l'Eglise est confiée, n'agissent dans le sens du parti contre lequel les protestations sont dirigées, et ne donnent suite aux nombreuses sommations qui lui ont été faites de se prononcer contre une manière plus libre de concevoir le christianisme.

“L'esprit de Jésus-Christ est seul juge de tout ; et si l'on pouvait supposer que l'Eglise fût jamais abandonnée de cet esprit, elle serait morte. Elle trouve dans les actes de sa fondation et de son passé le fil conducteur qui la conduit hors du labyrinthe des erreurs humaines, ainsi que la règle des développements de sa doctrine ; mais l'esprit de Jésus-Christ, qui doit survivre en elle, si elle doit être une Eglise, est son véritable guide et son unique juge, ainsi que l'unique juge des siens. Pour donner carrière à cet esprit, il faut assurément que l'Eglise ait un développement et une constitution qui mettent ses membres en état de travailler sérieusement au temple du Seigneur. Quoique l'Eglise soit dans l'Etat et se trouve dans de nombreux rapports avec la vie politique et celle du peuple, l'Eglise, considérée dans son essence, n'est pas une institution de l'Etat. Mais notre Eglise a reçu, par son développement historique, une forme qui ne lui permet pas développer avec énergie toute sa force vitale. Nous prenons la liberté de manifester dès à présent nos vœux et nos prières modestes sur le mode et la forme de cette institution. Mais, après avoir examiné l'état actuel de nos rapports ecclésiastiques, nous avons cru que notre devoir nous commandait de déclarer respectueusement à Votre Majesté que l'Eglise évangélique, si elle veut aspirer avec une force nouvelle à sa haute destination, a besoin d'une nouvelle constitution qui lui en donne le moyen avec la participation énergique de ses membres.

“ J'ai donné à la municipalité de Berlin un long délai pour qu'elle eût le temps de réfléchir à sa démarche. Je n'ai consenti à écouter l'adresse que sous la condition qu'elle me serait présentée et lue par la municipalité elle-même. Je ne plaisais à espérer qu'elle envisagerait cette question sous un autre aspect, et qu'elle finirait par voir ce qu'il y a d'étrange à débiter en ma présence, face à face avec moi, une longue dissertation théologique. Enfin, Messieurs, vous l'avez voulu et j'ai souscrit à votre vœu. J'accorde volontiers à la première autorité de ma chère ville natale ce que je refuserais à d'autres. C'est un privilège dû aux sentiments de véritable fidélité au Roi, dont cette municipalité a constamment donné l'exemple aux habitants de la capitale. Vous avez parlé, j'ai écouté ; maintenant je vais répondre, autant que je le puis, après avoir prêté l'oreille à votre adresse.

“ La municipalité paraît prendre un grand intérêt aux affaires ecclésiastiques ; il faut donc supposer qu'elle connaît à fond la situation légale de notre Eglise évangélique ; elle doit savoir que lorsqu'à l'époque de la réformation le pouvoir ecclésiastique perdit ses chefs, l'Eglise et les réformateurs eux-mêmes transmirent l'autorité spirituelle au souverain du pays. Cette autorité est donc une des prérogatives de ma couronne, et en augmente le fardeau. Elle m'impose une pénible tâche ; mais elle me confère aussi le droit incontestable et incontesté de veiller à l'organisation de l'Eglise. Je m'abstiens de l'exercer ; les cinq années de mon règne le prouvent ; et remarquez ceci, Messieurs, car c'est le point culminant de ma réponse, je m'abstiens, parceque je suis d'avis que l'Eglise doit procéder par elle-même. Feu le roi, mon père, lui a fait un don précieux en la dotant des synodes.

“ Mais, la main sur la conscience, Messieurs, il ne m'est vraiment pas possible de vous reconnaître ce droit moral. Jetez un regard sur la situation du clergé de cette capitale. En aucune ville, grande ou petite, de ce royaume, on ne prend si peu de souci de la charge des âmes ! Il est un fait qu'il importe surtout de ne pas perdre de vue, quelque incroyable qu'il paraisse, et pourtant, il est vrai, c'est que, sous Frédéric-Guillaume I^{er}, lorsque la ville ne comptait que de 60 à 70 mille habitants, le nombre des prêtres était en réalité, et non pas proportionnellement, beaucoup plus considérable qu'il ne l'est aujourd'hui, que le chiffre de la population de Berlin s'élève à 400,000.—On a souvent tenté de mettre fin à cet intolérable état de choses.

“ Des particuliers, des communes, feu mon père et moi-même, tous nous avons entrepris cette œuvre. Mais tous ces efforts ont toujours éprouvé de si fâcheuses entraves, que ce n'est qu'à force de temps et de labeur que quelques-uns ont eu du succès, tandis que tous les autres ont échoué.

“ Récemment encore, Messieurs, la fraternité protestante a reçu de douloureuses atteintes, quand vous avez rejeté la requête que vous adressaient des protestants Anglicans pour avoir temporairement la jouissance en commun d'une des églises dépendant de l'autorité municipale, et cela au moment où, sans avoir, à ce que je crois, reçu la demande, vous offriez aux dissidents de l'Eglise romaine l'usage de deux temples. Les choses étant ainsi, je ne puis malheureusement accorder à la municipalité un droit moral que je voudrais bien lui reconnaître. Pour finir, je vais aborder ce qui m'a le plus péniblement affecté dans votre adresse. Vous désignez sous le nom de parti les véritables fidèles de l'Eglise évangélique. Rien ne m'a plus vivement affligé. Mais vous ne vous êtes pas arrêté là. Vous accusez, bien que d'une manière détournée, mais cependant assez explicite, mon gouvernement de favoriser un parti. Sur ce dernier point, Messieurs, je contiens mon ressentiment par respect pour ma propre dignité et pour celle de la magistrature. Du reste, j'ajouterai quelques mots.

“ La véritable amitié ne consiste que dans la sincérité : sous ce rapport, j'ai fourni ma part, en vous exprimant franchement et sérieusement, selon ma conscience, mon opinion, à vous, que je me plais à appeler mes amis. Il existe depuis 400 ans, entre ma dynastie et votre ville un beau lien qui a produit les plus heureux résultats. Dans l'assurance que mes paroles, bien interprétées, fortifieront et resserreront ce lien, je vous congédie en vous donnant l'assurance de ma bienveillance.”

- 1.—Observations on Natural History: with an Introduction on Habits of Observing, as connected with the Study of that Science. Also a Calendar of Periodic Phenomena in Natural History; with Remarks on the Importance of such Registers. By the Rev. LEONARD JENYNS, M.A., &c. London; Van Voorst.

THE author of this pleasing and instructive volume, is one of the rather numerous class of writers who have followed in the track of the venerable author of the Natural History of Selborne; a publication which will always be perused with fresh delight by every observer of the beauties and marvels of creation. The work before us owes its origin to the preparation of notes for a new edition of the History of Selborne, during which a body of materials accumulated, a considerable proportion of which now makes its appearance as a separate work. Of the value and interest of Mr. Jenyns' observations there cannot be any question. Any competent observer who with pencil in hand will regularly, and systematically, for a series of years note down the habits and manners of animals, and the various phenomena presented by the operations of nature, cannot fail to accumulate facts equally valuable and interesting. The resources of nature are inexhaustible, and furnish a never-failing source of new and important information. There is great justice in Mr. Jenyns' remarks on this point.

"Let none think," he says, "that because we have so many works conducted on the plan of White's, and so much on record in these days respecting the habits of animals, there is nothing more to be learnt. Ray has remarked, that so rich is nature, that a man born a thousand ages hence will still find enough left for him to do and notice. The field open to the observer is really inexhaustible; and this is not more true in respect of the immense number of species inhabiting this globe, than of what is requisite to perfect the history even of those known. In how very few cases, if any, can we say that we have attained to a complete knowledge of any one species, so as to give a detailed account of all its characters and instincts, and the degree to which these are liable to be affected by an alteration in the circumstances of its life. To those who travel in foreign and remote countries, still more to those who are stationed in localities but seldom visited by man, the force of this remark must be obvious."—p. 12.

The following observations, on the pleasure which arises from such studies of the works of God, are well expressed:—

"There is much pleasure in watching and registering such natural phenomena as we last alluded to, whether, after all, we turn them to any account or not. Many persons have found their chief happiness in a habit of observing the life and manners of the animals in their immediate neighbourhood, without any view to the facts so acquired being made subservient to the progress of zoology. We would throw no hindrance or discouragement in the way of such observers. We desire not to say any thing that might tend to check their inquiries, though no benefit were thereby to accrue to the higher departments of the science. For we are deeply sensible ourselves of the pleasure which attends an observing habit of mind, as well as its usefulness in other ways, besides its bearing upon the general objects of science. When a man has learnt to take an interest in the varied operations of nature, which are every where being carried on about him, and has acquired the habit of directing his attention to such matters, and keeping his senses always alive to any new information thereby afforded him, he has made himself almost independent of outward circumstances. He has opened to himself a source of occupation and mental enjoyment, but little affected by the ordinary vicissitudes of life."

Mr. Jenyns observes on the profit and improvement which might be derived from such studies by many persons, who are not tied down by their circumstances to any particular employment, and who are content to do nothing. Such persons, he argues, might more agreeably fill up their time, and contribute to their happiness, by applying their minds to the great book of nature ever open before them. A moral and religious frame of mind would be promoted by such a habit.

“As a further encouragement to the forming a habit of observing the works of nature, we might mention, what has been so often alluded to, its tendency to foster, if not to generate, a devout turn of mind towards their adorable Author. Undoubtedly it has this effect, when there is no perverseness or viciousness of temper present to counteract it. In watching the habits of animals and the provision made for their welfare and happiness, in noting their varied instincts, their art and stratagems to obtain the necessary support for themselves and young, their mode of defending themselves against their enemies, and all their ways, so replete with matter for reflection and astonishment, we cannot but trace the finger of their Great Creator; we cannot but consider all we see as affording the clearest indications of His over-ruling Providence.”

We do not like such expressions as the “works of nature.” In the present day, more especially, when pantheistic notions are becoming extensively prevalent, it would be well to abstain from the use of any language which may be unintentionally made conducive to the promotion of such fatal errors. Mr. Jenyns lays down a series of practical rules for observing the phenomena of nature. He shows by examples the necessity of accuracy, and freedom from prejudice or from devotion to a particular class of ideas. He urges the importance of distinguishing between the attendant circumstances, and prescribes the most approved method of searching for facts. We select the following as illustrative of his mode of treating this part of the subject:—

“Perhaps it will be thought, to act upon the plan just suggested requires much patience on the part of the observer: but we fear without patience a man will never be a proficient in natural history, more than in any other department of science; at least he can learn but little of the habits of animals from his own autopsia. And perhaps it is not sufficiently known or considered how near it may be possible to get even to the most timid animals, to watch them in their actions, if the observer will be occasionally content to remain still and motionless for a few minutes. We have seated ourselves in a wood, and, while keeping perfectly quiet, without moving a limb, have had the hares sporting at our very feet, as if quite unconscious of our proximity: the same thing has occurred with the water-rat, one of the shyest of our native quadrupeds, and which in general darts into the water with great rapidity on the slightest alarm. It is moving objects, or the noise of some one approaching, which most readily frightens animals. Yet even when it becomes necessary to advance, in order to see any thing of their ways, as where they are feeding at a distance in open grounds, we may sometimes, by dint of great caution and patience, get almost completely up to them without causing them to fly. We must only be careful to take very short steps, and at intervals, always desisting the moment our object shows any apprehensions, and remaining stock-still till we see it resuming its former state of ease, and returning to its food, or to whatever else it is occupied with. By these means, we remember once succeeding in actually getting so close to an old rabbit, feeding upon a lawn, as to secure it with a common walking-stick, where there was nothing whatever to conceal our approach to the animal, which appeared in perfect health and nowise disabled."—pp. 43, 44.]

"A lady living in the neighbourhood of my own village had some years back a favourite Scotch-terrier, which always accompanied her in her rides, and which was also in the habit of following the carriage to church every Sunday morning. One summer the lady and her family were from home several weeks, the dog being left behind. The latter, however, continued to come to church by itself for several Sundays in succession, galloping off from the house at the accustomed hour, so as to arrive at the time of the service commencing. After waiting in the church-yard a short time, it was seen to return quiet and dispirited home. The distance from the house to the church is three miles, and beyond that at which the ringing of the bells could be ordinarily heard. . . . The same lady has communicated to me an anecdote, somewhat similar to the above, but more extraordinary. This related to a poodle-dog belonging to a gentleman in Cheshire, which it appears was in the habit of not only going to church, but of remaining quietly in the pew during service, whether his master was there or not. One Sunday the dam at the head of a lake in that neighbourhood gave way, so that the whole road was inundated. The congregation in consequence consisted of a very few, who came from some cottages close by, but nobody attended from the great house. The clergyman informed the lady, that whilst reading the psalms, he saw his friend the poodle come slowly up the aisle dripping with wet, having swam above a quarter of a mile to get to church. He went into the usual pew, and remained quietly there to the end of the service."—pp. 70, 71.

There is something truly astonishing in these instances. The most extraordinary feature in them is the knowledge evinced of the lapse of time. How is it conceivable that these animals could have become aware that another Sunday had arrived? We do not distrust Mr. Jenyns in the least, but we own that these tales, at first reading, seemed to us to have somewhat of the Munchausen character. At the same time stories are certainly current about the sagacity of dogs which appear to be well founded, and which do not in any degree fall short of those which we have extracted above.

At the conclusion of this work there is a calendar of periodic phenomena, containing in a tabular form the result of the author's observations, for a period of eleven years, of the periods at which the animal and vegetable world pass through their principal changes. On the whole the volume is highly creditable to its author, and we can safely recommend it as an agreeable and useful supplement to the History of Selborne.

- II.—1. The Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England, according to the Uses of Sarum, Bangor, York, and Hereford, and the Modern Roman Liturgy, arranged in parallel columns. By the Rev. WILLIAM MASKELL, M.A. Second Edition. London: Pickering.
2. Monumenta Ritualia Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ, or occasional Offices of the Church of England, according to the ancient use of Salisbury, the Prymer in English, and other Prayers and Forms, with Dissertations and Notes. By the Rev. WILLIAM MASKELL, M.A. In Two Volumes. London: Pickering.

AMONGST the various writers who have, of late years, applied themselves to the study of ritual subjects, Mr. Maskell is most honourably distinguished by the research and labour which he has bestowed on the illustration of the Liturgies and Ritual of the English Church prior to the Reformation. The second work in our list has, in our opinion, greater claims to notice than the first, comprising as it does, a mass of rites which have never been before brought within the reach of the ordinary purchaser and reader. Its contents are various. Two dissertations are prefixed, the first on the "ancient service books of the Church of England," in which the author treats, at far greater length and with much more minuteness of detail than any previous writer has done, on the complicated and curious questions connected with the service books of the ages prior to the Reformation. The variety of names by which these books are designated, and the difference which is frequently found between the contents of two volumes bearing the same appellation, renders this study one of no ordinary difficulty; and, while it is of course desirable that accuracy of idea should be attained on the subject by those who are engaged in researches bearing on ritual antiquities, it must be confessed, that few persons would have gone through the toil and labour which Mr. Maskell has bestowed on what is perhaps more a subject of bibliographical and antiquarian interest, than of any very high ecclesiastical or theological importance. The dissertation, however, bears the most undeniable marks of research and industry; and those who peruse it will certainly not be in much danger of mistaking the Missal for the Breviary, or the Manual for the Horæ. In a bibliographical and antiquarian point of view, there is much to interest and instruct in this part of Mr. Maskell's work. We may be accused of illiberality; but we should have been glad if Mr. Maskell had abstained here and elsewhere from so much of complimentary allusion to Dr. Rock and other clergy of the Romanists in England. Of Dr. Rock's work the "Hierurgia" we have formed a far lower estimate than Mr. Maskell seems to have done. However good as a compilation of the information on the Roman mass which has been supplied by writers whose works are very easily accessible, and as showing the actual practice of its ceremonies in the present day, we cannot observe the slightest signs of originality or research. The most ordinary statements of ritualists are accepted without any attempt at criticism. Almost the only part of the work which exhibits reading, and which was new to the English public at the time, was the argument in behalf of certain Romish practices, grounded on the ancient sepulchral monuments and other relics found at Rome; but this was, we apprehend, suggested by, if not derived from Dr. Wiseman's works. On the whole, whatever may be Dr. Rock's familiarity with the service books of his own communion, and however he may be thus enabled to solve antiquarian difficulties connected with the service books immediately before the Reformation, we certainly cannot award to him any high character for learning and originality as a ritualist, and we should have been glad if Mr. Maskell had not made quite such frequent or complimentary reference to his writings.

We extract the following passage as illustrative of the views of the author of this learned publication:—

"Some men, I trust but few, would have thought it almost necessary in such a discussion to make frequent observations upon the contents of the volumes under examination: to point out the absurdity of a rubric or the interruption of a response; to exclaim against the want of vital Christianity in an age which could be content with such and such forms of devotion; and against the excess of superstition which could alone account for the gorgeousness of this procession, or the abasement of that humiliation; which required, if we may so speak, such a multitude of service books: closing up the whole with loud congratulations upon the blessings which we now enjoy in the possession of the Common Prayer-book. From all such I have carefully abstained; and this, not because I do not fully value and appreciate our present Prayer-book, but because I am sure such remarks would have been utterly out of place.

"We have not been examining volumes of the same character and kind as those with which, to the injury of true and lively devotion, countries are at this time inundated, which are immediately subjected to the authority of the Church of Rome. Such as are the psalters of Bonaventure, the litanies of the Blessed Virgin, and many others. It is not to be denied, that some of the old "Horæ," of the Salisbury use especially, contained prayers and recommendations of prayers, which were the unhealthy produce of a period in the history of the Church of England, when the people and rulers, if they were anxious to pray more frequently than in modern times, were not so careful as they ought to have been about the language in which their petitions were couched, the matter which was in them, and to whom they were addressed. But, objectionable as such portions of the ancient service books were, they are not to be compared with the almost innumerable manuals of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, for the use of which in the communion of the Church of Rome, and their recommendation to the laity, universal as we know it is, I am at a loss even to conceive an excuse. An attempt has lately been made to introduce some such again among ourselves: adaptations, and so-called corrected editions, which cannot be looked upon without grave suspicion, and which we hope may have failed of success. Not by a stubborn resistance against what is really Catholic and good, not by an easy reception of what is at best but doubtful, and has certainly been mischievous: not by an ignorant and indiscriminating hatred of the rites and worship of other branches of the Church of Christ, not by a varnishing over of abuses which cannot be denied, and by a stealthy introduction of observances which we know have done injury, in fact, both to faith and practice, can we hope to restore once more the interrupted unity of the Church, and ourselves to the inestimable blessings which must be the result."

We think such sentiments are in every respect deserving of approbation, and sincerely hope that they may become generally prevalent.

Mr. Maskell has some curious remarks on the question of the possibility of changing the Christian name at confirmation. Prior to the Reformation, the bishop at confirmation might substitute a new name for that which was given at baptism; and Lord Coke says that "if a man be baptized by the name of Thomas, and after, at his confirmation by the bishop, he is named John, his name of confirmation shall stand good." And this was the case of Sir Francis Gawdie, Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas, whose name by baptism was Thomas, and his name of confirmation Francis: and the name of Francis, by the advice of all the judges, he did bear, and afterwards used in all his purchases and grants." Burn is, it seems, of opinion, that the bishop has now no such power of changing the name at confirmation, as he alleges that, at the last review of the Book of Common-Prayer, the office of confirmation was altered, so that the bishop does not pronounce the name of the person to be confirmed, and therefore cannot alter it.

But, as Mr. Maskell remarks, the change here alluded to has been made a century before, namely in 1552; and he therefore does not agree with Dr. Burn. Bishop White Kennet, in a manuscript note preserved in a book in Mr. Maskell's possession, states the following curious fact:—

“Confirmation. (Mem.) On Sunday, December 21, 1707, the Lord Bishop of Lincoln confirmed a young lad in Henry VII. chapel; who upon that ceremony was to change his Christian name: and accordingly the sponsors who presented him, delivered to the bishop a certificate which his lordship signed, to notify that he had confirmed such a person by such a name, and did order the parish minister then present to register the person in the parish book under that name. This was done by the opinion under hand of Sir Edward Worthey, and the like opinion of Lord Chief Justice Holt, founded on the authority of Sir Edward Coke, who says it was the common law of England, by which he meant the common custom of the Roman Church.”—p. ccxix.

“I shall not extract any of the canons, which forbid the bodies of certain great criminals to be buried with the solemn offices of the Church; such as of perjured persons, adulterers, fornicators, suicides and others. This may be seen in the excerpts of Egbert; in the canons of King Edgar, in the laws of the Northumbrian Priests, &c. In even earlier times, almost as soon as the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, we have a proof, from the penitential of Archbishop Theodore, how strongly the Church detested the presence of buried bodies of sinful and unbaptized men within holy ground. ‘Missam celebrare in ecclesia licet, ubi fideles ac religiosi sepulti fuerint. Si vero infideles, ac hæretici, vel perfidi Judæi sepulti fuerint, sanctificare vel missam celebrare non licet; sed si apta videtur ad consecrandum, inde evulsis corporibus, et rasis vel lotis parietibus, sanctificabitur, si antea consecratum fuit.’—p. ccxli.

The general principle of the ancient Canon Law certainly was, that the offices of the Church should not be celebrated over the remains of those whom, when living, she would not have permitted to receive her sacraments or rites. In the present day it seems to be ruled by ecclesiastical lawyers, that all who have received valid baptism, and who have not been denounced excommunicate or adjudged guilty of suicide, ought to be admitted to Christian burial. On the principles usually laid down by ecclesiastical lawyers on this subject, we apprehend that there would be nothing to prevent the burial with Christian rites of a person who, after receiving baptism, had apostatized to Islamism or to the Jewish religion, and been formally admitted by circumcision or by formal profession of these false religions! If the existing principles of ecclesiastical lawyers lead to this consequence, that a clergyman is, by our canons, liable to ecclesiastical censure for refusing to bury a Mahomedan or a Jew, it ought to show them at once that they have altogether misunderstood the principles of the Canon Law. It is perfectly incredible that so great an absurdity could have been authorized by any ecclesiastical law. The celebration of general offices, in its obvious meaning, seems to be an act of religious communion with the deceased. It cannot be regarded as a mere act of civil respect. It seems therefore unreasonable that religious rites should be celebrated by the clergy over persons of a different religion from that of the Church; and the more fitting course would seem to be, that the remains of persons of a different religious persuasion from that of the Church should be interred in the Church cemeteries, in the presence of the clergy as witnesses of the fact; without the rites of the Church, but after the celebration of the religious ceremonies of the sect to which they had belonged, in the chapel of that communion, or in some private dwelling. We cannot suppose that the present anomalous state of our practice on this subject will be permitted to remain much longer without reform and correction in some shape.

Mr. Maskell makes the following remarks on the use of holy water, which Romish ritualists ascribe to so early an origin as the second century:—

“Although then of such general observance for many centuries in the Church of England, it seems allowed, as regards proofs, by the most learned writers of the Roman communion, that it was of no earlier introduction than about the ninth century. It is true that Bellarmin and Baronius labour, or rather without labour quietly lay down its apostolical origin, and that the hallowing of water to be so frequently used, rests upon the authority of the first ages of the Church. But we know the extreme views of those learned authors, and the objects for which they wrote: and a far more candid writer, Martene, declares that he cannot trace it beyond the time of which I have just spoken.”
—p. cclvi.

The learned dissertations from which we have made the foregoing extracts are followed by a large number of offices in the original language, selected from the ritual books of the Salisbury use, accompanied by copious annotations. The offices included are, baptism—confirmation—purification—marriage—visitation of the sick—extreme unction—commending of souls—burial—form for blessing water—blessing of bread—various other benedictions—consecration of a Church—consecration of a cemetery—mode of holding a synod—excommunication—absolution—reception of apostates. Mr. Maskell proposes to add a third volume, comprising the Ordinal and the Coronation Service from the Sarum pontifical. There cannot be the least doubt of the value and interest of the work now before us, and of its fitness to occupy a place in all clerical libraries.

“The Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England” is less comprehensive in its contents than the work to which we have hitherto directed attention. It relates entirely to the office of the Holy Eucharist as celebrated previously to the Reformation in the English churches, and presents a tabular view of the variations in the offices according to the uses of Sarum, Bangor, York, and Hereford, compared with the modern Roman Liturgy. We should have thought that the latter feature in this work might have been advantageously replaced by a reference to the Sacramentary of Gregory the Great, which formed the basis of all these rites; or, at least, that it might have been added to the present work. The Offices are illustrated by copious annotations selected from the principal writers on ritual subjects; and they are preceded by a very learned preface on the origin of Liturgies, and the various rites which have obtained in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist. We extract the following interesting observations in reference to the Form to be used at the distribution of the Sacred Elements, drawn up in 1548:—

“Doubtless this was a good order of communion so far as it restored the cup once more to the laity; and the letter of the privy council to the bishops, which accompanied it, truly said, ‘that according to the first institution and use of the primitive Church, the most Holy Sacrament of the Body and Blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ should be distributed to the people under the kinds of bread and wine.’ This, indeed, is a fact which the most learned supporters of the practice of Communion under one kind only do not attempt to deny; to use the words of Cardinal Bona: ‘Semper enim et ubique ab ecclesiæ primordiis usque ad sæculum xii. sub specie panis et vini communicarunt fideles.’ No change, therefore, could be so justifiable, so necessary, as that which, after an interruption of some three hundred years, restored the undoubted practice of twelve hundred years, and of the age of the Apostles: and which, moreover, faithfully relying upon the command of our Blessed Lord, cut short all disputes upon a question which involves very terrible consequences, viz., how far Communion under one kind only is Communion at all.

“Again, this order of Communion was a most praiseworthy step towards a revival of the Liturgy in ‘a tongue understood of the people.’ I do not deny that stronger reasons have been produced by many authors for the sufferance, it cannot be put upon higher grounds, of a dead or foreign language in the celebration of the Holy Eucharist, than ever have been, or can be alleged for the denial of the cup: but these avail not in those cases, where liturgies are adapted by learned men, and under the guidance and authority of national Churches, to the gradual changes which, as time goes on, must take place in the vulgar tongue. Hence it may remain a question, whether we do not too hastily nowadays translate our Common Prayer Book, or at least the more solemn parts of it, those I mean relating to the due administration of the Sacraments, into the languages of heathen people, which we do not ourselves fully understand? One thing is unhappily most certain: an easy door is opened for designing men to intrude their own heretical opinions. Secure from almost the possibility of detection, innumerable errors may be foisted in, and the most important doctrines of the faith perverted, under the apparent sanction of the Catholic Church of England; the truths of Regeneration in Baptism be denied, or of the Communion of the Body and Blood of our Blessed Saviour in the Holy Eucharist

“The evil which must follow a stubborn, because unnecessary, adhesion to the use of a dead tongue in the public offices of the Church, is not unacknowledged by several writers of the Roman communion. Thus Gerbert, whilst he dares not, perhaps, go so far as to own the necessity of translations, yet complains of the consequence in the case of those who, though ignorant of the language, are bound by their rules to recite the office daily. ‘Dolendum vero est, illud deinceps penitus cessasse studium, ita ut hodie moniales nec quidquam intelligunt, quid psallant, contra Apostoli monitum et adhortationem.’ Extracts from earlier authors have been collected by Cassander, to which I would refer the reader; particularly directing his attention to one, Billet in Summa, who, speaking of the abuse in persisting in the observance of a dead language in his day, concludes: ‘Videtur ergo potius esse tacendum, quam psallendum; potius silendum, quam tripudiandum.’”

Mr. Maskell discusses at some length the question which has of late arisen, whether non-communicants ought to be present during the administration of the Holy Communion, or whether their departure ought to be prevented. These questions are determined in the negative by Mr. Maskell, who, however, admits that the rubric of 1549 is not clear either way, but remarks that, in the exhortation to negligent people in the various editions of the Common Prayer from 1552 until the revision in 1662, we find a prohibition of remaining during the Holy Communion without partaking of it. This passage certainly seems decisive of the question so far as the practice of the Church is concerned: it, doubtless, established, and that even from 1552, the custom which still exists in reference to the departure of non-communicants. At the revision of 1662, however, this passage was expunged, and thus far it seems that at present there is no actual law bearing on the point; so that in this, as in so many other points, the guidance of general custom is to be followed, unless there be a clear reason for exception in any particular case. It seems clear, however, that it is not possible to maintain on any legal or canonical grounds the necessity of non-communicants remaining during the whole of the communion office.

Mr. Maskell is of opinion that, when the Holy Communion is administered, non-communicants should withdraw as they usually do, after the Creed and before the Offertory.

On the subject of the Reformers Mr. Maskell has the following remarks :—

“ I would not be understood as desirous to speak ill of the Reformers of the Church. There are at present two parties who hold very different opinions of their merits : the extreme of the one would exalt them to the standard of the great Fathers of the Catholic Church, of the Saints and Martyrs ; the extreme of the other would depress them to the class of rash innovators, and speak of them in terms which may be, indeed, used of Peter Martyr, or Calvin, or Bucer. Rather let us, on the one hand, give what praise and honour may be justly due to their early exertions in the cause of truth, to which we owe our freedom from numerous errors and abuses which still overrun a large portion of the Church : let us, upon the other, disavow the lengths to which they were at last driven, not so much by the principle within, as by the pressure from without. Above all, let us remember that the Church of England has refused to ratify by her consent very many of the doctrines which have been attributed to her, by men who look upon the exiles at Frankfort, or upon Cranmer, and Hooper, and Latimer, and their decisions and indecisions, as her own and herself.”—p. xcvi.

Mr. Maskell holds the opinion which Bishop Bull and others have maintained, that prayers for the departed are still included in our Liturgy. In this we are unable to agree with him ; but he argues the point with moderation and ability. There is some degree of uncertainty whether the “ Use of Bangor ” has yet been discovered. Mr. Maskell is of opinion that a MS. in his possession of about the year 1400 represents this “ use ; ” but the reasons which he alleges for his opinion do not seem to be in any degree conclusive. We are, however, indebted to him for his careful and diligent researches on ritual subjects ; and in taking our leave of his publications we have to express the pleasure and the information which we have derived from their perusal.

III.—The Church of England cleared from the Charge of Schism upon Testimonies of Councils and Fathers of the First Six Centuries. By THOMAS WILLIAM ALLIES, M.A., Rector of Launton, Oxon. London: Burns.

A MORE important subject than that which Mr. Allies has here taken in hand cannot well be conceived; and we are bound to say that he has executed his task in a manner which reflects the highest credit on his abilities, research, and honesty of purpose. Mr. Allies is no mere advocate of a favourite cause, and is entirely free from controversial acrimony. His work assumes rather the character of a conscientious inquiry than of a polemical discussion, and if its conclusions are firm and unhesitating they result from a careful and fair-minded and dispassionate induction of facts. He evidently entered on his task in a frame of mind which fitted him for arriving at a right conclusion.

“The writer,” he says, “will not conceal that he took up this inquiry for the purpose of satisfying his own mind. Had he found the Councils and Fathers of the first six centuries bearing witness to the Roman supremacy, as at present claimed, instead of against it, he should have felt bound to obey them. As a priest of the Church Catholic in England, he desires to hold, and to the best of his ability will teach, all doctrines which the undivided Church always held. He finds by reference to those authorities, which could not be deceived, and cannot be adulterated, that while they unanimously held the Roman Primacy and the Patriarchal System, of which the Roman pontiff stood at the head, they as unanimously did not hold, nor even contemplate, that supremacy or monarchy which alone Rome will now accept as the price of her communion. They certainly do not recognise it, but their words and their actions most manifestly contradict it.”—Pref. p. v.

The inquiry on which Mr. Allies has entered in this work appears to have been chiefly, if not entirely, suggested by the perusal of the work of Dr. Maistre in defence of the Papal Supremacy, and by Mr. Newman's arguments in reference to the same subject in his late publication on “Development.” Mr. Allies is evidently more than a match for these writers. He follows them through their citations, and triumphantly refutes the various arguments from Christian antiquity to which Romanists are fond of appealing. On the whole we have been much pleased with this work, and commend it with confidence to inquirers into the doctrine of the Papal Supremacy. We do not go along with Mr. Allies in some of his opinions on other subjects, as stated in this book, which we think are occasionally somewhat unguardedly expressed ; but altogether we have been much interested and gratified by its perusal.

IV.—Proceedings of the Annual Meeting of the Archæological Institute of Great Britain and Ireland, at Winchester, September, MDCCCXLV. London : Longmans.

THIS volume is rich in papers which cannot fail to excite the liveliest interest amongst the numerous class, whose tastes lead them to Antiquarian inquiries. The most important and elaborate paper in the volume is that by Professor Willis, on the Architectural History of Winchester Cathedral. We cannot help smiling a little at the gravity with which the learned professor relates the monkish legends about the dimensions of the cathedral of Winchester, in the time of king Lucius, which are about as deserving of credit as the veracious history of Gulliver. But, setting aside such matters, the professor has certainly produced a most valuable and curious history of the cathedral, derived from history, compared with the actual condition of the building. Mr. Cockerell's paper on the Architectural Works of William of Wykeham is also most ably executed. Mr. Smirke contends, and apparently very successfully, that the well-known hall at Winchester, which was supposed by Dr. Milner to have been a chapel, formed originally one of the halls in the royal palace of Winchester. The volume is rich in papers on other antiquarian topics, which we regret that space does not permit us to notice more particularly. The engravings and woodcuts, which are numerous, are executed in the most creditable way.

V.—Six Discourses on the Prophecies relating to Antichrist in the Apocalypse of St. John. Preached before the University of Dublin, at the Donnellan Lecture. By JAMES HENTHORN TODD, D.D., M.R.I.A., Fellow of Trinity College, Dublin. Dublin : University Press.

THE general object of this ably written work is to prove that the prophecies of the Apocalypse have been misunderstood by the majority of modern commentators in England, who have interpreted them in a merely figurative sense ; and that they still remain to be fulfilled, in a literal sense. Dr. Todd argues with great learning and ability against the opinions of those commentators who suppose certain symbols of the Revelation to have reference to the pope ; and this doubtless will render his work unacceptable to those who employ arguments based on such an interpretation, in controversy with Romanism. Dr. Todd is conscious of the jealousy which is likely to be felt on this subject, and remarks on it as follows :—

“The interpretation of prophecy advocated in the following pages is frequently represented, in popular declamations and invectives, as unfavourable to Protestantism, and as having a tendency to support the claims and peculiar doctrines of the Church of Rome. This prejudice, it is true, is often raised as a mere artifice of controversy; but there are many sincere and serious persons who are really influenced and perplexed by it, and whose scruples are entitled to every respect. To such persons it seems as if a powerful weapon were snatched from the armoury of Protestants, when we deny that the prophecies of the Apocalypse are fulfilled in the Romish corruptions: they imagine this denial to imply a more favourable view of the errors of the Church of Rome, and a less deep conviction of the evils inflicted by the Papal system on the happiness of man, than is quite consistent with an entire loyalty to the Reformation.

“But the first principle of the Reformation, submission to the paramount authority of the written word of God, requires us to abandon the controversial interpretation of these prophecies. For if it be necessary to pervert the plain words of Holy Scripture; to deny and reject its literal and obvious meaning; if it be necessary to represent the Roman Catholic religion as a virtual renunciation of every article of the faith, and to pronounce all its followers, as such, to be beyond the hope or possibility of salvation;—if all this be necessary before we can apply the prophecies that speak of Antichrist to the corruptions of Romanism, then assuredly TRUTH requires us to abandon whatever advantages we may obtain from the use of such a weapon of controversy, even though those advantages are twofold greater than they are.”

This work cannot fail to attract the attention of all who are engaged in the study of the prophecies of Holy Scripture.

VI. An Ecclesiastical Biography, containing the Lives of Ancient Fathers and Modern Divines, interspersed with notices of Heretics and Schismatics, forming a brief history of the Church in every age. By WALTER FARQUHAR HOOK, D.D., Vicar of Leeds. Vol. II. London: Rivingtons.

How the author of this most interesting volume can find time to accomplish the various works in which he is engaged, is a matter of surprise to every one who is acquainted with their variety and extent, and the effective way in which they are carried out. Few, if any, parishes in England, we believe, are under better management than the extensive vicarage of Leeds; while there are few writers who are enabled to appear more frequently before the public. The work now before us is evidently the result of very considerable study and application: it appears in monthly parts, at a very low price, and is collected into volumes from time to time. The object seems to be to provide a work on Church history, which shall be calculated at once to amuse and instruct the middling and lower classes, and young persons. For this purpose it seems admirably adapted. On the whole, judging from the volume before us, it promises to become a very useful work for circulation and reference in country parishes, and in Parochial Lending Libraries.

VII. The Works of Frederick Schiller (Historical) Translated from the German, by the Rev. A. J. W. MORRISON, M.A. London: Bohn.

THE "Standard Library" of Mr. Bohn continues to sustain, in all respects, the character which it has acquired by the value and cheapness of the volumes included in the series. Of this series the work now before us bids fair to be one of the most important and valuable. It is the first volume of a new translation of the whole of Schiller's works. It comprises the History of the Thirty Years' War complete, and the History of the Revolt in the Netherlands, to the end of the third book. This history will be completed in the next volume, which will also include the Trial and execution of Counts Egmont and Horn; Wallenstein's Camp; the Piccolomini; the Death of Wallenstein and Don Carlos. The series will be completed in four volumes, with the last of which will be given a Life of the Author. We have no doubt that this series will obtain an extensive sale.

VIII. The Clergyman's Assistant in Visiting the Sick: to which are added the Offices for the Communion of the Sick, &c. By the Rev. MATTHEW PLUMMER, M.A., &c. London: Burns.

THIS little volume will be found very serviceable to young clergymen in affording hints and suggestions for the effective discharge of the important and difficult duty of visiting the sick. It consists of a series of "Visits," with exhortations, prayers, &c. suitable to each. The language of many parts of these forms being derived from old writers, the forms are not adapted to use in the present day without alterations; but they supply a useful collection of hints. We are a little surprised to find Mr. Plummer apparently recommending the remainder of the consecrated elements to be committed to the flames, when the Rubric so expressly enjoins them to be reverently received by the minister and some of the communicants present.

- IX.—Outlines of the Christian Faith, in fifteen Short Lectures.
By A CLERGYMAN OF THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. London:
Burns.

FEW tasks can be more difficult to an educated man than that which the Reverend author of this little work has proposed to himself, to trace the general outline of Christianity as a doctrinal whole in such a form as is adapted to the instruction of "humbler minds." We fear that the author has not succeeded at least in making his pages intelligible to the uneducated. They are in fact more suited for young persons of an inquiring turn of mind, and whose general education has been attended to. Such expressions as "the law of correlation," &c. are only adapted for cultivated minds.

- X.—Winterton. By MRS. FRANCIS VIDAL, Author of the "Tales for the Bush." London: Rivingtons.

A PLEASING little tale adapted to young persons. The narrative is simple and well told, and the conversations natural and well sustained.

- XI.—The Church and the Churches, &c. By the Rev. HUGH MC NEILE, M.A., &c. London: Hatchards.

THE able author of this work is, we think, more successful as a speaker and preacher than as a writer. The volume before us is heavy in more respects than one. The author seems to be very little more satisfied at the present condition of the English Church than those whom he assails—the romanizing party. We select the following passage, which is deserving of attention :—

"In no society upon earth do the marks of 'the Church of God in Christ' appear more conspicuously—or, as the writer thinks, so conspicuously,—as in the Church of England; judged by her constitution and authorized standards. He is guided by the force of facts to feel,—but, feeling it, he cannot withhold the faithful avowal,—that, judged by her present practice, she is not entitled to such commendation.

"Yes, though our adversaries should mock at our complaints, though they should misrepresent as essential and inseparable parts of our system what we deprecate as departures from, and abuses of that system; and though they should ascribe to unworthy motives our continued attachment to our Church, notwithstanding the evils so exposed and deplored; still our duty is clear; our attachment is sincere and unaltered: though this we freely confess, that to render that attachment abidingly conscientious in existing circumstances, it must be continued under protest against the abuses.

“ Instead of being a fair counterpart of her standards, the present practice of the Church of England, viewed in her authoritative administration, is in many respects a deplorable contrast. Apostolical doctrine, in all the free grace and unsearchable riches of Christ, is plainly maintained in her standards; and as plainly discountenanced by her rulers—with some exceptions. Apostolical fervour, in earnest prayer for the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, breathes through her Liturgy; but is condemned as unhallowed enthusiasm, when expressed in any other than the very terms which have become familiar to the ear, while the life and power of their true meaning is far from the heart. . . .

“ In her administration, there is an unfeigned and scarcely concealed horror of zeal, as of a most unorthodox and ungentlemanlike quality, altogether unsuited to sober-minded and harmless Churchmen.”

“ In her standards, the Church of England is Protestant—emphatically Protestant; but in her present administration—thank God, not universally—but in a very influential section of her governing body, she is, to say the least, doubtful; softly expressing one opinion, and with infatuated inconsistency acting upon another; justly reproving Tractarianism, and substantially promoting Tractarians. The good sense of the country is shocked by such proceedings, and whether our rulers will believe the awful fact or not, it is a fact that the attachment of the lay members of the Church, in unnumbered multitudes throughout the kingdom, is becoming seriously relaxed.”

We are bound to say, that although on very many points we are unable to concur with the able and eloquent author of this work, we admire the earnestness and sincerity with which his views are stated; nor have we observed any of the acrimony which has unfortunately too frequently mingled in discussions on the subjects of the work before us.

XII.—Justin Martyr's Dialogue with Trypho the Jew. Translated from the Greek, &c. By HENRY BROWN, M.A., Vicar of Netherswell, Gloucestershire. Cambridge: Deightons.

THIS is a reprint of a valuable and scarce translation of Justin Martyr's dialogue with Trypho, which was executed about a century since. It is enriched by notes selected from the best commentators, and is neatly and correctly printed.

XIII.—The Eucharist, its History, Doctrine, and Practice, with Meditations and Prayers suitable to that Holy Sacrament. By WILLIAM J. E. BENNETT, M.D., Priest of the English Church, VOL. VI.—NO. XI.—SEPT. 1846. O

Perpetual Curate of St. Paul's, Knightsbridge. Second Edition, London: Cleaver.

THIS is a new edition of a valuable and useful treatise, historical and practical, on the holy sacrament of the Eucharist. It is calculated for circulation amongst the well-informed and seriously disposed lay members of the Church, rather than for the use of the clergy or of the middling and lower orders. The meditations and prayers which are subjoined to the historical part of the volume, are far superior to the generality of similar devotional exercises.

XIV.—Sermons published at the request of his Congregation. By ALFRED GATTY, M.A., Vicar of Ecclesfield. London: Painter.

THIS volume comprises thirty sermons, addressed to a country congregation, in that style of forcible and simple exhortation which is the best adapted to their understandings. There is more of the character of sermons in these discourses than any that we have lately seen. They have all the characteristics of reality. We have no doubt that they will be found highly useful.

XV.—The Life Everlasting: in which are considered the Intermediate State, the New Body and the New World, the Man in Heaven, Angels, the Final Consummate Life. By JOHN WHITLEY, D.D., Rector of Ballymackey, and Chancellor of Killaloe. London: Longman.

THE object of this work, as stated by the author in his preface, is to evince that the soul is naturally and necessarily immortal; and neither asleep nor dead in the grave—that virtue is more than mere words—that religion consists not in bare affirmatives and negatives, but in something real and vital, substantial and eternal, the soul first, and the man afterwards partaking of the life of the world to come. Dr. Whitley's style is rather didactic and hortatory than argumentative, but there is much both to please and instruct in his volume.

XVI.—Ordination Vows: Practically considered in a series of Sermons. By THOMAS PARRY, D.D., Lord Bishop of Barbados. London: Rivingtons.

THE little volume before us comprises a series of sound and excellent discourses on the motives to the work of the ministry, the outward call, teaching from Holy Scripture, Church conformity, and the Church's need of both priests and deacons. These discourses are exactly what episcopal exhortations ought to be. We select the following passage in reference to the Burial Service:—

“An office evidently designed to be used only over the remains of such as really were members of the Church, and died in her communion. Nor is there, perhaps, any part of our discipline which it were more desirable to restore to its original vigour than this. It is true that burial is no sacrament, and in no way affects the departed; it is also true, that it is better, if we must speak, to err on the side of charity than of severity; better, where the slightest doubt exists, to give the title of brother to a fellow sinner than withhold it, and to express some hope, however faint, than to speak the language of blank despair in the case of any one in any sense entitled to be called a Christian, and who may at the very last have touched the hem of the Saviour's garment. But the duty is at best a painful one: and what an argument it ought to be with those who stray from the communion of the Church into irreligion, immorality, or schism, yet trust to receive at her hands a Christian's burial! What an argument for repentance, to think that the Church not only mourns over them while living, but that even over their graves she will be unable to speak with confidence the language of Christian hope!”

XVII.—Parochial Sermons from Trinity to Advent Sunday. By HENRY JAMES HASTINGS, M.A., Rector of Areley Kings. London: Hatchards.

THE sermons comprised in this volume are of a plain, practical character; and, from what we have seen of them, we think the doctrines seem to be sound and useful.

XVIII.—A Charge to the Clergy of the Diocese of Lincoln. By JOHN, LORD BISHOP OF LINCOLN, delivered at the Triennial Visitation in 1846. London: Rivingtons.

THIS charge abounds in topics of more than ordinary interest, at the present time. The moderation of the Church of England, as evinced in the Reformation, is shown by a historical survey. The impropriety of relaxing subscription to the Articles, or of introducing alterations in the Prayer Book, and the necessity of reviving ecclesiastical discipline, is argued in a most able and satisfactory way. We must lay before the reader some extracts on these subjects.

“Though there exists little desire on the part of the members of the Church to see the Articles revised, a wish has been expressed in certain quarters that subscription to them should no longer be required as a necessary preliminary to admission into Holy Orders, and to institution into a Benefice: nor can we well be surprised at the expression of such a wish, when it has been gravely contended that men may subscribe them in a non-natural sense. But I would inquire of those who wish to do away with subscription to the Articles, whether they are prepared to admit men to the office of teachers in the Church, without taking from them any security that they will inculcate the doctrines of the Church: or, if they deem a test necessary, what test will they substitute? . . . If, therefore, we abolish subscription, we alter the terms on which the clergy hold their benefices, and pro tanto repeal the acts by which the Anglican branch of the Catholic Church is constituted the Established Church of the realm; and under which the clergy derive their legal right to their temporalities."—pp. 13—16.

With reference to the questions affecting the celebration of Divine Service, the Bishop remarks that,

"The contents of the Book of Common Prayer may be classed under two heads,—the Prayers and Thanksgivings, and other forms of devotion which the minister is to use:—on the Rubrics, or directions respecting the manner in which they are to be used,—respecting the order, posture, the different parts of the sacred edifice in which they are to be recited. There is doubtless a wide difference between the two, in respect of their intrinsic value and importance. . . . Yet it is certain that the clergy, when they promise to conform to the Liturgy, bind themselves to conform to it in both its parts: not only to use the form of words, but to use it in the manner prescribed by the Rubric. While, however, the object aimed at by the framers of the Act of Uniformity has, in its more important part, been in great measure attained, they have not been equally successful in respect of the other part. Rare, comparatively, are the instances in which a clergyman ventures, in the celebration of public worship, to deviate from the prayers of the Liturgy, or to introduce his own extemporaneous effusions: but wide deviations have taken place in practice from the directions of the Rubric: and these deviations have now continued for so long a period, and the laity have become so accustomed to them, that the attempt to return to the letter of the Rubric is regarded and resented as an innovation."—pp. 18, 19.

The Bishop remarks on the great delicacy of reviving regulations which have been allowed to fall into desuetude, and discourages young men especially from attempting alterations which are likely to offend the feelings of congregations, unless some great good is to be achieved by their revival.

The Bishop calls attention to the following passage in the Archbishop's Encyclical Letter on these subjects:—

" 'All change in the performance of Divine Service, affecting the doctrine of the Church by alteration, addition, or omission, I regard with unqualified disapprobation.' Such change, is in truth, a dishonest act. The person who resorts to it admits that he is not satisfied with the doctrine of the Church as set forth in its formularies; and I can, in respect of the violation of moral obligation, discover little difference between the case of those who, while holding all Romish opinions, retain their position in the Established Church, and of those who change or wrest the words of the Liturgy in order to accommodate them to their own peculiar views of doctrine."—p. 20, 21.

We extract the following important passage in reference to ecclesiastical discipline:—

"A cursory inspection of the Reformatio Legum will suffice to show what were the sentiments of our Reformers respecting the maintenance of discipline in the Church. Many of the canons of 1603 are directed to that object: and the articles of inquiry, issued before every visitation of the diocese, are founded on those canons. But the canons having been pronounced to be not binding on the laity, presentments—with a view to the correction of offences against the laws of God—are rarely made, and the censures of the Church no longer operate to deter men from sin. I am aware that I am treading on dangerous ground when I venture to speak of a revival of those censures, and especially of excommunication. I am aware of the jealousy which exists—a jealousy which, looking back on the past, I cannot pronounce to be unfounded or unreasonable—of any measure which appears to place power in the hands of the clergy. But the national Church is now deprived of a power of which the possession is, as I have already observed, involved in the notion, and almost essential to the existence of a society,—the power of cutting off from the privileges of membership offenders against its authority and laws. The sense entertained by the framers of our Liturgy of the injury inflicted on the Church by the want of a penitential discipline, is forcibly expressed in the preface of the Communion Service. But if we proceed to inquire why we labour under that want, the answer must, I think, be, that the very aid which has been invoked to give effect to ecclesiastical censures—the aid of the State—has caused them to fall into disuse. The civil penalties, consequent upon a sentence of excommunication, has prevented the ecclesiastical authorities from proceeding against offenders. They shrink from the attempt: not more from an apprehension of the clamour which the infliction of those penalties would create, than from a sense of their unsuitableness to accomplish the true end of spiritual censures,—the awakening of the conscience of the transgressor. My conclusion therefore is, that in order to restore to those censures their due authority, we must disconnect them with all civil penalties. The offences against which they are directed are transgressions of the Divine Law; and the motive which the Church ought to propose in order to deter men from offending is fear, not of the temporal penalties inflicted by human laws, but of the eternal punishments denounced in God's Law against sin. To pronounce an offender excommunicate, and then to call in the civil power, is to confess at once that the Church is not invested by its Divine Founder with any external coercive power, and that it is desirous to obtain that which He never intended to confer on it."—p. 28—30.

We commend to the attentive consideration of our readers the subsequent remarks of the learned prelate on this most important subject, and also his just censure of that absurd congeries of sectarians entitled the "Evangelical Alliance." The concluding part of the charge is also replete with excellent advice in reference to the true method of resisting Romish attempts at proselytism, namely, by making our own system as efficient as possible in every way.

XIX.—The Succession of Bishops in the Church of England unbroken; or, the Nag's Head Fable refuted. With a Postscript on the Ordination Services of Edward the Sixth, in reply to the Ninth Letter of the Rev. J. Spencer Northcote. By E. C. HARINGTON, M.A., Prebendary of Exeter, &c. London: Rivingtons.

THE author of this tract, whose research and erudition are well known to the public, as the author of a valuable work on the "Object, Importance, and Antiquity of the Rite of Consecration of Churches," has now added to the obligations under which he has placed all good Churchmen by the publication of the seasonable and well written pamphlet of which we have transcribed the title. In this tract Mr. Harington satisfactorily disposes of the absurd and wicked fable of the Nag's Head Consecration,—a fable which is produced and reproduced by those who are fully aware of its falsehood. Mr. Harington's refutation of Mr. Northcote's objections to the validity of the form of consecration in the ordinal of Edward VI. is also most complete. The tract will be found useful for circulation where attempts are made to throw doubt on the validity of the English ordinations.

XX.—Miscellaneous.

A USEFUL tract entitled "Dialogues on Confirmation" has lately been published by Mr. Burns. It explains in a clear and intelligible way the various branches of the Christian covenant, and the vows which are renewed at confirmation. A little manual entitled "A Few Words of Advice to a Public School Boy, by an Assistant Master" (Rivingtons), comprises a series of brief rules and practical suggestions as to conduct at a public school, which cannot fail to be very useful. A Visitation Sermon on "The Means of Increasing the Efficiency of the Church," by the Rev. James A. Beaumont, M.A. (Leeds: Harrison), assigns reasons for a large increase in the numbers of bishops and clergy. A Visitation Sermon, by the Rev. H. Almack, D.D., describes the defective state of the popular religion of the day, and points out as a remedy an increased faithfulness on the part of the clergy in the discharge of their ordination vows.

We have to acknowledge with thanks the receipt of a copy of a Discourse delivered at Newark, New Jersey, by the Rector, the Rev. M. H. Henderson (New York). This discourse was delivered on the Centennial Anniversary of the granting the Charter of the Church at Newark; and it assumes an historical character, which, on such an occasion, was doubtless full of interest to those who heard it.

Amongst periodical publications we have to notice the "Ecclesiologist" as being continued with unabated interest. "Sharpe's London Magazine" is establishing its reputation as the cheapest, and one of the best of the periodical publications of the day. "The West of England Miscellany" appears to be well and ably conducted. "The Churchman's Monthly Penny Magazine, or Guide to Christian Truth," appears to be "evangelical" in its principles. It is written with spirit and ability, and appears to be, at present, chiefly occupied in the defence of the Church of England against the attacks of Dissenters.

AMERICA.—Popish Occupation of the Oregon Territory.—Hardly has the dispute between England and America on the division of the Oregon territory been brought to a peaceable termination, when the Popish papers announce the fact that the whole of the territory has been claimed for the spiritual supremacy of the Pope. In the exercise of this assumed universal jurisdiction over the whole earth, the territory has been divided into eight dioceses, one of which is to have an archiepiscopal see, with jurisdiction over the other seven. The Ami de la Religion gives on this occasion a detailed history of the Popish mission which has existed in the Oregon territory ever since November, 1838; containing also a variety of statements respecting the Protestant missions, especially those of the Methodists and Presbyterians: and among others the assertion that the only clergyman of the English Church, stationed for two years at Vancouver, left the country three weeks before the arrival of the first Popish missionaries. We have no means of testing the accuracy of this statement, nor are we aware whether the English Church has at present any mission or ecclesiastical establishment in that part of the world; at all events it is evident that unless efficient measures be at once adopted to plant our national Church there, the ground will be effectually preoccupied by the Romish intruders. Of the eight sees erected, three only are to be filled up at present; viz., the archiepiscopal see, of which M. Blanchet, appointed last year to the newly-created Bishopric of Oregon, is to be the first occupant; a brother of his and his vicar-general will be the other two bishops; one of these will take under his administration the whole of the English, and the adjacent Russian possessions; the other will share with the archbishop the administration of the American part of the territory. M. Blanchet has been perambulating France, with a view to raise money and men in aid of his mission; he is expected to leave France at the end of September, with twelve missionaries and eight nuns; besides four Jesuits and four Frères des Écoles Chrétiennes. The previous force of the mission consists of sixteen missionaries, one half of whom are Jesuits, imported into the territory two years ago, with a superior, Father Smet, at their head. The order will therefore have at once a nucleus of twelve members to commence operations. We sincerely hope that this intelligence will arouse the two Missionary Societies of our Church to active exertion in that quarter.

Roman Catholic Synod at Baltimore.—A provincial council was held with great pomp and ceremony, in May last, by the prelates of the Romish hierarchy in the United States, at which twenty-three bishops out of the twenty-seven comprised in the province were present; one, M. Blanchet, Bishop of Oregon, being absent in Europe, and three others prevented from attending through age or ill health. Several decrees were passed, one of them appointing the next council to be held at Baltimore in 1849. The other decrees have reference to the administration of the sacraments, and to other matters of ecclesiastical discipline; they will not be published until they have received the approbation of the Pope; it is, however, understood that the erection of four new bishoprics is one of the measures in contemplation. A synodal letter to "the faithful of the United States" was agreed to, and the council brought its official acts to a close, by "solemnly placing the United States under the patronage and especial protection of the most holy Virgin Mary."

The following is a list of the sees of the Romish Church in the United States, according to the official acts of the council. The Archbishopric of Baltimore, the Bishoprics of Mobile, Philadelphia, Louisville, Cincinnati, New Orleans, Dubuque, New York, Nashville, Vincennes, Natchez, Richmond, Saint Louis, Pittsburg, Little Rock, Chicago, Axiern, Hartford, Charleston, Milwankie, Boston. Besides the occupants of these twenty-one sees, there are six bishops in partibus, three of whom are coadjutors, and the three others, the administrator of Detroit, the Vicar-Apostolic of Texas, and the Vicar-Apostolic of Oregon, since erected into a separate province. Out of the twenty-seven prelates, seven are natives of Ireland, and seven natives of France.

Establishment of the Benedictines in the United States.—A Benedictine mission left France in July last, for St. Joseph in Pennsylvania, where it is to found the first Benedictine monastery in the United States. The mission consists of the superior, three other divines, four scholars, and twenty-five artisans.

AUSTRALASIA.—Difficulty of evangelizing the native population.—A letter from one of the missionaries stationed in Western Australia, addressed to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, contains a most discouraging account of the difficulty of evangelizing the natives, and urges the establishment of schools for native children, as the only means of introducing Christianity among the indigenous population of this vast continent. "Though," he says, "the adult native population is absolutely inaccessible, through our instrumentality, to the truth of the Gospel, the rising generation may be rescued from this lamentable condition. Four years have now elapsed since I established our school for aboriginal children at Fremantle; and during this period, their advancement towards civilization and evangelical knowledge has been uniformly progressive; and I have no hesitation in stating my conviction, that in moral sentiment, as well as in the attainments of ordinary humble tuition, they are not one degree inferior to the common average of European children. And with this fair field, under the very shadow of the British flag, inviting the culture of British benevolence, what has Britain done? How many missionaries has she sent forth to evangelize the children of the dark wanderers in the Australian bush? Alas, not one ! Are our brethren at home aware of this melancholy fact ? And will they not arise, and wipe away this black stain from the page of her history ? If you could send us one catechist, at present, together with a suitable apparatus for school instruction, and a provision for the maintenance of some twenty or more native children ; under the Lord's guidance we will proceed in the work, and with the blessing of God it will prosper. That the natural erratic habits of the race may be quite subdued by education, our success in the first instance triumphantly exhibits ; up to the present they have remained steady, without one exception, and we have no apprehension as to the future."

In another part of the same letter, the inefficient state of the mission, in consequence of its crippled means, is thus urged : "Our humble labours, as you are aware, are confined to the rising generation, the only avenue to which hope seems to beckon our willing advance ; and this is extremely narrowed and circumscribed through a deficiency of means. In regard to numbers, our native school is at a stand, and must remain so, except we receive aid from home. The Government grant, which is its sole support, is 50l. per annum, and cannot be augmented. From this sum we pay 25l. per annum to the matron in charge of the institution ; and the remaining 25l. is our only available fund for the clothing and entire maintenance of eleven youths."

In the hope of drawing attention to the urgent appeal of the writer of the above remarks, and to the national sin of abandoning our colonial population to be divided between heathenism and popery, we give from the Ami de la Religion the following extracts from a letter written by a Benedictine missionary, within a few weeks, and a few miles' distance of the other ¹, which shows both the activity of the Romanists, and the encouragement which they receive from the Government : "In a few days," says the writer, "we shall leave Perth, and proceed to the interior of Australia, towards Moore River. That is the post which our Bishop has kindly confided to us. He has marked out the whole country between the 31st and 20th degrees of south latitude, for the Benedictine Mission ; but one of us, M. Zastell, having lost all courage, is determined not to leave Perth, and we are thus reduced to the number of three. This number is very small for the great enterprises we have before us. Let us hope that Providence will send us a reinforcement of some French Benedictines.

"I have thought it right to propose to the Propaganda at Rome, the establishment of a Congregation of Missionary Benedictines of Australia ; by and by it would consist of such natives as might embrace the rule of our Father St. Benedict. The Government has authorised us to select twenty acres of land at Moore River ; but we have only our own arms for tilling the ground and for building, and, above all, we have to devote ourselves to the instruction of the poor savages, and to public prayer. Besides, we must forthwith think of preparing others to succeed us. Thus manual labour, prayer and study, prescribed by our holy patriarch, become with us a matter of imperative necessity.

“ Our plan of proceeding is as follows. We shall join the first savage tribe which we shall meet ; we shall go with them, and share their nomad life, until we shall be able to fix them in some favourable situation, where we mean to teach them by our example to obtain their subsistence by agriculture. When we have thus attached them to the soil, we shall begin to speak to them of religion, and initiate them in ecclesiastical knowledge, in order that we may find in the very sons of Australia future missionaries who shall assist in instructing their still savage brethren. This method is perhaps the only one that will produce some solid results among a nomad population.

“ When we shall have the good fortune of seeing new fellow-labourers arrive from Europe, we shall locate them in the monastery-huts already established, leaving them to bestow their labour upon the tribes already attached to the soil. This will leave us at liberty to advance further, and to endeavour to win other tribes to the faith of Jesus Christ. If we can in this manner establish a chain of monasteries, the conversion and civilization of Australia are secured.”

At the same time that the Romish missionaries are thus occupying the continent of Australia, they are no less actively engaged in fixing themselves on the islands of the Australasian seas. On one of these, seemingly one of the group called the Solomon Islands, the life of Dr. Epalle, the Vicar Apostolic of Western Oceania, has recently been sacrificed in his attempt to get a footing among its savage inhabitants. It appears that he effected, about the middle of December last, a landing in the company of two priests and a lay brother, and of a ship's officer and four sailors, on one of the islands, with a view to ascertain its suitability for a missionary station ; when they were attacked and overpowered by a large body of natives, one of whom inflicted several wounds with a tomahawk on the bishop's head. The party returned immediately to the vessel, to which they conveyed Dr. Epalle in a state of insensibility ; his case was at once pronounced hopeless, and he died within a few hours after. Dr. Epalle was in the prime of life, having scarcely attained his thirty-fifth year ; he was a native of the diocese of Lyons, and had early devoted himself to the missionary life in Australia. He returned to Europe in 1844, when he was consecrated Bishop of Sion in partibus, and appointed Vicar Apostolic of Western Oceania.

GERMANY.—General Synod of Prussia.—The measure contemplated for some time by the King of Prussia, of convening a general synod of all the Protestant churches of the kingdom, has been carried into execution in the course of last spring. It will be remembered that in the year 1843 the first steps were taken, preparatory to this measure, by the convocation of district synods, consisting of the clergy of each district under the presidency of the superintendent. In the royal ordinance by which they were convoked, it was intimated, that according to the views of the king, no solid or permanent good could be effected for the evangelic Church, otherwise than by the internal development of the life that was in her. In these district synods the existing evils and defects of the Church were canvassed, and various suggestions were made with a view to the application of a remedy. The result of these discussions formed the materials on which the provincial synods, convoked in the autumn of the year 1844², were called upon to deliberate; and upon the same principle of gradual centralization, the general synod has now been called upon to take into consideration the different subjects debated by the provincial synods, and the conclusions at which they have arrived. The time appointed for the meeting of the synod was Whitsun week, the composition of it was as follows:—1. Clerical members: the general superintendents of the eight provinces, the two bishops Neander and Eylert, the four royal chaplains and the military chaplain-in-chief; the six assessors and the six secretaries of the provincial synods of the eastern provinces, the two presidents, and the two assessors of the provincial synods of Westphalia and Rhenish Prussia, six professors of divinity, chosen by the theological faculties of the six universities of the kingdom. 2. Lay members: the eight presidents of the provincial consistories, either in person, or represented by one of the lay members of their respective consistories; six Protestant professors of law, to be chosen by the faculties of law, with a preference for those versed in the ecclesiastical law; and for each of the eight provinces three lay members, chosen by the members of the provincial synods, out of a number of eighteen, put in nomination by the chief of the provincial government, and the general superintendent concurrently; except in Westphalia and the Rhenish provinces, where the provincial synods which have there been longer established, deputed three of their lay elders; making in all seventy-five members, thirty-seven ecclesiastics, and thirty-eight laymen. Of the twenty-four laymen appointed by election, there were eleven holding judicial or administrative offices under the government, four municipal office bearers, one general military officer, five landed proprietors of the order of nobility, two professors, independently of those chosen by the faculties of theology and of law; and one apothecary. Among the professors deputed by the universities, are the divines, Dorner, Twesten, and Sack; and the professor of law, Stahl of Berlin. The presidency belonged ex officio to Dr. Eichhorn, minister of worship; Bishop Dr. Neander was elected to the office of vice-president by the synod.

The members of the synod met for the first time on Whit Sunday at the cathedral, when after a sermon on the prophecy of Joel, by Dr. Ehrenberg, one of the royal chaplains, they all received the Holy Communion, in which they were joined by a small number of the congregation. The formal constitution of the synod took place on Whit Monday morning, again at the cathedral, when Dr. Strauss, another of the royal chaplains, preached on Ephesians iv. 4; the first meeting for business, on Whit Tuesday, at the chapel royal, the locality assigned to it for its regular sittings. On the last named day, Dr. Eichhorn opened the synod with a discourse, in which he explained the views of the king in convoking it, and the extent of its powers. The condition of the Evangelic Church, which led to this attempt to apply a remedy, he thus described: "The time is not very long past, when many among the faithful members of our Evangelical Church viewed her condition with anxious solicitude. They saw the indications of her visible life vanishing more and more; and what little movement was as yet perceptible in her, tended on the one hand to separation and individual isolation; or on the other hand, to an union without principle and without meaning. The symptoms of the movement were those of dissolution rather than of regeneration. Her faithful members, who inwardly still clung to the hope that the Head of the Church would not forsake her, found among her outward circumstances only one ground of confidence, which was, that men distinguished in theological literature began again zealously and deeply to scrutinize the sense of the revealed word, and to seek, not without great conflicts and efforts, to revive a knowledge of it in the minds of the present generation, by means of those whom they trained up for the service of the Church. Compared with those days of anxious forecasting, how cheering is the prospect which opens before us, when we look around upon this assembly! From every part of our fatherland, from all the institutions and corporations which are connected with our Church, from all the spheres in which our common Church life dwells, ecclesiastics and laymen have met together, for an interchange of their sentiments touching our evangelic Church, of their thoughts and views, the fruit of deep study with some, of living experience with others; to the intent that we may be stirred up together to life and energy, by a clear understanding of the aims which our Church is to pursue, and of the means by which her welfare is to be promoted. Dr. Eichhorn next adverted to the fact, that the wish for the convocation of such an assembly had been expressed in various quarters; and after complimenting the king on his liberality in allowing the Church free scope for her development, he took care to inform the synod, that as the superior ecclesiastic authority had suggested no definite objects for their deliberations, but had left them to deal with the materials furnished by the district and provincial synods, so it was not intended that they should actually legislate for the Church, but only pave the way for future legislation by a full consideration of her wants. Having exhorted them to enter upon that consideration "in a spirit of true freedom and of sincere love," he concluded by observing: "Since the days of the reformation, the Church of our fatherland has not seen any assembly which can be compared with the present, whether we look to the manner of its composition and the number of its members, or to the nature and extent of the subjects on which it is called upon to deliberate. Neither has there ever been a time when the power which protects the Church, showed like generous confidence in not only permitting, but encouraging her free development. Let us use wisely this favour of the times. May the result of your deliberations be, to allay the conflict of the age by a profound comprehension of what is needed, to secure what has been tottering, to unite what has been separated, and to open a fountain from which new life may flow forth abundantly into all the parts, and upon all the members, of our evangelic Church."

These general intimations of the limits within which the synod was to confine itself, as an assembly called upon to offer advice, but not to frame decrees, were repeated by the minister in a still more definite form during the discussion on the address to be presented to the king, which took place in the second session. The address itself, which was presented by the vice-president, Dr. Neander, accompanied by the whole of the members, on the 11th of June, was nothing more than an expression of gratitude to the king for having called the synod, and a promise to do all in their power to show themselves worthy of the confidence reposed in them. The reply of the king, which appears to have been unpremeditated, and which was pronounced by his majesty "with visible emotion," was of a more significant character than the generalities and commonplaces behind which his minister had entrenched himself, from an evident desire to say, though placed in a position of authority, nothing of an authoritative character. The king himself, indeed, disclaimed all intention of influencing the synod; at the same time, his words were such as could not fail to carry great weight with them. He spoke as follows: "From my very heart I bid you welcome here. I meet you with entire confidence; the fact of your being convened, of itself proves this. But I hope that you, too, gentlemen, are come here in the confidence, justified I trust by what has transpired since you have been here, that there is no intention on my part, or that of my government, in any way to influence your deliberations. The most entire freedom of deliberation and conviction can alone be productive of happy results in such a cause. On the other hand, I also shall exercise the most entire freedom, a freedom resting on immutable principles, in examining the result of your proceedings, and in deciding whether I shall give it my concurrence or my opposition. What little I have to say to you, and wish to impress upon you, will, I trust, by the very fact of my saying it, preclude all idea of my wishing to influence your convictions. Unfortunately, I have not had time to prepare it, and to express it as clearly as I could wish. Do not confine yourselves within the narrow limits of our country, or even of our communion. Raise your eyes above these narrow limits to the universal Church of Christ upon earth; consider her origin, her history, her present condition, her future prospects, her position in this age of the world. Discern the mission which the Lord has given to our Evangelic Church. I feel that I am too unprepared, too deficient in eloquence and in depth of expression, to declare in suitable terms this mission which the Evangelic Church has towards all mankind; indeed I am afraid lest I should, by an ill-chosen expression, give rise to serious misapprehension. Only bear this in mind, gentlemen, our Church has a definite mission, a distinct call within the universal Church of Christ. This call is no other than that which has been addressed to the Church universal in all ages, which has been actually realized in the life and power of the apostolic days. Ecclesiastical history teaches us that the exercise of this divine call has for centuries been sadly interrupted. Understand, therefore, that we are called to arise in apostolic power, and so to organize ourselves, that we may be capable of fulfilling our mission. With me this is no empty phrase; I speak from a living picture in my mind of the history of the universal Christian Church. THIS IS THE ONLY STANDARD WHICH I SHALL APPLY TO YOUR LABOURS; greatly shall I rejoice to find them coming up to it. I have earnestly desired to see this present moment, to see you thus assembled; and, once more, from my heart, I bid you welcome."

With a view to the despatch of business, the synod proceeded to divide the mass of materials contained in the minutes of the provincial synods (of which each member was furnished with a printed copy) into eight departments; and a like number of committees were appointed, for the purpose of digesting the materials and reporting them to the synod. The eight departments were as follows:—1. Matters relative to doctrine and confession, including the question of subscription in connexion with the ordination of the clergy. 2. Matters touching the constitution of the Church, and the state of the ecclesiastical laws bearing upon this subject. 3. Examination of the suggestions made relative to the course of preparation for the ministerial office. 4. Examination of the suggestions made with a view to increase the efficiency of the ministry, or to remove obstacles by which that efficiency is impeded. 5. Every thing connected with the celebration of public worship and with private edification. 6. Inquiry into the relation between the Church and public education. 7. Preliminary discussions on the relations between the Evangelic Church and other Churches or religious communions touched upon in the minutes of the provincial synods. 8. Consideration of the position of the Church in regard to matters subject to civil legislation, and especially matrimonial law and the administration of oaths.

These arrangements occupied the first four sessions; the business of the fifth session was confined to the consideration of additional suggestions from different members of the synod, for receiving which a week's delay had been permitted, and which were either referred to the committees into whose departments they fell, or else "ordered to lie on the table;" in the sixth session, in which the consideration of additional suggestions was resumed, the synod was chiefly occupied with the question, how the addresses were to be dealt with, which had been sent, some to individual members of the assembly, and others to the synod itself, both by private individuals, and by different municipal corporations, not a few of them at the instigation of the "friends of light." The general tendency of these addresses was to remonstrate and to protest beforehand against the adoption of any resolutions by the synod, tending to pledge the Evangelic Church to the doctrines contained in the symbolical books of the Reformation; some of them were of a decidedly rationalistic character, others complained of the constitution of the synod and impeached its competency, while others indulged in severe censures of the ecclesiastical government, and assumed a tone of dictation as to the course which the synod was to pursue. After considerable discussion, especially as to the right of civil corporations to interfere in the affairs of the Church, it was determined to leave the correction of any excess of power of which the authors of the addresses might have been guilty, in other hands, and without taking any notice of their origin or their mode of expression, to refer them to the committees to whose department the matters mooted in them belonged³.

Having thus escaped from the dilemma of either appearing to disregard

"In several towns of the monarchy magistrates and municipal bodies have taken occasion from the convocation of a general evangelic synod, to forward addresses to members of the synod, which both as to their origin and their purport have excited my royal disapprobation. The town authorities are according to their calling to attend to the municipal affairs of their several localities; they forget their position and their calling, if in their magisterial or other capacity they permit themselves to give an opinion on the general affairs of the Church, which by the municipal regulations they are in no way authorised to do. Besides, in some of the addresses my own position is lost sight of, as well as my exclusive right to determine in what way and by what method I may see fit to collect the opinions of the Church respecting her wants, and the means of quickening her life, and further, my exclusive right to keep the assemblies convoked by me within the course and the limits of their commission, in case they should venture to transgress them. If the magistrates had considered this, they would have perceived, that in protesting against the possible assumption of the character of a regularly constituted ecclesiastical assembly, on the part of the general synod, they transgressed both against me, and against themselves; against themselves, because the promulgation of such gratuitous and unfounded assumptions is but too much calculated to bring them under the suspicion of wilful agitation. All this I can pass over with indulgence, only in consideration of the perfect faithfulness and the absolute confidence with which such cities as Magdeberg, Breslau, Königsberg, &c. have in good and in evil times attached themselves to their king, and thereby entitled themselves to the honourable privilege of being quoted as examples of loyalty; of whose representatives I cannot, therefore, but conclude, that in eliciting and signing such addresses, they have fallen into unconscious and unintentional error. But this shows the necessity of pointing out to them that ecclesiastical supremacy, which I have not assumed, but which has been transmitted to me by my ancestors, on whom it devolved in consequence of the reformation, and which, as I have more than once declared, I am determined to use in such wise, that the evangelic Church may by her own inherent life rise to a state of independence, and of long lost unity. But the way to accomplish this, is not by a false liberty, but by a liberty within legal bounds; not on the ground of a newly invented and arbitrary doctrine, but only upon the ground of the ancient faith upon which the Church of Christ is built, and which is established once for all. To protect and to assist the Church in this course, is both my duty and my purpose. Magistrates and municipal authorities are to be admonished, not to anticipate these my intentions, but quietly to wait their execution, and to keep strictly within those limits of their official authority, within which they are according to the municipal regulations competent, and which I could not suffer them again to transgress with impunity. You, Minister of State, Von Bodelschwingh are to notify this to the magistrates and municipalities by whom the addresses were signed, and you, Minister of State, Eichhorn, are to communicate this my present order to the general synod. Sans-souci, 22nd June, 1846. Signed: Frederick William."

In consequence of this communication some members of the synod imagined that the synod had incurred the king's displeasure by the course taken upon the addresses; they were, however, informed by the minister of worship, that no ground whatever existed for such an apprehension.

the wishes of the people, or else sanctioning the principle of private and corporate interference with its deliberations, the synod at last proceeded to actual business in the seventh and eighth sessions, in which the report of the eighth committee respecting the administration of oaths was taken into consideration. Here a preliminary question arose as to the abstract lawfulness of oaths, a point which had been agitated in the provincial synods, and which the report proposed to pass over unnoticed. This course was strongly objected to on the ground, that the implied assumption of the lawfulness of oaths was calculated to give offence to those parties, who had a conscientious objection to oaths under any circumstances. The synod determined to give no such offence, and having satisfied all "tender consciences" by an express reservation of the abstract principle as "an open question," proceeded, on the ground that in the existing state of the law oaths are required as a matter of fact, to consider the various points connected with their administration. On one point there was an unanimous feeling, viz. that oaths were far too frequently administered; and it was resolved that the synod should formally record its opinion, that in any revision of the law the diminution of the frequency of oaths should be specially kept in view. The next suggestion, adopted after a short discussion, was, that the administration of every oath should be preceded by a solemn exhortation; the majority being in favour of a set formulary, with leave to the judge or magistrate administering the oath, to add special exhortations of his own. In the composition of such a formulary it was agreed, that care should be taken so to word it as to make it suitable for persons of every variety of creed, a rule which the synod wisely abstained from reducing to practice, on the ground that the judicial authorities were the proper parties to provide the requisite formulary, in doing which it was suggested that they would probably seek ecclesiastical counsel. The report had proposed to add a prayer at the close of the exhortation, but this was thought inexpedient. Several other proposals of the committee were adopted, which had for their object to increase the solemnity of the act of administering the oath, and to provide, in some cases under the co-operation of the clergy, for the instruction of parties about to be sworn, both as to the sanctity of the oath, and with regard to the particular matters in reference to which the oath was to be taken. The subject was with great difficulty brought to a close in the eighth session, a variety of suggestions from individual members of the synod being overruled for want of time; notwithstanding which the subject was again forced upon the attention of the synod at the beginning of the ninth session, but without any practical result.

The subject which occupied the synod during the ninth and tenth sessions, was the report of the fourth committee respecting the best means of lightening the onerous duties of the clergy, and especially the superintendents, in regard to correspondence, registration, and other like administrative functions, by which their time and attention is too much diverted from their proper calling as ministers of the Gospel. The evil, which appears to be a serious one, was universally acknowledged ; but in the way of remedy little was done. It was proposed by the committee, and agreed to by the synod, that the government should be applied to for an allowance to the superintendents, enabling them to procure assistance in the manual labour of writing ; and the whole matter was recommended to the attention of the superior ecclesiastical authorities, who would be best able to devise and to apply a remedy.

From the eleventh to the fifteenth session inclusively, the synod was engaged in considering the important subject of preparation for the ministry. The present state of the case is, according to the report of the committee, as follows :—The future minister passes through the colleges (Gymnasia) and the universities much in the same manner as youths destined for other learned professions. At the close of his university career he presents himself before the superintendent of the diocese in which he is resident. Generally speaking there is an interval of from ten to fifteen years between this period and his appointment to an ecclesiastical office ; and during this time the Church takes but little account of him. He has to gain his livelihood as best he can, either as a private tutor, or in some public scholastic position ; once or twice a year he has to send in to the superintendent an essay on some theological subject, in proof of his continued attention to theological studies ; and he has also to pass through two theological examinations. But beyond this he is left to himself, and the best years of his life are generally lost to the service of the Church. While the want of labourers in the parishes is universally felt, and numbers of “ candidates ” who have made choice of the clerical profession, and gone through the necessary course of study, are waiting for employment, the existing arrangements prevent the latter from being called in to supply the wants of the former.

In dealing with the subject with a view to an amelioration of the present system, the committee directed the attention of the synod to four different points :—1. the preparatory education at the Gymnasium ; 2. the University career ; 3. the examinations ; 4. the farther training of the candidate, until his entrance upon the ministerial office. Touching the first point the committee were of opinion, that no difference should be made between the education of youths destined for the ministry, and those destined for other professions. They suggested, however, that care should be taken to provide for proper religious instruction generally in the Gymnasia, that the study of Hebrew should not be neglected, and that regular attendance on public worship should be encouraged, without, however, having recourse to compulsory means. With regard to the University career, the same feeling prevailed, that the theological students should be placed upon the same academic footing as others ; but a desire was expressed that the theological faculties might be induced to attach more importance to their connexion with the Church ; and it was suggested that the members of the faculty should take an interest in the characters of the young men, that private tutors (repetentes) should be employed, and University preachers, or rather University ministers, with special care of souls over the members of the University, appointed. Lastly, it was proposed that seminaries should be established for the reception of those candidates in theology who had completed their University education, in which they might go through a course of homiletical and catechetical training, and obtain a knowledge of church music. In the course of this discussion two points came out, which deserve to be noted; the first, that young men, while they are mere students, before they have passed their examination or completed their course, are permitted to act occasionally not only as catechists, but as public preachers; the other, that while they are thus allowed to anticipate their future calling, they remain subject to the general laws of military service, which in Prussia require every citizen to serve in the army for a certain period of time; the result of which is, that one and the same youth may be seen to-day in the pulpit preaching the gospel of peace, and to-morrow in the ranks shouldering the musket.

With regard to examinations it was thought best to retain the present system of two examinations, one, pro licentia concionandi, at the conclusion of the academic course, the other, pro ministerio, after an interval of from one to three years; which latter examination should have for its object chiefly to test the candidate's acquaintance with Scripture, with the symbolical books, and with the ecclesiastical law, as well as his ability as a preacher and a catechist. It was further determined, that on account of the length of time which often intervenes between the second examination and the appointment to an ecclesiastical charge, the existing practice ought to be retained, according to which the appointment is to be preceded by a kind of oral examination, termed a colloquium. A suggestion that the candidate should be specially examined as to his "faith and piety," as well as required to produce a certificate of his attendance on the holy communion, was overruled by the synod in accordance with the report of the committee. Another suggestion, that the examinations should be public, was pressed with a variety of modifications, but uniformly rejected by the synod.

The most difficult point, and that which elicited the greatest possible diversity of opinions, was the question as to the employment of the candidates in the interval between the second examination and the appointment to an ecclesiastical charge. The suggestions which were ultimately adopted by the synod, were the following:—That in every district the synod of that district should select a certain number of clergymen qualified to direct and superintend the further theological studies of the candidates who had passed the second examination; leaving the candidates themselves free to choose which of them they will take for their guide; and the ecclesiastical authorities exercising a general superintendence over the course to be pursued in regard to their private studies, and the practical preparation for the ministerial office connected with them;—that in addition to this general provision, embracing all the candidates for the ministry, those living on their private means, those engaged as private tutors, &c., arrangements should be made to place small knots of candidates, from four to six, in a kind of miniature seminaries, larger seminaries being objected to as too monastic in their character, under the charge of distinguished clergymen, for the completion of their clerical education;—lastly, that the candidates after having been for some time under this discipline, should be employed at the expense of the state, in the capacity of assistant ministers and substitutes in large parishes, in vacant charges, in district churches and chapels of ease, in prisons, penitentiaries, and other similar institutions. An important point which came out in this part of the discussion, is the light in which ordination is regarded in the Prussian Church. It was distinctly asserted, and does not appear to have been contradicted, that ordination is unnecessary, not only for the office of preaching, but also for the administration of the sacraments, all which functions may be performed by non-ordained candidates; ordination by laying on of hands, being defined as the act of consecration to the pastoral office in a permanent charge, in other words, ordination being considered as a mere form of induction.

As the detailed reports of the proceedings of the synod, which have reached our hands, do not extend beyond the fifteenth session, held on the 9th of July, we must reserve the continuation of this subject for our next number.

Moravian Conference.—The Conference of the Moravian Communion, at which fifty-eight ministers from different parts were assembled, took place at Herrnhut on the 10th of June last. The discussion itself, in which the case of the German Catholics and of the clergy in the Canton de Vaud occupied a prominent place, presented no features of particular importance; the most interesting point connected with this conference being the circular by which it was convoked, and in which the central ecclesiastical authority of the Moravian body expressed, in opposition to the laxity of the times, their strict and faithful adherence to the faith of their fathers. In the introductory part of the circular, in which the origin of the Conference is referred to, it is said: “The Communion of the United Brethren, which adheres to the twenty-one doctrinal articles of the Confession of Augsburg, regarding them as a pure and scriptural summary of belief, has from its first origin, notwithstanding the peculiarities of its constitution, considered itself as a part of the Evangelic Church, and desired to remain in connexion with it, esteeming highly the blessing of acquaintance with faithful witnesses and approved servants of that Church, by which it has in return been recognized as a Christian community.” After giving a short history of the Conference, and the admission to it of ministers of other Protestant communions, the circular deprecates all discussion of points of faith, which in that Conference ought ever to be taken for granted: “Neither was it, from the very first, consistent with the objects of the Conference to enter upon controversies on theological and doctrinal points. The brethren who met at it, were all like-minded as to the foundation of their faith, on which they stood firmly; and on the same foundation of faith, however much it may be spoken against in our days, we are still determined to maintain our stand with unshaken firmness. The Holy Scripture of the Old and New Testament is and remains the alone rule of our faith and our life. We venerate it as God's word, and are persuaded that every truth, the knowledge of which is necessary to our salvation, is completely contained therein, and that the Holy Ghost will give an understanding of it, and an inward apprehension of its truth, to every one who seeks for that truth with sincerity of heart and humility of mind. We confess Jesus Christ as God manifest in the flesh, who came into this world to save us sinners; who gave his life a ransom for us, and shed his blood for the remission of our sins; who was delivered for our offences, and raised again for our justification. We confess that we are by nature sinful men, alienated from God, and stand in need of such a Saviour and Mediator; that no one comes to the Father but through the Son; and that there is no salvation in any other, nor any name given unto men, whereby they shall be saved, but only the name of Jesus Christ. We hold it to be the office of preachers to preach Christ crucified, and as messengers to beseech and entreat men in his stead to be reconciled unto God. Upon this doctrine of reconciliation, as the central point of the gospel of salvation by Christ, we found, after the example of Paul and other Apostles, both the justification and the sanctification of penitent sinners; in it we find our greatest comfort in life and in death. We enter into no controversy on points which are left obscure or indefinite in Holy Scripture, or which go beyond it. We do not wish to set ourselves up as judges of any man's conscience; neither are we unmindful of the progress of our age in many respects: but we cannot allow the wisdom of our day to assume the right of invading the truths which are so clearly and repeatedly declared in Holy Scripture, which for centuries have proved to so many souls the power of God and divine wisdom, and in which we too have found peace of heart and blessedness. These truths are esteemed by us as eternal truths, high above all the vicissitudes of time and of men's opinions, according to that saying of our Lord: 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my words shall not pass away.' This is the foundation on which the faith of the Evangelic Church is founded, on which the Communion of United Brethren has rested from its very origin, and on which we pray the Lord to keep it."

As regards the subjects of the lectures, a review of the different programmes gives the following general data. The only subjects treated of in all the universities are, Dogmatic and Interpretation of the Holy Scriptures; these occupy out of 329 courses of lectures, dogmatic, 20; interpretation of the Old Testament, 55; of the New Testament, 69. Lectures on Church history are delivered in all, except the Roman Catholic faculty of Tübingen, and the Roman Catholic University of Würzburg, total, 29 courses. The other subjects are taught in the following proportions: encyclopædic knowledge of theology and theological literature, 14; the history of Christian doctrine, 14; symbolic, 11; practical theology, including introduction to homiletic and catechetical instruction, 21; pastoral theology, 6; Christian morality, 11; various biblical subjects, 8; subjects connected with the history of religion in general, 6, among them a course on the history of Mahometanism at Halle; Jewish and Christian antiquities, 7; Christian apologetic, 4; the philosophy of religion, 12; patristic readings, 2; liturgical subjects, 3; ecclesiastical law, 3; Church statistics, 2; the apocrypha, 1; controversial subjects, 2; pædagogic science, 4; Hebrew language and literature, 8; other Oriental languages, 14; miscellaneous, 3. In addition to the regular lectures, class meetings are appointed for various practical purposes, such as examinations, repertory courses, exegetical, homiletic and catechetical exercises, and conversazioni on general theological subjects. These class meetings are conducted by the several professors generally in connexion with their lectures; and some of them are held in almost every university; the Protestant faculty of Bonn, and the Roman Catholic faculties of Tübingen and Würzburg being the only exceptions; but by far the greatest attention to this part of theological education appears to be paid in the University of Göttingen.

RUSSIA.—Proselytism of the Russo-Greek Church.—Not the least significant among the many indications of the present tendency of the world to resolve all the questions of the day into religious questions, is the attitude which, under the impulse of the imperial government, the Russo-Greek Church has latterly assumed towards the other Christian communions established within the dominions of the Czar. By a sudden transition from a state of torpid inaction, she has entered upon a course of the most active proselytism, which is the more remarkable, as it takes no account of the Mahometan and heathen populations, but is exclusively directed upon the Protestants and the Roman Catholics. The movement is evidently connected with a deep-laid scheme of Russian policy, the object of which is to raise a colossal Slavonian empire in the East of Europe, enlisting for this purpose the national sympathies of the different branches of the Slavonian family, both those which already owe allegiance to the Russian sceptre, and those which are subject to Austria and Prussia. Whatever may be the origin of the new tendencies in the national life of the Slavonians, whether it be, as the author of an able article on this subject in the Revue des deux Mondes suggests, the example of the newly awakened nationality of their German neighbours, and of the wonders which it wrought in the war of deliverance against Napoleon, the young Slavonians who frequent the German universities bringing home with them, along with the erudition of Germany and more enlarged views of the world, the infection of national enthusiasm; or whether it be, that in the natural development of the Slavonian tribes, and their progress in civilization, they have arrived at the period at which a nation becomes conscious of its intellectual and moral power, and of its own place in the destinies of the world, certain it is, that the national mind in the various tribes of the great Slavonian family responds in a most remarkable manner to the ambitious designs of the Russian autocrat. A spirit of nationality breathes through the recent productions of Slavonian literature, both in the field of history and in that of poetry, and that not only under the immediate inspiration of imperial patronage, but in Bohemia, and among the exiled Poles. Even the latter, represented by the mystic and visionary Mickiewicz, appear to have turned from the hopeless dream of Polish independence, towards the rising sun of Slavonian unity and greatness under the mighty sceptre of the Czar. In Bohemia, the poet John Kollar, in his great national poem, bearing the bi-significant title "Slavi Dcera," i. e., "The Daughter of Glory;" or, "the Slavonian Maid," by a bold figure "melts the different ores of the Slavonian mine," for the casting of a statue, of which, he says, "Bohemia shall be the arm, Poland the heart, Russia the head;" and in a fantastic description of the Slavonian paradise, prophetically places in it the Emperor Nicholas and the Grand Duke Constantine. Meanwhile the practical character of the tendencies which literature thus at once attests and fosters, becomes more and more apparent, and that in a manner calculated to create the most serious alarm in the mind of those governments which reckon Slavonian tribes among their subjects. An increasing impatience of foreign, that is, of German rule, is betrayed by them; and there appear to be very sufficient grounds for the suspicion, that Russian influence was secretly at work in producing the recent disorders in Gallicia and in the Grand Duchy of Posen; for, however cautiously the Russian cabinet may proceed in the pursuit of its comprehensive and ambitious schemes, it is evident that the malcontents count upon the silent approbation, and that in some instances they have even obtained the direct countenance, of Russia, in their attempts to heighten the hereditary antipathies of the Slavonian against the German race. And it is surely more than a mere coincidence, that at the very moment when the subjects of Austria and Prussia turn their eyes towards the great Slavonian monarch, as if expecting from him the impulse of national regeneration, a new line of policy, one which courts popularity by the same promise of national regeneration, should be adopted towards oppressed and persecuted Poland.

To the working out, however, of this vast conception of a Slavonian empire in the east of Europe⁴, there is at present one great obstacle; viz., the difference of religion. So long as a large portion of the Slavonian race owns spiritual allegiance to the Roman see, and while in the most civilized portion of the great Russian empire, the Baltic provinces, whose population contains, in the upper classes especially, a large admixture of German blood, the people are leavened with the leaven of Protestantism, the leaven of free inquiry and independence of thought, such a complete amalgamation as the policy of Russia contemplates, cannot possibly take place. It is for the purpose, then, of removing this obstacle, that the Russo-Greek Church has received the mission, in the execution of which it is at this time displaying a combination of subtlety and cruelty, such as the world has not witnessed since the days when the Holy Inquisition employed the secular arm of the mightiest kingdoms of western Europe for the maintenance of the "Catholic" faith.

Before entering upon the details of the facts which have transpired, in spite of the jealous care with which Russia guards the secret of her internal affairs, a slight sketch of the history of the Russian Church may not be unacceptable to our readers. Its origin dates from the conversion of the chieftain Wladimir, at whose request the patriarch of Constantinople despatched a number of missionaries to the Russian provinces, and among them several bishops, one of whom was invested with the title of metropolitan. This happened about seventy years before the great schism between the east and the west, in which, as might be expected, the Russian Church took sides with the patriarch, to whom, by virtue of its descent, it owed canonical obedience. The see of the first metropolitan was Kiew, at that time the residence of the sovereign princes; which has, on account of its antiquity, maintained its ecclesiastical rank, although its political importance has been greatly diminished. The seat of government has long been removed, and two other metropolitan sees have in consequence been erected. For a considerable period the Russian Church was thus divided between the metropolitical sees of Kiew, of Moscow, and of Novogorod; all three acknowledging the spiritual supremacy of the Patriarch of Constantinople. Subsequently, during the confusions to which the invasion of the Tartars gave rise, the Patriarch of Constantinople lost de facto his rights over the Russian Church: the appointment of its metropolitans, which had hitherto been at least nominally in his hands, devolved upon the Russian episcopate; and the metropolitan of Moscow, which had become the seat of government, obtained a sort of primacy over the two other metropolitans. Still a show of recognition of the patriarchate of Constantinople was retained, even after the conquest of Constantinople by the Turks, until, in the year 1559, the Patriarch of Constantinople, having been expelled from his see and obliged to take refuge in Russia, conferred upon the Metropolitan of Moscow, to the prejudice of his own rights, the patriarchal dignity, on the plea, it is alleged, that Rome having separated itself from the Catholic Church, the primitive number of patriarchates should nevertheless be maintained. This act was afterwards confirmed, after his restoration to his own see, by a formal decree, to which the other patriarchs of the east gave their adhesion. By this means the Russian Church became altogether independent of all extraneous influence, and assumed an important position among the Christian communions of the east. But at the same time the patriarchal dignity gave to its possessor so high an ascendancy, and so powerful an influence, that it was viewed with a jealous eye by the despotic rulers of Russia; till at last Peter the Great adopted the expedient, on the death of the last patriarch, of appointing an ecclesiastical commission for the administration of the affairs of the National Church. This commission, which was in the first instance only provisional, was afterwards made permanent, under the name of the "Holy Governing Synod." The substitution of this corporate body for the personal authority of the patriarch was notified by Peter the Great to the Patriarch of Constantinople and the other patriarchs of the east, in an epistle addressed to them on the 30th of September, 1721; to which, after the lapse of two years, consumed in hesitations and negotiations, the Patriarch of Constantinople replied by the following curious document: "Jeremiah, by the grace of God, Patriarch of the city of Constantine. By the grace and power of the Holy Ghost, the giver of life and fountain of all perfection, our Humility declares lawful, confirms and proclaims the synod which the most pious and most clement autocrat, the holy Czar, Lord of all Moscovia, of White and Little Russia, and of all the eastern and western and other regions, the Lord Peter Alexewitch, your Emperor, most beloved in the Holy Spirit, has established for the holy and great empire of Russia. This synod both exists and is named holy and sacred, by all my brethren in Christ Jesus, and by all pious and orthodox Christians, both of the clerical and the secular orders, superiors as well as inferiors, and by all persons holding any place of dignity. It has power to do and to act, the same as the four apostolical, holy, and patriarchal sees. We put it in mind, we exhort and enjoin it, to preserve and maintain incorrupt the rules and customs of the seven holy œcumenical councils, and of the other councils which the holy Oriental Church acknowledges, that the same may be inviolably kept throughout all ages. And may the grace of God and the prayers and benediction of our Humility be with you!" A precisely similar adhesion to the change made in the Russian patriarchate was sent in by the Patriarch of Antioch; what the reply of the two other patriarchs, of Alexandria and Jerusalem, was, does not appear.

In this "Holy Governing Synod" all authority in matters of faith and discipline, and the appointment to all ecclesiastical offices, was henceforth concentrated. The dignities of metropolitan and archbishop, which had hitherto had a practical importance in the ecclesiastical hierarchy, became empty titles of distinction, and the bishops generally mere spiritual functionaries, charged with the administration of the word and sacraments, and the execution of the ecclesiastical law, but without any synodal, deliberative, or legislative power. By the appointment of a lay procurator-general, who is the organ of communication between the synod and the czar, and through whose hands all the business of the synod passes, the direction of the proceedings of the synod is substantially in the hands of the emperor himself; and thus, while in theory the Russian Church maintains the principle, that "the Lord God and our Saviour Jesus Christ is alone the true Head of the one true Church," the supreme ecclesiastical power is practically wielded by the same despotic hand with the imperial sceptre. Under these circumstances it is obvious, how easily the action of the Russo-Greek Church can be brought to bear upon the promotion of the political designs of the czar, in the manner described in recent accounts from different parts of the empire.

As regards the Roman Catholics, the scene of operation is chiefly in Poland and the southern provinces, where means similar to those which were first adopted in 1839 for separating the "United Greeks" from the communion of the Roman Church¹, continue to be used. From the extreme ignorance of the people, added to the use in public worship of "a tongue not understood of the people," the measures of conversion, if conversion it can be called, bear chiefly upon the clergy, whose conformity to the Greek rite, and submission to the authorities of the Russian Church, it is attempted by various means, both of conciliation and compulsion, to obtain. In many instances the common people do not even seem to be aware of the change, when it has been effected; the priests retaining the vestments of the Romish Church, while they recite the Liturgy of the Greek Church. Nor is that ignorance likely to be remedied, the priests being prohibited, under pain of deportation to Siberia, from enlightening the common people as to the progress which has been made in the incorporation of their Church with the Russo-Greek Church, or preaching on the question of the confessional differences. The priests who refuse to conform, are placed in a position of great perplexity; many of them have been deprived of their incomes without any indemnity or pension, and are dependent on the voluntary contributions of their flocks. Various advantages are held out to the people also; e. g. a tax is levied upon marriages performed according to the Romish rite, while those according to the Greek rite are performed without charge. Children born of mixed marriages, or, in case both parents were originally Roman Catholics, after the conversion of either parent to the Greek Church, are by law baptized according to the Greek rite, and being so baptized, are compulsorily brought up as members of the Greek communion. And while thus a variety of methods are used for obtaining proselytes from the Roman to the Greek Church, defection from the Greek Church to any other communion is visited by the severest penalties, more especially in the case of persons who originally belonged to other communions, and who, as "relapsed heretics," are treated with increased severity. The extent of barbarity to which the persecution of the Russo-Greek clergy against the Roman Catholics occasionally proceeds, has become notorious throughout Europe by the account of the sufferings of the nuns of the Basilian convent of Minsk, given by the superior of the convent, Makrena Mieczyslawska, who succeeded in making her escape, and having proceeded to Paris, and thence to Rome, furnished in the last-named place materials for a publication which appeared at Paris under the title, "Récit de MAKRENA MIECZYSLAWSKA, abbesse des Basiliennes de Minsk, ou Histoire d'une Persécution de sept ans, soufferte pour la foi par elle et ses religieuses; écrite sous sa dictée, et d'après les ordres de N. T. S. Père le Pape Grégoire XVI., par le R. P. Maximilien Ryllo, Recteur de la Propagande à Rome; l'abbé Alexandre Jélowicki, recteur de l'Église Saint-Claude à Rome; l'abbé Aloys Leitner, théologien de la Propagande à Rome; commencé le 8 Novembre, et terminé le 6 Décembre, 1845, dans le couvent de la Trinité-du-Mont, à Rome." The circumstantial indication of these names, coupled with the fact that the document was published by one of the regular ecclesiastical booksellers at Paris (Gaume frères), can leave little doubt as to the authenticity of this examination. In the interval, however, between the examination and the publication of it, towards the end of January of the present year, the emperor had paid his personal visit to the pope, and it was accordingly thought more expedient by the Roman court to disavow the official character of the above-named document. The truth of the facts set forth in it, the substance of which had previously been made known to the public, was still asserted. Into the details of these facts it is unnecessary for us here to enter, as their uncommon atrocity excited universal attention to them at the time. Suffice it to state, that they became afterwards the subject of violent controversy; the Russian government putting forth repeated denials of the whole story; first in anonymous newspaper articles, and afterwards by two demi-official notes, which M. de Bouténieff, the Russian minister at the court of Rome, circulated among the influential clergy at Rome, without, however, presenting them officially to the pontifical government, and which have found their way into the public prints. In these notes, however, the Russian government overreached itself, by denying the very existence of a Basilian convent at Minsk, and of such a person as the abbess Mieczyslawska; the publicity given to these denials provoking communications from a variety of persons, who attested both the fact that there is such a convent at Minsk, though extra muros, and also the fact of its being under the direction of an abbess of the name of Makrena Mieczyslawska, the history of whose family some of the correspondents gave. As far as it is possible in a matter of this kind, when the testimony is of so conflicting a nature, to form an opinion, there seems to be no reason to question the substantial truth of the account originally given by the abbess, while great suspicion attaches to the denials put forth in the name of the Russian government.

But whatever might be the merits of this story, it appears unquestionable that the impression which it had produced upon the mind of Gregory XVI., coupled with the knowledge of many other circumstances of oppression against the Roman Catholic Church in the Russian dominions, led to the earnest remonstrance, which according to the accounts furnished from Rome of the visit of the Emperor Nicholas to the pope, was addressed by the latter to his imperial visitor. This remonstrance does not appear to have been without effect; immediately on his return to his own dominions, the emperor appointed a commission of inquiry into the condition of the Roman Catholic Church in Russia, and the grievances alleged by the Papal government, the report of which is said to be decidedly favourable to the interests of the Romish Church. The news of the decease of Gregory XVI. having arrived at St. Petersburg, at the moment when it was intended to despatch a special envoy to Rome, with a view to the accommodation of existing differences, the subject was for a time adjourned; but the latest accounts from St. Petersburg announce, that as soon as the intelligence of the election of Pius IX. had arrived, the envoy, Count Bloudoff, accompanied by M. de Hube, a learned canonist, was directed to proceed on his mission. The Romish journals, however, do not anticipate that much good will result from the negotiation, the count being a zealous partizan of the Russo-Greek Church, and one of those who have taken an active part in the measures of oppression against the Romish communion. The same inference is drawn by them from the names of eight candidates which the count is to propose to the pope, for filling up eight bishoprics which have become vacant during the late differences; and it is generally thought that Russia, while making concessions sufficient to meet the exigences of the moment, will not the less steadily pursue the plan of merging all the Christian communions under its sway in the one Russo-Greek establishment.

The determination to effect this object is further attested by the proceedings which have taken place in the Baltic provinces. In these provinces the Russo-Greek Church has, upon the faith of the treaties by which they were incorporated in the Russian empire, no legal existence; they having made their submission upon the express condition, that they should be protected "in the inviolable exercise of that religion which had hitherto obtained amongst them, on the ground of the evangelical and apostolical Scriptures of the pure Church of Christ, and in conformity with the decrees of the council of Nicæa and the determinations of the Confession of Augsburg;" and that "no other preacher of any other confession should ever be permitted to introduce or superadd any kind of alteration or innovation." In direct violation of these stipulations, a Russo-Greek Church was established at Riga, in the midst of a Lutheran population. This encroachment was soon followed up by a similar proceeding in the other chief towns; and latterly, moveable churches, and itinerant Russo-Greek priests, have been sent through the country districts, for the express purpose of proselytizing the ignorant multitude. The course adopted in this case is, to employ inferior agents of the government, whose declarations are disavowed, whenever it is convenient, for the purpose of disseminating among the peasants, who constitute the chief part of the population, and who are emancipated serfs, living upon the land as tenants, in a state of abject dependence upon the lords of the soil, the notion that, by embracing "the religion of the emperor," they will obtain relief from many of the burdens which now press upon them. At the same time, by an accommodation similar to that adopted among the Romish populations of the south, the difference between the two modes of worship is made to appear as slight as possible. By the representations made to them, many have been induced to allow their names to be placed on lists of persons willing to embrace "the religion of the emperor." In some cases, indeed, they seem to have been inveigled into signing, or rather setting their mark, to documents of the purport of which they were totally ignorant, but which were, in fact, lists of proselytes. No sooner is this point accomplished, than they become subject to the operation of the laws already referred to, against "relapsed heretics," and are thus forcibly retained in a communion in which they have been ignorantly, and in some cases even unconsciously, enrolled. Their protestations that they were not aware what they were doing, are not listened to; their signatures or marks are taken as conclusive evidence of their conversion, and they are treated accordingly. The unfairness of the proceedings adopted by the Russo-Greek clergy and their emissaries and abettors, having been reported to the emperor by Count Pahlen, the governor of the Baltic provinces, and himself a Lutheran, the only result was the recall of the count, who was retained at St. Petersburg under the semblance of promotion to a higher dignity, while his place in the government of the Baltic provinces was supplied by Count Golowin, a Russian by birth, and a Russo-Greek by faith. Under his administration the proselytizing system of the Greek Church is carried on with the greatest activity, chiefly by the agency of a Russo-Greek neophyte, formerly a Lutheran, of the name of Bürger, who is armed with special powers from the imperial government for this purpose. The Protestant clergy are prohibited, under severe penalties, and by a special engagement entered into on their appointment, from preaching, or otherwise seeming to influence the people against defection from their communion to the Greek Church; and unfortunately, moreover, the machinations of the Russo-Greek priesthood are facilitated by a feud of long standing between the strict old Lutherans and the Moravians, who obtained leave to form establishments in these provinces from the Empress Catherine, and received great favour and encouragement more recently at the hands of the Emperor Alexander. The latest accounts state that the number of so-called converts exceeds already 10,000; and that whole districts have departed from the faith of their fathers, and gone over to the Russo-Greek Church. Considering that the Protestants are divided among themselves, and that they have no power or influence to fall back upon in their resistance against these aggressions, it is to be anticipated that at no distant period the Russo-Greek will be, if not the exclusive, at least the dominant religion of these provinces; and that in this part of the empire, at all events, the ambitious designs of the Russian Colossus will meet with success.

SWITZERLAND.—Bishop Marilley at Geneva. The appointment of M. Marilley, expelled some time ago from the territory of Geneva, in consequence of a dispute between the late bishop of Freiburg, Lausanne, and Geneva, and the cantonal government⁶, to the vacant see, has begun to bear its fruit. Having set out on a primary visitation of his diocese, and paid a passing visit, at Lausanne, to the radical M. Druey, the President of the Council of State, and persecutor of the Protestant Church in the Canton de Vaud, Mgr. Marilley proceeded to make his triumphal entry into the city of Calvin, where he arrived towards the end of June last. The following is the account given of his reception by the Ami de la Religion.

“The Catholics of Geneva enjoy now the ineffable happiness of having amongst them their chief pastor, him who formerly, as a simple priest, was subjected to the persecutions of calvinistic intolerance. Last Tuesday, as early as five in the morning, a body of young men were in waiting for Mgr. Marilley, in order to serve him as a guard of honour. About half-past ten, the carriage of the prelate passed through the gates, and soon after he entered the Church of St. Germain. A way was opened for him between the lines of young orphans which had been placed there, as a speaking symbol of the Church of Geneva. At that moment the most inexpressible emotion manifested itself in the whole assembly of the faithful, and Monseigneur himself, after kneeling down, shed abundant tears; tears which are precious to all the true children of Geneva, tears of a kind father, tears of joy and of love, which will not be shed in vain."

The authorities of the town, who had so unceremoniously disposed of his person, paid their respects and received his visits, by way of first instalment of that "justice from Rome" for which M. Marilley's predecessor in the episcopate had appealed to the Pope. The fruit of the tears of Mgr. Marilley, so confidently predicted in the foregoing paragraph, has not failed to make its appearance; for the Ami de la Religion gives in a subsequent number the following statement on the authority of the Romish journals of Switzerland: "The affair of the nomination of a curé of Geneva does not seem to have advanced a single step. It is true the government had proposed to the bishop three priests, one of whom in particular seemed highly deserving, but in the course of the negotiations the pretensions of the Council of State seem to have increased. They meant, by way of preliminary, to extort from the episcopal authority a concordate analogous to that which expired at the death of Mgr. Yenni. Mgr. Marilley had had too much experience of the extravagant pretensions which the Genevese authorities found on concessions of this kind, to go into the trap. In consequence the negotiation is broken off, and probably a higher power will have to interpose between the contending parties." In other words, Mgr. Marilley having been a party to the violation of the rights expressly reserved to the temporal authorities of Geneva, on the re-admission of the Romish communion into the republic, now refuses in his episcopal capacity to recognize the very existence of the laws, which in a lower station he had already helped to outrage.

Foreign Correspondence.

From a Correspondent in Switzerland.

Yverdun, Canton de Vaud, August 20, 1846.

MY DEAR —,

I HAVE been for some days past endeavouring to bring myself to write to you in answer to your note of the 14th July; but I find it no easy matter to put upon paper my impressions on the state of matters in this country. Knowing that you wish rather to know actual facts than to hear of my mere personal judgment of them, I have been very desirous of gathering from persons of contrary parties all I could on the subject. Here, as in most places, it is most difficult to get information simple and unvarnished. Party feeling has broken society into pieces, and houses are divided in themselves and against houses, and every thing seems to be out of joint. My remarks must, however, be considered as relating particularly to this canton; for although I fear, from all I hear, that the other Protestant cantons are much in the same case, yet as I have not had any opportunity of conversing with persons from Bern, Geneva, &c., I can say nothing positive. The strife is here, as in England, the same, au fond, and proceeds, no doubt, from the same cause; but here we have it in miniature and more within compass. The dismissal of the clergy was on the point of bringing on a crisis, but the decision and firmness of the government on the occasion appears to have arrested it for a time: a considerable number returned to their parishes, which gave a death-blow to the liberty and, perhaps, even the existence of their national Church. After considerable difficulty I obtained the loan of an old Prayer-book, which contains the Helvetic confession, the Church liturgy, and the Psalms. You will be surprised, no doubt, that I should have found difficulty in borrowing such a book! The fact is, the Prayer-book is never used by the congregation in church, except for singing, when the people sit: the minister reads the prayers, the people standing; but no one reads the prayers with him or after him, nor says "Amen" aloud. All but the singing is done from the pulpit by the minister or deacon alone, so that there seems to be no use for Prayer-books; indeed, modern Prayer-books only contain the Psalms set to music, and the office for the Lord's Supper.

But I must go further back. Previous to 1830 a part of the people were dissatisfied with the way in which the religious services of the Church were performed, and (as in our own country) they commenced forming themselves into what we call sects, or parties, who desired more spirituality than they fancied the Church possessed the means of affording them,—became an evangelical body, or section,—till at length the purity and sufficiency of their national confession of faith were called into question. Both ministers and people were divided on this point. The old school or national party attributed this schism to the "English Methodists" (as they call some of our good people who have of late years taken the world in hand), and they especially name a "Miss G——," who came to reside for some time at Lausanne, as the prime cause of the movement. Be this, however, as it may, most distressing have been the results. The Canton de Vaud cannot now be said to have an established Church at all; for such were the lengths to which parties went, that the civil authorities at length interfered; and it has ended in a total suspension of the Helvetic Confession, and nobody seems to know where they are, or what they are about; for some cry one thing and some another. In the midst of this lamentable state of things in ecclesiastical matters, the Conservatives, who seem to have favoured, on the whole, the Evangelical party, were suddenly and most unexpectedly driven from office by an almost infidel party. Matters then became still worse; for, finding the Church stripped of its privileges as a Church, they treated her and her ministry as the mere servants of a political party, and so have made use of them. This brought on the dismissal of the ministers, who refused to read—as they were ordered by the government to do from the pulpit on a Sunday—a brief of the “New Constitution,” introduced by the present party. The Evangelical party they, as far as they can do, seem to persecute, and accuse of insubordination. In the midst of all this, the condition of both ministers and people is most deplorable, they are languishing in bondage. A blind zeal has so entangled them in the enemy’s net, that they see no way of escape from it but by endeavouring to proclaim the necessity of a total disunion of Church and State—which I believe they will not readily succeed in bringing about. They take the Free Church of Scotland as their model; but at present the divisions among them are too numerous to admit of uniformity. Numerous churches are without pastors. The “démisionnaires” are without churches; and although a considerable portion of their flocks are sympathising with them, and have followed them to hear their preaching in private rooms, yet they are counted by the government as mere laymen and private individuals; and many of them have been fined and even condemned to imprisonment, for not attending to the militia rules. Sunday is as much as possible by the government dedicated to public amusement; of which we, last Sunday week, had an example here; and it was the case throughout the canton, by order of the civil authorities. The day was set apart by authority for public rejoicing; when a considerable sum of money was given by them for the purpose. There was firing, feasting, and dancing, with illumination in the evening. This is the most melancholy issue of dissension on religious matters I have yet seen; but it is only what thousands in our own country would blindly and ignorantly lead the multitude to, thinking all the time they are doing God service. The more I reflect on our state at home, the more I think we ought to pray that we may desire the good old paths of fixed principles, instead of that love of change, which destroys merely for the sake of having something new, on the experimental chance of its being better. If we are contented with our foundations, why lay them afresh? If the superstructure be fallen into decay, let us repair it, before the enemy fall upon it with impious hand, or the friend in mistaken zeal destroy it. For where shall we find the spirit of unity and love at present strong enough to rear a national temple to God afresh on holier ground than our forefathers have chosen?

The Church at Geneva is also in a most deplorable state as to its national peace and unity. They have there orthodox, heterodox, and various dissensions besides. In Neuchâtel they have dispensed with the Helvetic Confession, and substituted, as they say, the Bible. So that I presume the ministers are inducted into their sacred office upon individual and private interpretations of the Scripture, in such general terms as may prove satisfactory to the examining parties, who probably question the authority of all human beings in matters of faith, making a reservation in favour of their own. From the state to which Protestantism is reduced in Switzerland, I think they have reason to fear more enemies than one. On the one hand, an attack from the papacy; on the other, an attack from infidelity; will find them but little prepared for the shock, and still less able to reckon on the issue. What Protestantism may be on other parts of the Continent, I cannot of course judge; but if it resembles that which I have seen in the Canton de Vaud, I am not surprised at the Bishop of Exeter's protest against the Chevalier Bunsen's bishopric at Jerusalem. Nothing, I think, could be more unwise than the Church of England descending from her sacred and responsible position, in order to meet the views of private individuals, whose chief labour seems to be in unnecessarily irritating the Roman Catholics, and in causing further dissensions amongst Protestants. They think perhaps the only way to bring about the unity they seek is to break us up into fragments, like the particles of a macadamized road, in order that we may, for the future, unite the better into one solid mass. May we be defended from such philosophy and vain deceit!

I must not omit to tell you, as an instance of the state of things here, that the chief magistrate of the cantonal government and his friends entered the pulpit themselves in the church of Lausanne, on the Sunday of the public rejoicing, and delivered to the congregation political speeches. This seems to have been all part of the entertainment of the people. Of the private character of some of the individuals who direct public affairs in these matters we hear scandalous things; but I will not repeat them, as some of our own public officers at home are not chosen for their private virtues. Public duties are thought not to need such considerations.

AUGUST 31.—Affairs in this country of Switzerland are in a state of disruption. This and the canton of Berne are passing through an accès of intermittent fever. They have just now obtained new constitutions, by means of an overwhelming majority of Radicals, who, I expect, will give these republicans such a dose of liberty, as they will not know what to do with. Society appears to me to be in a wretched state of disunion. Our dissenters have, I fear, been one means of unsettling them in Church matters; for in this canton they seem to have no Church at all. The state has wounded it to death, by removing its Confession of Faith; so that they are now Protestants without a "protest." The clergy are officers of the state in every sense of the word, for their synod has lost its independence. They are truly in the most unhappy state of bondage.

HERSELF more like an apparition than like a reality, a creature of romance rather than a historical character, the heroine of Dom Remi has yet left on the face of her own age so deep a mark of her fleet and passing footstep, that in spite of the difficulty of reducing her tale to the sober proportions of historic truth, and separating matter of fact from matter altogether visionary, the historian cannot avoid dealing with this most perplexing episode in the annals of modern times. And while the historian is thus compelled to insert among the records of well-authenticated transactions a story scarcely less fabulous than that of the Trojan war, philosophers exhaust their ingenuity to fathom the depth, and poets weary the wing of their fancy to rise to the height, of that most enigmatic and most poetic of subjects—Joan of Arc.

Setting aside all the curious details with which her story is rife, and all the embellishments which it has at different times received, taking merely the broad outline of the facts, as they stand forth undeniably in the general history of the times, the tale is marvellous enough. A simple country lass, obscure and unlettered, not out of her teens, suddenly appears on the stage of the world; by her appearance she changes the whole tide of events; victorious armies are put to the rout, the fallen fortunes of a fugitive king are repaired, and the royal diadem is set on his brow; in the midst of her career she falls into the hands of her enemies, and is subjected to a legal procedure of the most appalling as well as perplexing nature; she is placed before the tribunal of the Inquisition, where she defies the power, and baffles the wiles of her judges; and a conviction being at last procured by the most disgraceful perversion of justice, she dies with the fortitude of a martyr. But even here her power does not end; long after her death the proceedings taken against her are subjected to a searching revision, and the result is, that the infallible Church of Rome solemnly recants a sentence solemnly pronounced, and that in a case involving questions of faith, by the dread tribunal to which she has committed the guardianship of her orthodoxy.

These are the leading facts about which there can be no dispute; they are of a character sufficiently extraordinary to induce an inquiry into the means by which so powerful an influence was exercised over the world by one whom her sex, her age, her birth, and her education, all alike disqualified, according to the ordinary rules of judgment, for the task she undertook, and for the career which she accomplished. The course of that inquiry, instead of explaining so singular a phenomenon in the history of human affairs, on the contrary tends to increase the mystery, and still further to perplex the mind; till at last it seems as if the whole were a riddle cast forth upon the tide of events on very purpose to teach us that “ There are more things in heaven and earth, Than are dreamt of in our philosophy.”

That the keen edge of this lesson was felt by the vain and shallow philosophers of the encyclopædist school, who pretended to know all and to explain all, is attested, not only by the many untenable and often ridiculous hypotheses¹, which were advanced with a view to account for the extraordinary circumstances connected with the history of the Maid of Orleans; but, above all, by the infamous production by which the corypheus of that school unwittingly bore witness to the close connexion between unbelief and moral corruptness; the standard-bearer of infidelity exhibiting himself, to his own irretrievable disgrace, in the character of a “filthy dreamer” and a “brute beast.”

¹ The most absurd, perhaps, of all the suppositions which have been started in explanation of the mysterious tale of Jeanne d'Arc, is that of Mr. Caze: he sets about gravely to prove that she was an illegitimate daughter of Isabel of Bavaria and Louis of Orleans, who was put in her infancy under the charge of her supposed parents, and had accidentally become acquainted with the secret of her birth.

Against this abomination the purer moral sense and the loftier poetic feeling, both of England and of Germany, revolted. Almost simultaneously, and apparently without any knowledge of each other's performance, appeared Southey's epic, "Joan of Arc," and Schiller's "Maid of Orleans, a romantic tragedy." The former, with all its imperfections, frankly acknowledged by the great laureate himself in the preface to the new edition of it, published, in 1841, in the collection of his poetical works, atones largely for the coarse blows dealt to "the Mission'd Maid" by the misplaced patriotism of the Bard of Avon. The latter, by its great and deserved popularity, contributed in no small degree to the diffusion of nobler and more worthy views on the subject in the public mind, and so helped to realize Schiller's own prophecy, in one of his short lyric poems, of which, as neither of the two English versions which we have seen of it², is sufficiently faithful to convey a correct idea of the original, we shall venture to give a translation of our own:—

Humanity to foul, the scoffer lewd
 Low through the dust thy virgin form did hale;
 Wit against beauty bears eternal feud,
 Spurns God and angel, like a fabled tale:
 Whate'er the heart holds dear, it basely reaves,
 Whate'er or fancy dreams, or faith believes.

But, like thyself, sprung from a childlike race,
 A pious maiden, shepherdly in guise,
 High poesy in her divine embrace,
 Does clasp and bear thee to th' eternal skies;
 With radiant glory she encircles thee:
 The heart's creation must immortal be.

² One of them in Sir Lytton Bulwer's translation of the minor poems of Schiller, which is too "free" to be satisfactory; the other prefixed to the translation of the drama in Burns' Fire-side Library (No. 3), which, to say nothing of its general defectiveness, altogether mistakes the sense of the original in the second stanza, where the lines,

*Reicht dir die Dichtkunst ihre Götterrechte, Poesy holds out to thee her divine right hand,
 Schwingt sich mit dir den ew'gen Sternen zu,
 Wings her flight with thee to the eternal stars,*

are thus rendered,

Soars to the everlasting stars with thee,
 And makes thee partner of her rights divine;

the translator evidently mistaking the sense of the word "Götterrechte," which signifies "thy divine right hand," and in consequence of this quid pro quo reversing the order of the two lines.

To soil whate'er is bright, to drag down low
 Whate'er is lofty, is the world's delight.
 But fear not thou ; there are yet hearts which glow
 With glorious thoughts, and upward wing their flight.
 To gaping crowds let Momus shake his bells ;
 A noble mind on nobler visions dwells.

It was not to be supposed that the most egotistical people in the world, on this side the Atlantic, would long submit to the indignity of allowing foreign literature to monopolize one of the noblest themes of their national history. The more the poems of Southey and Schiller became known in France, the more was Voltaire's Pucelle felt to be a national disgrace, and pen after pen was set to work, to celebrate in strains more worthy of her the pure and heroic maiden. Besides a variety of smaller poems, and several pieces written for the stage, there have been no less than four epic poems produced on the subject since the restoration of the Bourbons ; one by M. Pierre Duménil, one by Mme. de Choiseul, one by Mlle. Bigot, and the fourth by M. Alexandre Soumet, the only one of the four which has in France itself met with considerable success.

But it is not in the field of poetry alone that our French neighbours have exerted themselves to make the amende honorable to the injured memory of their national heroine. As far back as the middle of the last century, Lenglet Dufresnoy had published a history of the Maid of Orleans, abridged from the manuscript compilation of Richer ; which was succeeded by the still more copious work of M. de Laverdy, during the early part of the revolution. The restoration of the Bourbons, and the taste for mediæval and " Catholic " subjects, which it brought in its train, gave a new impulse to this line of study : M. Berriat Saint-Prix endeavoured to bring the adventures of Joan into an accurate chronological arrangement ; and M. Lebrun de Charmettes gave an abstract of her history, with detailed accounts of the proceedings in her cause, taken from the original manuscript documents preserved in the Bibliothèque du Roi. But by far the most important and the most valuable of the recent historical labours on this subject, is the publication of the original documents themselves by M. Quicherat, under the auspices of the Société de l'Histoire de France. The work is to be preceded, in a fourth volume, by a general introduction ; but the three volumes which are before the public, contain the whole of the judicial proceedings instituted for the condemnation of Joan, and afterwards for her réhabilitation, together with some extrajudicial pieces written during her lifetime.

These authentic documents contain ample and most interesting materials for appreciating the real character of the mysterious maiden ; and if they disprove the supposition of her being a delegate of heaven, which M. Lebrun endeavours to support, they furnish equally clear evidence that she was neither herself an impostor, nor the dupe and tool of a crafty policy ; but that, in whatever way the phenomenon may be accounted for, she was herself sincerely persuaded of her divine mission, and of the reality of her visions.

The witnesses examined in the place of her birth unanimously depose to the spotless character of her childhood and youth. She was the daughter of poor, but honest and respectable rustics, and down to the time of her sallying forth for the rescue of France from the English yoke, she had never left her parents. Her occupations were of the same nature as those of other girls in her station : she was employed in spinning and in household work ; sometimes she followed the plough with her father ; and when his turn came to provide for the custody of the cattle of the parish on the common pasture, the task was performed by her. For a short time the inhabitants of Dom Remi were obliged to fly in a body to Neufchateau, when she too went thither in the company of her parents. On their return they found their own village, and the church itself, reduced to ashes ; a circumstance which appears to have made a strong impression on the mind of Joan.

Her education was of the most limited kind ; it extended not beyond the knowledge of the Creed, the Pater-noster, and Ave-Maria, and such legendary lore of saints and angels as an intelligent girl, diligent in her attendance upon all the solemnities of Romish worship, could not fail to acquire. Her fervent piety was the only remarkable feature in her character ; she was frequent and regular at confession and at the Holy Communion, heard mass on all the festivals, and when the bell for prayer sounded, she would either repair to the church, or else say her prayers standing, with her knees bent, in the place where she was. On Sundays it was her custom, moreover, to make a short pilgrimage to a chapel dedicated to "the Blessed Lady of Ber-mont," at a short distance from Dom Remi. She was liberal after her power in offerings to the Church, and in almsgiving, and took pleasure in solacing her sick neighbours.

Two points respecting the early life of Joan, which are generally introduced into the histories and poems, and which were much insisted on by her judges also, among the counts of the indictment, are wholly disposed of by the witnesses of Dom Remi, and by Joan's own answers on her trial; viz. the allegation that she had for some time served the unfeminine office of ostler at an inn, and the legend about the haunted oak. The former was intended on her trial to support the general charge of looseness of conduct; and among a certain class of her biographers, the circumstance helps to explain the interest which she took in the political events of the day, by the various tales of wayfaring and warfaring men, with which in that situation she is supposed to have become familiar. It turns out, however, on inquiry, that the whole is a perversion of the simple fact, that during the flight of the people of Dom Remi to Neufchateau, she lent a helping hand, in the general confusion, to the mistress of the house in which, with her parents, she had taken refuge for a few days.

As for the haunted oak, it appears that there was indeed a fine old beech-tree not far from her native village, under which the old gossips would have it that the fairies used to hold their nightly revels in days of yore. But in the days of Joan's childhood it was chiefly noted as the favourite resort of the promenaders of all ranks and ages; and on certain village holidays in spring and autumn, and especially on the Sunday called Des Fontaines, or the Sunday Lætare Jerusalem, i. e. the fourth Sunday in Lent, it was the custom for the maidens of the village to repair to the old beech, which they decorated with wreaths of flowers, danced and sang around it, and afterwards feasted under its shade upon cakes baked for the occasion, and drank of a brook which ran close by it. Whatever connexion this custom might have had originally with superstitious notions about the fairies, it is clear that it had long ceased to be regarded in any other light than that of innocent mirth; for, as one of the witnesses gravely deposes, "although it was anciently reported that the fairies met there, yet he had never seen any of them, nor had he ever heard in his own lifetime of their meeting under that tree." In this amusement it appears that Joan had usually taken part, in her younger years, with the other girls of the village; and this circumstance was on her trial tortured into an evidence of her dealing with "familiar spirits." In two respects this part of her examination is curious and interesting; first, because it affords a striking illustration of the unfair nature of the proceedings against her; and, secondly, because her answers prove how clearly she distinguished in her own mind between fairy superstitions, which she utterly repudiated, and the heavenly visitations of which she believed herself to be the favoured object. Notwithstanding that she disclaimed all knowledge of, or belief in the fairies or their power, and gave repeatedly the fullest explanation of the merry doings under the beech-tree, in which, moreover, she herself had never taken any part after she had come to years of discretion, the matter is thus articulated against her:—

“V. ITEM, near the said village of Dom Remi there is a certain great, large, and ancient tree, commonly called l'arbre charmine faée de Bourlemont, and near the said tree there is a certain brook; round which certain evil spirits, called Fata, French, faées, are said to be conversant; with which they who deal in witchcraft are wont to dance at night, going round the said tree and brook.

“VI. ITEM, the said Joan was in the habit of frequenting the said brook and tree, and that for the most part at night; sometimes in the day, and chiefly at the hours at which divine service is celebrated in church, in order that she might be alone; and she danced and went round the tree and brook aforesaid; and afterwards hung up on the branches of the same tree sundry wreaths of divers plants and flowers, made with her own hands, saying and singing, both before and after, certain songs and spells, with certain invocations, sorceries, and other black arts; all which on the following morning were not to be found there.”—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. pp. 210, 211.

And in the summary of the indictment, which was submitted to various doctors and learned bodies, and among others to the University of Paris, for their opinion thereon, and which formed the basis of the sentence of condemnation, the same charge is introduced in connexion with her visions; an admission having been extorted from her that she might have heard her “voices” sometimes near that tree, as well as elsewhere:

“And that the said saints, Catherine and Margaret, sometimes spoke to her, near a certain brook, by the side of a large tree, commonly called l'arbre des fées; of which brook and tree it is commonly reported that the fairies (Fatales Dominæ) resort thither, and that sundry persons afflicted with fever repair to the said brook and tree, in order to recover their health, although they be situated in a profane spot. Which fairies she then and elsewhere repeatedly venerated, and did them reverence.”—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. p. 328.

Whereupon “the sacred faculty of theology in the University of Paris” came to the following wise conclusion:—

“That the said revelations [of St. Catherine and St. Margaret] are either feigned, seducing, and pernicious lies, or else the aforesaid apparitions and revelations are superstitious, proceeding from the malignant and diabolical spirits, Belial, Satan, and Behemmoth.”—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. p. 414.

For our own part, we greatly prefer, touching this matter of the fairies, the conclusions of Joan herself, who, in answer to the numberless interrogatories addressed to her on the subject, could never be got further than to say, that "she never saw them," that "she did not believe in them," or else, that "they must be sorceries."

The next interesting point in the history, is Joan's departure from her home, to come to the rescue of the Dauphin, at the bidding, as she herself uniformly maintained, of her "voices." Of this, the deposition of her uncle Durand Laxart gives the following account:—

"That he himself went to fetch her from her father's house, and brought her to his own home; and she told witness, that she wanted to go to France to the Dauphin, to cause him to be crowned, saying, 'Was it not said of old, that France should be laid waste by a woman, and afterwards restored by a virgin?' And with this she told witness to go to Robert de Baudricour, to tell him that he should have her conducted to the place where M. le Dauphin was. And the said Robert several times told the witness to take her back to her father's house, and to box her ears; and when the Maid saw that he, Robert, would not cause her to be conducted to the place where the Dauphin was, she took his, witness's, clothes, and said she wanted to depart; and when she departed, witness brought her to Vaucouleurs³; and after she had got there, she was taken with a safe-conduct to Lord Charles, Duke of Lorraine; and when the duke saw her, he spoke to her, and the said Lord Charles gave her four francs, which she, Joan, showed to witness; and then when she, Joan, had returned to Vaucouleurs, the inhabitants of the town of Vaucouleurs bought her man's clothes, boots, greaves, and other necessities; and he, witness, and James Alain of Vaucouleurs, bought her a horse for twelve francs, which they made their own debt; however, afterwards, Lord Robert of Baudricour caused it to be paid. And this being done, John of Metis, Bertrand of Poulengey, Colet of Vienne, and Richard the archer, with two servitors of the said John of Metz and of Bertrand, brought the said Joan to the place where the said Dauphin was. And, as the said witness has now deposed, so did he formerly state all these things to the king; nor does he know aught else, except that he saw her at Rheims, at the king's coronation."—Procès de Réhabilitation, t. ii. pp. 444, 445.

The John of Metis, or Metz, here mentioned, was John de Novelonpont, whose deposition supplies several particulars which throw light on the state of mind in which Joan was at the outset of her expedition; among others, the reply which she made to the inquiries of her host at Vaucouleurs, respecting the object of her journey :

“ I am come here to this royal place, to speak to Robert de Baudricour, that he should conduct me, or have me conducted, to the king ; but he does not care for me or my words. Nevertheless, before the middle of Lent I must to the king, if I should walk my legs off up to the knee-joints. For no one in the world, neither kings, nor dukes, nor the king of Scotland's daughter, nor any others, can recover the kingdom of France ; nor is there any help for it, except from me ; although I would rather spin by the side of my poor mother ; for this is not my proper state ; but I must go and do this, because my Lord wills that I should do so.”—Procès de Réhabilitation, t. ii. p. 436.

During their progress to Chinon, which, on account of the difficulty of passing through a country occupied by the English and the Burgundians, took eleven days, John of Metz says that he asked her whether she thought she should accomplish what she professed. Her answer was, that “ They need not be afraid ; that she had commandment so to do, because her brethren from Paradise told her what she was to do ; and that for four or five years past her brethren from Paradise, and her Lord, that is God, had told her that she must go to war for the recovery of the kingdom of France.”—Ibid. pp. 437, 438.

Where the evidence of John de Novelonpont stops, the thread of the history is taken up by the depositions of several witnesses who were present when she arrived at Chinon. Among them is Simon Charles, president of the chambre des comptes, whose account of the reception she met with at the hands of the Dauphin is as follows :—

“ This deponent knows that when the said Joan arrived at the town of Chinon, it was debated in council whether the king should give her audience or not. And first they questioned her what she came for, and what she wanted. Although she would say nothing unless she spoke to the king, yet she was compelled by the king's command to state the object of her mission, and she said that she had two things in command from the King of heaven ; namely, first, that she should raise the siege of Orléans ; and secondly, that she should lead the king to Rheims to be crowned and anointed. Whereupon some of the king's councillors said, that the king ought not to give any credence to the said Joan ; and others, that since she professed to be sent by God, and that she had certain matters to speak to the king, the king ought at least to give her audience. However, the king directed that she should first be examined by clerks and ecclesiastics, which was done accordingly. And at last, though with difficulty, it was settled that the king should give her an audience. And when she was coming into the castle of Chinon to be brought into the king's presence, the king still, by the advice of the chief men of his court, hesitated to have an interview with her, until it was reported to the king, that Robert de Baudricour had written to him, that he had sent to him a certain woman, and that she had been led thither through the country of the king's enemies, and had almost miraculously forded many rivers in order to be brought to the king. And upon this the king was moved to hear her, and accordingly an audience was granted to the said Joan. And when the king knew she was coming, he stood aside from the others; nevertheless, Joan knew him well, and did him reverence; and for a long space she spoke with the king. And having heard her, the king seemed to be glad. And then the king, still unwilling to do any thing, unless he had advice from ecclesiastics, sent the said Joan again to the town of Poitiers, there to be examined by the clerks of the University of Poitiers; and after the king knew she had been so examined, and when it was reported to him that nothing but good was found in her, the king caused armour to be made for her, and gave her troops, and took order in the matter of the war."—Procès de Réhabilitation, t. iii. pp. 115, 116.

This unvarnished tale of President Simon Charles does away with two of the extraordinary circumstances generally introduced into the history of Joan; viz. her alleged miraculous recognition of the king, and the revelation of some matter which could only be known to the king himself, by which she is said to have proved to the king the reality of her divine mission. As regards the former, it appears clearly from the deposition of President Charles, that so far from concealing himself among his courtiers, and getting one of them to personate him, which is the common version of the story, on the contrary, Charles was, on her entrance into the room, standing apart from the rest; in a position, therefore, in which it was most natural that Joan should direct her steps to him, almost instinctively; nor is it in the least surprising that afterwards she herself should, as it appears from her answers on her trial she did, attribute her fortunate identification of the king to the guidance of her "voices." As regards the story about some secret said to have been revealed to the king by Joan, the statement of President Charles is altogether inconsistent with it. If Joan had given to the king such positive and irrefragable evidence of her divine mission, as the revelation of a secret of which his own heart and the Omniscient alone were cognizant, there could have been no occasion for her being remanded to the ecclesiastics of the University of Poitiers for further examination. And even supposing that after such conclusive evidence of her being the delegate of heaven, the king had still desired to fortify himself by the advice of the Church, at all events the fact of such a revelation made to him must have been one of the points, or rather the principal point, referred to the theologians of Poitiers. But of this there is no trace whatever; on the contrary, the qualified terms in which the University expressed its opinion leads to the conclusion, that Joan had nothing but her enthusiasm, and her own account of her visions, to produce in attestation of the divine commission to which she laid claim. The most competent witness, touching the examinations which Joan underwent upon that occasion, is Séguin, the dean of the faculty of theology in the University of Poitiers, who deposes to the following effect:—

“ They put to the said Joan sundry questions, and among other questions, Master John Lombart asked her wherefore she had come, and that the king desired to know what had moved her to come to the king; and she replied in a lofty manner, that while she was keeping cattle, a certain voice appeared to her, which told her that God had great pity on the people of France, and that she, Joan, must go to France. Who, on hearing this, began to weep; and then the voice told her she must go to Vaucouleurs, where she should find a certain captain, who would bring her safely into France, and to the king; and that she must not be of a doubtful mind; and that she did so, and had come to the king without any impediment. And Master William Aymeri asked her, ‘Thou hast said, that the voice told thee, that God wishes to deliver the people of France from their present calamity. If God will deliver them, it is not necessary to have armed men.’ To which the said Joan replied: ‘En nom Dieu, the men of arms will fight, and God will give them victory.’ With which answer the said Master William was [as well he might be] content.

“ And he, deponent, asked her in what language the voice spoke to her; to which she answered, that it spoke better than he, deponent (who was speaking in the Limousin dialect). And again he asked her, whether she believed in God; to which again she answered, yes, better than he, deponent. And then deponent told the said Joan, that it was not God’s will that she should be believed, unless some other reason should appear why credence should be given her; and that they should not advise the king that upon her bare assertions armed troops should be given to her and placed in jeopardy, unless she had something else to allege. To which she answered, ‘En nom Dieu, I am not come to Poitiers to work signs; but lead me to Orléans, and I will show you the signs for which I am sent,’ and that troops should be given to her, in such number as should seem good to themselves, and that then she would go to Orléans. And then she told to deponent and to the other persons present four things which were yet to come, and which afterwards happened. First, she said that the English would be destroyed, and that the siege of Orléans would be raised, and the town of Orléans be delivered from the English; but she would first summon them.

Secondly, that the king would be anointed at Rheims. Thirdly, that the town of Paris would be brought back to the king's obedience; and, that the Duke of Orléans would return from England. All which things he, deponent, has seen accomplished. And all these things they reported to the council of the king; and they were of opinion that, considering the imminent distress and danger in which the town of Orléans was, the king might avail himself of her services, and send her to Orléans."—Procès de Réhabilitation, t. iii. pp. 204, 205.

If we deduct from this evidence the matters which transpired afterwards, viz. the alleged fulfilment of the four predictions, it evidently appears that the faculty of Poitiers, though forced at last to rest content with Joan's bare assertion in evidence of her divine mission, because she frankly acknowledged she had no other evidence to adduce, was by no means satisfied on the subject; and the same is apparent from the evidence of Francis Garivel, one of the king's councillors, who, after enumerating the members of the commission appointed for the examination of Joan at Poitiers, says:

"They examined the said Joan sundry times, and repeatedly for the space of about three weeks, visiting her and weighing all she did and said; but finally, considering her condition and her answers, they said that the Maid was a simple girl, who, being questioned by them, persisted in this answer, viz. that she was sent by the God of heaven for the benefit of the noble Dauphin, to restore him to his kingdom, to raise the siege of Orléans, and to lead him to Rheims to be anointed; but that she must first summon the English, and write to them that they should depart, forasmuch as this was the will of heaven. . . .

"Further, that the said Joan was told by the said clerks, that she ought to show some sign, by which it might be believed that she was sent from God; but that she answered them, that the sign given her by God was, that she should raise the siege of Orléans, and that she did not doubt that this would come to pass, if the king would give her ever so small a company of armed men. . . .

"At last, after a long consideration held by clerks of the different faculties for a long time, deponent says, that they all determined and concluded, that the king might lawfully receive her, and that she might lead a company of armed men before Orléans, because they found nothing in her, except what was catholic, and quite agreeable with reason."—Procès de Réhabilitation, t. iii. pp. 20, 21.

The inference to which these depositions lead, that in advising the king to avail himself of Joan's services, the University was influenced by the consideration of the present necessities of Charles, rather than by any certain conclusions at which her examiners had arrived as to the validity of her claim to be regarded as an inspired messenger of God, is abundantly confirmed by the document itself, in which the opinions of the examiners were summed up, and which M. Quicherat gives in the Appendix to the third volume of his work. It runs as follows:—

“THIS IS THE OPINION OF THE DOCTORS, OF WHOM THE KING HAS INQUIRED, TOUCHING THE FACT OF THE MAID SENT FROM GOD.

“The king, considering the distress of himself and of his kingdom, and considering the constant prayers to God of his poor people, and of all others who love peace and justice, ought not to repel nor to reject the Maid who asserts herself to be sent from God to bring him help, notwithstanding that her promises are mere human works; neither on the other hand ought he to believe in her hastily and lightly; but following holy Scripture, he ought to prove her in two ways: that is to say, by human prudence, making inquiry of her life, her character, and her purpose; as saith St. Paul the Apostle: ‘Try the spirits, whether they be of God⁴’; and by devout prayer, asking a sign of some divine work or promise, by which it may be possible to decide that she is come from the will of God. Thus God commanded Ahaz to ask a sign, when God promised him victory, saying unto him: ‘Ask thee a sign of the Lord;’ and even so did Gideon, who asked a sign, and several others, &c.

“The king, since the arrival of the said Maid, has observed and put in practice the two methods before named; that is to say, trial by human prudence, and by prayer, asking a sign of God. As for the former, i. e. by human prudence, he has caused the said Maid to be tried concerning her life, her birth, her character, her purpose, and has caused her to be kept near him, for full the space of six weeks, in order to show her to all people, whether clerks, ecclesiastics, devout people, men of arms, wives, widows, and others. And publicly and privately she has conversed with all people; but no evil is found in her, nor aught but good, humility, virginity, devotion, honesty, simpleness; and of her birth and her life several marvellous things are alleged to be true. As for the second mode of trial, the king asked a sign of her, to which she answers, that before the town of Orléans she will show it, and not by aught in any other place, for so it is commanded her by God.

“The king, considering the trial made of the said Maid, as far as is possible for him, and that no evil is found in her, and considering her answer, which is to show a divine token before Orléans; considering her constancy and perseverance in her speech, and her pressing entreaties to go to Orléans, in order to show there the sign of divine succour, ought not to hinder her from going to Orléans with his men of arms, but ought to have her honourably conducted thither, hoping in God. For to doubt or dismiss her, without appearance of evil, would be to strive against the Holy Ghost, and to render himself unworthy of the aid of God, as said Gamaliel in a council of the Jews in regard to the Apostles." — Opinions et Mémoires extrajudiciaires, t. iii. pp. 391, 392.

Nothing can be clearer or more conclusive as to the light in which Joan was regarded both by the king and by the University of Poitiers. The evidence of her divine mission was insufficient; there was nothing but her own bare assertion; a sign in attestation had been asked, and Joan had not only not shown one, but had declared,—and that on the ground of an alleged command from God,—that no other sign was to be given until she came to Orleans. Her assertion was admitted so far, as to cause the experiment of sending her to Orleans, agreeably to her wish, to be made; not, however, on the ground of her being acknowledged as God's messenger, but on these two grounds: first, that no evil was found in her, or, as one of the witnesses expresses it, nothing contrary to the Catholic faith and to common sense; and, secondly, that in the desperate condition in which Charles' affairs then were, her services were not to be refused without giving her the trial she asked for.

That a marvellous tale about some secret revealed to the king by Joan, got abroad soon after, is indeed evident, and appears in the depositions of several of the witnesses; but the evidence of the only competent witness, if such a fact had actually existed, that of the king himself, is wanting. All the rest is mere hearsay evidence, and is the less to be relied upon, as it is given by persons who not only were impressed with a belief in the reality of the divine mission of Joan, and predisposed to give credence to any miraculous story respecting her, but who felt an interest—and that an interest of the very strongest kind—in establishing her character as a divine messenger; the only alternative which presented itself to their minds, for the reversal of the sentence which had branded her as a heretic and a witch. Such evidence as this cannot for a moment come into competition with the depositions respecting the examination of Joan at Poitiers, and with the official document, in which the opinion of the University was delivered to the king; from which it clearly appears, that not only the king had not had any sign,—such as the revelation of a secret known only to God and to his own heart,—but that desiring a sign, he had been disappointed of it; that, in fact, Joan herself declared, and for several weeks continued to declare, that she had, by God's command, no other sign to show, in attestation of her divine mission, but the success which she expected to have at Orleans.

For that success, and the other military successes which followed, it is not difficult to account; nor does the fact, that Joan announced them beforehand, give her the least claim to the character of a prophetess. The anticipation of these successes was part and parcel of the enthusiastic loyalty for her king, and zeal for the cause of the Armagnac party, which prompted her whole enterprise; and the successes themselves were the natural consequence of the enthusiasm which she felt, and with which the popular belief in her divine mission inspired the king's troops, while the Burgundian and English troops were panic-struck by her extraordinary appearance on the scene of action. Nor must the military tact and good generalship be lost sight of, which Joan appears to have possessed in a striking degree, and of which the depositions of the military leaders make repeated mention, even as the witnesses who depose to the circumstances of her trial, speak of the extraordinary quickness and discretion with which she replied to the perplexing questions addressed to her by her iniquitous judges; the concurrent testimony of both proving, that, independently of her religious exaltation, Joan was a woman of strong mind and great natural ability.

Upon these grounds it is demonstrable, that not only up to the time of her starting from Chinon, on her career of victory, but further on to the time of her capture, her case presents nothing whatever that renders it necessary to suppose the intervention of a supernatural agency. On the contrary, there is a strong presumption against such a supposition: for, after a solemn examination of her case, it was distinctly declared that it was deficient in those attestations by which a miraculous interposition of God is generally, not to say invariably, accompanied; Joan herself admitting her inability to adduce such attestations as were required of her; and that which was afterwards taken as a proof of her divine mission,—viz. the success which attended her,—was so obviously the result of the effects which her own enthusiastic belief in her divine mission produced upon both armies, that it is of no weight whatever, as an evidence of the reality of her alleged mission.

So far, then, the question whether she was, as she professed to be, an inspired messenger of heaven, or else, which is the only other alternative in the supposition of supernatural agency, an emissary of hell, is decidedly an open question; the ultimate solution of which depends upon the circumstances which transpired subsequently to her capture. Against the last-named alternative it is scarcely necessary to argue; as for various other reasons, so especially because of the unaffected piety evinced by Joan throughout her career and during her trials, and of the constancy of faith exhibited by her in suffering a death, which, if it is not entitled to be accounted as martyrdom, is the nearest conceivable approach to it. It is impossible to watch the tone which her mind maintained all through the oppressive and captious proceedings to which she was subjected, and to peruse the abundant testimony borne by many witnesses to her edifying conduct under the agony of her last sufferings, without arriving at the conclusion that she was, however mistaken and self-deceived she might be in some respects, at heart a sincere Christian.

This being a settled point, the only question that remains to be considered is, what reasons there may be for admitting, or else rejecting, the idea that she was the delegate of heaven. The reasons which, in our opinion, render that idea inadmissible, are chiefly of two kinds.

In the first place, her accounts of the supernatural visitations of which she believed herself the object, are so completely cast in the mould of Romish superstition, that the belief in the reality of her visions involves the admission of the whole system of Mariolatry and Hagiolatry of the Romish Church. Without entering into the speculative question, as to the credibility of a visible intervention of angels and departed saints in the affairs of this world, during the progress of the present dispensation, it is quite certain that according to one of the canons for the trial of pretensions to a divine mission, laid down in Holy Scripture¹, even the fulfilment of any prediction, or other miraculous sign, is not to be received as evidence of a divine mission, if the person professing to be an inspired messenger be chargeable with idolatrous doctrines or practices. Forasmuch, then, as the intercession and protection of other mediators, than the "one Mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus," is the fundamental idea upon which the whole fabric of the alleged visions of Joan is built, we hold, that whatever other explanation may be given of those visions, and whatever allowances made for Joan's education in the superstitions of Rome, in estimating her personal character, the idea of her being in reality the bearer of a divine commission, must, upon this ground alone, be altogether repudiated.

The other reason for which such a notion is untenable, is the failure of her predictions, and the disappointment of her expectations in a variety of instances. At the very outset of her career she expected, from what her "voices" told her, a very different reception at the hands of Robert de Baudricour, than the sedative of boxing her ears, which the said knight somewhat ungallantly recommended her uncle to administer to her. Still more contrary to her expectations was the delay to which she had to submit at Chinon, before the king consented to give her audience, and afterwards when he remanded her before the University of Poitiers. The disappointment which she felt, and the impatience which she exhibited under it, are altogether at variance with the foreknowledge which she professed to have of the course to be pursued by her. Of her capture before Compiègne she said she had warning, though she knew not the day nor the hour; and her leap from the tower of Beaurevoir she stated afterwards to have been an act of disobedience to her "voices." But although she adopted that conclusion while labouring under the ill effects of her fall, it is evident from her own statement that the object of her leap was not, as her judges endeavoured to make it out, to commit suicide, but that she hoped thereby to effect her own escape, and afterwards to rescue Compiègne from the English. She cast herself down, "recommending herself to God and the Virgin," in the confident expectation that the supernatural protection of which she had no doubt that she was the object, would carry her safely through it.

¹ "If there arise among you a prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder, and the sign or the wonder come to pass, whereof he spake unto thee, saying, Let us go after other gods which thou hast not known, and let us serve them; thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams: for the Lord your God proveth you, to know whether you love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul."—Deut. xiii. 1—3.

The most signal failure, however, of her prophetic anticipations, connected with her own personal history, is the fact of her condemnation and death. For this she was evidently quite unprepared; on the contrary, she asserted repeatedly during the course of her trial, that she knew from her "voices" that she would be liberated. In her sixth examination, on the 3rd of March, being asked whether her "voices" had made any communication to her as to her escape from prison, she at first evaded the question, but afterwards said :

"Yes, verily; they told me that I should be delivered, but I know not the day nor the hour; and that I should boldly put on a cheerful countenance."—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. p. 94.

Again, on the 14th of March, being asked respecting certain menaces which she had uttered against the Bishop of Beauvais, telling him that he was incurring great danger by the proceedings he took against her, she replied, that

"St. Catherine told her she should have help; but she does not know whether it will be by her being liberated from prison, or by some disturbance arising when she shall be brought forth to judgment, by means of which she may be delivered. And she reckons that it must be the one or the other."—ibid. p. 155.

And three days after, when it was intimated to her what fate she was likely to meet with, if she persisted in her refusal to recant and submit herself to the Church, she answered—

“She would rather die than recant what she did at God’s bidding ; and she believes firmly that God will not suffer it to come to pass that she should be brought so low, but that she shall speedily have help from God, and that by miracle.”—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. p. 176.

It is not, however, in matters connected with her own person only, that her prophetic character is at fault ; there are two of the facts which, according to the deposition of Dean Séguin (see above, pp. 237, 238), she predicted as early as her examination at Poitiers, which cannot be considered as having been fulfilled in the manner in which she predicted them ; viz. the liberation of the Duke of Orleans, then a prisoner in England, and the evacuation of France by the English. As regards the former, he was liberated, it is true, not quite ten years after her death ; but only on the payment of a large ransom ; whereas the prediction of Joan pointed to a deliverance by the victorious power of the French arms under her command. The style of deliverance which she contemplated, appears clearly in her examination on the 12th of March :—

“Being asked how she would have delivered the Duke of Orleans, she answered, that she would have taken a sufficient number of English prisoners on this side the sea to get him back ; and if she had not taken a sufficient number on this side, she would have crossed the sea, to go into England and bring him away with power.

“Being asked whether St. Catherine and St. Margaret had told her absolutely and unconditionally, that she should either take sufficient prisoners to get back the Duke of Orleans, then in England, or else cross the sea, to go and bring him away, she answered, yes, and that she told the king so, and that he should let her treat about the English lords who were then prisoners. She says further, that if she had continued for three years without hindrance, she would herself have delivered the said duke. Also she says, that the time appointed for doing this was less than three years and more than one ; but of this she has no recollection.”—Ibid. t. i. pp. 133, 134.

If we compare with this the actual facts of the case as they fell out, it is impossible to agree with the opinion of Séguin and others, who consider the fulfilment of her prediction respecting the liberation of the Duke of Orleans, as one of the evidences of her divine mission. Still less will her predictions touching the evacuation of France by the English bear investigation. On this subject, also, she prophesied, as has been seen, during her examination at Poitiers ; and though we have no record of the particulars of that prediction, further than that she predicted the destruction of the English, the expectations which she entertained, may be gathered distinctly enough from the letter of summons and defiance which she addressed to the King of England and the Duke of Bedford, and of which M. Quicherat's collection contains a fuller and more authentic copy than that which is generally contained in the histories. It is to the following effect :—

“ + Jhesus Maria. +

“ King of England, and you, Duke of Bedford, who call yourself the regent of the kingdom of France ; you, William de la Poule, count of Sulford ; John Lord of Talebot ; and you, Thomas Lord of Escales, who call yourselves lieutenants of the said Duke of Bedford, render account to the King of heaven. Surrender to the Maid⁶, who is sent hither from God, the King of heaven, the keys of all the good towns which ye have taken and violated in France. She is come hither from God to reclaim the blood royal. She is all ready to make peace, if you will render her an account, on these terms, that you renounce France and pay for your holding of it. And as for you, archers, companions of war, nobles, and others, who are before the town of Orléans, go away to your own country, by God's command ; and if you do not do so, expect news from the Maid, who will soon come to visit you to your very great hurt. King of England, if you do not do so, I am chief of the war⁶, and in whatever place I shall overtake your people in France, I shall make them go away, whether they will or no ; and if they will not obey, I shall cause them all to be slain. I am sent hither from God, the King of heaven, body for body⁶, to drive you out of all France. And if they will obey, I shall show them mercy. And do not hold by your opinion, for you shall not obtain the kingdom of France from God, the King of heaven, Son of St. Mary ; but King Charles, the true heir, shall obtain it ; for God, the King of heaven, wills it, and it is revealed to him by the Maid ; who shall enter into Paris with goodly company. If ye will not believe the news from God and the Maid, in whatever place we find you, we shall break into it, and raise such a mighty halloo, that for a thousand years past the like has not been heard in France, if you do not render an account. And believe firmly, that the King of heaven will send more strength to the Maid, than you will be able to bring against her, at every onset, against her and against her good men of arms; and by the blows it will be seen who shall have the better right from the King of heaven. You, Duke of Bedford, the Maid prays and requires you, that you cause not yourself to be destroyed. If you render her an account, you may even yet come into her company, when the French will do the fairest deed that ever was done for Christianity. And make answer if you will make peace in the city of Orléans; and if you do not do so, of your very great hurt be you briefly reminded. Written this Tuesday in Holy Week."—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. pp. 240, 241.

Not only did Joan in her examination acknowledge this letter as her own, disclaiming the suggestion of its having been dictated by some of the French lords, and maintaining that it was, with the exceptions noted, indited by her; but she further explained the sense in which she understood its contents; for she added,

"Before seven years the English shall lose a greater stake than they did before Orléans, and they shall lose all in France. She also says, that the aforesaid English shall suffer a greater loss than they ever suffered in France; and that will be by a great victory which God shall send to the French. Being asked how she knows this, she answered: 'I know this well by the revelation which was given to me; and that it will happen before seven years; and I should be very wroth if it should be delayed so long.' She also said that she knew this by revelation, just as well as she knew that we were there before her. Being asked when this should happen, she answered, she did not know the day, nor the hour. Being asked in what year it should happen, she answered: 'You shall not have it yet; but I should like it very much to happen before the feast of St. John.' Being asked whether she had said that this should happen before the feast of St. Martin, in the winter, she answered, that she had said, that before the feast of St. Martin, in the winter, many things would be seen; and that it was possible there might be Englishmen who should be laid low on the ground. Being asked what she said to John Gris, her guard, concerning the said feast of St. Martin, she answered: 'I have told you.' Being asked from whence she knew that this would come to pass, she answered, she knew it from St. Catherine and St. Margaret."—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. pp. 84, 85.

That the events of history do not correspond with these anticipations, it is needless to observe: five years elapsed before Charles recovered possession of Paris, thirteen years before even a truce was agreed to; after a few years hostilities were resumed, and it was not till twenty years after the death of Joan that a peace was concluded, which still left the English masters of Calais, and they maintained their footing there for more than a century after. But not only do the events themselves not correspond with the predictions of Joan, but from the manner in which she expressed them, it is moreover evident that she expected to bear a principal part in all the achievements to which she so confidently looked forward.

It is, no doubt, to these inconsistencies between her prophetic announcements, and the course which events afterwards took, that we must attribute the fact that the Roman Church carried her case no further than the reversal of the sentence pronounced against her. It was felt, that however unjustly she might have been dealt with⁷, there was something unsatisfactory in the abrupt termination of a career commenced with such high promise, and in the evident failure of some of her predictions; otherwise her death must have secured her a place among the martyrs, if her life did not entitle her to a place among the saints, of the Roman calendar. Of either she was certainly far more worthy than John Guignard, or Henry Garnett; nor was there in her visions any thing to render them suspicious to Romish theologians; their whole character being infinitely superior every way to the ridiculous and profane legends with which the acts of canonization usually abound.

On the whole, then, the result of the documents now published, tends to strengthen the conclusion arrived at before by the best informed among those who have investigated her marvellous story, that the idea of a supernatural agency, and of a real commission from heaven, supported by extraordinary visions, is altogether inadmissible; and that, as the notion of imposture is equally untenable, there remains no other explanation to be given of the whole phenomenon but this, that her visions were the effect of the excitement produced in her mind by the extraordinary character of the times in which her lot was cast, and probably by some of the prophecies then current respecting the liberation of France by a maid; one of which, as we have already seen, she referred to at the outset of her career. There is one very curious circumstance, and which, it must be admitted, carries with it a certain degree of suspicion as to the perfect good faith of Joan; and that is, her frequent refusal to reply to questions which related either to the Dauphin or to her apparitions. Possibly this may be accounted for by the great veneration which she felt for the latter, and by her devoted loyalty to her rightful sovereign, touching whose affairs she might not feel herself at liberty to make any statements to his declared enemies. The following extract will give our readers an idea of the manner in which she kept her judges at bay by a reference to her "voices :"—

"She said that last night she heard a voice telling her to answer boldly. Being asked whether the voice prohibited her from stating all that was asked of her, she said: 'I shall not answer you on this point. And I have revelations touching the king, which I shall not tell you.' Being asked if the voice had prohibited her from telling these revelations, she answered: 'I have no instruction about it. Give me a fortnight, and I will answer you on this point.' And having asked a further delay, she said: 'If the voice prohibits me, what will you say to that?' Being again asked if it was forbidden her, she answered: 'You may believe that men have not forbidden it me.' She also said, that she would not answer the question that day, and that she did not know whether she should answer it or not, till it should be revealed to her. She also said, she firmly believed—as firmly as she believed the Christian faith, and that God has redeemed us from the pains of hell—that that voice comes from God, and by his appointment. Being asked whether that voice, which she said appeared to her, was an angel, or whether it came immediately from God, or whether it was the voice of any saint, male or female, she answered: 'That voice comes from God; and I believe that I am not telling you quite all I know; and I am more afraid of doing wrong by saying any thing that may be displeasing to these voices, than I am about answering you.'"
—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. p. 63.

Whatever might be the impression left on the mind by the former part of this examination, the latter part strongly tends to re-establish one's confidence in the sincerity of her belief; the more so as she repeatedly expressed the conviction which she felt, that she was acting under the immediate command and guidance of God, in the strongest possible terms, yet without the least presumption. We select the following passages by way of example :—

"If you were rightly informed concerning me, you ought to wish that I was out of your hands. I have done nothing but by revelation."
Ibid. p. 51.

"She would rather be torn asunder by horses, than to have come into France without God's permission."—Ibid. p. 74.

"Being asked if she always did and fulfilled what the voices bid her, she answered, that to the best of her ability she fulfilled God's commandment given her by her voices, as far as she understood it. And the voices give her no commandment without the will of God."—Ibid. p. 168.

When the articles of the indictment were read over to her, she observed upon the 15th article, which charged her with obduracy and disobedience to the Church, because she would not obey the directions of her judges in opposition to those of her voices :—

“She would rather die, than recall that which she had done by the commandment of our Lord.”—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. p. 227.

And on the 50th article being read, in which she was accused of frequently and daily invoking evil spirits, to which, as was charged against her, she gave the names of saints and angels, she answered :

“ ‘I have already made answer concerning them,’ and that she would call these voices to her aid so long as she lived. Being asked in what way she asked for them, she answered ; ‘I call upon God and our Lady to send me counsel and comfort, and then they send it me.’ Being asked in what words she asked, she answered, that she asked in this way, in French : ‘Most sweet God, in honour of thy holy passion, I pray Thee, if Thou lovest me, to reveal to me how I am to answer those Church folks. I know well, as to the clothes^a, the commandment, how I came to put them on ; but I know not by what means I shall leave them off. Therefore may it please Thee to teach it me.’ ”—Ibid. t. iii. p. 279.

This firmness of conviction did not forsake her even at the sight of the instruments of torture, which being shown her, she replied :

“Verily, if you should cause me to be torn limb from limb, and cause my soul to depart from my body, I will not tell you any thing else ; and if I should tell you any thing else, I shall ever after say that you drew it from me by force.”—Ibid. p. 400.

This bold declaration saved her from the rack, the majority of the court being averse to the infliction of barbarities so evidently unavailing against a resolution so bold and so constant.

Another point in her examination, which is not quite satisfactory, are certain statements made by her, touching an attendance of angels at her interview with Charles, and the conveyance to him by a messenger from heaven of a crown, richer than any

^a This has reference to the male apparel, which she said she put on by direction of her voices when she went to the war. Being required to resume female apparel, and refused permission to hear mass unless she did so, she was much troubled in conscience how she should act. She was ultimately prevailed on to comply at the time of her recantation ; but immediately after she resumed her male attire, it does not clearly appear for what reason, the evidence being contradictory ; and this fact was the principal allegation against her for procuring her execution as a relapsed heretic.

earthly crown ; statements which are not only at variance with historical fact, but in themselves so strange, that it is difficult to avoid the suspicion of intentional mystification of her judges, in the vague hope that the perplexity and delay occasioned thereby, might in some way or other serve her cause. Her own subsequent explanation, adopted by Theodorus de Læliis, auditor of the Rota, in his opinion on the process, that she spoke these things "in a figure," is hardly satisfactory ; nor will it account for the whole of the statements in question. Possibly they may in part have arisen from the visions of her excited imagination, and have been made by her in all sincerity ; a supposition which is supported by one of her answers, in which she says, that "angels often come among Christians without being seen, and that she has often seen them among Christians."

At all events it is perfectly clear from the general tenor of her depositions, and especially from the constancy of her affirmations immediately before her death, coupled with the pious resignation and heroic fortitude of that death, that she was herself firmly impressed with the reality of the visions she saw, and the voices she heard. A few passages taken here and there from the different examinations in support of this view of her case, and in illustration of the tone of her mind, and of her general character, is all that our limits will permit us to add on this part of our subject.

As regards her voices, the most remarkable of her statements are the following :—

"When she was thirteen years old, she had a voice from God, to assist her in directing her conduct ; and on the first occasion she was in great fear. The voice came about mid-day in the summer, in her father's garden : she, Joan, had fasted on the day before⁹ ; and she heard the voice on her right hand towards the Church, and she rarely hears it without a brightness. This brightness is on the same side on which the voice is heard ; but on that side there generally is a great brightness. And when she, Joan, came into France, she often heard that voice."—Procès de Condamnation, 2nd sess. t. i. p. 52.

"Being asked whether it was the voice of an angel which spoke to her, or of a saint, male or female, or the voice of God immediately, she answered, that the voice was that of St. Catherine and of St. Margaret. And their figures were crowned with beautiful crowns, very rich and very precious. 'And of this,' she said, 'I have licence from the Lord to tell; but if you doubt about it, you may send to Poitiers where I was questioned formerly.'"—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. p. 71.

⁹ The connexion between her visions and previous fasting appears again ; for instance, in the third session she was asked what was the last time of her taking nourishment. She answered that she had neither eaten nor drank any thing since noon the day before, and added that she had "heard her voices both yesterday and to-day."—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. p. 61.

"Being asked whether she had seen St. Michael and those angels" (whose appearance was before mentioned by her) "bodily and really, she answered: 'I saw them with my bodily eyes, as well as I see you; and when they departed from me, I wept, and wished they had taken me away with them.'"—Ibid. p. 73.

"She said also, that she was wounded in the neck by an arrow, at the storming of the bastille of Pont; but she received great comfort from St. Catherine, and was healed within a fortnight; nor did she on account of her wound cease to ride and to transact business."—Ibid. p. 79.

"She said also, that she would have died, if it were not for the revelation which daily comforts her."—Ibid. p. 88.

"She says that she feels great joy when she sees St. Michael; and she thinks she cannot be in mortal sin, since she sees him. She also says that St. Catherine and St. Margaret gladly hear her confession, occasionally, and in turns."—Ibid. p. 89.

"Being asked whether the angel did not fail her in regard to success, seeing she was taken prisoner, she answered, 'that she believes, since it so pleased God, that it is for the best she should have been taken.' Being asked whether the angel did not fail her in regard to gifts of grace, she answered, 'How should he fail me, since he daily comforts me?' And she understands him to say, that that comfort comes from St. Catherine and St. Margaret. Being asked whether she called those saints, or whether they came to her without being called, she answered, that they often came without being called; and at other times, if they did not come, she would speedily ask God to send them. Being asked whether those saints had ever failed to come when she called for them, she answered, she never wanted them, but she had them."—Ibid. pp. 126, 127.

Occasionally the questions put to her respecting her visions are impertinent to the last degree, especially when it is remembered that they were put by ecclesiastics of a Church, with whose legends the visions of Joan were perfectly consonant. But she generally replied to them with great propriety, and in a manner consistent with her belief in the reality of her visions. A few examples may suffice.

"Being asked how she knows whether what appears to her is a man or a woman, she answered, that she knew and distinguished them by their voices, and that they revealed themselves to her."—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. p. 85.

"Being asked if their hair (of St. Catherine and St. Margaret) was long and flowing, she answered, 'I do not know.' She also says she does not know if they had arms or any other definite members. Also she said that they spoke excellently and beautifully, and she perfectly understood them. Being asked how they spoke, if they had no members, she answered, 'I leave that to God.' She also said the voice was beautiful, sweet, and gentle, and spoke French. Being asked if St. Margaret spoke English, she answered, 'How should she speak English, seeing she does not side with the English?'—Ibid. p. 86.

"Being asked in what form St. Michael appeared to her, she answered, 'she saw no crown on him; and of his garments she knows nothing.' Being asked if he was naked, she answered, 'Do you think that God has not wherewith to clothe him?' Being asked whether he wore hair, she replied, 'Why should it have been cut off?'"—Ibid. 5th sess. p. 89.

"Being asked whether she believes that St. Michael and St. Gabriel have natural heads, she answered, 'I saw them with my own eyes, and I believe that they were those angels themselves, as firmly as I believe that there is a God.'"—Ibid. p. 93.

"Being asked in what part of her person she touched St. Catherine, she answered, 'You will get no more on this head.' Being asked whether she had ever kissed or embraced St. Catherine or St. Margaret, she answered that she had embraced them both. Being asked whether they had a nice smell, she answered, 'It is a good thing to know; they had a nice smell.' Being asked whether in embracing them she felt heat or any thing else, she answered, that she could not embrace them without feeling and touching them. Being asked in what part of their bodies she embraced them, the upper or lower, she answered, that it was more fitting to embrace them in the lower than in the upper part."—Ibid. pp. 185, 186.

While she thus skilfully parried the attempts of her judges to turn her apparitions into ridicule, or to involve her in some absurdity, she showed no less acuteness of mind in the replies which she made to a variety of difficult theological questions proposed to her, with the evident intention of entangling her in some constructive heresy. Some of these are very striking, and manifest great ability and a strong and sincere religious conviction.

"Being asked whether she knew herself to be in a state of grace, she answered: 'If I am not, may God bring me into it; and if I am, may God preserve me in it. There is nothing in the world I should be more sorry for than to know that I was not in a state of grace.' She said, moreover, that if she were in a state of sin, she believes the voices would not come to her."—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. p. 65.

"Being asked whether it was for any merit of her own that God sent his angel to her, she answered, that the angel came for a great purpose; and that she was in hopes her king would have believed that sign, and that men would cease to argue with her; and also that the angel came to give succour to the good people in the town of Orléans, and also for the merits of her king and of the good Duke of Orléans. Being asked why she had this mission more than any other, she answered, that it pleased God to do this through a simple girl, in order to drive back the king's enemies."—Ibid. pp. 144, 145.

"Being asked, if, after her voices told her that she should finally go into Paradise, she holds herself assured that she shall be saved, and that she shall not be damned in hell, she answered that she firmly believes what those voices told her, namely, that she shall be saved, as firmly as if she were in Paradise already.—Being asked, if, after this revelation, she believes it impossible for her to sin mortally, she answered, 'I do not know, but leave it all to God.' And when she was told that this answer was of great weight, she answered, that she also accounts this a great treasure."—Ibid. p. 156.

"Being asked whether she knew that St. Catherine and St. Margaret hate the English, she answered, 'They love what God loves, and hate what God hates.'—Being asked whether God hated the English, she answered, that touching either the love or the hatred which God had towards the English, or how He would deal with them as to their souls, she knows nothing; but this she well knows, that they will be driven out of France, except those who shall remain and die there, and that God will send victory to the French against the English.'—Being asked whether God was for the English, when they had good success in France, she answered, that she did not know whether God hated the French; but she believes that it was his will to let them be punished for their sins, if they were in any."—Ibid. p. 178.

"Being asked whether her banner derived more power from her than she from her banner, or the contrary, she answered, that, as touching the victory of her, Joan, or of her banner, it rested all with God.—Being asked whether the hope of obtaining the victory rested on her banner or on herself, she answered, that it rested on God, and no where else.—Being asked whether, if any other person had carried the same banner, he would have had the same good success as Joan herself, she answered: 'I know not; I leave that to God.'—Being asked if any one of her own party had given her his banner to carry, whether she would have had the same confidence in it as in her own banner, which was appointed her from God; and being specially asked this question, in regard to the banner of her king, she answered: 'I preferred carrying that which was appointed me from God. And yet I leave it all to God.'"—Ibid. pp. 182, 183.

On the ticklish question of submission to the decision of the Church, which was again and again pressed upon her, by argument, as well as by the denial of the Holy Eucharist—a privation which she felt deeply—and by the fear of the horrible punishment which awaited her, she framed her replies with a degree of good sense and good feeling, which, considering her age, her sex, her education, and condition, and the nature of the tribunal before which she was arraigned, is truly astonishing.

"First, she was asked whether she will refer herself to the judgment of the Church on earth, touching all that was said and done by her, whether good or evil ; especially touching the falls, crimes, and transgressions laid to her charge, and touching all that relates to her trial ; she answered, that touching what is so demanded of her, she refers herself to the Church militant, provided it do not prescribe to her any thing impossible. And she states what she considers impossible ; namely, that she should revoke the things which she has said and done, and which she has declared in the said process that she did, by visions and revelations from God ; and these she will not revoke on any account. And that which God has caused her to do, and has commanded her, and hereafter shall command her, she will not cease to do, for any man living ; and it is impossible for her to revoke any of it. And in case the Church should require her to do aught else, contrary to the commandment which she said she had received from God, she would not do it on any account.

“ And being asked, whether, if the Church militant were to tell her that her revelations are delusions, or diabolical devices, she will refer herself to the Church, she answered, that on this point she will always refer herself to God, whose commandment she will always do ; and that she well knows that what is contained in her process came to pass by the commandment of God, and whatever she affirms in the said process that she did by God’s commandment, it would be impossible for her to do the contrary ; and in case the Church should command her to do the contrary, she will refer herself as to this not to any man in the world, but only to God, if she did not always obey his good commandment.—Being asked, whether she believes herself to be subject to the Church of God which is on earth, namely, to our Lord the pope, the cardinals, archbishops, bishops, and other prelates of the Church, she answered : ‘ Yes ; God being first served.’—Being asked whether she had a commandment from her voices not to submit herself to the Church militant on earth, and to its judgment, she answered, that she does not make any answer of her own head, but that whatever answer she makes, is by commandment of her voices, and they do not command her otherwise than to obey the Church, God being first served.”—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. pp. 324—326.

The same firmness of tone she maintained in what the holy office termed the exhortatio caritativa, and in the subsequent public admonition addressed to her as a preliminary to her execution. At the close of the latter she exclaimed :—

“ ‘ I leave it all in the hands of God, my Creator ; Him I love with all my heart ;’ and being asked if she wished to make any further answer to the said general admonition, she replied : ‘ I leave it in the hands of my Judge ; He is the King of heaven and earth.’ ”—Ibid. pp. 385, 386.

For a moment, and only for a moment, at the sight of the fearful preparations for her execution, her fortitude forsook her, and she was prevailed upon to declare that she submitted herself to the judgment of the Church, and to affix her signature to a form of recantation. But the triumph which her enemies thus obtained was of short duration; the strength of her conviction soon returned in the solitude of the prison, and she revoked, with a full knowledge of the terrible death which awaited her, the recantation which had been extorted from her a few days before, on the express ground that her "voices" required it of her.

"Being asked what her voices told her, she answered, that God sent to tell her by St. Catherine and St. Margaret how great a pity it was for her to have consented to such great treason in making an abjuration and revocation to save her life, and that by saving her life she was damning herself. She also said, that before Thursday (the day of recantation) her voices told her what she was going to do that day, and what she then actually did. She says, moreover, that her voices told her when she stood upon the scaffold, before the people, that she should boldly reply to the preacher, whom she called a false preacher, because he said she had done several things which she had not done. She also said, that if she were to say that God had not sent her, she would damn herself; and that, in truth, God had sent her. Also, she said, that her voices told her after Thursday, that she had done a great wickedness, in confessing that she had not done right in what she had done. Also, she said, that whatever she said and recanted on that same Thursday, she did so merely through fear of the fire. Being asked whether she believed that those voices which appeared to her were St. Catherine and St. Margaret, she answered, yes, and that they were from God."—Procès de Condamnation, t. i. pp. 456, 457.

With such fortitude, and with the unaffected piety which, by the unanimous testimony of many eye-witnesses of her execution, she displayed to the very last, the supposition of imposture is wholly incompatible; and as we have shown the hypothesis of divine inspiration to be equally inadmissible, the case was clearly one of high mental and nervous excitement, by which not the imagination only, but the very senses were deluded. And having arrived at this conclusion, we shall, mindful of the adage, "Nesutor ultra crepidam," leave the case in the hands of the physiologists, and proceed to analyze a far less difficult and less mysterious subject, viz. the Trilogie Nationale of M. ALEX. SOUMET.

As its title indicates, it consists of three parts, yclept severally, l'Idylle, ou Jeanne D'Arc Bergère, l'Épopée, ou Jeanne D'Arc Guerrière, and la Tragédie, ou Jeanne D'Arc Martyre. The last-named title would be equally suitable to the whole "Trilogie," at least, if departed heroes and heroines have any sense of the treatment to which they are subjected at the hands of those who undertake to celebrate their deeds. As for the epithet “nationale,” M. Soumet’s performance has a twofold claim to it; first, because it treats of a national subject, and secondly, because it is gorged with that “keen hatred and round abuse” of England and the English, which, with a certain, and we fear a very numerous, school of French literati and politicians, is deemed eminently national. Of this we have a rich specimen at once in the “prologue,” where the “soul of the world” is represented as cut in halves, the British Channel heaving its uneasy tide between the two moieties. Let not our readers suppose that we are playing upon their credulity, for thus runs M. Soumet’s événement :

Ont en deux larges parts scindé l’âme du monde.”*

And then follows a portraiture of the two nations, exhibiting “that to this,” as “Hyperion to a satyr;” and thereupon M. Soumet, with truly national self-complacency, bids us “look upon this picture, and on this, the counterfeit presentment” of the two halves of the world’s soul. We have no hope of being able to render into plain English prose the inflation of M. Soumet’s French rhymes, but we will do our best. France, then, or the half-soul which falls to the share of France,—we are not clear which, but it does not matter,—

“From the cradle raised herself to grasp dominion: the flower of devotion grows in the air she breathes; her lip either pouts in war or is curled in derision; her heart is always warmed by her brilliant sky; under a radiating forehead she always carries a soul open to tears in an amazon bosom.”

We confess ourselves somewhat puzzled by this topography of the inner soul of France. But we proceed:—

“Affixing her crown to every virtue, consoling with her compassion the prostrate nations; or to re-establish them in calmer destinies, offering to their misfortune the alms-gift of her palms; making of her thought, at all times and every where, a solemn round of the ladder of heaven.”

We cannot venture to send forth this last trope without showing cause for the nonsense we have penned:

*“ Faisant de sa pensée, en tout temps, en tout lieu,
Un degré solennel de l’échelle de Dieu,”*

and having done so, we resume:—

“And when doubt spreads its dominion far and wide, finding human certainty again in honour, she is great, and proud, and even in her misfortunes a reflexion of her name suffices to gild the universe. Heroism is always her second nature."

We hope our readers will let us off with this specimen. It is the hardest thing we ever did in the way of "rendering," and we really despair of some three or four score lines of this glorious rhodomontade, in which we learn by the way that France is very much annoyed at the Congress of Vienna for not allowing her to wear the Rhine for a girdle all the way, an annoyance which she expresses by the significant exclamation, "Regardons l'eau couler." Furthermore, we learn that Malebranche is another Plato, and France the sphinx of all the énigmes suprêmes; that the latter keeps, "like all the great prophets," a fiery chariot—not a Brougham, we apprehend, but a Joinville;—that the Celts have thrown a great many mots Adamiques into the flots académiques of the French language; and that, what no one conversant with the modern history of France could have suspected, "noble France bequeaths to the earth the true laws of the code humanitaire."

Such is M. Soumet's "Hyperion;" let our readers guess what his "Satyr" may be. The sketch opens like an Old Bailey indictment, with the serious charge that England is

"Criminelle toujours de lèse-humanité;"

and then comes a long list of "felonies and treasons." We are charged with "extinguishing Moses with the breath of Locke;" with pursuing a system of wholesale aggrandizement which never takes less than "a segment of the globe;" and with being unreasonably indignant at the Czar for breaking our heads with his lumps of ice; and after a broad hint or two that nothing English can ever find admission into heaven, the whole is wound up with a piece of rare and bold imagery, in which "perfidious Albion" is likened to a gigantic polypus, which feeds upon whales. And so ends the prologue, as it began, with

*"L'Angleterre stérile et la France féconde

To pass on from the prologue to the body of the poem, the "Idylle," in six cantos, brings the history of Joan down to the period of her starting from Chinon for Orleans. In the first canto, after a brief introduction setting forth the state of things upon earth, the scene is transferred to heaven, where the angel of history, among whose occupations M. Soumet enumerates that of extracting, "as an algebraist deeply engaged in calculation, the unknown quantity from every event," is on the point of “ casting the ashes of France forth to the winds,” when St. Genoveva interposes her all-powerful intercession. The irreverent, we had almost said the impious, tone in which this part of the subject is handled, is one of those exceedingly painful evidences which every now and then meet the eye, of the pravity of religious sentiment engendered in the national mind of France, by a mixture of the unbelief and profaneness of the revolutionary school, with the scarcely less objectionable legends of popular Romanism. St. Genoveva addresses the Supreme Being in the following terms :—

“ Were I upon earth, I should this day sacrifice my life for France ; but I am near Thee, and in Paradise no one but thy Son can immolate himself.”

And after a vast deal of expostulation in the style of that which in the “ Æneid ” Juno and Venus address to Jove, and which we cannot better describe than by calling it simply blasphemous, she says,

“ I shall not take for my guard (on her expedition for the protection of France) thy grand chariots, with their six-eyed wings, sending forth azure lightnings ; but if, to drink from my chalice, if to follow my flight, thy holy soldiery should leave heaven deserted Thou wilt pardon me.”

Lastly, she winds up the whole of her pleadings with the grave complaint :

“ My soul is less powerful here, than my bier in St. Peter’s chapel ;”

a proposition which contains more truth within a few words, upon the subject of saint-worship, than we have often met with, and more, probably, than M. Soumet himself was quite aware of. But the plea of St. Genoveva is not the most objectionable part of the scene in question :

“ The great Voice replies : ‘ Between thy people and me let a victim as pure as thyself be lifted up¹. Let her offer herself for thy people in a divine mystery, even as my Son offered Himself to redeem the earth ; and thy people shall live for ever.’ ”

The latter part of the first canto exhibits Charles in the company of Agnes Sorel, under the walls of Chinon, in the soft

“ Entre ton peuple et moi Qu’il s’élève une hostie aussi pure que toi.” dalliance of troubadour life, in which they are interrupted, first, by the arrival of a white deer, which takes refuge from the hunt at the feet of Agnes, and is by her protected against its pursuers; and shortly after by that of a knight mangled in battle,

“ Having neither helmet nor shield left, his harness slit, and his breast laid open, the ruin of a man, escaped from St. Euverte, who painfully drags his stiffened foot over the ground, his hair all glued with clotted blood, and with his only remaining arm holding back his entrails.”

He lays himself down to die before the loving couple, but first he breaks forth into a philippic against the inaction of Charles, which has in it more of the vehemence of life, than of the faintness of death, and more of prosy prolixity than belongs to either; and at the close of it he releases his gushing entrails, and “ three spots of blood mark the white skin of the deer.” This fact M. Soumet places in stronger relief than naturally belongs to it, by adding at the end of the line three signs of exclamation; a method invariably resorted to by him, when, as is often the case, the actual sense of his words falls short of the would-be emphasis of his intention.

Small as is the promise of poetic excellence in this exordium, the performance which follows, falls, if possible, below it. In the second Canto the arrival of Joan of Arc is announced to Charles, and a debate ensues, in which various objections are raised against her reception. The first comes from La Hire, who thinks it not impossible that Joan may be suborned by the English:—

“ Their crooked paths are well known, and for the accomplishment of her gloomy designs England delights to walk in the ways of darkness. Perhaps she herself, skilful in deceiving us, and burning to smite us with the rod of shame, wishes that our immovable army should, instead of the great Dunois, choose a sibyl for its commander.”

Another objector rises up in the person of the inquisitor Hermangard, whose business it is to “ extract death from the catholic crucible,” and who is in his own proper person described as “ an expiring world concentrated into a monk.” He sees in the story of the marvellous Maid at once the devices of “ the impure goat concealed under the iron mitre,” and breaks forth into a general lamentation on the spread of the black art, for which he suggests as a remedy that the whole ocean should be turned into a basin of holy water. The excitement produced in the royal council by his harangue, M. Soumet, who is any thing but happy in the choice of his tropes, compares to the noise of a pegtop whipped along by a little boy; it is, however, fortunately allayed by the intervention.

of St. François de Paule, who suggests that this may be a sign from heaven :—

“ Perhaps the triumph of France is written in heaven, in order to preserve Europe to Jesus Christ, in order that the weight of England may not hereafter drag the whole earth down into some immense error.”

His advice prevails ; and Hermangard retires in disgust, but not before M. Soumet has done him the honour of comparing him, in another of his unhappy tropes, to a vulture in the Jardin des plantes, who seeing a fair swan rising into the air, would fain be at him, if the bars of his cage did not forbid it. Meanwhile, in the third Canto Joan is brought into the royal presence ; Charles denies himself, and points out one of his courtiers as the Dauphin, to which Joan replies in unequivocal prose, only that the rhyme nôtre follows in the next line :—

After unfolding her mission, she proceeds, at Charles's request, in this and the three following Cantos, to detail her history, in which M. Soumet follows the general legend, with an occasional enlargement of his own invention. Thus he makes her tell the king, that she was in the constant habit of reciting the story of Judith and Holofernes, her Bible being always open at that place, covered with a veil ; M. Soumet forgetting that in the previous Canto he made her say :—

“ L'alphabet est un livre à mes yeux inconnu.”

Passing over sundry incidents, we hasten on to the conclusion of the fifth Canto, when a magnificent diadem, borne by seraph's hand, descends upon the head of Charles, which Joan tells him, is “ a present from her guardian angel.” The sixth Canto, which is a continuation of Joan's narrative, bears the extraordinary title, “ Apparition de MONSIEUR l'Archange Saint Michel,” an event which M. Soumet, less discreet than Joan herself in her examination at Rouen, describes with vast particularity, asserting, inter alia, that he came to her “ in an azure mantle, through an old wall,” and that the sound of the beating of his wings was—could M. Soumet find no apter image in the wide creation ?—“ like the noises which proceed from swallows' nests.” The prayer which Joan offers up after his departure, corresponds with the fundamental idea of the whole poem, already disclosed by the intercession of St. Genoveva :—

“ Lord, have mercy on us ! See our kings proscribed, our towns alarmed. Art Thou no longer the God that rules the hosts ? If our faults draw down the wrath of heaven, PUNISH ME ALONE, FOR I OFFER MYSELF FOR ALL!² Restore, restore to France her former glory !”

This prayer is answered by St. Genoveva, who appears to her ; a vision of paradise, where, as M. Soumet specially mentions, “the young sparrows never tumble out of their nests,” closes the day and the scene. A conversation between Joan and her mother, in which the latter endeavours to prevail on her to abandon her project, and which is written in a strain of inimitable prose, drowning the very rhymes in its dulness, follows ; then comes the history of her application to Robert de Baudricour, and of her progress to Chinon. The conclusion of the Canto contains an account of the preparations made for her expedition, in which is inserted a rhymed paraphrase of Joan’s letter to the English leaders, which ends with the following climax : —

“ *Donc ne résistez plus ; vous vous tromperiez fort,
Si vous pensiez que Dieu craint le duc de Bedford !*”

Having given our readers this taste of M. Soumet’s quality, we shall not weary them by following our poet through all the strange and often repulsive scenery of the “épopée,” which contains, only in rhyme, all that apparatus of external horrors, and of strange fantastic situations, and all those exhibitions of human nature depraved by the vilest, the bloodiest, the most lustful passions, which unhappily characterize the popular literature of France in the present day, and which testify to the deep injury inflicted by the revolution upon the moral sense of that people ; an injury which is not to be effaced in the first nor in the second generation. The conceptions of wickedness are sensual and devilish to an unnatural degree, possible only in the mind of a people which has thrown down all the barriers which instinct, human civilization, and the ordinance of God, oppose to the full development of man’s natural corruption ; the attempts to paint virtue and purity are equally unnatural, wanting both in freedom and in depth ; they display a total absence of the finer and deeper feelings, the nobler and loftier principles, whose growth is possible only in an atmosphere of social morality and of pious reverence ; the dashes of religious sentiment which are introduced here and there, are coarse, carnal, and distorted, like the rudely carved idols of a demi-savage people. The poet deals exclusively with outward nature, with its wild elements, with the ferocious powers of the brute creation, with the carnal man, and his animal mind ; there is a nauseating savour of flesh and blood, like the atmosphere of a slaughter-house, pervading the whole; and heaven itself is, like the Walhalla of our barbarous ancestors, nothing more than a counterpart of the grossness of the earth.

To a conception so essentially unearthly, as is the Maid of Orleans, nothing could be more uncongenial than the inspirations of such a muse; and this the "épopée" of "Jeanne d'Arc Guerrière" abundantly proves. The heavenly inspiration of "the missioned Maid," the lofty bearing with which she accomplished her high career, the virgin purity and the commanding enthusiasm of her character, will not bear the defiling association of an Arab slave with a half-tamed lion, now lying in wait to take away her life, and then under the influence of a half voluptuous fascination watching over her, and making use of poison, of the dagger, and of the savage strength of his companion brute for her defence; or the offensive contrast of a boastful infidel from whose giant force the blood shed by an iron crucifix cannot protect her, because the miscreant sets his foot upon it, and she owes her safety to the timely operation of the poison administered by the provident treachery of her Arab admirer and slave. Through such scenes as these, indifferently relieved by her being made to deliver, in the Cathedral of Rheims, a prophetic lecture in rhyme on the future destinies of France, not forgetting Napoleon, that "phoenix-king," whom "Hideous England, that colossal spider which crushes its victims with its long maritime arms, seizes, tortures, strangles, and gnaws," the Maid is brought down to the close of her martial career. During the coronation ceremony she feels herself unaccountably forsaken by the spirit which animated her; in consequence of which she desires to retire to her former home; but the king insists on retaining her in his service against her will. It is in this state, dispirited, and irritated moreover by the growing jealousies of the leaders of the French army, that she one day meets a "filles de joie" in the camp. In virtuous indignation she strikes her with the sword of Charles Martel, with which all her victories had been won, and that blow finally seals her fate. The unhallowed contact breaks the sword; the presence of the archangel, from whom she had received it, is henceforth withheld from her; her supernatural power forsakes her; she sinks back to the level of common mortals; her high courage is turned to brooding despair; and abandoned by all the leaders of the French host, cared for by none but the Arab and his lion, who both perish in the attempt to save her, she falls at last into the hands of the English, whose cry, "Prisonnière," with the emphatic accompaniment of three signs of exclamation, closes the twelfth Canto, and the "épopée."

The last piece of the Trilogie, entitled the "tragédie," hardly deserves that name; being nothing more than a continuation of the subject in the form of a dramatic dialogue, subdivided into five parts. The scene opens with Joan asleep in prison; she is visited by St. François de Paule, who after an altercation with Hermangard, determines to make interest in her favour with the Duke of Bedford; while on his way to do so, he discovers that Hermangard has, by holding out to him the prospect of its being of service to his daughter, procured from the father of Joan a statement in which she is declared insane, and guilty of intermeddling with magic arts. The base fraud which has been practised upon the feelings of the old man, is however exposed during the trial of her case, at which the Duke of Bedford presides, Hermangard pleading against her, and St. François de Paule for her; when Hermangard being foiled in his purpose, seeks the co-operation of the Duke of Burgundy for effecting the destruction of Joan. The duke visits her in prison, and at first seeks to gain her over to his side; instead of which he is induced, by the eloquence of the Maid, to renounce the English, and henceforth becomes her champion. The Inquisition, acting under the direction of Hermangard, having condemned her to death, Burgundy appears to plead for her, and challenges the Duke of Bedford to a single combat, upon the issue of which the life or death of Joan is to depend. Burgundy being conquered, the execution is proceeded with, and Joan of Arc is seen on the pile, waving her banner, which the Inquisitor Hermangard has been so obliging as to restore to her for the occasion. The whole is crowned by an epilogue, in which M. Soumet, pursuing the subject still further, exhibits the Maid of Orleans, with scientific precision, as "squelette calciné," and then passes on to the unseen world, where Isabel, who had died about the same time, is doomed to eternal death, while Joan of Arc is welcomed to heaven by the Virgin Mary, St. Genoveva, the archangel St. Michael, and others. But even here M. Soumet cannot leave the subject; his ruling passion is strong in death, and before he brings his effusion to a close, he takes care to intimate that the pile of the Maid,

"That monument of triumph and of blame, raises a separation wall of fire between London and Paris."

For the sake of both nations, we hope that no more serious misunderstandings may arise between them, than this grievance of M. Soumet; a grievance which, we may observe by the way, is wholly destitute of foundation; for contrary to the popular notion, which attributes the disgraceful legal murder of Joan to the English, the documents published by M. Quicherat clearly prove, that the French were themselves the chief actors in this barbarous persecution. Whatever share the English had in setting the proceeding against her on foot, it is an undeniable fact, that the University of Paris, which took the lead in requiring her to be arraigned, and would gladly have got the process into its own hands, pronounced its solemn decision against her; and that all the judges before whom she was arraigned, and by whose perversion of justice her condemnation was mainly procured, were Frenchmen; the leading person among them, the Bishop of Beauvais, acting his part as judicial persecutor with an alacrity and vehemence of zeal which must have rendered any thing like compulsion on the part of the English quite superfluous. Of the disgrace, therefore, which undoubtedly attaches to Joan's death, by far the largest and heaviest share belongs of right to France; and while England has done at least poetic justice to her memory, France has not as yet discharged even that debt, nor is likely to do so, unless a poet should arise of a very different spirit and calibre from that of M. Alex. Soumet.

After all that has been written by poets of different countries on this highly poetic subject, the drama of Schiller, notwithstanding its faults, especially in the dénouement of the story, still stands unrivalled; and we cannot but hail the idea of transplanting into the field of English literature a performance which justly ranks among the masterpieces of the great German bard. Two attempts which have recently been made to effect this are now lying before us, and we shall endeavour, before we bring our article to a close, to give our readers some idea both of the drama of Schiller, and of the merit of the two translations quoted at the head of this article.

One of these, that of Miss Swanwick, is unfortunately incomplete, the authoress having selected for translation those portions of the drama only, which are immediately connected with the Maid of Orleans herself. This is to be regretted, because the knowledge of the original, and the facility for rendering its sense with tolerable accuracy and faithfulness into flowing English verse, displayed in these fragments, prove her to be equal to the task which she has undertaken. In saying this, we do not mean to convey an unqualified approval of her translation; we think, and we shall presently show, that a closer adherence to the original might in some instances have been observed, without deteriorating the English either in point of cadence or of expression. But we desire not to forget how great a command of both languages a really good translation requires, one which shall not merely render the average sense in words of somewhat similar import, but which shall transfer the more recondite beauties of the original, nay, to a certain extent even its faults, if they be characteristic of the genius of the author, into another idiom.

Such a command of the German it does not appear to us that Miss Swanwick possesses, and her translations are not therefore likely to take rank among those master-works of genius, by which, in some few rare instances, the productions of the human mind have been not only transplanted into, but, if such an expression may be allowed, rendered indigenous in a foreign soil. But although we cannot place her in the first line of translators, we feel it but due to her to acknowledge, that she does possess the ordinary qualifications required in a translator of poetry, namely, 1, a competent knowledge of the grammatical construction of the language from which the translation is made ; 2, a sufficient acquaintance with that language to appreciate not only the general, but the idiomatic beauties of the work translated ; 3, a correct ear and a cultivated taste for poetic expression in the language into which the translation is made.

Having enumerated these three qualifications, without possessing which no one should, in our opinion, intermeddle with the business of translating any thing, but especially masterpieces of literature, we may as well state at once that the author of the other translation of the Maid of Orleans, quoted at the head of this article, is woefully deficient in all the three. We make this statement with considerable reluctance, because the author in question is, we believe, a respectable writer in that field of literature which is his own proper province ; but there are offences in the literary world to which no mercy can be extended ; and we take the mangling of a great masterpiece of genius to be of that number.

Mr. Thompson himself deprecates criticism, and makes some sort of apology for the imperfections of his performance in his preface, by informing the reader that it was "written at scraps of time,—leisure moments of laborious days." This would be a valid excuse, indeed, if there had been any necessity, any very strong call of duty, for the author to publish a translation of the Maid of Orleans ; but it does not excuse a performance swarming with imperfections, being thrust upon the public, without any call or necessity, professedly as a cast taken from one of the finest specimens of German poetic art. Having deprived Mr. Thompson of the excuse which he alleges, we feel bound to provide him with another. He tells us, in his preface, that "all men must have some sleep ;" and we charitably conjecture, that to this undeniable necessity of nature our author generally yielded while he was employed upon this work of art. Indeed, to be quite candid, we do not think that even if he had been always wide awake, and had had plenty of leisure at his command, Mr. Thompson would have been qualified for such an undertaking, on account of his deficiency in the three pre-requisites before-mentioned. That he is wanting both in correctness of ear and in poetical taste, constantly diluting the sense of the original, and swelling its bulk with unmeaning and often inappropriate epithets, we shall not stop to demonstrate; a cursory glance over the specimens which we shall have occasion to quote, will abundantly illustrate his unnecessary and unpoetic prolixity; and a comparison with the German text will prove, to any one moderately acquainted with that language, the inadequacy of his translation for rendering the beauties of the original. We shall, therefore, content ourselves with adducing a few proofs how utterly insufficient is even his grammatical knowledge of the language from which he has ventured to translate. None but the veriest tyro in German could have fallen into such palpable mistakes as meet the eye at every turn in the translation before us. For instance, in the passage:

“ *Dass Räuber in das königliche Frankreich
Sich theilen mit dem Schwert, die edeln Städte,
Die mit der Monarchie gealtert sind,
Dem Feind die rost'gen Schlüssel überliefern,*”

Mr. Thompson, ignorant apparently of the phrase, “Sich in etwas theilen,” “to share, to divide a thing,” translates as if the original read, “in dem königlichen Frankreich,” and mistakes “die edeln Städte,” which is the nominative to “überliefern,” for the accusative governed by “theilen,” rendering the lines:

“ That spoilers in our fair imperial France
Should parcel with the sword the noble cities
That have grown ancient with the monarchy;
Hand over to the foe their rusty keys,”

where it appears as if the spoilers handed over the keys.

In the speech of Dunois, where he encourages Charles by the reflection that the war is not of his kindling,

“ Du hast ihn nicht leichtsinnig selbst entflammt,”

Mr. Thompson contrives to say just the reverse, only alleging that he had good cause for kindling it, thus:

“ Thyself, for no light cause, hast kindled it.”

The expression, “dem Schicksal unterliegen,” which signifies “to succumb to fate,” he renders, “to lie beneath the hand of fate ;" "Machtwort," i.e. word of command, he renders "war-cry ;" "das Schwert ist drunter, das mir dienen soll," i.e. "the sword which is to serve me is among them," among the other weapons, he renders, "beneath them all." "Ihr Herzoge, die das Reich verwesen," i.e. "ye dukes who administer the realm, ye regents of the realm," he renders, and we perceive Miss Swanwick too, who is not usually found tripping, "ye dukes who desolate this realm ;" so the word "Reichsverweser," in a passage where the context ought to have drawn attention to the mistake, "the destroyer of our realm," instead of the "Regent." "Entgegnet man mir so ?" i.e. "am I treated thus ?" he renders, "must I be thus encountered ?" "den ersten Kampf," i.e. "the severe fight," he renders, "the first encounter," as if it were ersten ; "fünfzig," i.e. "fifty," he renders "fifteen ;" "streng," i.e. "severe," he renders "strong ;" "Schon vor des Eisens blanker Scheide schaudert mir," i.e. "even the polished sheath of the sword alarms me," he renders, "I shudder at the blaze of naked steel." Those beautiful lines, in which Burgundy betrays his secret conviction of the innocence of Joan, and of the heavenly spirit by which she is animated :

" *Verstrickend ist der Lüge trüglich Wort, Doch ihre Rede ist wie eines Kindes.
Wenn böse Geister ihr die Worte leihn,
So ahmen sie die Unschuld siegreich nach ;*" hear in Mr. Thompson's translation a sense precisely the reverse of the original, from sheer ignorance of the language. He renders them thus :—

" The treacherous voice of falsehood lays its snare
Deep in the artless language of the child.
When evil spirits would conquer souls by words,
They wear the form of innocence."

Miss Swanwick renders correctly :

" Falsehood's fallacious words are full of guile,
But hers are pure and child-like. If indeed
Spirits of evil borrow this disguise,
They copy innocence triumphantly."

Again, in the passage—

" *Fürchtet die Gottheit
Des Schwerts, eh' ihr's der Scheid' entreisst. Loslassen
Kann der Gewaltige das Schwert ;*"

Mr. Thompson refers DER Gewaltige, which is masculine, to die Gottheit des Schwerts, which is feminine, and so translates, “Dread, ere ye unsheathe it,

The godhead of the sword! that power sets free
The war-fiend;”

whereas the meaning of the original is, that “the powerful may easily let loose the sword;” but they cannot, as the poet goes on to say, recall it as easily. “Meine Schäfertrift,” Miss Swanwick correctly, “my shepherd walks,” Mr. Thompson renders, “my pastoral toil.” On the death of Talbot, Lionel takes leave of him with these words:

“Kurz ist der Abschied für die lange Freundschaft,” which means obviously,

“Short is the parting for so long a friendship;”

yet Mr. Thompson contrives to escape the sense, and puts,

“Short is the absence
That interrupts an everlasting friendship.”

These examples, taken here and there, as we noted them in looking over his performance, are more than enough to demonstrate Mr. Thompson's utter incompetency to translate Schiller; but in order to give our readers an idea how thickly strewn these mistranslations are, we will take them in order as they occur, at the first place that opens before us; marking not only those instances in which the sense of the original has been grossly mistaken by our author, but the numerous other cases, also in which the expressions chosen by him are, though not absolutely erroneous, yet so unsuitable, that no moderately read German scholar would have thought of selecting them; while a little attention to the context would for the most part have been sufficient to have prevented their adoption. The passage from which we shall quote, is in the second scene of the prologue, part of the dialogue between Joanna, her father, and her lover. Thibaut d'Arc urging upon his daughter the suit of Raimond, describes him as “dieser wackre Jüngling,” which means simply, “this brave youth;” or as Miss Swanwick renders it, “this noble youth;” but Mr. Thompson, misled apparently by the termination ling, translates, “this bold stripling.” A little farther on Thibaut, in allusion to Joanna's age and beauty, says—

“Ich sehe dich in Jugendfülle prangen,” which Miss Swanwick very properly renders,

“ I see thee blooming in thy youthful prime ;”

but Mr. Thompson, misled by his dictionary, where, at the word “ prangen,” he finds, inter alia, “ to boast,” altogether misses the sense, and writes,

“ I see thee boast in haughtiness of youth.”

Presently again, where Raimond interposes, to stop Thibaut’s torrent of reproach against his daughter, he begins his speech with the words,

“ Lass!’s gut seyn, Vater Arc !”

the meaning of which is, as again Miss Swanwick correctly gives it, “ Forbear, good father,”

i. e. “ say no more,”—“ trouble not the girl ;” instead of which, Mr. Thompson, evidently unacquainted with the German phraseology, infelicitously renders :

“ Let well alone, good father.”

Again, where Raimond describes Joan,

“ Standing erect, surrounded by her flock,
With noble port, casting her thoughtful look Down on the petty kingdoms of the earth ;”

it is evident that in the words,

• “ und den ernsten Blick Herabsenkt auf der Erde kleine Länder,”

the poet means to convey the idea of Joan’s moral elevation, and of her commanding position, appointed to rule the destinies of kingdoms, without being moved by their petty interests. Of this exquisitely beautiful allusion there is no trace whatever in Miss Swanwick’s version, who only says,

“ with noble form
And earnest gaze bent on the world beneath.”

But Mr. Thompson, though he suffers not the words thus to escape him, altogether misses the sense, making that which is a matter of moral elevation, a trite question of perspective :

“ With noble port, and fixed and steady eye,
Gazing on the diminished fields below.”

We say nothing of the dilution of the "thoughtful look" into a "fixed and steady eye;" but what means Mr. Thompson by the two lines following?

"Then seems she somewhat loftier to betide,
And oft I deem her maid of other days."

With the author's leave, this is not English sense, much less the sense of the German; "to betide," if there is any truth in Johnson, means "to happen to, to befall, to bechance;" never "to signify," which is the sense in which Mr. Thompson uses the word, being suspended, as it would seem, between sleep and waking, between German and English, and misled by the analogy of sound in the German word "bedeuten." As for the "maid of other days," if any idea can attach to it at all, it is what the vulgar call "an old maid," which Joan certainly was not. Much more appropriate again is Miss Swanwick's version:

"Looking, methought, as if from other times
She came, foreboding things of import high;"

which, though not literally accurate, is perhaps the best way of giving the sense of Schiller's,

"Da scheint sie mir was Höh'res zu bedeuten, Und dünkt mir's oft, sie stamm' aus andern Zeiten."

Occasionally Mr. Thompson splits upon that rock of all bad poets, bombast; as in the following lines:

"*Schleicht sie, gleich dem einsiedlerischen Vogel,
Heraus ins graulich düstre Geisterreich
Der Nacht, tritt auf den Kreuzweg hin*"

Miss Swanwick faithfully and simply:

"She, like the solitary bird, creeps forth,
And in the fearful spirit-realm of night
To yon crossway repairs"

Mr. Thompson:

"Glides, like the midnight fowl of solitude,
Into night's grim and grisly realm of ghosts,
And speeds her to the cross-road"

In matters of emphasis, too, he is not unfrequently at fault; thus:

"Warum erwähnt sie immer diesen Ort?"

which means,

"Why this spot always does she choose?"

he renders,

“ Why should she ever choose this gloomy spot ? ”

A little further on we have the unfortunate “ betide ” again :

“ O das bedeutet einen tiefen Fall, ”

Miss Swanwick, quite satisfactorily,

“ Oh, ’tis the prelude to some fearful fall ! ”

but Mr. Thompson,

“ Oh, surely it betides some fearful fall ! ”

This badge of sciolisms, grammatical, philological, and poetical, crowded together within the narrow compass of two pages, will, we think, suffice to convince our readers that if they wish to have an idea of Schiller, they must not commit themselves to the guidance of Mr. Thompson ; and that we have not exceeded the boundaries of fair criticism by pronouncing him, without circumlocution, wholly disqualified for the task of transplanting the master-works of German literature upon the soil of England.

And now for the drama of Schiller. The outline of the story, as he gives it, keeps pretty closely to the historical legend in the earlier part of her career, but departs widely from it towards the close, principally with regard to the cause of Joan’s captivity and the manner of her death. The drama itself is preceded by a prologue, which opens the story ;—Thibaut d’Arc, in recounting the calamities of the times, bestows his two elder daughters in marriage upon their suitors, that they may not be without protection in such dangerous times ; he then turns to Joan, whose lover, Ráimond, has in vain sought to win her heart. This gives the old man occasion to animadvert upon her solitary habits, and her mysterious communion with the unseen world, which he suspects to be “ of evil.” During these discourses, Bertrand, one of their neighbours, arrives with news from the seat of war, and with a helmet which, by his account, a gipsy forced upon him, and then disappeared. Joanna considers this as a sign from heaven, and seizes the helmet ; and as Bertrand continues to enumerate the mischances of the French army, and the successes of the enemy, she who hitherto had stood silent, grows more and more animated, and in a prophetic strain proclaims the approaching deliverance of the kingdom. This is followed by the scene in which Joanna bids farewell to her home, in those stanzas of exquisite beauty, which more than any thing else that has been written in prose or in verse, image forth her inner mind.

The drama itself opens with a scene in the camp of Charles, in which all the perplexities of his position are successively introduced; and Agnes Sorel, whose character is largely indebted to Schiller for the high poetry with which he has veiled its defects, sacrifices her jewels to relieve the Dauphin from the most pressing of his necessities. While despair thus reigns among the followers of Charles, a knight arrives, bringing intelligence of a wondrous maiden, who had suddenly appeared on the scene of war, and had turned its tide; an anticipation of the military exploits of Joan before her presentation to the king, which needlessly deviates from historic truth, and is scarcely in keeping with the character of her mission, while it serves no other purpose in the plot of the drama than to bring her on the stage with greater éclat. The announcement is followed by the immediate arrival of Joan herself; but, before her entrance, the Dauphin bids Dunois take his place and personate him. Instead of M. Soumet's

Schiller makes her say,—

“ Bastard of Orléans, thou wilt tempt thy God !
This place abandon, which becomes thee not !
To this more mighty one the maid is sent.”

as Miss Swanwick renders; or, as Mr. Thompson has managed to pervert and dilute the passage:—

“ Stay,
Bastard of Orléans ! thou wouldst tempt thy ruin !
Vacate that place at once that ill becomes thee !
My mission is to this thy master here.”

Joan then declares to Charles the purport of three prayers which he had addressed to heaven the night before. Moved by this sign, Charles proclaims his belief in her divine mission; and then the Archbishop of Rheims asks her of her birth and parentage: Schiller thus avoiding, by a reversal of the legendary order of events, the unpoetic episode of a theological commission of inquiry. Joanna thus replies³:—

“ Most reverend lord, Joanna is my name :
I am but a poor shepherd's lowly daughter,
Born in the royal hamlet Dom Remi,

* Both Miss Swanwick and Mr. Thompson are mistaken as to the sense of this verse. The diocese of Tulle is in the Limosin, and Dom Remi in Lorraine, at the opposite end of France. But neither could Dom Remi be described as "within the precincts of the church of Toul," from which it is more than twenty miles distant. The truth is, that Dom Remi belonged to the ancient diocese of Toul, which now forms part of the united diocese of Nancy and Toul. The German Kirchensprengel means diocese.

Already, and the kingdom made their own.
 Then I God's Mother suppliant implored
 To turn from us the shame of foreign bondage,
 And to preserve to us our native king.
 Outside the hamlet of my birth an image
 Most ancient stands of Holy Mother : crowds
 Of pious pilgrims at its shrine were wont
 To meet ; and by its side a holy oak,
 Far famed, for by some blessed power there
 Were countless wonders wrought. Beneath its shade
 I lov'd to sit, tending the flock ; my heart
 Was thither drawn. And if perchance a lamb
 Amid the mountain wilds was lost, in dream
 'Twas shown me, when beneath that oak I slept.

Possession of the kingdom. Then I cried
 Imploring earnestly the Queen of heaven
 To save us from the shame of foreign chains,
 And still preserve to us our native king.
 Not distant from the spot where I was born
 An ancient image of the Virgin stands,
 To which the holy pilgrims oft repair ;
 And near it is a consecrated oak,
 Famed for the healing power of miracle.
 Oft 'neath the shadow of this oak I sat, Tending my flock,—my heart still drew me there ;
 And if by chance among the desert hills
 A lambkin stray'd, 'twas shown me in a dream
 When in the shadow of that oak I slept.

 Then did I to the mother of my God
 Make urgent supplication, that her power
 Would save us from the stranger's shameful yoke,
 And shield our lawful native prince from harm.
 Now, at the entrance of my native village
 There stands, revered from dark antiquity,
 The Virgin Mother's holy effigy,
 To which full many a pious pilgrimage
 Was customed to be made ; and, hard thereby,
 A consecrated oak, of power, renowned Through countless wonders, blessings to impart.
 Well loved I in the oak's broad shade to sit Tending my flocks : some instinct drew me thither ;
 And oft as lambs strayed on the upland
 wolds,
 Did I but sleep in shadow of that oak,
 Dreams taught me where to seek them,
 and I found.

 Von uns zu wenden fremder Ketten Schmach,
 Uns den einheim'schen König zu bewahren.
 Und vor dem Dorf wo ich geboren, steht
 Ein uralt Muttergottes-Bild, zu dem
 Der frommen Pilgerfahrten viel geschah'n,
 Und eine heil'ge Eiche steht daneben,
 Durch vieler Wunder Segenkraft berühmt.
 Und in der Eiche Schatten sass ich gern,
 Die Herde weidend, denn mich zog das Herz,
 Und ging ein Lamm mir in den wüsten Bergen Verloren, immer zeigte mirs der Traum,

And once upon a time, when I in pray'r
 Devout beneath that tree the long night through
 Had sat, my eyes from sleep defending,—lo!
 The Holy Virgin came to me, a sword
 And banner bearing, else clad like myself
 In garb of shepherdess, and thus she spake:
 'Tis I: Arise, Joanna! leave the flock,
 The Lord doth call thee to another work.
 This banner take, and gird thee with this sword!
 Therewith extirpate thou my people's foes,
 The son of thy liege lord lead into Rheims,
 And crown him with the royal diadem!
 And I to her made answer: 'How should I
 On such deeds venture, I, a maiden soft,
 And all unskill'd in man-destroying war!'

MISS SWANWICK.

And once, when through the night, beneath this tree
 In pious adoration I had sat,
 Resisting sleep, the holy one appear'd
 Bearing a sword and banner, otherwise Clad like a shepherd maid, and thus ad-dress'd me:
 "'Tis I; stand up Johanna! leave thy flock;
 The Lord appoints thee to another task!
 Receive this banner! gird thee with this sword!
 And with it slay my people's enemies,
 Conduct thy lord's appointed son to Rheims,
 And on his forehead place the kingly crown!" To which I answered, "How dare I presume
 To work such wonders,—I, a timid maid,
 Unpractised in the dreadful art of war!"

MR. THOMPSON.

And once, when I had sat the livelong night
 In orison devout beneath that tree,
 And battled with invading sleep—behold!
 The holy Maid herself approached me, bearing
 A sword and banner; for the rest arrayed
 In pastoral weeds, like me; and thus bespake:
 "'Tis I. Arise, Joanna! leave thy flocks;
 Heaven calls thee to another charge!
 arise!
 Receive this banner! gird thee with this sword!
 With this exterminate thy people's foes,
 And lead to Rheims thy lord's imperial son,
 And set the royal crown upon his head."
 Then I replied: "How should a tender maid,
 Unskilled in murderous war, presume to guide
 So great and perilous emprise!" But she

*Und einmals, als ich eine lange Nacht
 In frommer Andacht unter diesem Baum
 Gesessen, und dem Schlafe widerstand,
 Da trat die Heilige zu mir, ein Schwert
 Und Fahne tragend, aber sonst, wie ich,
 Als Schäferinn gekleidet, und sie sprach zu mir:
 'Ich bin's. Steh' auf, Johanna. Lass die Herde, Dich ruft der Herr zu einem anderen Geschäft!
 Nimm diese Fahne! Dieses Schwert umgürte dir!
 Damit vertilge meines Volkes Feinde,
 Und führe deines Herren Sohn nach Rheims,
 Und krön' ihn mit der königlichen Krone!'
 Ich aber sprach: 'Wie kann ich solcher That Mich unterwinden, eine zarte Maid, Unkundig des verderblichen Gefechts!'*

But she replied : ' No deed so glorious
Which may not be achieved by virgin pure,
Whose heart against all earthly love is steel'd.
Behold myself ! like thou a maiden chaste,
I to the Lord gave birth, the Lord divine,
And am myself divine.' With that she touched
Mine eyelids, and as I did upwards cast
My look, the heaven fill'd with angel-boys
I saw, bearing white lilies in their hands,
While music sweet was floating through the air.
And thus on three successive nights appeared
The holy One and said : ' Arise, Joanna !
The Lord doth call thee to another work.'
But on the third night, lo, her countenance

MISS SWANWICK.

And she replied, " Whate'er is good on earth
Can be accomplished by a virgin pure,
If she doth never yield to earthly love.
Gaze upon me,—a maiden like thyself !
I to the Lord, the holy One, gave birth,
And am myself divine !" Mine eyelids then
She touch'd, and gazing upwards I perceived
That all the heaven was fill'd with angel forms,
Who bore white lilies in their hands,
while tones
Of sweetest music hover'd in the air.
On three successive nights the holy One Appear'd to me, and cried, " Arise, Johanna !
The Lord appoints thee to another task."
And when the third time she reveal'd herself

MR. THOMPSON.

Instant rejoined : " A pure and stainless virgin Accomplishes the mightiest deeds on earth,
Where she resists the lures of earthly passion.
Look upon me: like thee, a maiden chaste,
I had the grace to bear a birth divine,
And am divine myself." And then she touched
My drooping lids ; and, as I upward gazed,
All heaven was full of quiring cheru-bim,
Bearing white lilies in their gentle hands,
While notes celestial floated in the air.
And thus on three successive nights appeared
The holy maid, and cried, " Arise, Joanna !
Heaven calls thee to another charge !
arise !"
And when in the third night she came to me,

*Und sie versetzte : ' Eine reine Jungfrau
Vollbringt jedes Herrliche auf Erden,
Wenn sie der ird'schen Liebe widersteht.
Sieh mich an ! Eine keusche Magd, wie du,
Hab' ich den Herrn, den göttlichen geboren,
Und göttlich bin ich selbst !'— Und sie berührte
Mein Augenlied, und als ich aufwärts sah,
Da war der Himmel voll von Engelknaben,
Die trugen weisse Lilien in der Hand,
Und süßer Ton verschwebte in den Lüften.
Und so drey Nächte nacheinander liess
Die Heilige sich sehn, und rief : ' Steh' auf, Johanna !
Dich ruft der Herr zu einem andern Geschäft.'
Und als sie in der dritten Nacht erschien,*

Was wroth, and sharp rebuking thus she spake :
 ' Obedience is on earth the woman's duty,
 And hard endurance her oppressive lot ;
 By service stern she must be purified ;
 And great above is she, who served below.'
 Thus speaking she her shepherdly attire
 Let fall, and in her royal robes, as Queen
 Of heaven radiant like the sun she stood.
 And thence uplifted to the realms of bliss
 She slowly vanished, borne on clouds of gold."

This narrative of Joanna is followed by a long pause, which the archbishop interrupts by declaring the divine attestation of her mission sufficient to put to silence all doubts of earthly prudence; she is then invested by Charles with the command of his army, and on the arrival of a herald from the enemy she sends a message of summons and defiance, which is a versified rendering, though in very different taste from that of M. Soumet, of the letter to the king and the Duke of Bedford, before quoted among the historical documents.

With this the first act is brought to a close, and the second act introduces us to the British camp. Discussions and disputes between the English generals, Talbot and Lionel, the Duke of

MISS SWANWICK.

She seem'd displeased, and chiding spoke these words :
 " Obedience is the woman's duty here,
 Endurance is her destiny on earth.
 She must be purified through discipline;
 Who serveth here is glorified above."
 While thus she spoke she let her shepherd's garb Fall from her, and as Queen of heaven stood forth,
 Enshrined in radiant light, while golden clouds
 Upbore her slowly to the land of joy."

MR. THOMPSON.

With wrathful chiding thus did she rebuke me :
 " Obedience is the woman's part on earth,
 And patient suffering her appointed state ;
 By service hard must she approve her worth :
 Who serves below, shall there above be great."
 And therewith from her fell the pastoral garb,
 And in the splendour of the sunlight
 there
 She stood, the queenly majesty of heaven;
 And golden clouds enwrapped her, and she vanished,
 Gradual ascending to the land of bliss."

*Da zürnte sie, und scheltend sprach sie dieses Wort :
 ' Gehorsam ist des Weibes Pflicht auf Erden,
 Das harte Dulden ist ihr schwereres Loos ;
 Durch strengen Dienst muss sie geläutert werden ;
 Die hier gedienet, ist dort oben gross.'
 Und also sprechend liess sie das Gewand
 Der Hirtinn fallen, und als Königin
 Der Himmel stand sie da im Glanz der Sonnen,
 Und goldne Wolken trugen sie hinauf
 Langsam verschwindend in das Land der Wonnen."*

Burgundy and Isabel of Bavaria, which disclose both the internal state of their league, and the effect produced upon the confederate army by the appearance of Joanna, take up the former half of the act ; the latter part consists of battle scenes, in which Joanna appears, first, by her refusal to give quarter to the Welshman, Montgomery, who sues hard to her for his life, in the character of the merciless championess of heaven, in whom to show compassion would be sin ; and, secondly, in the character of peacemaker, by her persuading the Duke of Burgundy to withdraw from the English alliance, and to be reconciled to France ; an event which, it is well known, did not, as a matter of history, take place till long after the death of Joanna, but which is admirably suited to the purpose of the drama, and therefore introduced into it by an allowable poetic licence.

The third act is taken up chiefly with the meeting between Charles and the Duke of Burgundy, at which Joanna also is present : after the settlement of the high affairs of state the discourse is skilfully turned upon the Maid, whom the king ennobles, and for whose hand two competitors start up in the persons of Dunois and La Hire, which affords an opportunity of eliciting in the fullest manner the incompatibility of any thought of earthly love with Joanna's mission, and so prepares the way for the catastrophe which follows. The passage in which Joanna abjures all the softer emotions of her sex, is thus rendered by Miss Swanwick :

“ Art weary, Dauphin, of the heavenly vision,
That thou its vessel wouldst annihilate ?
The holy maiden sent to thee by God
Degrade, reducing her to common dust ?
Ye blind of heart ! O ye of little faith !
God's glory shines around you ; to your gaze
He doth reveal his wonders ; and ye see Nought but a woman in me. Dare a woman
Invest her tender frame in polish'd steel,
And boldly mingle in the rush of war ?
Woe, woe is me, if bearing in my hand
God's sword of vengeance, I in my vain heart
Cherish'd affection to a mortal man !
'Twere better for me I had ne'er been born.
I do conjure you, speak no more of this,
If thou wouldst not provoke the Spirit's wrath
Who in me dwells. The eye desiring me
To me is horror and profanity.”

At the close of this scene the action of the drama returns to the battle-field, when after the short but highly tragic episode of Talbot's death, Joanna is engaged in combat, first with a phantom of hell, which appears to her in the shape of a black knight, and gives her an oracular intimation that the tide of her power and greatness will turn at the coronation at Rheims; and afterwards with the English leader Lionel, whom she defeats, and is on the point of slaying, when, suddenly struck by the beauty of his countenance, as she tears down his helmet, she feels the weakness of earthly affection rising in her breast. This is the point on which, in the arrangement of Schiller's drama, the whole destiny of Joanna turns. She proceeds with the army to Rheims, but her heart is distracted by love and remorse. Feeling that she has proved faithless to her vow, and to the stern duty of her high mission, conscious, moreover, that he whom she loves, is the enemy of the cause for which she is sent to fight, she accuses herself of impiety to her God, and of base treason to her king and country. The pitiless slaughter which she has committed in the hour of her strength, rises up against her like the guilt of murder. She dares not to hold communion with her own heart, nor to meet the eye of those who surround her with every mark of love and reverence, and above all she has lost her confidence in the heavenly support in which she had hitherto felt so strong and so secure; the remembrance of her connexion with the invisible world fills her with a fearful anticipation of coming vengeance. It is in this mood that we find her at the opening of the fourth act, plunged into a state of deep melancholy, amid the festive preparations for the approaching coronation. The lyrics in which she pours forth her meditations and her grief, are replete with exquisite beauty and touches of deepest feeling, rendered but feebly even in Miss Swanwick's translation; but on this we have not room to dwell. Joanna is forced to take her place in the coronation procession, among the spectators of which her family and her neighbours appear. In the middle of the ceremony, Joanna, overpowered by her feelings, rushes forth from the cathedral, and being received in the arms of her sisters, the recollection which this meeting calls up, increases the agitation of her mind till it is raised to a state bordering on delirium. Meanwhile the ceremony being concluded, the procession returns from the cathedral; all eyes are now turned upon Joan, and at the moment when, amidst the acclamations of the multitude, the king addresses her in the language of worship rather than of human gratitude, she utters a piercing cry, having recognized her father in the crowd. The old man, who had always been suspicious of the character of her supernatural power, and whose misgivings have been confirmed by the agitation in which he has seen her hurrying from the house of God, now openly accuses her of being the confederate of hell. Joanna herself is silent;

neither to the challenges of her father, nor to the entreaties of her friends, nor to the adjuration of the archbishop, does she answer one word; and the scene, the stage effect of which is heightened by a succession of thunderclaps, closes with the announcement made to Joanna, on the part of the king, that she is at liberty to depart unmolested.

The multitude has been dispersed, Joanna is left alone, with but one companion, who does not doubt, and will not forsake her, Raimond, the lover of her youth. She allows herself to be conducted by him, an excommunicated outcast, shunned wherever she flies; but in the solitude of the Ardennes her fortitude and her faith return, and she, who was speechless before her accusers, gives assurance to her humble and faithful companion that her disgrace was but a trial imposed upon her by heaven, from which He who sent it will provide an escape for her. During her flight she falls into the hands of Isabel, who carries her to the English camp as her prisoner, while Raimond makes his escape to the French army, where a reaction in her favour has taken place, and where the earnest protestations and the simple narrative of the shepherd youth, speedily avail to arouse the leaders of the host, and foremost among them Dunois, to hasten to her rescue.

Meanwhile Joanna in captivity atones for the momentary weakness of her feelings. Lionel, in whose mind likewise a strong interest for her had been excited by the scene in which she refused to take his life, offers her freedom and his hand; but she is deaf to all his entreaties, and answers him only in the character of a heavenly messenger, bidding him repair the injuries inflicted on France by the English invaders. The fierce attack of the French, who have collected their forces under Dunois for her deliverance, compels Lionel to take the field, and Joanna remains in the custody of Isabel, in chains, and under a strong guard. A soldier from the top of the tower in which she is confined, informs the queen of the progress of the battle; and when Joanna hears that the French are routed, that Dunois is wounded, and the king himself in imminent danger, she sinks upon her knees, in fervent prayer, for a miraculous interposition of heaven. At this moment a shout of triumph resounds in the English camp; Charles is taken prisoner; when Joanna, with giant strength, bursts her fetters, and escaping through the midst of her astonished guards, once more rushes forth to the battle, and on the instant brings back victory to the host of France. But Joanna is mortally wounded, and expires on the field, in the arms of the king and the Duke of Burgundy.

We cannot resist the temptation of transcribing the closing lines in a version of our own, as neither of the versions before us is quite to our mind.

“ And is it true, then ? Am I with my people ?
And am no more rejected and despised ?
They curse me not ; kindly they look upon me !
Yes, now I clearly recognize it all.—
This is my king ! the banners these of France ;
But mine is not among them.—Where is that ?
Without my banner I may not appear.
My Lord committed it to me, and I
Before his throne must render it. I may Freely present it, for I bore it truly. . . .

She receives her flag, and continues :

See you the rainbow yonder in the air ?
Its golden portals heaven does unfold ;
There in th’ angelic choir she radiant stands,
The Son Eternal to her bosom clasped ;
Her arms to me in love she stretches forth.—
How do I feel !—Light clouds are lifting me ;—
A winged robe the ponderous armour grows.
Aloft—aloft—back flies the reeling earth—
Brief is the pang, eternal is the joy !”

Whether Schiller was justified in departing as completely as he has done from the historical truth of this remarkable episode in the annals of the world, is a question into which we will not enter further than to express our conviction that, in the hands of such a poet as he, the heroine of Orleans would have lost none of the interest attaching to her career, if the crown of Christian martyrdom had been superadded to her well-earned laurels. Certain it is that no one has ever seized her character as completely as Schiller ; nor does any part of his splendid poem contain a more graphic picture of the state of her mind, as it appears on the face of the historical documents now for the first time published,—reluctant to enter upon her career of greatness, and yet full of holy enthusiasm and of pious resolution,—than the stanzas at the conclusion of the prologue, in which she takes leave of the scenes of her youth, to go forth on her high errand ; and which will form the most appropriate conclusion to this tribute of our pen to the memory of Joan of Arc⁴ :—

⁴ We are again obliged to have recourse to a version of our own. Mr. Thompson’s rendering of these stanzas is altogether a failure. Instead of imitating the appropriate lyric stanzas of Schiller, he has lengthened them out, more suo, into epic Spenserian stanzas ; and the translation, if translation it can be called, is throughout so full of affectation, and so unfaithful to the original, that we do not “ Farewell ye mountains, and ye pastures lov'd ;

 Ye vallies lone and tranquil, fare ye well !
 Through you Joanna will no longer roam,
 Joanna now for aye bids you farewell.
 Ye meads which I have water'd oft, ye trees
 Which I have planted, be ye verdant still !
 Farewell, ye caves, ye fountains cool, farewell !
 And thou sweet echo, too, voice of the dale,
 Which ever wast responsive to my strain,
 Joanna parts, and ne'er returns again.

“ Ye haunts of mine, where I my heart did yield
 To silent joy, for aye from you I wend.
 Ye lambs, all o'er the heath now stray a-field,
 I may no longer guide you, nor defend.
 For far away, upon the bloody field
 Of danger, I another flock must tend.
 The Spirit's call of me this service claims,
 No vain, no earthly ardour me inflames.

think it worth while to reproduce it. Miss Swanwick has preserved the metre, but taken a liberty, in our opinion unwarrantable, with the arrangement of the rhymes ; her version is, as usual, simpler, closer to the original, and altogether superior ; yet it does not satisfy us. We subjoin it, together with the original :

*Lebt wohl, ihr Berge, ihr geliebten Triften,
 Ihr traulich stillen Thäler, lebet wohl !
 Johanna wird nun nicht mehr auf euch
 wandeln,
 Johanna sagt euch ewig Lebewohl.
 Ihr Wiesen, die ich wässerte ! Ihr Büume,
 Die ich gepflanzt ! Grünet fröhlich fort !
 Lebt wohl, ihr Grotten und ihr kühlen Brunnen !
 Du Echo, holde Stimme dieses Thals,
 Die oft mir Antwort gab auf meine Lieder,
 Johanna geht, und nimmer kehrt sie wieder.*

*Ihr Plätze alle meiner stillen Freuden,
 Euch lass ich hinter mir auf immerdar !
 Zerstreuet euch, ihr Lämmer, auf der Heiden !
 Ihr seid jetzt eine hirtelose Schaar,
 Denn eine andre Herde muss ich weiden,
 Dort auf dem blut'gen Felde der Gefahr.
 So ist des Geistes Ruf an mich ergangen ;
 Mich treibt nicht eitles, irdisches Verlangen.*

Farewell ye mountains, ye beloved glades,
 Ye silent peaceful valleys, fare ye well !
 Through you Johanna never more may stray,
 Johanna bids you all a long farewell.
 Ye meads in which I wander'd ! and ye trees,
 Which I have planted, bloom in beauty still !
 Farewell ye grottos and ye crystal springs !
 And thou, sweet vocal spirit of the vale,
 Who sang'st responsive to my simple strain,
 Johanna goes and ne'er returns again !

Ye scenes of all my peaceful heartfelt joys,
 For ever now I leave you far behind !
 My gentle lambs, poor flock without a fold,
 O'er the wide heath now wander unconfined ;
 For I am call'd another flock to tend,
 Where armies on the field of battle blend.
 This hath the holy Spirit's voice made known ;
 No earthly motive drives me forth alone.

“ For He, who did descend on Horeb’s height
 To Moses once, in flaming fire enshrin’d,
 And bade him stand before proud Egypt’s might ;
 Who Jesse’s son of old, the pious hind,
 His champion chose and headman of the fight,
 Who aye to shepherds has been wondrous kind ;
 He from these spreading branches spake to me,
 ‘ Go forth ! thou shalt on earth my witness be.

“ ‘ Round thy soft limbs rude armour thou must bear ⁵,
 Thy gentle bosom all in steel encase ;
 No man must e’er thy heart with visions fair
 Of love beguile and earthly happiness ;
 No bridal wreath thou in thy locks shalt wear,
 Nor to thy breast a smiling infant press.
 In martial gear triumphant shalt thou ride,
 Above all earth-born maidens glorified.

*Denn der zu Mosen auf des Horebs Höhen Im feur’gen Busch sich flammend nieder-liess,
 Und ihm befahl, vor Pharao zu stehen,
 Der einst den frommen Knaben Isai’s,
 Den Hirten, sich zum Streiter ausersahen,
 Der stets den Hirten gnädig sich bewies,
 Er sprach zu mir aus dieses Baumes
 Zweigen :
 ‘ Geh hin ! du sollst auf Erden für mich
 zeugen.*

For He who once on Horeb’s sacred height
 Appear’d to Moses in the bush of
 flame,
 And bade him go and stand in Pharaoh’s sight,—
 He who to Israel’s pious shepherd came,
 And sent him forth his champion in the fight,—
 He who hath ever loved the shepherd train,
 Thus whisper’d from the branches of this tree,
 “ Go forth ! thou shalt on earth my witness be.

*‘ In rauhes Erz sollst du die Glieder schnüren,
 Mit Stahl bedecken deine zarte Brust ;
 Nicht Männerliebe darf dein Herz berüh-
 ren,
 Mit sünd’gen Flammen eitler Erdenlust.
 Nie wird der Brautkranz deine Locken
 zieren,
 Dir blüht kein lieblich Kind an deiner
 Brust ;
 Doch werd’ ich dich mit kriegerischen
 Ehren,
 Vor allen Erdenfrauen dich verklären.*

“ Rude armour now must clothe thy tender frame,
 Thy bosom heave beneath a plate of steel.
 No mortal there may kindle earthly
 flame,
 Thy heart the glow of passion ne’er
 may feel,
 For thee no hand the bridal wreath shall twine,
 No smiling infant on thy knee be nursed,
 But war’s triumphant glory shall be thine,
 And thou of women shalt be deem’d the first.

⁵ M. Soumet has imitated this stanza in the following lines :—

*“ Il faut d’un dur acier que mon front s’entourne :
 L’hymen, pour mes cheveux, n’aura point de couronne.*

“ ‘ For when weak fear the stoutest shalt dismay,
 And fast approach the doom of France renown’d,
 Then high shalt thou my oriflamme display,
 And, as the reap’ress swift mows to the ground
 The corn, shalt low the haughty victor lay ;
 His fortune’s prosperous wheel shalt thou turn round,
 To the heroic sons of France shalt bring Salvation, rescue Rheims and crown thy king.’ ”

“ He who thus spake, bade me expect a sign ;
 And here it is : the helmet⁶ comes from Him ;
 Its iron touch fills me with strength divine,
 With ardour bold of flaming cherubim ;
 I’m carried onward in the fray to join,
 As if by tempest or impetuous stream ;
 The war-whoop wild all other thoughts confounds,
 High rears the charger, and the trumpet sounds.”

‘ *Denn wenn im Kampf die Muthigsten verzagen,
 Wenn Frankreichs letztes Schicksal nun
 sich naht,
 Dann wirst du meine Oriflamme tragen,
 Und, wie die rasche Schnitterinn die Saat,
 Den stolzen Ueberwinder niederschlagen ;
 Umwälzen wirst du seines Glückes Rad, Errettung bringen Frankreich’s Helden-söhnen,
 Und Rheims befreyn und deinen König
 krönen !*’

“ For when the most courageous hearts despair,
 When humbled France is just about to yield,
 Then thou my conquering oriflamme shalt bare,
 And, like a reaper in the harvest field,
 Mow down the haughty victors to the ground ;
 Thou soon shalt turn the wheel of fortune round,
 To Gaul’s heroic sons deliverance bring,
 Relieve beleaguer’d Rheims, and crown
 the king.”

*Ein Zeichen hat der Himmel mir verheissen ;
 Er sendet mir den Helm, er kommt von ihm,
 Mit Götterkraft berühret mich sein Eisen,
 Und mich durchflammt der Muth der Cherubim ;
 Ins Kriegsgewühl hinein will es mich
 reißen,
 Es treibt mich fort mit Sturmes Ungestüm ;
 Den Feldruf hör’ ich mächtig zu mir
 dringen,
 Das Schlachtross steigt, und die Trompeten klingen.*

The holy Spirit promised me a sign ;
 He sends the helmet,—it hath come from Him ;
 Its touch endues me as with strength
 divine ;
 I feel the courage of the cherubim !
 It drives me forth the din of war to find,
 Its power impels me like the rushing wind ;
 I hear the charger’s neigh, the trumpet’s sound,
 And the loud war-cry echo shrilly round.

*Je ne serai point mère ; offert à mon baiser,
 Nul enfant sur mon sein ne viendra reposer.
 Mon cœur doit ignorer l’amour ; mais, en partage,
 Du laurier des combats je ceindrai l’héritage !
 Dieu me parle . . . sa voix retentit aujourd’hui.”*

ENGLISH gentlewomen of the present day are little likely to err for want of advice. Counsel, such as it is, abounds; it can be had by the pound, by the hundredweight, or the ton; by duodecimo, octavo, or quarto, as it may be required. "Hints," "Strictures," "Letters," "Remarks," "Essays," on female education or female character have been perpetually bubbling forth from the press for the last few voluminous generations. Hannah More, Mrs. Sandford, Miss Edgeworth, Miss Hamilton, Mrs. Ellis, these are but a few of the governesses of the sex. Mrs. Ellis alone has given birth to a complete library for women. Advice is ever trickling—nay, streaming from her pen. "Women of England," "Mothers of England," "Daughters of England," have each their respective volumes of advice; while "coming" volumes "cast their shadows before," and to complete the set, we are threatened with some special lecturings of governesses and old maids. By that time she will have gone round all the points of the compass, N., N.E., N.N.E., and so on. She will have circumnavigated the female world; every variety of female condition will have had its separate book; the Ellis-ium will be complete; and even the ingenuity of the most inveterate bookmaker will fail to find another peg to hang any further advice upon. By that time, too, we doubt not, her powers, like her subjects, will be exhausted, and her strength spent; for we confess that we already discern a strong disposition to "water in the brain."

Now among the more direct preceptors of women we must notice a decided tendency to prose, to vapour, to linger on through pointless pages of ponderous sentimentality, smacking the whip of instruction through the long stages of their tedious Diligence, dawdling over their precepts, and drawing them out until, like some tall, overgrown boy, their strength has evaporated in their length. There is much attempt at what is called "fine writing" and fine sentiment, and we have to wade through a series of bombastic passages, in style a cross between poetry and prose, which after all yield us no better matter than a few turgid truisms swollen into an apparent importance.

Of the most popular works, Mrs. Sandford's "Woman in her Social and Domestic Character" takes a prominent place; it has reached the sixth edition; and yet a more unsatisfactory production we cannot conceive. It is a marvel that it contrives to live; it can be but the life of a living skeleton; it has neither strength, nor sinew, nor blood, nor warmth; the ideas "to water run;" it is a somniferous book, written with laudanum, not with ink. We can imagine the well-intended authoress nodding as she wrote, dragging her drowsy pen from page to page, till she had reached the appointed bulk; it is without order, method, or fixed principle; it is not ridiculous; it is not wise; sometimes it speaks about "elegance," sometimes about religion, sometimes about "romance." Her religious views are shapeless and indistinct; we seem to be reading through gauze, or to be walking in a fog; we see nothing definitely; we get no precise ideas, no details; there are vague outlines around us; like a mass of stone fresh from the quarry, designed for the statue of a man, without form or feature or proportion, capable of being chiselled into the likeness of a man, but not yet a likeness; so is Mrs. Sandford's view of religion: there is much sentimentalizing on the subject, but no instruction in positive duties, no mention of the means of grace. How we become Christians, how we are kept in the faith, are matters left wholly in the dark. With the exception of a few incidental remarks, there is nothing said of prayer, of the sacraments, of the Church as a Divine institution, of self-examination, of devout meditation, of any course of active charity. With such subjects left out, and yet much mention of the Christian religion, what sort of book must it be? something swinging between the world and the Church, too dull and moralizing for the one, too vague and lifeless for the other.

Hannah More's "Strictures on Female Education" is an infinitely better work; indeed we must candidly confess it is the best book as yet upon the subject. Strange to say, she is somewhat too heathenish and classical in her illustrations, and reminds us of our early "themes" at school, in which it was always necessary to give an "example," as it was called; whereupon, Aristides, Pericles, Brutus, or Epaminondas, were marched out, as they seemed to fit the subject, the stale and hacknied samples that were handed down from one race of theme-manufacturers to another. So is it with Hannah More. Her style, too, is sententious and diffuse; her work wants compression; her ideas are hooped out with over many words, a common fault among female writers. We need not say that her religious views are defective. But still, amid much that is defective, we do get some positive ideas of women's duties as members of Christ; we do get a clear and distinct notion of "the world," that there is such a thing, that it must be renounced, with its pomps and vanities. She writes in a higher and more decided strain. She speaks of holy baptism; she speaks of it as a sacrament binding us to a strict life, as that which must be kept in view in every true system of education. She has chapters "on Prayer," "on the Influence of the Spirit," "on the Doctrines of Christianity," "on a Worldly Spirit," "on Dissipation," "on the Necessity of Holiness," "on the Existence of our Spiritual Enemy." Though we may not agree with every remark on these topics, yet these are the topics that ought to be discussed in such a work; here is something higher and better than the cold meanderings of Mrs. Sandford.

But Hannah More's is an old book; her popularity has waned; and we must therefore hasten to speak of the great modern writer upon women, who has hold of the present attention of the sex, the incomprehensibly popular Mrs. Ellis. About fifty years have passed since the publication of the "Strictures on Female Education." We might have expected improvement by this time; but, instead of rising, we have sunk; instead of advancing, we recede; we descend to Mrs. Ellis. She doses us with weak dilutions of Hannah More. She has shaken Hannah More's thoughts in her own sieve, and given us the bran; the best part is left out; there is more bulk, but less matter. Hannah More was somewhat defective, and Mrs. Sandford vague, but Mrs. Ellis is vaguer and more defective still; we can get no notions from her what "the world" is; the condemnation of the world is faint. Godliness and worldliness are patched together, now a stratum of the one, now a stratum of the other; or rather the world is stuccoed over with a sort of sentimental religion in front. There is a sort of Christianity, which is the very essence of vagueness. As if afraid of what is called "a sectarian bias," as if she would not be classified with any body of Christians, as if she believed there was no such thing as schism, and no such thing as a Church, she keeps with the utmost wariness on the broad road of unmeaning and unpractical generalities. We accordingly grasp no certain notions of duty, no definite view of the truth; she asserts no doctrines; she suggests no system of action; we hear a constant buzzing in our ears, but we cannot catch any articulate sounds. A young person would not know what to do, or where to begin, or how to obtain help in a religious course, if Mrs. Ellis were her only guide. "Go, be good!" "Go, be Christian women!" "How beautiful is religion!" This is the strain of her exhortations: no tangible view of Christianity is presented to the mind; she does not commit herself to any single definite principle; hers are books for the million; they will form no character, nor give any decisive shape to character; they will not satisfy warm, earnest spirits, thirsting for a complete devotion of themselves to the law of Christ; they will spread a sort of loose, easy, indefinite religion over the multitude; they will please that large mass of persons who do not want any thing strict and positive, who do not want quite to give up the world, nor yet quite to live without God. There are no chapters on prayer, on the sacraments, on the doctrines of Christianity, on daily self-denial, on visiting the sick and poor, on almsgiving. And yet those who would lead spiritual lives must live by rule; they must have details of duty; they must have definite plans of life pointed out; they must set themselves particular tasks, in order to form habits either of devotion or of holiness. Mrs. Ellis gives no helps where helps are wanted; she goes murmuring on about religion; but her mouth is closed when we ask for details, when we want to discover what she means.

And yet, with a strange perversity, as she leaves out details where details are wanted, so, where they are not wanted, she puts them in; she has chapters on "Love," "Courtship," and "Flirtation." Think of a chapter on "Flirtation," in what is said to be a Christian work! Surely we ought rather to form general principles of seriousness, sobriety, earnestness in the soul, and then leave these principles to operate, instead of wasting time in discussing these results of frivolity and light-mindedness. Teach women to be holy as members of Christ; supply them with all helps for the formation of a serious character, and we may then trust them to comport themselves in all circumstances as those who have to give account for every idle word. A section on "Flirtation" is both monstrous and absurd. By the devout it will not be wanted; by the frivolous it will not be read.

As a specimen of the looseness and laxity of Mrs. Ellis's views, her inclination to please all readers, her fears of over-much strictness, her ignorance of the true doctrine of the Cross, she speaks thus :—

“A Christian woman has made her decision not to live for herself, so much as for others ; but, above all, not to live for this world, so much as for eternity. The question then arises,—What means are to be adopted in the pursuit of this most desirable end ? Some of my young readers will be disposed to exclaim, ‘Why, this is but the old story of giving up the world and all its pleasures!’ But let them not be too hasty in their conclusions. It is not a system of giving up, which I am about to recommend to them, so much as one of attaining.”

And this is a great, self-appointed teacher of women, a Christian teacher ! Thus does she speak of the words of Holy Scripture as “the old story ;” thus does she tell her young readers, that though our Saviour charges us to give up the world, hers is not a system of giving up. She does not, perhaps, herself realize the force of her own expressions, or mean exactly what she says ; but surely she is unfitted for a preceptress who can, over and over again, print and stereotype such language.

Of the Church she has not the shadow of a notion, nor of any spiritual society or spiritual brotherhood : this would involve some definite statements ; and so, as a Universalist, as a popular writer, she makes no mention of spiritual membership one of another, or fellowship. She cannot, indeed, make her women isolated beings ; she must, in bidding them to “live for others,” make them members of some sort of body or society, that their sympathies may be exercised ; and so she chooses the State, the Body Politic, as being more universal than the Body Christian. “In the first place, you are not alone,” she says ; “you are one of a family—of a social circle—of a community—of a nation.” Mark the expansion of her sympathies, the widening of the circle. The family sympathy enlarges into social sympathy ; social sympathy into community sympathy ; and the climax of all is the sympathy of the patriot, the sense of being fellow-Englishwomen, members of the same State ! We hear nothing of fellow-citizenship of the saints, or of the household of faith, or of the Body of Christ, “which is the Church.”

What she is we know not ; we know what she is not,—not a member of the Church ; though we judge, of course, only by her writings, being wholly ignorant of her personal history ; nay, she may be a fabulous personage altogether, like Peter Plymley ; and so we mean her no personal disrespect. Her “Universalism” will be evident from the following passage :—

“Much may be done by a judicious mother, where subjects of sectarian interest are under discussion, to ward off the attention of the young from the extreme importance attached by persons generally to different forms of government or modes of worship. Much may also be done by a mother, to impress upon the minds of her children that the religious sect to which their parents belong is preferred by them, not because it is perfect in itself, or more owned by God, as regards the tokens of His especial favour, but because the views and principles upon which it is founded are most in accordance with their own, and consequently afford them more support and satisfaction than any other."

Once, indeed, she allows herself to praise a particular body; and on this occasion she sets those worldly and almost most unscriptural religionists, the Quakers, as models to Christian mothers!

"If it were possible for the world in general to be made acquainted with their (the Quakeresses') hidden virtues—perhaps more virtuous because they are hidden—I believe there would be found much among them that would encourage the mothers of England to educate their daughters upon a system, which, while it detracts nothing from the loveliness and gentleness of female character, places it upon a firmer foundation, as regards strong principle and moral feeling."

It is, as we have said, the fatal fault of this writer that she intends to be popular. We can only account for the voracity of the female world in devouring as many as twenty editions of one of her works, and requiring a "Marriage-day edition, in white Morocco," of another, from the fact, that a certain number of women, sincerely seeking to improve themselves, purchase every work especially addressed to them; and that a still larger number are ever ready to deceive themselves with that mixed sort of life, partly religious and partly worldly, which Mrs. Ellis decidedly encourages. Never, however, will she raise her readers above a cold respectability; no true spiritualizing of her sex will follow her labours: there is nothing more fatal to spiritual growth, to spiritual knowledge, or to earnest practice, than this indefiniteness in works of instruction.

To go any further into these writings would be unprofitable; nay, it would be difficult to proceed, for this authoress so jolts us from one line of thought to another that the mind goes through a series of rapid dislocations. In one chapter, we are considering "Moral Courage and Worldly-mindedness;" in the next, we have lectures about physic, children's digestions, riding, and "the habits of the horse." We must content ourselves with a few words upon the style of her compositions. She seems unable to write in a plain, natural way,—to put her thoughts into simple and unaffected language; the rhythm of her sentences has the uneasy motion of a horse that is cantering with his fore legs and trotting with his hind : this is always the case with the high-flown style. To use her own poetry against herself, originally designed as a condemnation of Dr. Johnson, she is guilty of “ Taxing the ear with endless pomp of sound.”

Her style, however, is her least defect : if the matter of her works was worthy of the subject, and tended to produce sound and decided piety in the gentlewomen of the age, we would greet her compositions with a profound pleasure, whatever her style might be.

It would be needless to speak of any less celebrated works of a kindred character. They are chiefly written by women ; and we doubt much whether women are the best direct preceptors of women. Those not of their own body, external to themselves, are most likely to write such works with success. We are yet in want of a plain, grave, earnest work ; taking a high standard ; of a strong and practical character ; free from twaddling ; helping rightly to mould the souls of women, and to strengthen their understandings. Such a work would be seized upon with eagerness ; for, among a great multitude of readers, Mrs. Ellis only floats by sufferance. We should like to see something after the style of “ Theophilus Anglicanus ;” or, rather, a work divided into two parts,—the one doctrinal, the other practical. We are sure that a strong-minded book of the kind would be now received with thankfulness, and would work an infinity of good ; for we believe that there is a considerable body of women among the higher classes, thirsting for guidance in the right way, not to be satisfied with the mawkish generalities of the Sandford and Ellis school.

In indirect teaching, however, our women have fared better ; and here, we must observe, the powers of literary women can be more profitably exercised. We cannot speak too highly of the admirable fictions of “ Amy Herbert,” “ Gertrude,” and “ Laneton Parsonage.” We should like to have “ Gertrude” read, once every year, throughout the female world. And not only in fiction, but in biography, female writers have been successfully at work for their own sex. Such a volume as “ English Churchwomen of the Seventeenth Century” has told and must tell ; there is always something singularly attractive in seeing, as it were, the embodiment of precepts ; in seeing theories worked out in actual character. To mould oneself after a book is a hard and often disheartening attempt ; but to mould oneself after an actual person, a being of like flesh and blood and passions with ourselves, not a cold abstraction, is a more hopeful task ; there is something chilling in mere rules, and precepts, and theories, unless we have some real person before our minds' eye who has actually fulfilled "these fair-sounding rules." We, therefore, recommend such of our female readers as desire to have some helps for their own better conversation, to study the women of former times: and we shall make no apology for endeavouring to whet their appetite for such a task by laying before them a series of extracts from the biographical work we have just mentioned; not as furnishing a complete view of the women of the seventeenth century, which the volume itself alone can do, but as showing some important features in their character.

Of Lady Falkland, the first in the list, we read thus:—

"That she set out early in the ways of God, in the dawn and morning of her age. . . . While she was very young she paid an exact obedience to her parents . . . that her time might not be misspent nor her employments tedious to her, the several hours of the day had a variety of employments assigned to them; intermixing of prayers, reading, writing, working and walking, brought a pleasure to each of them.

"Whilst she was very young, she worked a purse to hold her own alms, and would beg for money from her mother to fill it, as eagerly emptying it again for the poor who came to her father's house, and who seldom left it without alms from the young daughter, as well as from her parents. She was at this time constant in her private prayers; and when strangers occupied her own room to which she commonly retired, she would ask the steward for the key of some other room for that purpose, at her hour of prayer.

"Nothing could hinder her from holy assemblies; every Lord's day constantly, forenoon and afternoon, she would be there among the earliest; and when she had no other means of going, she would walk cheerfully three or four miles a day, young and tender as she then was; and at night, she reckoned the joy and refreshment of which her soul had been partaker a sufficient recompense for the extreme weariness of her body."

After her marriage with Sir Lucius Carey, afterwards Lord Falkland,

"When possession was given her of stately palaces, pleasantly situated, and most curiously and fully furnished, and of revenues answerable, her friends could never perceive that her heart was exalted by any of them, while she acknowledged God's great goodness towards her in giving them. Thus some years passed, during which time she was most constant at prayers and sermons, and frequently received the blessed Sacrament; and though now and then she did not feel her usual spiritual comforts, but instead of them had some anguish and bitterness of spirit, yet, by the advice of good divines, and by her ordinary help of prayer, she soon recovered her peace and joy."

Upon her husband's death, in 1643, who fell fighting valiantly at the battle of Newbury in the king's cause,

"She received the blow as a loud call from heaven to further advancement in holiness. She then addressed herself to a divine of great eminence for piety and learning, and from him she took directions for a more strict course of life in this her widowhood, than she had hitherto pursued. Though the greatest part of her Christian work was locked up close within herself, and some of it carefully concealed for fear of vain-glory, yet much of it appeared by the effects, and so came abroad for the good of others.

"Her first and great employment was to read and understand, and then, to the utmost of her strength, to practise, our blessed Saviour's 'Sermon on the Mount' . . . beginning with those virtues to which the Beatitudes are annexed. Her mercifulness was one of those virtues which she could not conceal from observation; much of her estate went yearly to such of her relations as were in need of her assistance; some of her near neighbours, who were too old or too young for work, were wholly maintained by her; to other poor children she contributed much, both for their spiritual and temporal well-being, by building a school, where they were taught to read and work. It was her great care in the management of her estate that no man, woman, or child should want employment, and to this she had more regard than to her own profit, as by such constant work, she kept them both from want and idleness.

"She would also send plentiful relief to prisoners and needy persons at London and Oxford, with a strict charge that it should not be known from whence it came, and it was not till after her death that these charities came to light. Nor was her mercifulness bounded within the limits of friends, but extended to her enemies; for when many of them were taken prisoners by the king's soldiers, she consulted how she might send relief.

"Her mercifulness was constantly exercised towards the sick; she spent large sums of money every year in providing antidotes against infection, cordials, and various sorts of medicines, which she distributed among her neighbours, attending herself to their wants with skill and care, hiring nurses when they were required, frequently visiting the poorest cottagers, waiting on their sick beds, and carrying books of spiritual exhortations which she read to them with words of holy counsel.

"Her maids came into her chamber early every morning, and usually passed an hour with her, when she prayed, catechized, and instructed. To this were daily added the Morning and Evening Prayers of the Church, before dinner and supper, together with reading the Scriptures and singing Psalms, before bed-time. She charged her servants to be present at all these hours of prayer, if their business allowed of it, but never suffered any one to be absent from all the services; if she observed any such, she sent for them into her chamber and prayed with them privately, making it a rule that at least every morning or evening, every servant in her house should offer the sacrifice of prayer and praises to God.

“On the Lord’s day she rose earlier than on other days, but often found the day too short for her private duties and instructions of her children and servants. . . . In order also to prepare herself for the Sunday’s duty beforehand, she sequestered herself on the Saturday from company and worldly business. . . . She punctually observed the other Holy-days of the Church, and after the public service, she released her servants to their recreations, and the care of their own concerns. . . . On these days of rest, she went with her books to her unlearned neighbours, who were at leisure to hear her read, whilst their plough and their wheel stood still.

“She strictly observed the fasts of the Church. . . . She was very careful in preparing herself to receive the Lord’s Supper; often at such times fears and scruples arose within her, tending to keep her back from that heavenly banquet; but having cause on examination, and after advising with her minister, to consider them temptations from the devil, she put them by, and presented herself with an humbling and trembling heart at that blessed Sacrament. . . . She exhorted all her servants to accompany her to the Sacrament, and those who were prevailed upon, gave in their names two or three days before, that she might instruct them herself, and obtain the help of her chaplains to examine them and instruct them further.”

In an interesting letter addressed to her friend and chaplain Duncan,

“Now I miss,” she says, “those opportunities I had at court and at the cathedral—nay, it is not here so well with me as it was when you and I lived together in that country village, where the good parson had morning and evening prayer in the parish church twice a day continually: where I now live, we have this advantage of public prayer only on the Lord’s day and its eve, and on Holy-days and their eves, and on Wednesdays and Fridays, our wonted Litany days.”

Darkened as her spirit was by occasional clouds of constitutional melancholy, the death of a hopeful son added to her heaviness; but this affliction also she looked upon as a call to greater godliness: and when her sorrow seemed inclined to be somewhat too severe, she many times opened out the state of her soul to the excellent divine who had advised her after her husband’s death. Sometimes this melancholy, increased by her affliction, almost overcame her, especially as her bodily health, always weak, began to fail. She increased her mortifications, dispensed with all pomp, and was more than ever careful of her words and actions:—

“That which more astonished the inmates of her house, was to see this noble lady begging forgiveness from her inferiors and servants, for her angry words or chiding frowns towards them ; and sometimes asking their pardon when she had expressed no anger outwardly, because, said she, ' somewhat I felt within myself too like anger towards you, though I suppressed it as soon as I could.' More than once or twice she was in her closet upon her knees ready for her prayers, when she remembered that her ' brother ' might have possibly somewhat against her, for a word, or a look, or a negligent silence a little while before, and then she arose and went to ask pardon before she proceeded with her prayers.

"As she drew near to her end, so did her deadness to the world increase. When her last sickness seized her, she strengthened herself by continual prayer and frequent reception of the Lord's Supper ; her fits of extreme depression, which she looked upon as great temptations of Satan, left her, and though ' she was wont to fear his most violent assaults on her death-bed,' she then enjoyed great tranquillity. ' This quiet,' says her good chaplain Duncan, in describing her death, ' gave her leave, though now very weak and faint, to be most vigorous and most instant at prayers ; she calls for other help very faintly ; but for prayers, most heartily and often ; and after the office of the morning was performed, she gave strict charge that every one of her family, who could be spared from her, should go to church and pray for her ; and then in a word of exhortation to them who stayed by her, saying, " Fear God, fear God," she most sweetly spent her last breath ; and so most comfortably yielded up her spirit to Him who made it. In which moment of her death there seemed as little outward pain as inward conflict ; none could perceive either twitch, or groan, or gasp, or sigh, only her spirit failed ; and so she vanished from us. Thus in her youth she was soon perfected, and in the short time of five-and-thirty years she fulfilled a long time.' "

From this deeply interesting character let us turn to Lady Capel, whose husband, praised in parliament by Cromwell, and yet condemned, suffered on the scaffold with so much Christian heroism.

"It was in March, 1649, that Lord Capel was beheaded, and his wife survived him the eleven following years of Cromwell's usurpation. In her widowhood she occupied herself in the care of her children and household, in works of devotion and charity, spending money in alms, even beyond the advice of the clergyman whom she employed as her almoner, obeying and assisting the ministers of the Church during the times of trouble, and devoting part of every day to the exercise of prayer, meditation, study of the Scriptures, and reading, from which she never suffered herself to be diverted by business or company.

"About four years before her death she lost her second son, Charles, then grown up to be a gallant and hopeful young gentleman, when she sent for her spiritual adviser, Mr. Barker, as she habitually did on any occasion of grief, and addressed him in these words, 'Sir, I pray be free and plain with me, and tell me seriously what sin or vice did you ever take notice of in my practice and conversation? for I am sure something is amiss, and something God would have amended in me, that He does thus continually ply me with crosses.'

"As she was patient in her afflictions, and careful to improve them, so she was diligent in fulfilling her duties, and received strength to go through all that was required of her, notwithstanding the delicacy of her education and tenderness of her constitution. In her family devotions she required the attendance of all her servants, on which point only she showed herself a strict mistress, and would tell Mr. Barker that she never pleased herself in her family duties, nor thought that she served God acceptably, unless she had all her family about her.

"Towards the latter part of her last sickness, she twice received the blessed Sacrament of the body and blood of Christ, and both times with expressions of devotion and reverence; on the first of these two occasions, especially, when though her strength was much decayed, and her pain sharp, she would receive upon her knees, saying to Mr. Barker, that as long as God lent her the use of her knees, she resolved to use them in that solemn service, as a testimony of her unfeigned humility, and reverence of the majesty of those sacred mysteries.

"On January 26th, she sent for him four several times to pray with her, thrice in the morning, and once in the afternoon, at which last time all her children, except one who was not then in town, were present, and joined in the prayers. Soon after he was summoned again, to perform his last ministerial office, the recommendation of her soul into the hands of Almighty God, and then her senses beginning to fail, she drew her last breath a few minutes afterwards in much peace and sweetness."

After this brief notice we will turn next to Lady Mary Wharton,

"Who began without delay to perform her baptismal vow, finding those vanities in which her equals often took delight, only a burden and grievance. . . . She was never tainted with novel opinions, but well acquainted with and tenacious of the form of sound words contained in Holy Scripture, and as they are taught in the Church of England, whereof she was a true and dutiful child, and was never moved by any arguments with which members of the Church of Rome endeavoured to make an impression upon her.

"She studied the Scriptures, and copied largely from them for her own use, increasing her knowledge by the writings of the best divines. . . . Besides her diligent and unwearied reading, . . . she constantly observed her designed and stated time of secret prayer. In which, if she were at any time hindered by entertainment of friends, &c., yet would she redeem time, even from her sleep, rather than shorten her accustomed devotions.

"She was so much affected by the thought of God's loving-kindness to her, that she could not forbear to speak of it in her private discourses with her friends. She would often do this in conversing with Mr. Watkinson, who came to the rectory of Edlington in Yorkshire, whilst she was living there. Upon her first acquaintance, when he was but newly settled in the rectory, she said one day, whilst alone with him, 'Sir, God hath sent you hither to take care of our souls; therefore I entreat you, that you would not spare faithfully to reprove whatever you shall see amiss in me.' He resolved, upon this encouragement, to deal freely with her, if occasion offered; but he observed such a uniform regard to duty and care of her deportment at all times, and towards all persons, that during the rest of her life, he could find nothing in her worthy of reproof.

"Mr. Watkinson, in describing her character, goes through all the parts of it in relation to her duty towards God and man. . . . Sincerity, modesty, simplicity in dress, temperance in food, hospitality, diligence, charity, evenness of temper, willingness to ask pardon, attendance at public worship, attention to sermons, reverence to the ministers of God, and to his holy Sacraments, so that whenever an infant was baptized, she rejoiced in seeing its admission to Christ's Church, and joining in prayer with the congregation; nor would she lose one opportunity of receiving the Lord's Supper, when (at the feast of Easter) it was more frequently administered.

"The last time she ever received this holy Sacrament was on June 9, 1672, on which occasion she came out of the house, after being long confined to it by want of strength, and from this time she never left the house again. She had once received the Communion in private, during her confinement, but had a longing desire to receive it in the public congregation. That morning she rose two hours earlier than for a long time she had done before; the day was rugged, and the air cold, so that she probably increased her disorder. Her husband having conducted her to the church, after the sermon she received the Sacrament with more than ordinary devotion; on her return home she retired to her chamber, which she never left again, but died ten days after."

We will next proceed to give a few extracts from the life of Lady Halket, who, together with her sister, had the advantage of a religious education, for—

"Their mother's chiefest care was to instruct her children in the principles and practice of religion, teaching them to begin and end every day with prayer and reading a portion of Scripture in order, and daily to attend the church as often as there was occasion to meet there, either for prayers or preaching."

"She began the second period of her life, her youth, with a personal dedication of herself to God, renewing and confirming her baptismal vows; this she frequently repeated, but more solemnly every year on her birthday, when she reviewed her former life, confessed her sins, returned thanks for the mercies she had received, and made resolutions for living more strictly, asking for help to keep them. She now read the Scriptures, which in childhood had been her task, as her own choice and delight. She went regularly through them every year.

“ Her charitable disposition led her early to apply herself to the study of physic and preparing medicines, which might be useful in common cases of illness and of accidents, especially for the benefit of the poor.”

During the public disturbances of that unhappy period, previous to Charles' death—

“ She was instant in her private humiliations, fastings, and prayers, making the Psalms the subject of her meditation, as they afforded most suitable directions for regulating her thoughts and prayers.”

After the king's death, she stayed at Fife near two years in great content.

“ Here she applied herself to the delightful exercise of meditation ; and it was also a pleasant diversion to her to prepare things useful for the sick and wounded persons, of whom a great many came to her.”

Her marriage with Sir James Halket seems to have been a most happy one :

“ That which was the firm bond of their concord and mutual comfort in one another, was sincere religious disposition, which they mutually cherished and increased in one another.”

Troubles, however, soon came upon her ; she lost all her children but one, and then her husband :

“ The first time she went to bed after his death, she awakened out of sleep with these words in her mouth, ‘ A widow indeed ! ’ which made such impression upon her, that she could not be satisfied till she found the place where it was wrote. She fixed her thoughts on the characters there given of a widow indeed, resolving to make them her example. . . As a Christian, she resolved to learn that first lesson, to be meek and lowly in heart. As a mother, she pitched on the examples of Lois and Eunice. As a widow, she fixed on that fore-mentioned passage (1 Tim. v. 2. 5. 10) . . . She considered with herself that God was pleased in a peculiar manner to show his regard and compassion to the sad and solitary condition of widows. . . . She thought, therefore, that in gratitude they ought to be singular in their devotion to God, and in zeal for his ‘ honour and glory ; ’ and she felt that ‘ the virtues proper to holy widows are, perfect modesty, renouncing all honours and all sorts of vanities, serving the poor and sick, comforting the afflicted, instructing young maids in devotion, and making themselves a pattern of all virtue to young women.’

“ She set apart every Saturday, being the day of her husband's death, for retirement, devotion, and abstinence . . . and to be employed in examining and reviewing the past week in acts of charity and mercy." She resolved "that if she recovered her patrimony, she would dedicate a tenth of all to charity . . . She never ate her morsel alone, the fatherless and indigent widow shared with her; her kitchen and table sustained many poor families; her still-house was an expensive business, and the apothecaries' accounts were considerable every year. . . She greatly delighted in frequent Communion; and not having in Scotland that desirable occasion every month, as in England, she endeavoured to make up that want by laying hold of all opportunities which offered yearly, not only in her own parish, but in all the churches round about, within three or four miles . . . Her piety had nothing of moroseness or affectation, but was free and ingenuous, full of sweetness and gentleness, which made it amiable and impressive . . . She much delighted in God's house and the public worship, and was a conscientious observer of the Lord's day; and hath made this remark, that, according to her frame and temper that day, such was her disposition the week following. She was careful that all her family served the Lord; and when she wanted a chaplain, performed the offices of morning and evening prayer herself, enjoining them private devotion. She was very moderate in her sentiments about disputable points, sadly regretting the divisions and animosities occasioned among Christians by them. Though she heartily approved the doctrine and worship of the Church of England, . . . yet she complied with all the forms of the country where God had cast her lot, finding the essentials of religion the same in both. Being deprived of all her regular opportunities of communicating, by the deprivation of the Scotch clergy in 1690, she communicated spiritually on those days on which she had been accustomed to receive the Communion in church. She did heartily pity and pray for those who did separate and cause divisions; and though she was much displeased with their courses, as offensive to God, . . . yet in all offices of charity and mercy she made no difference, but as she had opportunity did good unto all, especially to them of the household of faith.

"She divided the twenty-four hours into three parts, allotting five for devotion, ten for necessary refreshment, nine for business; . . . yet she did not confine her devotion to these stated hours, but all the day long, however employed, she endeavoured to keep up a spiritual frame; and in the night-time, when she did awake, she was still with God, had then her meditations, her songs and prayers. She ministered cordials and medicines every Wednesday to a multitude of poor infirm persons.

"Notwithstanding her many difficulties, she was generally of a cheerful temper, pleasant countenance, and always of an obliging behaviour . . . ever projecting to make others better by her converse, yet managing it in such an humble manner, as if she designed rather to receive than give instruction. She had a singular dexterity to divert and shuffle out unprofitable talking, and introduce serious discourse; which if she could not effect, she would then pleasantly converse with God and her own soul in the midst of company, without discovering herself or disturbing them. She was equally eminent both for the contemplative, active, or practical part of Christianity; contemplation had so spiritualized her mind, that almost every object suggested pious thoughts to her."

She prepared herself for death in her seventy-eighth year with great patience and resignation, and finished her warfare with unshaken faith.

Of the celebrated Anne Clifford, Countess of Dorset, we have some interesting particulars. She "Rendered all the assistance in her power to the ejected clergy . . . she persevered in her fidelity to the Church, refusing to communicate in any other manner than that appointed by the Prayer-book. . . . The parish church at Skipton had suffered during the long siege of the castle, and was repaired by the countess. She rebuilt also the church at Bongate, the chapels of Brougham, Ninekirk, and Mellerslang, besides founding and endowing schools and other charities. She repaired and restored an almshouse at Bethmesley, which had been built and endowed by her mother.

"As to her servants domestic, she well knew that they were pars domús; and how necessary a part of the house servants, and therefore to be kept tight, sustained and carefully held up; if in decay to be repaired; and therefore this part of her house she was always building or repairing by the hand of her bounty, as well as by good religious order in her family . . . building them up in the most holy faith, and also giving them their meat in due season, that meat which our Saviour told his disciples would not perish. This spiritual meat this lady wisely took care that it might be provided for all her household in due season; that is, at the three seasons in the year that the Church requires it, and once more in the year at least; besides those three great festivals, she made one festival more. And that all might be fitted and prepared, she took care that several books of devotion and piety might be provided four times in the year, that every one might take their choice of such book as they had not before, by which means, those who had lived in her house long (and she seldom turned away) might be furnished with books of religion and devotion of every kind.

"Whilst treating her neighbours and dependants with generosity, she was sparing, even to frugality, in her personal expenses. She was simple and abstemious in her food, and accustomed 'pleasantly to boast that she had never tasted wine or physic.' She took especial delight in the almshouse which she founded near Appleby for thirteen poor women, to be called a mother and twelve sisters, for which she provided an endowment, and the Service of the Church to be performed daily. With these sisters she would sit down and dine in their almshouse, and invite them to dine and converse with her as freely as her greatest guests. This institution continued more than twenty-three years under her care. . . . She was not satisfied with her children and grandchildren, when they came to visit her, if they did not pay their salutations at her almshouse; and she commonly admonished them, when they came from far to pay their duty to her, that before they came to her for a blessing, they should take a blessing of the poor, the almswoman's blessing, by the way.

"She had not a chaplain living in her family; but at each of her six houses, the minister of the parish was accustomed to officiate in her family. When age had deprived her in some measure of the use of her limbs and hearing, she used her chamber as an oratory, there offering up her private devotions. She either read the Psalms of the day to herself, or, when hindered by ill health, they were read to her by her attendants, and she took especial delight in the Psalms. She also usually heard a large portion of Scripture read every day, as much as one of the Gospels in the course of a week.

"As her death drew near, . . . her passions were mortified and dead before her; so that for three or four days of her last sickness (for she endured no more) she lay as if she endured nothing. She called for her Psalms, read herself, and caused them to be read unto her. But that cordial (in which she had always taken particular delight) kept, in Rom. viii., and in her heart, this her memory held to the last, this she soon repeated; no doubt to secure her soul against all fear of condemnation, being wholly Christ's . . . and so to strengthen her hope by other comfortable arguments, contained in that chapter, being the last words of continuance which this dying lady spoke. The rest of the time she lay quiet, as if ruminating, digesting, and speaking inwardly to her soul what she had uttered in broken words, and so breathed her last without disturbance on March 22, 1675-6, in the eighty-seventh year of her age."

We will now notice a few particulars concerning the life of Lady Elizabeth Hastings, of whom we read that,—

"When she became, at the age of twenty-two, the mistress of a large fortune, her character was necessarily more known to the world, and she was observed to be somewhat more than a lady of great beauty and fine accomplishments, of condescension and good-nature, and regular observance of religious duties. In order to increase that stock of wisdom and knowledge which she had lain in by her own endeavours, and by the assistance from the appointed ministers under whom she lived, she cultivated the friendship of such learned men as Archbishop Sharpe, Mr. Nelson, Dr. Lucas, and others. She obediently followed the counsels which she received from them, doing every thing which the rules of the Gospel require.

"Her beauty and other attractions of person were such as without her large fortune might easily inspire affection; but she refused the offers of several among the nobility, and chose to continue in a single life; either, it is supposed, that she might make a wise and religious use of her great estate, or accounting that a single life naturally led to a higher perfection. . . . She studied the Word of God daily, that by it she might amend her life; other books that she used were wisely chosen for soundness of doctrine and sentiment. . . . Four times a day all her family, who were not necessarily engaged, assembled to attend prayers, and chiefly the Holy Service of the Church, read for the most part by the established minister, or some other, or else by one of the upper servants. She delighted in public worship, and constantly attended it, with a grave and awful demeanour, free from affectation.

"She watched strictly over her own heart to keep clear of all evil mixtures, and the taint of self-love, continually purifying her heart by acts of faith in the blood of her Redeemer. . . . She was careful and tender of her servants and even of her cattle; and besides providing for the temporal wants of those who lived in her house, causing every artificer employed in her house to take care of their comfort and seeking gently to lead them into the way of goodness and religion, she kept her house with great elegance, that her poor neighbours might not want employment. She practised charity both by alms-giving, visiting and consoling the sick and afflicted, receiving the poor at her house, and sending sums of money to a distance.

"Her still larger applications were fixed pensions upon reduced families, exhibitions to scholars at the Universities, the maintenance of her own charity school, her contributions to others, disbursements to the religious Societies for the Propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts, and Promoting Christian Knowledge at home, for the erection, decoration, and augmentation of churches: add to these, frequent remission of debt, in cases of straitness or insolvency. Her rule was to give the first place to justice, the second to charity, the third to generosity.

"For several months before her death she was unable to attend public worship, from which she had never been kept by any trifling hindrance; indeed, after her illness, she continued to go when wanting sleep, and apt to suffer cold; but when it became impossible for her to reach the church, she had the Service read at home daily, and the Holy Sacrament administered to her every Sunday. . . . About six hours before her death, she summoned, for the sake of her household, those especially who had seldom seen her in the time of her long illness, to strengthen and enforce every thing that she had done, or shown them before, by her dying counsels. She had wished in like manner to take leave of the whole village, but was restrained by her physician; and being anxious to have the last offices of the Church administered to her in the most solemn and regular manner, she set aside the services of two or more excellent clergymen, then in the house, and sent for the vicar of the parish, whom she had held in honour for twenty years.

"When this last service was performed, her soul seemed to receive some of the happiness of heaven; her eyes, though languishing under years and sickness, shone bright as diamonds (as one said, who was present); and all who looked on were amazed at the transport now granted to her spirit. She broke out with a raised accent into words such as these: 'Lord! what is it that I see? Oh the greatness of the glory that is revealed in me—that is before me.' And some time after she had so said, she fell asleep."

We have been somewhat lengthy in our extracts, and yet extracts, however long, fail to give more than rough sketches of character, to make a few points prominent; and, in this instance, we trust, to create an appetite for the closer study of the finished full-length lives of these English saints. Our object has been to select such portions of their history as would bring into relief a few of the stronger and more striking features of their character, and upon them to concentrate the attention of our readers. And what an antipodes is such biography to the library of Mrs. Ellis! After having been muddled with bewildering volumes of vague advice, we are here refreshed by some "great facts." We have not theories, nor precepts, nor sentimentalizings; we escape from a foggy "Ideal" into excellent realities; we behold forms, real and well-defined; we have actual Christian women before our minds' eye; we have at least something to grasp; something tangible and distinct. Christian faith is, as it were, embodied before us in real shapes; and with these models of fair proportions, in the natural and comely attitude of genuine piety, we have something positive to set before the women of these times. Here we have, not tinsel, but true gold, the genuine development of true, decided, consistent Christianity. After puzzling ourselves with a multitude of recipes for the formation of female character, here we have the thing itself, the female character as we desire it to be.

And, what adds to the value of the survey of these faithful women, we know that we have the genuine exhibition of their real character; we have the advantage of being taken behind the scenes; it is not their stage action, their public life, that we behold; we are admitted into their every-day and domestic life; they are not sitting stiffly for their portraits, in their best gowns, with their best looks, nor whispering set speeches, nor playing the oracles; they were wholly unconscious that their descendants of the nineteenth century would know any thing about them; they did not act with any idea that they would appear in a book; but their likeness was caught and sketched at casual times by their intimates, as they chanced to find them, sometimes in their country walks, sometimes in out of the way cottages of the poor, or among their servants, or in their closets or oratories, where nobody seemed to be looking on, or in the humble village church filled with a smockfroked congregation, or on their sick-bed. We see them, so to speak, in their working-dress on a working-day, just as they were ; and at the hastiest glance of this their private, and, as they thought, unobserved life, we are led at once to exclaim that these are the sort of mothers and daughters of England which one would wish to see revived and repeated in their posterity.

Now, in considering the impression which these Churchwomen make upon us, we think that what must first strike the reader is, a certain strong resemblance between them all. Even our extracts are enough, we imagine, to give that impression. A painter is said to be always painting the same face, to be unable to create a real variety, however he may try ; and there is much truth in the remark, though of course the strength of the likeness that runs through the works of the same master is of various degrees. Maclise, for instance, in our day, has but one creation, one face in all his faces. So in all these portraits of Churchwomen we see a general likeness, a certain common tone of mind, running through them all, as though one hand had drawn them all ; and yet from many hands we get their characters. We seem to have got into an old gallery of family pictures, and as we walk down its pictured length, notwithstanding the varieties of complexion, age, costume, attitude, all the faces that look down upon us have a family look. We seem to be reading accounts of the same person over and over again, with but slight varieties of incident. And yet we do see variety in the midst of resemblance ; individuality is not lost in the general similarity. Thus, as in Lady Falkland we see a melancholy temperament, so in Lady Halket we see a cheerful and sunny disposition. As among sisters there is a variety and yet sameness, so in this devout sisterhood we behold at once oneness and yet diversity. This we consider to be a striking point of view much to be dwelt upon ; for we are led thereby to have a distinct idea of spiritual fellowship, and to discern the working of one and the self-same Spirit in their souls, which, notwithstanding the variety of their temperament and natural gifts, blended them altogether into one, and marked them with the common image and superscription of the Spirit. So in music, the notes are many and different, and the master of music makes them all contribute their sounds towards one general effect, to the greater perfection of but one air, which is thus filled up with harmonies, and made the richer by the very varieties of tone. There is a difference between one great monotony and one great unity.

The fact is, that all these characters, which are here brought before us, were formed in the same mould, trained in the same system, nourished with the same food, and fed by the same mother's hand. That mould, that system, that mother, was the Church. The family resemblance is accounted for; they were members one of another,—daughters of the Church. They did not strike out a way of religion for themselves, nor follow their own humours; they did not go a multitude of ways, apart from one another, in self-trusting isolation, as lovers of novelty. They felt their need of help and guidance; they knew not what to set about, nor where to begin, of themselves; and so they teachably threw themselves into the divine system of the Church; they humbly put themselves under the Church's rule; they lived by rule; they did not content themselves with general, undefined, dreamy notions of Christianity, nor with sitting in easy chairs, thinking about religion; they desired to be formed and shaped into some consistent discipleship, and to have the details of discipleship set before them. And from them we see the advantage, the superiority of system; it prevents waste of power, the evaporation of zeal; it directs energies, good feelings, and impulses. Want of system, of acting by rule, of having an appointed course of action, is an evil readily admitted in worldly matters; the loose, ungirded mind, that acts by fits and starts, that has no more than a general notion that something must be done, and that there is a great deal to do, rambles on without design, and loses itself amid a thousand unfinished works. Now these Churchwomen, by casting themselves into the Church form of Christian life, had a given course before them, and accordingly they set themselves to the course marked out.

We may remark, by the way, on the beauty of this mould,—we mean the mould of the English Church, as reformed; for while it is the unfair fashion of the Romanists of the day, in speaking of saints, to contrast the whole continent of Europe, from the sixth century to the present day, with this single island, from the period of the Reformation, and then to appeal to the multitude of saints under the one system, and their paucity under the other, as though the contrast were made on equitable terms, it is a great comfort to us to bear in mind that these female saints were formed in the Reformed Church of England; and we are bold to say, that such a number of such women as lived in the English Church the century after the Reformation, cannot be found in the century preceding it.

Now, in analyzing the elements of these Churchwomen's characters, we observe not only a resemblance, but we are also struck by the union of devotionality and activity, of the contemplative with the practical, of a course of praying, meditating, reading, Church-going, with a course of active charity, kindness, and self-denial. They prayed, they read the Scriptures, they kept the feasts and fasts of the Church, they frequently communicated, they were daily, if possible, in the Lord's house, and in their private oratories, they had spiritual converse with holy chaplains and parish priests; but they also visited the sick, attended to the wants of the poor, gave medicines, trained their servants and dependants into a religious course. Their life ran upon two wheels, devotion and action; theirs was a two-edged sword; on one side of their hearts the text was written, "Pray without ceasing," on the other, "Be careful to maintain good works." They did not content themselves with what have been called the "luxuries of religion," the devotional and contemplative part; neither in forming a high estimate of the value of works and labours of love, of the practical part of faith, did they neglect the means of grace: they did not neglect "work" for prayer, nor prayer for "work."

This continued and consistent union of devotion and action involved great domesticity; such a round of prayer and active charity could not be run except by those who were "keepers at home:" this was their praise, and this their necessity, as long as they sought to fulfil thoroughly the requirements of the Church. The excitements of what is called "society" must have been given up, and any great mixing in the pleasures and gaieties which their means and station tempted them to pursue; there was no time for such things. A certain degree of retirement was necessary for the fulfilment of all their duties. Though they had their friends and intimates, and were far from leading an isolated and lonely life, yet it was a home life. And as they withdrew from worldly "society" they did not form "a religious world;" there was no cliqueism or partyism; they could get on without the excitement of popular religionism, without "meetings" and speechifyings; there was no bustling about with subscription cards, no "Ladies' Associations," no vagrant "Deputations," no idolizing of preachers, no working of grotesque pin-cushions for "Charity Bazaars." Theirs was a deeper view of spiritual fellowship; they shunned the publicity of the turbid religion which prevails so widely now.

And look at the advantages of the domestic character of their lives. Instead of spending their time amidst a mass of frivolous associates, or spending their wealth in entertaining a wide circle of mere acquaintances, they had time to visit the poor; they had the means to relieve them. They mixed with the poor; they knew them in their own cottages; and it was from this actual knowledge and personal inspection of their wants, from an unceasing round of visiting, that they learnt truly to love them and to be merciful; their sympathies were not only excited, but soberly sustained by facing constantly the realities of want, and distress, and patience. This is the only sort of love for the poor which is real: sham love and sham interest are often apt to become popular; it sometimes becomes a fashion to talk about the poor; like any other fashion, this pity passes away; perhaps it lasts as long as to give birth to a few ephemeral "Societies," or to make a few "Charity Balls," as for the "poor Poles," where selfish gaiety, having given a guinea for its own amusement, dances, waltzes, polks, and makes merry, because of the sufferings, and distresses, and tears of the poor.

The poor are sometimes looked upon as excellent subjects of declamation; and persons will go to meetings and speak about them in an excited way, and others will go and be melted at these speeches; and yet both parties would shrink from penetrating into the squalid homes, or soiling themselves with actual contact with those whom they think they pity. There is a philanthropy which will listen to descriptions of poverty; but when it comes to handling it and touching it, to brushing against the coarse clothes, or scenting the close hut, or sitting among the dirty children, or reading by the mean bed, then it recoils. And yet, as we have said, if sympathy is to be true, or sober, or continuous, it must be learnt from constant and continuous intercourse with the poor. Thus did the Churchwomen we are speaking of know and love them.

Another characteristic worthy of notice is the sort of light in which they viewed their servants, and the treatment which they bestowed upon them. They started with the texts of Scripture upon this matter as their guide; they considered their responsibilities as mistresses; they looked upon their servants as "pars domûs," as a real part of their family, as bound up with them, as having a certain membership with them. They did not consider the subject as a mere worldly covenant, so much wages and so much work, as though their duty were over in giving them enough to eat and drink, and paying them honestly their due. There was a heartier feeling; they did not want such a loose kind of connexion, but a real sympathy between both parties, warmth and interest on both sides. Their home-life heightened these domestic sympathies; their home being so much a home, every member of the household was not simply a servant in the house, but a member of the house. Hence, not coldly regarding them as a living apparatus or machinery by which their tables were served and their house kept in order, they had at once a sincere regard for their temporal comfort; and above all, as the extracts we have given so clearly tell us, a deep interest in their spiritual state and progress. Without forgetting their own station, they manifested towards their dependants that high-principled friendliness which obtained as its recompense willing services, and something infinitely warmer than the unhearty, prim respect of the mass of modern servants. In fact, the mistresses and the servants did not hang loosely together, but were, so to speak, parts of one another. As the domestic habits of the mistresses gave them more opportunities of seeing and knowing their servants, so they created a stronger interest. Their quiet regularity of life must have been of infinite benefit to the household; for as the spirit of dissipation spreads downwards, and the gay living of the heads of the house is developed in coarser forms in the imitative world downstairs, so the staid, holy manners of these good Churchwomen were doubtless somewhat reflected in their dependants, to say nothing of the direct instruction given them by their mistresses, and of such other opportunities as they enjoyed in the constant round of prayer.

As another point of interest we must not fail to notice the sort of intercourse which they maintained with their clergy, whether chaplains or parish priests; it was essentially a religious intercourse, and so grave, earnest, and sober of its kind, that even Michelet could have found no fault. They did not look upon the clergy simply as well-informed and well-bred gentlemen, agreeable in society, and suitable companions from their tastes and cultivation, but as priests and pastors, as their ghostly counsellors, as the physicians of their souls, from whom they should seek guidance in their manner of life, to whom they should reveal the more marked symptoms of their spiritual state. And it is pleasing to observe this high view of the pastor's office was not damped and chilled by the secular deportment of the clergy: it is pleasing to observe the seriousness of those of whom counsel was asked, and whose office it was to give it; there was well-governed sympathy between the counsellor and the counselled; the one were serious in seeking, the other in giving.

In thus bringing before our readers a few of the stronger points of character, we must not forget to remark that these Churchwomen were mostly of noble birth, of that very rank where the world is the richest in powers of temptation, and where we least look for deadness to the world or any high degree of spirituality. And if we find such a body of devout persons amongst the nobles of the land, we may reasonably infer that a still larger body existed among the gentry. As the writer of "the Lives" observes, they are but "specimens of a class, representatives of a period, samples of a much larger number like themselves." We do not see all the stars of that "milky way."

Now having shown our readers somewhat of the mode of life, the real and interior life, of these ancient Englishwomen, as moulded by the Church, by means of the excellent volume of biography, which has been our telescope on the occasion, and revealed some stars deep in the firmament of the past, we are tempted to wheel round and see what is going on immediately before our eyes; in short, to whisk from the seventeenth to the nineteenth century. Now the moment we touch the very edge and rim of a comparison, we are at once struck by the undomestic tendencies of the upper classes in these times, as compared with the highly domestic character of the same classes in the seventeenth century. We purposely use the word "tendencies," for the love of domesticity has not as yet so far decayed as to require a stronger word; while we thankfully discern some counteracting tendencies already at work, a counter-current setting in with some power. But still, so it is, there are strong undomestic or anti-domestic tendencies in the age. We do not mean that women have yet their "clubs," that the dust gathers upon the drawing-room chairs, or that grass grows between the boards; but we mean that women are inclining to choose a wrong sphere, to live in a wrong atmosphere, to move in a false mode of life, to cast themselves too much out of home-life into what is called "society," to make this the chief sphere of action, the object of their care, the stage of their energies and exertion, the occupation and business of life. Instead of home, with its cheerful and solid friendships, its reasonable pleasures, its sober occupations, its opportunities of usefulness, there has been an increasing devotion to "society," with its artificialities, its heartlessness, its false excitement, its worldliness and show and expensiveness, its unprofitableness, its rivalries, its luxuriousness and self-indulgence. This great "sham," this hollow substitute for true communion and intercourse, this apparent union of uncemented units, this seeming corporate life of a multitude of self-weary selfs, this show of fellowship under the garb of an intense self-ism, this heart-separating system by means of an apparent comingling, has been making the whole of life "a sham;" has turned it into a dramatic scene, a constant artificiality and piece of acting, binding up natural feelings and naturalness of character, as the Chinese women compress their feet, with the bands and restraints of a thousand stiff conventionalities, till all the movements of the mind are regulated by a technical courtliness instead of free-born courtesy. The little circles in which women once were content to move, with room enough for friendship but not for a host of mere acquaintances, has been widening and widening more and more, that acquaintances might come in instead of friends. To "enter into society," to live in "society," to cast themselves into wide but shallow floods of humanity, to generalize themselves by spreading their intercourse through an infinite number of persons, to dilute their sympathies that they may know the outsides of a multitude instead of the hearts of a few, and of course to receive diluted sympathies in return, has been too much the aim and the life of the women of these later times. The "keepers at home" have been constant "goers out." Much going out, party after party, ball after ball, dinner after dinner;—this is the undomesticating course in which so many run.

There is too much publicity, of living in the presence of others, in this society-life; reality fades before publicity; the mind and feelings have to be dressed up, as well as the body; it is difficult to be natural and genuine, not to put on a manner, where there is much mixing with others, without reaching intimacy; and the habit of being so constantly with a dressed mind remains, where the mind might unbend; naturalness is lost, the parade attitude remains: just as Mrs. Siddons is said to have been always acting at home and conversing to her friends in blank verse. The power of sympathizing is chilled and weakened by the constant exposure to the cold atmosphere of society-life; the interest in others being constantly excited, without opportunities of deepening inwardly, or of fastening itself upon objects, the objects for ever changing and flitting by, at last evaporates into the mere affectation of interest; mind grazes mind, but this is all; mutual amusement is sought, not membership one of another. As Hannah More observes, with much truth, though we should widen the view of the losses suffered through "society,"—

"Perhaps the interests of true friendship, elegant conversation, mental improvement, social pleasure, maternal duty, and conjugal comfort, never received such a shock as when Fashion issued out that arbitrary and universal decree, that every body must be acquainted with every body; together with that consequent, authoritative, but rather inconvenient, clause, that every body must also go every where every night. . . . As the circle of acquaintance expands, and it will be continually expanding, the affections will be beaten out into such thin laminæ as to leave little solidity remaining. The heart which is continually exhausting itself with professions grows cold and hard. The feelings of kindness diminish, in proportion as the expression of it becomes more diffuse and indiscriminate. The very traces of 'simplicity and godly sincerity,' in a delicate female, wear away imperceptibly by constant collision with the world at large. And, perhaps, no woman takes so little interest in the happiness of her real friends as she whose affections are unceasingly evaporating in universal civilities; as she who is saying fond and flattering things at random to a circle of five hundred people every night."

We cannot be conversant with the habits of the higher classes in London, or in any of our large towns, without seeing the short and awful space of human life frittered away by this passion for "society," with all its frivolities and all its varieties of evil; while the real and solemn duties of women are either utterly neglected or but partially fulfilled, because of the sacrifice of time, and strength, and worldly substance, which their idol imperatively demands. Where once this passion is suffered to take root, "crescit indulgens sibi dirus hydrops;" when once the wheel begins to whirl, it must be whirled on; when once this living upon excitement, upon the pastry of life, has been indulged, the diseased appetite sickens at the sight of better food; the power of repose is lost; home and home duties and home pleasures become dull, and wearisome, and flat; and even though the excitement of society has lost its first relish, "going out" is continued as a habit.

And this society-life, so much indulged, infects the very beginning of female life; it begins with exercising its influence on female education. First, it shortens it; it creates a wrong idea of what education is; it erects a "terminus" at the eighteenth mile of life: then the steam is turned off, the engine stops, and the young passenger's course of instruction is at an end. The space from ten to eighteen is not looked upon as the mere grammar-time of education, but as the beginning and the end, the whole. Whatever has to be learnt must be compressed into that short space; the stock must be laid in; as much knowledge packed into the brain as the time will allow; then the pupil is "finished:" and in order to appear in any light finished, to avoid the exposure of gross ignorance on any common point, to be able to pass through society with a certain appearance of commonplace information, a hundred things must be learnt at once, or, rather, the mind must skim the surface of a thousand things. Where education is itself condensed and abridged, recourse must be had to that wretched race of "Abridgments," "Compendiums," "Treasuries," which Mrs. Ellis and Hannah More so justly inveigh against. The day must be split into little pieces, and the brain too. We know of a school where there are no less than eleven professors at work! Conceive what a tesselating of the mind must take place! A school-boy's pocket, a village shop, where cheese and calico, boots and treacle, lard and letter paper, are crowded into one little dingy space, give but faint representations of the variety and confusedness of the educational articles. An old coach dinner, where fish, meat, pastry, and cheese had all to be eaten "in hot haste," in a short half hour, were more easy of digestion than the rapid dishes of the eleven professors.

But the insufficiency of the education is a slight evil compared with others which the love of "society" inflicts upon woman's early life. Think of the prospect which is presented to the girl at the end of the dull avenue of lesson-life! Is not her whole mind, with an eager longing natural to youth, bent upon the door at the end which in a moment will open out into a dazzling course of ease and pleasure. Parties, parties are the things of which she hears, and of which, therefore, she thinks and dreams. Infinitely hurtful must it be to the unformed and buoyant mind to see the importance attached to "coming out," to see it by the fact that a given time is fixed upon for so sudden and so great a change in life when she is to burst into the gaieties of the world; a wrong idea must be running through her brain, a false notion of human life. It will be strange if this wrong idea does not influence her in her studies, by leading her to place a wrong motive for improvement before her eyes, to pursue it with a view of appearing to advantage and shining in society, in short, to regard education as a mere preparation for society. Consider, also, the undue prominence which the coming out into the world necessarily gives to the mere fringes, and trimmings, and ornaments of education, the lesser but the more showy parts, we mean "accomplishments." Music, dancing, drawing, &c., no longer hold a subordinate place, nor fill up the chinks and corners of the day. "Accomplishments" strike and tell in society, carry admiration by storm, and therefore are studied for their quick effectiveness; and even the modern languages are learnt in a shallow way, rather with regard to conversation, than as opening out stores of wisdom to be mastered and digested. "Manner," elegance of motion, and address, become subjects almost of study. Strange stories are told of what has been done in schools on this matter, of the lessons in "manner;" and the use of pasteboard carriages to teach the pupils the art of stepping in with easy elegance, though, of course, fabulous, is after all a fable framed upon an "over true tale," the exaggerated and swollen features of a real face. Home education is of course less open to excesses in the formation of manner.

And when the great epoch is reached, when the girl is "out" fairly in the world, think of the reaction! Eleven professors one week and none the next! All her course changed; and all her hours upon her own hands. To dance, to dine out, to make morning calls, to receive visits, these are the beginnings of full-grown life. The school-room opens into the ball-room. It is but one bound from French exercises and dreary strummings on the piano, to fêtes and gaieties. What young head can bear all this freedom after all that restraint, all this self-indulgence after all that discipline? And what shall we say of the effect of late hours, frivolous conversation, questionable amusements, or at best excess of amusement, of the care for dress, the habits of self-indulgent expense, of flatteries and compliments, of the surrounding idolatry of fashion, and rank, and riches upon an unformed character, a mere girl? We might well speak of the nature of one of the amusements in vogue, of the indecency of the most popular dance, the immodest waltz; a thing not of English growth, at first opposed, scarcely tolerated, long resisted, now corrupting a wider circle every year, for which the fine and precious edge of natural delicacy has to be turned, from which the guileless and unhacknied girl shrinks at first with blushes at her heart, if not in her cheek; till seeing all around yielding to the dance without compunction, she tries to distrust her own sense of what is strictly modest, accuses herself of over-bashfulness, at last yields the sacred waist to the hand of a stranger, who is allowed to do that in public which he would not dare to repeat at home.

Now, when a few years of society-life are past, what is the fruit? That she has done nothing for God or for man, is the society-seeker's best defence. To have dined out so many times, to have paid and received so many calls, to have danced at so many balls, to have known so many people, what a melancholy inventory of the acts of life! Though nothing gross, nothing startling, no great iniquity stands out to blacken the character, yet this round of life, this doing nothing, this trifling with time, is a manifest serving of the world and a following of "the pomps and vanities of this wicked world." How different was the life of the Churchwomen of the seventeenth century!

And, even if we were to let such a false idea pass, that youth is a season for society, a fit season for what amounts to dissipation, we do not see that the passion or the habit dies when youth is past. The habit of living in the world, the love of going out, remains; as "the boy is father to the man," so the girl is mother of the woman; the tone of mind, the tastes, the character of the girl, somewhat modified of course, continue in the woman. And what is the result? The mother sees little of her children. What the Spectator says of the society-seeker of that day is not out of date now.

"She thinks life lost in her own family, and fancies herself out of the world, when she is not in the ring, the playhouse, or the drawing-room. She lives in a perpetual motion of body and restlessness of thought.

and is never easy in one place, when she thinks there is more company in another. She pities all the valuable part of her own sex, and calls every woman of a prudent, modest, and retired life, a poor-spirited and unpolished creature."

If education is conducted at home it is resigned to governesses; the mother looks in to see that all is going on well; this is all: she takes little or no part in it; children are in the way; there is no time for teaching them; devotion to society destroys devotion to children; the mother's conscience is satisfied, if she finds a trustworthy person, who becomes, in fact, her children's step-mother in her own lifetime. She is, too, it must be confessed, but little qualified to instruct her children. When she came out, every thing like real study was at an end; there was nothing more but what is truly called "light reading," to fill up the gaps that intervened between one act of excitement and another. Society-life does not prepare women for doing their part as mothers. And yet we hold it to be a positive duty in every mother daily to take part in the training of her children; nor do we think that women of the very highest rank are freed from this charge. The part which especially falls to them is that of directing the religious discipline of their children, in instructing them in religious truth, in their duties as children of God, and inheritors of the kingdom of heaven. This office ought not to be deputed to governesses; a mother can best impress religious truth upon her child; it is a mother's duty, and a mother's privilege, while it is a high incentive to watch over her own spiritual state, to walk closely with God, after the Spirit, that she may be fit for so momentous a work. We must recal the example of Lady Halket's mother, whose labour was not in vain; it was her

"Chiefest care to instruct her children in the principles and practice of religion, teaching them to begin and end every day with prayer and reading a portion of Scripture, and daily to attend the church as often as there was occasion to meet there, either for prayers or preaching, backing all her instructions by her own pious example."

We are far, however, from wishing the decrease of governesses in desiring mothers to fulfil their part; as helps and assistants in the work of education, they are of the greatest use; for as we want not, where it can be helped, the whole burden of teaching to fall upon the mother, whose other duties must not be altogether sacrificed for her family cares, so the aid of well-qualified and well-principled governesses can be profitably employed. Indeed we claim for this class of persons far greater reverence, tenderness, and consideration than is commonly bestowed upon them in England ; they ought to be the mother's friends, as they occupy by her own choice the place of the best of friends, and are engaged with them in the work which tells upon the whole after life and character of their children. They should have the friend's honour. We believe that in Russia they are wisely treated with considerable affection and respect.

But society-life has greatly discouraged home education altogether ; the burden and responsibility of children interfering with the claims of society, they have too often been packed off to school, as a mode of effecting a more complete riddance of them than consigning them to a governess and school-room at home. Now, while we admit that there must be girls' schools, since there are many girls, orphans, motherless children, and the like, who cannot enjoy the privilege of home education, yet we have the strongest opinion of the superiority of the home over school. As women are designed for home-life, so ought they to be trained at home. Schools, however good, however conscientiously conducted, are not good for girls ; it is a wrong beginning, a false start ; a youth spent away from home has a tendency to undomesticate them, to weaken home feeling. Home seems their natural place. Nothing can supply constant and affectionate intercourse with a mother. From the very nature of a girl's mind, she ought to be thrown into constant and immediate contact with those older than herself, not to be thrown principally or chiefly with persons of her own age ; she gets a girlish character engrafted in her from such friction, and though we like cheerful tempers and good spirits in the young, we do not want a sort of girlishness to be carried away from school. Nothing, again, can supply a father's place ; we think it highly hurtful to be mixing only with those of her own sex ; it is apt to make her affected and unnatural when at last she is brought out of exclusively female life into mixed life. "Coming out" is a greater change than ever, and a greater trial, where she has not been accustomed to mix with any but girls and women.

Besides, a girl wants confidantes, and will have them ; she is of a confiding nature ; and though it is good for her to have friends of her own age, yet there are many matters on which she needs to speak out her mind, without reserve, to those of riper years. Now a schoolmistress has the authority, but not the affectionateness, of a mother. Let her be ever so good, and kind, and tender, she has to divide her interest and care among many ; it is difficult for her pupils to be confidential ; there is a stiffness and restraint between them ; and while there is reserve, where openness and free expression of the mind would benefit, so there is apt to be a trifling and frivolous confidentiality between the girls themselves, where there had better be some reserve. There is also a sort of publicity in school-life, which seems opposed and hurtful to the character of women ; and the fact, that we shrink instinctively from the idea of "public schools" for girls, as being unfeminine, at once seems to condemn all those approaches to such a system which are already made by schools of twenty or thirty girls. With boys it is different ; they had better have some beginnings of the friction of public life, in order to fit them for that publicity which it will be their portion, as men, to know.

Whether, however, education be at home or abroad, the daughters see too little of their mothers when the latter enter much into society ; for even when school-room life is over, and the daughters spend more time with their mothers, the increased intercourse is more in public than in private, amid the unrealities of life ; they make the same morning calls, or shop together, or dine out together ; their hearts are not a whit more thoroughly opened out to each other. And hence it is that that cold, unworthy notion of the honour due to parents has arisen ; there has been little communion between them, or, what is as bad, stiff, artificial communion in the midst of society ; the true keen edge of filial feeling has been suffered to rust. It is Hannah More's complaint, that—

"Among the real improvements of modern times, it is to be feared that the growth of filial obedience cannot be included. Who can forbear observing and regretting, in a variety of instances, that not only sons but daughters have adopted something of that spirit of independence, and disdain of controul, which characterize the times."

Hence in high life those bold breaches of obedience, of which we have had many recent examples, which have led to the shameful mockery of a marriage, and which are commonly spoken of in so light a way as to leave the impression that the true notions of honour to parents are but faint.

In London, indeed, of late years, society-life has been busier than ever in making family intercourse cold and unreal ; we hear of husbands and wives seeking even society apart from each other ; the wife drives to a ball, the husband to the opera ; and though this evil is as yet confined to the world of the world, we see the separating and undomesticating tendencies of over-much going out in full play.

As we are disposed to accuse society-life, not only of being an active course of vanity and self-indulgence, but of being one prolonged sin of omission, what shall we say, in speaking of the omission of home-duties in this undomestic course, of the treatment of servants? It is the fashion to complain of servants; but masters and mistresses should first complain of themselves. The olden interest in servants is all but past; much society prevents interest; the dissipation of mistresses dissipates the servants; the spirit of the heads of the house descends. We believe the habits of servants in large towns to be vicious in the extreme, vicious almost beyond belief; they have caught the vices of those above them, and exhibit them in grosser and coarser forms. Extravagance, luxurious ways of living, self-indulgence, passion for dress, these are among their more obvious sins. Whether servants are Christians or infidels, as long as they preserve a show of propriety and respect, seems among a host of persons to be a matter of no concern; their spiritual state is not cared for, and is not known. The constant entertainments which they attend throws them among large numbers and varieties of servants, who corrupt each other and provoke each other to sin; late hours, an unquiet house, want of regularity, stiff, formal, brief glimpses of their mistresses, worldly examples before them; all these are the injuries which "society" inflicts upon the dependants of her votaries. If servants' morals be at the very lowest ebb, what an awful weight of responsibility rests upon the souls of those to whom they have been given in charge by God Himself!

Omitted duties thicken upon our minds as we begin to number them. What regard is paid to the poor by those who fly from home-life to society? We go into the narrow streets of our larger towns, where the poor are packed together in their close homes; where there is many a sick bed, and the sickness aggravated by want. How rarely do we see any sisters of charity turning out of the broader and sunnier highways of the world to dive into the gloomy abodes of poverty! Where is the heart for such a task, where the time? A few stragglers may occasionally be found, and but a few; even then making often rather irregular incursions than carrying on a systematic and well-directed mission; acting often without the knowledge or guidance of the clergy, and going perhaps where they had better not, and not going where they would do well to go; meaning well, and yet, for want of order, hindering their own charitable design, or making it less fruitful.

While women shrink from the sickly sights which meet the visitors of the poor, and disturb not the serene life of self-indulgence by agitating spectacles of distress, any thing like a system or due proportion of alms-giving is not to be hoped for. Where there is not real pity, there will not be real bounty; a selfish life and a self-denying life, in order to be bountiful, cannot be led by the same person at the same time ; a few shillings at a charity sermon, or to a "troublesome" beggar, or a few guineas squeezed out by the ingenious importunities of some "collectors" for doubtful societies, "to get rid of the men," make up the sum total of gifts. Society-life is voracious ; it demands the whole purse ; it leaves scarce any shreds or scrapings of worldly means for the poor : all the resources of those who are much out, all the "allowances," or "pin-money," or whatever other name is given to a woman's privy purse ; all are required to keep pace with the costly and restless fashions of dress.

Again, we go into the schools of the poor in London, and in our large towns, and we see one hot, wearied mistress, acting as colonel, captain, lieutenant, and ensign of her regiment of 200 or 300 girls, while some dozen little corporals, a lesson or two ahead of those they teach, are placed as "monitors" under her. Occasionally a lady hurries from class to class ; but being unable, on an emergency, to multiply herself into a dozen, she is able to effect but little, and is almost lost in the sea of little ones. Where, we ask, are "the daughters of England ;" the daughters of the upper classes, who have time and leisure on their hands ? There is time for worsted work, time for polking, for shopping, for calls, but no time can be found for the blessed work of teaching the children of the poor. We know women's aptness to teach, their power of adapting themselves to children's minds, and of interesting them ; and, therefore, we bewail the more the lack of devotion to so great a cause, the neglect of those natural gifts which would give blessings to others and rebound in blessings to themselves.

Again, we go through our cathedral towns, or other places where the privilege of daily common prayer is offered. We pass down goodly streets, crescents, rows, terraces, where the wealthier classes live. Well, we say to ourselves, how happy a thing for this busy town ; these houses must yield a host of at least female worshippers ; here are those who can go to pray for these restless multitudes of busy men. Here there must be an army of defenders to go daily into the citadel, and by their prayers in the temple to defend the place against the powers of darkness. How excellent the economy of God, who in his mercy gives so large a portion of his servants, in the very places where temptations most abound, time and opportunities for the work of daily intercession. Filled with these thoughts, we wend our way hopefully to the cathedral or the church in the morning ; alas ! only to be chilled and saddened. All those houses, all those streets and terraces, yield but a dozen or so who have the heart and spirit to seek the Lord in his temple. If household cares employ the mothers, where are the daughters? As we return, we catch the sounds of a multitude of pianos, and in passing from house to house carry in our ears a shred of secular music from each; here the end of the overture of "Don Giovanni," and there the middle of a quadrille from "Robert le Diable," and then the last notes of "Soave imagine d'amor." Again, however, we tread the same path in the afternoon, determined to hope even against hope. We behold the doors of these goodly houses opening, and female crowds issuing forth; our spirit brightens with fresh hope; but, alas! we quickly discern to our dismay card-cases, and not Prayer-books, in their hands: they are bent upon that work of confessed and most profitless self-denial which even the world exacts from its worshippers. We see carriages rolling by, we hear the knockings at doors, and with these sounds in our ears we enter the almost forsaken temple.

Now in all these remarks which we have made upon "society-life," as we have called it, and its great train of evils, we, of course, have spoken generally: we know there are countless shades and degrees of this sort of life, the more and the less; of course, therefore, there is the more or the less hurt, the more or the less loss of domestic habits according to the degree and measure of "going out." We have spoken, also, chiefly of the habits of the women whose lot is cast in our larger towns, where the indulgence of the taste for living in crowds and escaping the quietness of home-life can be gratified. The country, happily, is less tainted with the disease. Society there partakes more of the character of hospitality; friction is less frequent; the very distances from house to house prevent a round of dissipation, or, at least, mitigate it; there is necessarily more of home-life; the tastes and amusements which the country itself suggests are of a higher and more elevating kind: these tastes leaven the tone of life, make it less artificial, more natural, and more wise. It is easier to mix with the poor; they are thrown more in the way of their richer neighbours, and from their simplicity they are apt to excite greater interest.

Now, if we have in any degree taken a true view of the undomestic tendencies that are at work among the upper classes, making them frivolous "lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God," taking them from their proper duties, from all objects worthy of their care, or able to recompense them at the last, from all that constitutes a spiritual, unworldly, and useful life, what can be done to stem the tide?—We must look to the Church—this is the true domesticating power; this the true nurse of home affections, of genuine well-grounded friendships. Here, when the mind is beginning to have some longings after a more satisfying life, and conscience between the exciting acts of gaiety remembers something of the renouncing of the world, when the "heart, distrusting, asks if this be joy," or rather, if this be the proper use of human life, then the Church meets the awakening conscience with a given system, with a satisfying course of life marked out, with clear and defined schemes of nobler occupations. We must look, we repeat, to the Church ;—this is the divinely-appointed antagonist of the world, and of that form of the world now developing itself among the upper classes. As society really dislocates while it seems to unite, as it wastes and weakens the natural love of fellowship, while it pretends to gratify it, by substituting a hollow system of acquaintanceship, too broad and universal to be deep and true,—so the Church, on the other hand, increases the reality of communion, while it reduces the number of persons known ; it opens out hearts, while it checks the mere knowledge of faces. It presents, too, as we have said, a distinct intelligible plan of life ; it gives those who are sickening of the world something positive to do ; it has a work prepared for them ; and system is a great help ; human nature needs it.

If it be asked, how does the Church rescue souls from the life of the world, and lead them into a homelife, where they can enter upon a useful course, let the Prayer-book, not the only voice of the Church, speak. This at once, if it be obeyed, breaks the round of society-life, causes the wheel to pause, and claims no slight portion of the week for the retirement of home. It takes, for instance, every Sunday as a matter of course, and sets it apart as the great day of devotion and charity ; it forbids all parties and entertainments of every kind on Saturday, as being the vigil or eve of the Lord's day, on which Christians should prepare themselves in quietness for the solemn duties of the morrow. It marks all Fridays in the year as days of abstinence and humiliation ; and if we take the loosest view of fasting, perhaps to beginners the best view, we should at least interdict ourselves from the pleasures of society on that day, and practise that abstinence. Here, then, has the Church rescued three days out of seven from the world¹, while to these we may add the forty days of Lent, which would indeed be a gain to the soul if it were but spent strictly at home. Here is a plan prepared for those who want to break the flow of society. It is not left to us to say, "some day we will pause ;" it is not left to us to choose the day, or number of days, which shall be kept inviolate and consecrated to home ; but, what is of the greatest help, especially to unstable novices, certain days are marked out for them and chosen ; a rule is ready at hand, which they have but to use. It saves them, also, from the appearance of inventing over-strict rules of life in a moment of new-born zeal ; they can meet remarks by saying, " We have set up no private standard ; we are doing no unheard-of things ; we are simply obeying the plain rules of the Church, and taking her standard of strictness." If the clergy's wives and daughters led the way in such an observance of these days, that is, in withdrawing from all society thereon, the task would be made still easier for the lay members of the Church.

Then, again, as regards the duty of prayer, and the hearing or reading God's Word, the Church does not leave her members without guidance ; she arranges a course of devotion to arm them against hurry, changeableness, lessening of prayers ; though she gives no direction as to the length or times of private prayer, she enjoins daily Common Prayer. And where this privilege can be had, what is to hinder the mass of the women of the upper classes from a regular daily attendance in the House of God ? The offer of this privilege is almost daily multiplied. The golden remarks of the Bishop of London on this point are still fresh in our minds ; while in our cathedral towns the privilege has never been withheld. Even where it is not as yet to be enjoyed, the spirit of the Prayer-book would lead us to go through the service devoutly at home, to read the Psalms and Lessons of the day, and to use the prayers appointed. We may remember the custom of the Scotch saints, who, when prevented by the bigoted tyranny of their opponents from receiving the Holy Communion, were wont to receive it, as they said, spiritually, on the same day when they would have actually received it had it been administered. If no such rule of reading and praying be observed, some days might pass without any reading of God's Word, or a few verses might be read hurriedly, or some portions of Scripture might be dwelt upon to the neglect of other portions : we know that there is a tendency to read the Epistles more than the Holy Gospels, and to cast the Old Testament into the shade altogether. We must, also, suggest the devout observance of the festivals of the Church, that relish for spiritual feasts may be learnt, and the love of earthly feasts may be lessened. We need hardly speak of the Church's view of the duty of communicating, nor of the many excellent devotional works which her members have supplied to aid communicants in a due preparation for that great feast.

But we must not forget the union of devotion with active piety, which we saw in the Churchwomen of the seventeenth century. It is not enough for the daughters of the Church to be found at daily prayer, to be frequent communicants, to keep fast and festival; the means of grace must not be mistaken for the end; there must be no patching of a worldly life upon a devotional course; there must not be a piebald life; consistency in action is imperatively required. We must guard against inactivity or worldliness after these devotional duties have been fulfilled. There is great temptation to rest here; to begin to build, but not to finish; to pray, but not to act: among young persons the danger is the greater; we have seen painful inconsistencies, which have provoked the ridicule of the world, and brought discredit upon a great cause. To be praying in the morning, and waltzing at night; to be talking at dinner-parties upon high, solemn subjects to one neighbour, and nonsense to the other; to be gabbling about architecture, or the Gregorian tones, as the mere hobbies of the day; to be reading good books, and to be spending as much as ever upon dress and gaiety: this is just the course which must be at once denounced; this flimsy shadow of earnestness must be guarded against with especial care. We want consistency; we want action; we want calm, unostentatious, deep devotion of daily life to the service of our Blessed Lord, and of our brethren in Him.

But, supposing that a course of action is desired consistent with the course of devotion, what guidance does the Church give? Here the Church suggests the aid of the ministry. It is the part of the parish priest to direct any member of his flock who desires to do good towards some definite actions, to point out a course of usefulness. Here he meets the inquiring portion of his family, not as preacher only, but as pastor, as the spiritual guide and friend. When then any earnest women desire to do good, we may say that he is, not only likely, but certain to suggest the visiting of the sick and poor, to set them forth on that course of charity, in which "pure religion, and undefiled before God and the Father," consists. He is able also to temper zeal, that it may be more useful, to suggest the particular individuals whom particular persons would do well to visit, to hinder his visitors from going into scenes unfit for female feet. It is true that in our larger towns this personal contact with the clergy is not always easy as yet, for it implies the proper action of the parochial system; whereas, from the unexampled increase of population, and the Church's neglect in former times, this system has become, in many parts, a fiction rather than a reality. Still, however, the fiction is fast becoming a reality again, and the overgrown parishes are undergoing a rapid process of dismemberment, that the parochial system may be adapted to the altered state of things ; and thus a close and familiar intercourse with the clergy, now overburdened with care, will be attainable where it is desired ; opportunities of seeking their guidance will be obtained, without those difficulties in reaching them which sometimes deter timid minds from revealing their desire to be employed in some labour of love.

In a thousand cases, however, notwithstanding these present and partial hindrances, arising from the defective organization of the parish system, the members of the Church who desire to know the poor, and to show kindness to the sick, can procure from their parish priest judicious direction in such a course. And when this course is entered upon, there are spectacles enough of misery and distress to touch even hearts of stone ; we know no such cure for personal luxuriousness and self-indulgences, as the sight of the homes and wants of the poor. The "visible rhetoric" of such sights is strong ; a visible sermon is preached to the soul through the eye, and never does personal extravagance seem so sinful, never does it pierce the conscience with such keen and sharp reproach ; the trappings and costly ornaments of the rich, "the wearing of gold, and the putting on of apparel," seem then to be malefactor's robes, rather than things to be coveted ; and when the cry for bread is heard, or the want of bread is seen, the extravagant trifles and gewgaws seem to torment the wearers with stern accusations of cruelty. Pity is sure to flow, self-indulgence to be seen in its true light, if the poor be really visited, and their state really revealed. If the visiting is regular and habitual, the pity becomes habitual ; and habitual pity will produce, what is so much to be desired, habitual almsgiving and personal self-denial. And it is constant giving, not by fits, nor on impulse, nor in gusts, which is of real good. There should be a fixed and stated portion set apart and consecrated to the poor by those who would be true almsgivers, to secure them and help them against themselves, to prevent the spirit of self-indulgence or self-deceit from creeping in. Would not the tithing of an "allowance" or "pin-money" suggest itself as the least that should be done ?

It is, indeed, of the highest importance that those of the higher orders, who habitually visit the poor, should make much of the duty of relieving their temporal wants ; though it seems an indirect channel for improving their spiritual state, yet, as a solid proof of real interest, so it predisposes the poor to believe the regard for their spiritual improvement is equally sincere. To rustle into a poor man's house, when he is wanting bread, and to say, "Now let us read the Bible," will provoke some such remark as "Give me some bread, and then let us read;" to begin sermonizing to a starving family, to speak in a soft tone of the consolations of the Gospel, while want is thinning their frames, and whitening their cheeks, is almost a mockery of their need. Take an interest in their worldly state, and we have found a key to open their hearts; gratitude has a quick ear; and the Bible will sound with double sweetness on their lips, who have first supplied the family with a meal. At the same time our female almoners must be careful not to yield to rash, hasty, indiscriminate largess. They turn silver to copper, and waste half their alms, who give without discretion.

And, in speaking of visiting the poor, we must say a word on the subject of instruction. We think that lay visitors would do well, as far as possible, to confine themselves to the reading of the Bible, to talk little directly on religious subjects, to leave positive instruction to the Clergy. And in reading God's Holy Word, it is a good plan to fix upon the Psalms and Lessons of the day, as being an observance of the Church's course in public service, and connecting the infirm and sick, in spirit at least, with those who pray and hear God's word in church. At any rate, it is a rule to go by, and there is always an advantage in submitting ourselves to rule. Visitors must learn to regard themselves as readers, rather than as teachers or expounders.

While we are on this point, we cannot but remark on other advantages which will arise to the higher orders, from being brought into contact with their pastors, and in seeking from them ways of doing good to the poor. The intercourse thus commenced may lead them to consult their pastors about themselves. They suffer great loss from that extremity of reserve, which forbids any spiritual and serious intercourse with their parish priests; they get to look upon them simply as gentlemen; they meet them in secular society, and talk with them on every subject probably but the most important. There is, we know, a difficulty in talking freely and naturally upon religious subjects, but we think this over-reserve and stiffness arises from mixing too much in what we would call conventional life; the whole character becomes somewhat artificial; naturalness upon all points has too much departed, and if there were a return to home-life and the more natural attitudes of the mind, we believe that this difficulty would be greatly lessened. There are many cases of conscience, many religious doubts and perplexities, which it would ease and profit the heart to unfold: and in time of sickness, what great benefits and comforts the higher orders refuse themselves by hesitating to seek, as the poor do, the visits of the clergy. We are thankful, however, to see that the pastor is beginning to be more frequently invited to the bed-side of the rich. We have already shown our reader the grave and sober kind of intercourse which the churchwomen of the seventeenth century held with their ghostly counsellors; it is the revival of this kind of intercourse which we desire, not the "running after" them, which characterizes modern religionism, amounting more to a passionate admiration than aiming at grave, earnest deliberation with them.

But even supposing that there is some bar to the visiting of the poor; that either, in the case of daughters, parents object to it, or that a suitable district cannot be marked out, or that the ground is pre-occupied, still the earnest churchwoman need not be at a loss for opportunities of doing good. In this case the parish school invites her care, a noble sphere of action. Children, above all others, seem to appeal to her for aid, while the gift of a natural aptness in teaching gives a double voice to the call.

But in thus pointing out duties that call the churchwoman abroad, these must not be performed to the neglect of duties at home. "Charity begins at home," is indeed a holy proverb, if it be rightly understood; love towards kindred and unselfishness must be exercised before love and unselfishness towards strangers; particular love must precede universal. We earnestly recommend the perusal of "Gertrude" to our female readers, that they may learn to mix home duties with duties abroad, lest love for the poor becomes a mere hobby, or a passion, or an excitement; they must not look upon their homes as mere bedrooms, breakfast-rooms, and dining-rooms, and the out-of-door world as the scene of interest and exertion; but they must practise self-denial and considerateness in home life. It is the fault of the Romish conventual system, that it does not merely afford a refuge to the lonely, and homeless, and friendless, but that it quenches half the fire of the home hearth, draws persons away from the natural fellowship into which they were incorporated by God Himself, and encourages the neglect and forsaking of kindred. If women throw themselves out of their home duties, either by devoting all their care and time to the poor, or by rushing into conventual life, in both cases they pursue a mistaken course. As it has been well said,—

"By trying to love our relations and friends, by submitting to their wishes, though contrary to our own, by bearing with their infirmities, by overcoming their occasional waywardness by kindness, by dwelling on their excellences, and trying to copy them; thus it is that we form in our hearts the root of charity. . . The vain talkers of philanthropy usually show the emptiness of their profession, by being morose and cruel in the private relations of life, which they seem to account as subjects beneath their notice. . . . I cannot fancy a state of life more favourable for the exercise of high Christian principle, and the matured and refined Christian spirit, than that of persons who differ in tastes and general character being obliged by circumstances to live together, and mutually to accommodate to each other their respective wishes and pursuits. And this is one among the many providential benefits (to those who will receive them) arising out of the holy estate of Matrimony; which not only calls out the tenderest and gentlest feelings of our nature, but, where persons do their duty, must be in various ways more or less a state of self-denial."

In thus insisting upon a careful respect to home duties, do we not insist upon care for the servants of our house, a true part of the family, or "familia," even in the Roman view of home? Reform of the whole class of servants is strongly called for; "steadiness" is the most that is now looked for; seriousness is indeed rare; out of the whole class of communicants, rich and poor, the servant-class yields the fewest, and this is no faint proof of the condition of the class. We venture to hint, that, among other methods of reformation, it is of the highest importance to provide good books for servants. We should like to see a kitchen library in every house. Servants are great readers in their way, and at present they rather hurt than improve themselves by reading, through the cheapness of vicious, unprincipled, but exciting publications. Among men-servants the "Weekly Dispatch" is notoriously popular. We know no better method of hindering the circulation of bad books than by a counter-circulation of good. Regular hours, home life, absence of gaiety and dissipation, the cessation of a constant flow of company; all these are among the most powerful of indirect methods of raising the religious character of our households.

Now in thus freely commenting on the present condition of the women of the upper classes, in contrasting them with no small portion of the same classes in former times, and in anxiously urging a return to a more domestic, unselfish, and Christian mode of life, we write hopefully and in good heart. Though we see great evils, we are not disposed to sink into the gloomy apathy of despair; it is no time to despond; we can discern a break in the sky. Though the smooth, deadly current of worldly life sweeps down with fearful force, and gathers into itself a vast multitude of lighter minds, there is, as we have already said, a counter-current setting in, breasting with the other tide, with a still, deep, and mysterious power; not noisily, not tumultuously, nor with great show of power, but steadily, and with a firm, unyielding earnestness. The Church is beginning to be stirred with a new life, and to lay hold of souls, and to work in them, and to possess them, with a spirit such as she has not had the grace to put forth for a century and a half. We see the renewal of olden zeal, and faith, and love ; we behold a more self-denying spirit spreading itself into the very seats of wealth,—simplicity of life, adopted as a duty and as a means to greater usefulness,—the system of the Church better understood, more fully felt, and entered into and obeyed,—an increase of earnestness ; and this earnestness tempered by a teachable spirit, and uniting itself to order. All these marks of renewed vitality give witness that ours is no ephemeral, no schismatical body, raised for a time to provoke the true body to faith and to good works, but a true, living, enduring branch of the Catholic Church.

Now this new zeal is animating the daughters of the Church ; and we see a growing body of earnest-minded women, who are disentangling themselves from the frivolous, easy, and unsatisfying pleasures of the world, returning to their proper sphere of action, devoting themselves to a holy and charitable life, and yet showing that the course of true religion is not morose nor sour, that long-drawn faces and sombre looks are no part of genuine piety ; but rather that they who give themselves to such a life have the true source of even, enduring cheerfulness. The importance of an increase and deepening of this true religion among the women of the higher ranks cannot be told ; though woman's is a home mission, and so seems bounded within a narrow and quiet sphere, yet the influence there exercised spreads downward, upwards, and all around. Home is, as it were, the heart of the world ; and the great body of the world takes its colour from the blood which issues from the heart, and which is itself unseen. We know not how much of the mother or the wife colours the actions of the men ; what lines of public conduct issue from the spirit that was learnt at home. And hence, as we desire that our nobles, statesmen, lawyers, soldiers, physicians, merchants, all the members of the Church “in their vocation and ministry,” should promote the glory of God by faithfully filling their parts as sons and servants of Jesus Christ,—so we have an intensity of desire that women, the secret levers of such a weight of good or evil in the world, by a high spirituality of life, by giving a godly character to their homes, may have the grace given them to move towards good those whom they in any degree mould or influence.

We have now discussed the more important branches of the subject ; but our pen, having once gained an impetus, and catching somewhat of the locomotiveness of the age, is disposed to run even into the by-lanes of the subject, rather than stop ; so we must suffer it to take its course and fairly to run itself out, leaving the more hardy and persevering of our readers to follow for a moment if they will. The by-lanes, indeed, into which we turn, open out, it must be confessed, a view of considerable importance, though we can but briefly consider it. When we urge a return to greater domesticity, we are instantly led to look at the means for giving a continued interest to home. We want, of course, women to be "keepers at home," simply as a matter of duty, as their estate according to the Gospel, the sensual privacy of Eastern women being exchanged, not for publicity, but for an elevated retirement. But having taken this high ground, we may fairly look about and see what can be done to prevent their tiring of that which they dutifully undertake, to give them a permanent zest and relish for home life, and to prevent ennui from gradually making itself a place by the quiet fire-side. Thus, if there is to be more of home life, there must be more of home resources: bare unfurnished minds are but dreary things for daily use; women must be better educated, and have a stronger system of education. Without entering into the delicate question of the extent or character of their capacities, there cannot be a doubt in any reasonable mind that they are greatly under-educated at present; their minds are but gilt and plated with a thin coating of knowledge; a shallow mosaic is let in; like modern glass the colour is laid on, and not, as Hannah More observes, "burnt in:" the brush spreads a coloured wash over the whole, that looks well enough for the hasty glances of the multitude, who in society-life just look and pass on; but it will not bear the daily gaze, or daily wear.

"Society" has been the great vampire of women's minds; it is this which has weakened and vitiated the whole system of their education; it has been a system for show rather than for use; the surface of their minds has been brightened with a flimsy embroidery to fit them for society, to make an effect, as it were, by the candle-light of life. At eighteen, when their understandings are just beginning to gather strength, then the work of instruction is pronounced to be "finished;" they are veneered and polished up for the great show-rooms of the world; they walk forth from the school-room in supposed maturity. Such a system, so brief, so careful of the lighter and more trifling attainments, is wholly unworthy of their natural understandings, and leaves them with but slender resources for enlivening a domestic course of life. Too much is attempted in the school age, and much of that is of a wrong kind; the whole structure must not be begun, completed, and roofed in by eighteen, if it is to keep out dulness and ennui all the long winter nights. It is like starting for Russia with a bandbox of muslins and caps. Music, and worsted-work, and light reading, are well enough to fill up the crevices of the day by way of relaxation, but they are not enough to give a constant charm to home life. All that can really be done in the school-age is to lay the foundation of knowledge, to get through the grammar, to have the ground well dug and prepared, to acquire habits of study and application: the hot-house haste of "abridgments" and compendiums will but produce a weak luxuriance of leaves.

In short, if schoolroom life is devoted only to the foundation, the girl prepared for after-study, no great burst into the world at eighteen first anticipated and then effected, but a gradual enlargement of intercourse with the circle of the parents' friends, then education, properly so called, would be carried on when school ceased. Though it would partake more of a voluntary character, yet it need not be a whit less vigorous for that. If the wrong impression be once done away, that every thing like real study is over when she "comes out," she will continue, as a matter of course, to give herself to study, even though she has more freedom of motion, and the restraints of the schoolroom are removed; just as the best part of the education of men is carried on, when they are in a measure masters of themselves, and free to choose either ignorance or knowledge, their own good sense keeping them to their books, when the leading-strings of school are broken.

And when we say that the capacities of women are but faintly exercised, are not properly worked out and developed, are equal to stronger meat, we are not speaking at random, nor taking a Utopian view of the power of their minds; we speak soberly, and, as it were, from book; we look, as we have done in the former question, to actual women of past times; we see what they have attained, and thence we learn what they may attain again, if they were moulded in a stronger system. We turn to the Elizabethan age,—the strong age of English intellect,—and also to the succeeding century; there we see the goodly stature; which, under proper discipline, female understandings can reach. In the phalanx of strong-minded, well-informed women that there presents itself, Elizabeth herself stands first. Miss Strickland, the pleasant gossip of history, speaks much of Elizabeth's learning.

"Among the royal manuscripts in the British Museum is a small volume, in an embroidered binding, consisting of prayers and meditations selected from different English writers by Queen Katherine Parr, and translated and copied by the Princess Elizabeth, in Latin, French, and Italian. . . . Like her elder sister, the Princess Mary, she was an accomplished Latin scholar, and astonished some of the most erudite linguists of that age, by the ease and grace with which she conversed in that language. French, Italian, Spanish, and Flemish, she both spoke and wrote, with the same facility as her native tongue. She was fond of poetry, and sometimes made verses that were not devoid of merit, but she only regarded them as the amusement of her leisure hours, bestowing more of her time and attention on the study of history, than on any thing else."

"French and Italian," says her tutor, Ascham, "she speaks like English; Latin, with fluency, propriety, and judgment. She also spoke Greek with me frequently, willingly, and moderately well. . . . She read with me almost the whole of Cicero, and a great part of Livy. . . . The beginning of her day was always devoted by her to the New Testament in Greek; after which she read select Orations of Isocrates, and the Tragedies of Sophocles. . . . For her religious instruction she drew first from the fountains of Scripture, and afterwards from St. Cyprian, the 'Common-places' of Melancthon, and similar works."

Hume tells us of Lady Jane Grey, that

"She had attained a familiar knowledge of the Roman and Greek languages, beside modern tongues. . . . Roger Ascham, having one day paid her a visit, found her employed in reading Plato, while the rest of the family were engaged in a party of hunting in the park; and in admiring the singularity of her choice, she told him that she received more pleasure from that author, than the others could reap from all their sport and gaiety."

Mildred Lady Burleigh was a good Greek scholar, and wrote a letter in that language to the University of Cambridge. Her learning was not confined to the Classic writers, but she deeply studied the Fathers of the Church, especially Basil, Cyril, Chrysostom, and Gregory Nazianzen. Her sister, the mother of Lord Bacon, was "eminent for piety, virtue, and learning, and well versed in the Greek, and Latin, and Italian tongues." She published a translation of several celebrated Italian sermons, which obtained the commendation of Archbishop Parker; while another sister, Lady Russell, was equally learned.

It would, of course, be easy to supply a list of well-read women; we allude only to a few specimens; and though we are far from expecting to see women of our day with the understanding of Elizabeth, still George Herbert's advice on a higher matter is applicable to this, that we had better shoot at the moon if we want to hit a high mark. Even if we regard the class of women we speak of as the "wranglers" of the sex, we might raise the standard many degrees without approaching them.

And if the general standard were raised, we need be under no fears of being over-run with female pedants. When a few women are infinitely better informed than the mass of their sex, there is then a strong temptation to learned vanity and parade; but where all are raised to a higher level, we have no greater inundation of pedantry. Nor need we fear that a book-worm spirit will arise to the destruction of those lighter accomplishments which in their proper place seem natural to women. Ascham says of Elizabeth, that in music she was "very skilful;" and Heywood, quoted by Miss Strickland, says, that after the severer studies of the day were over, "she betook herself to her lute or viol, and after that, employed her time in needle-work." Indeed, we know that it was the golden age of English music. In the volume from which we have so much quoted, we find that Mrs. Murray, the mother of Lady Halket, had masters for her daughters for "playing on the lute and virginals and dancing; and a gentlewoman was kept for teaching them all kinds of needle-work." Music and needle-work were much cultivated as relaxations. A race, not of trifling and shallow, but of strong-minded, well-informed women is required, if home life is to bloom with perpetual charms; and such women will not break out into any of the affected eccentricities of learning, nor forget in solid acquirements the lighter ornaments that become their sex; they will trim their minds as well as clothe them. We must, however, curb our pen, and content ourselves with having thrown out a few hints on the less important, but not unimportant, branch of the subject.

ART. III.—Essays on Partial Derangement of the Mind, in supposed connexion with Religion. By the late JOHN CHEYNE, M.D., F.R.S.E., M.R.S.A., Physician-General to his Majesty's Forces in Ireland, &c. &c. Dublin.

WE do not know of any really important topic upon which the popular knowledge is so superficial as that of the connexion between the body and the mind, and of the modes in which they act and react upon each other. We fear we cannot except from the charge of lack of most useful, not to say necessary, information, that class of men to whom we are now chiefly addressing ourselves, although to them it is little less important than it is to the medical practitioner. It has long been our settled opinion, that the ignorance we so constantly meet with amongst our clerical acquaintances, of the machinery of their own bodies, and of the invariable operation of certain long-proved principles by which it is regulated, cannot be justified by a reference to their advancement in so many other branches of knowledge, which were once confined to distinct classes. There is something in the phrase, the study of medicine, which is still considered as prohibitory to an unprofessional person as the phrase, the study of the law; so that a work upon medical science seems as much a stray book upon a clergyman's table as Coke upon Littleton. The usual consequence is, that the practical knowledge—science would be an improper word to designate it—of so many, concerning the simple laws of health and disease, would but entitle them, we fear, to the worst epithet of the two in the old saying, that every man at forty is either his own physician or a fool. We are not now alluding to an accurate knowledge of the practice of medicine, which of course demands the energies of the whole life and the whole man; but only to that elementary philosophy of the human frame, which will confer on its possessor the power of protecting himself against the imposition of disordered nerves, and the like, or the baser imposition of dishonest practitioners; and, by necessary consequence, aid him in morally and physically benefiting others. We are only asking, that he who is not satisfied without knowing something of the many philosophies of the heavens and the earth, should not be satisfied without knowing something of the philosophy of his own microcosm. In advocating this, we do not think it necessary to guard ourselves against the old charge, that such knowledge will, probably, turn men into quacks or hypochondriacs. Superficial knowledge may do this ; we mean that outside knowledge (which is often ignorance disguised by words), in contradistinction to that inside knowledge, of the corporeal machine, which would most surely defend its possessor from the quackery of tampering with disease, either in himself or another. When, however, it is considered that the noblest intellect, upon which the welfare of the human race may depend, is yet enshrined in a physical case of most exquisite construction, upon the continued perfection of which its successful operations depend ; and that the preservation, or partial or total ruin of that case depends absolutely, speaking generally, upon the prudence, or carelessness, or ignorance of its possessor ; so that, short of vital damage, ignorance of its laws may deduct days, weeks, and months, from pursuits for which life is altogether too short ; certainly a prima facie case is made out, of sufficient force to bear down fanciful scruples : and we have only to look over the examples of the living and the dead to ascertain the value of such information, by which we may learn the costly price which high intellectual attainments have so often cruelly forced from their possessor ;—bodily sufferings, premature old age, an inactive life, which rendered their attainments little better than idle ornaments, or an untimely grave, which were the sole results of the palpable violation of physical laws, as certain in their operation, and as certainly known, as the best known laws of the inanimate world. Students, in pursuit of lofty knowledge, are warned by experienced friends of the future consequences, both to body and mind, of over-exertions ; that is, of violating known laws ; and instances, familiar to all, are pointed out, as buoys tell of past wrecks to the mariner. But the advice of grey hairs is too often thrown away upon the enthusiasm of youth, conscious of the present possession of an instrument which, as yet, responds to none of these forebodings : and this is not always from obstinacy or disregard of the respect due to affectionate seniors, but more often, because their warnings fasten upon no accurate knowledge of the unchanging laws of the machinery they are entreated to use rationally, in obedience to the plain designs of its Maker.

This elementary acquaintance with the primary laws of health and disease, founded on what we are contending for—a certain measure of popular philosophy of the corporeal system, which, we are sure, might be made easily accessible to all—must be regarded as pre-requisite to that higher knowledge, so transcendently important to the clerical, as well as to the medical, practitioner,—the mutual effects of the body and the mind upon each other. We will not institute a comparison, to determine to which of the two this kind of knowledge is most important, but will merely say, that, as the medical practitioner, who does not know, philosophically, the influences of the mind on the body, must totally fail in many cases; so, in like manner, must the clergyman often grievously fail, who does not know, philosophically, the influence of the body on the mind. We have ourselves witnessed the humiliating consequences, in spiritual practice, resulting from a total ignorance of the effects of certain bodily diseases on the soul: we say humiliating, for surely it was mortifying to discover that we had grossly mistaken symptoms, which turned out to be more like the uncertainties of madness, than the certainties of penitence and faith.

For the sake of bringing forward and enforcing our views of this deeply important subject, we propose making free use of the work which stands as the text of this article. Its popular style, its freedom from technical words and phrases, and, above all, the deeply pious tone that pervades it, justify its claims upon the clergyman's thoughtful attention, for whose use the benevolent author wrote it. Moreover, the authority for its theories and facts is in every way so unexceptionable, that it must require considerable self-confidence in him who should attempt to gainsay them. For when this work is lying before us, it is to be considered that we are not listening to the dreams of inexperienced youth, or the hypothetical creed of the mere book-student, or to the limited opinions of one who writes timidly, because he tells us he has done his best only, amidst imperfect means for testing his theories. On the contrary, Dr. Cheyne appears before us as one who, in his day, was recognized by his professional brethren in Dublin as a leader in that ample medical field. It is impossible, we think, to peruse the unassuming autobiographical sketch prefixed to the Essays without yielding its author our full confidence. We there read of one who, from humble beginnings, and with but few adventitious aids, relying mainly on the laws of human prudence, aspired to, and reached, the summit of an arduous profession. Indeed, we have seldom met with wiser lessons for general success in life than are told in this brief story. We know of no liberal profession—not even the English Church, in which, constituted as it now is, patronage must of course depend mainly upon the accidents of birth and connexions—which could ultimately refuse success to him who should frame his life upon them. We would gladly, could we spare room, enrich our pages with some of those maxims of human prudence, so rarely practised, yet so easily learnt, which carried their obedient and persevering possessor through the gradations of an income of "three guineas for six months," and of 472*l.* for the next twelve months, to one averaging 5000*l.* per annum; together with the more rare, but infinitely more blessed, undying rewards of fair fame and ample love.

In a modest and brief preface, the author thus accounts for the imaginary imperfections of these essays, and explains the object for which they were composed:—

"At a season when it was desirable to find such occupation as would divert him from anxious thought, he was induced to write the following Essays, which are obviously the result of recollection rather than of study, and, without exception, are in a crude and unfinished state. Had he been in the habit of recording his observations in writing, or even had he been possessed of the necessary books of reference, and had not his power of application been impaired by declining health, he is persuaded that he could have produced a fulness of evidence which would have more firmly established the positions to which he is desirous of obtaining the reader's assent. These positions are:

"1. That mental derangements are invariably connected with bodily disorder.

"2. That such derangements of the understanding, as are attended with insane speculations on the subject of religion, are generally, in the first instance, perversions only of one power of the mind.

"3. That clergymen, to whom these essays are particularly addressed, have little to hope for in placing divine truth before a melancholic or hypochondriacal patient, until the bodily disease, with which the mental delusion is connected, is cured or relieved.

"4. That many of the doubts and fears of truly religious persons, of sane mind, depend either upon ignorance of the constitution and operations of the mind, or upon disease of the body."

The work is divided into eleven essays, the titles of which will serve to show the importance of the topics discussed. The first is introductory and somewhat metaphysical. The others bear the following titles:—"On False Perceptions, and Supposed Demonism." "On Disorder of the Mind, confined to a single Faculty." "Of a Disordered State of the Affections." "On Insanity, in supposed connexion with Religion." "On the Constitution of Man, Upright, Fallen, and Regenerate." "On Conscience." "On Faith." "On Love to God, Charity, and Hardness of Heart." "On Hope." "On the Presence and Absence of Devotional Feeling."

One or two of these are almost purely theological, though based on philosophy, manifesting, however, accurate and deep thought upon momentous topics, together with earnest piety, and, in the main, successful attempts at philosophical explanations of difficulties and anomalies in the Christian's experience.

The first essay opens with a quotation from Pinel, expressive of his views of the nature of the human mind.—

“ ‘ It cannot be doubted, that to consider the faculties of the mind separately would contribute to facilitate the study of pneumatology, as well as tend to very important knowledge in regard to the nature and varieties of insanity.’ ”

Upon this, Dr. Cheyne observes :

“ This arrangement we adopt as the basis of the following remarks, although we are aware that a doctrine is assumed which is rejected by many psychological writers, and which, however probable it may be, has not been proved ;—namely, that the mind, whatever unity of essence it may have, operates as though it were an aggregate of distinct faculties.”

As we shall not meddle with the metaphysics of this work, we leave this theory undiscussed ; and more especially as the author warns us, that he pretends to but little knowledge of the mind but what he has learnt from observation, and from having witnessed the passions and affections in unrestrained action ; and from “ having viewed the drama of life from behind the scenes, and attended to manifestations of character in health and disease ; from introspection, especially while suffering from lowness of spirits arising from dyspeptic nervousness, aggravated by the wear and tear of a life of continued over-exertion.” We apprehend that the disclosures implied here (and they are more than meet the eye, as we happen to know), must stamp the work with a far higher value than any merely metaphysical claims could bestow upon it. There are, however, evidences in it that Dr. Cheyne was not unacquainted with our best metaphysical writers, and he therefore takes upon himself to affirm, with a just confidence, that his conclusions will hold good, upon the theory that the mind is uncompounded, and that its faculties are but varied conditions of one simple substance.

Mental derangements—such as most clergymen of extensive experience must have met with—may arise, Dr. Cheyne says, from the following sources :—

- “ 1. From a disordered condition of the organs of sense.
- “ 2. From a disorder of one or more of the intellectual faculties.
- “ 3. From a disorder of one or more of the natural affections and desires.
- “ 4. From a disorder of one or more of the moral affections.”

The practical clergyman, who has not examined this branch of knowledge, will find many illustrations of these sources from which he cannot fail to derive instruction, and much relief of mind under anxieties, in particular cases, where effects exist which, if he did but know it, are really beyond his province and his skill. Charitable constructions, too, are here prepared for more intricate cases of inconsistency of conduct,—which have sometimes shaken faith to its foundations,—oddness, and irregularity of behaviour. He will be led to new trains of investigation when, in particular cases, unlooked for changes of character occur: such as, when a sensualist is spiritualized, the proud man becomes humble, the ambitious man lowly; or, on the other hand, when the generous man becomes miserly, a moral man dissolute or knavish, a sober man a drunkard, or a well-tempered man passionate. And surely there is all the difference in the world, for comfort and safety, between vaguely saying of certain persons, they must be deranged, and authoritatively knowing that truly some derangement of the mental faculties has occurred, which altogether shifts the ground of moral responsibility, and of his own duty.

We find, hereabouts, two remarks, relative to the dependence of the activity or inactivity of the mental faculties on the condition of the brain, which are well worth the student's attention. We recollect when, many years ago, we have quitted our books for exercise in the garden, and anxious to crowd as much as possible in the shortest space of time, have relinquished the spade drenched and limb-tired. But again and again great has been our mortification to find our inability for deep thought. For then we knew not, that mental activity depends on the supply and exhaustion of sensorial power, which is exhausted by long continued exercise either of body or mind, and, until restored by food, or sleep, or rest, the full mental vigour cannot be given. And, secondly, upon the state of the circulation of the blood, which is of course affected in various ways, depending on the constitution. A distinct apprehension of these laws will save the student much time, and, it may be, aid him in shunning disease.

The essay, "On false Perception and supposed Demonism," announces some physical laws which are illustrated and enlivened by striking facts. The ear, the sight, and other organs of the senses, are all shown to be capable of conveying false perceptions; and it is important to know that all are referable to disease of the brain, or of the digestive organs acting upon the brain, or a portion of it. Hence arise lessons of the value of temperance, grounded on warnings, that the glutton or the drunkard may end in the madman.

Of course Dr. Cheyne rejects the popular stories of demoniacal possessions; though, we think, he stops short of the whole truth of Satanic agency. A case parallel to one recorded here occurred in our own experience last winter, and cost a walk of two miles almost daily for some weeks. This person's temptations may be told in the words here applied to the case of another. "I am urged to say the most shocking things—blasphemous and obscene words are ever on my tongue; hitherto, thank God, I have been preserved," &c. We always urged that the disease under which she was labouring, was the proximate cause of these involuntary mental states. We, however, elicited a discovery, to which we attached much value, that these were temptations to former familiar sins, though they had been long given up. "Thou makest me to possess the iniquities of my youth." It seems to us, however, impossible, upon the principles of revelation, as it is needless, to deny that degree of Satanic agency, in such cases, which shall fall short of the somewhat indefinite phrase, demoniacal possession. A weakened state of body, and consequently disordered nerves; the mental powers, therefore, stripped of their wonted energy; what condition more suitable to his purposes could Satan find? The Bible, or some religious work, was almost always open before her, we believe. She was beyond the reach of sensual temptations. Hence, this one was invented; a permitted chastisement (so we taught her) by means of long-forgotten sins, imperfectly, if ever, repented of. We understand Dr. Cheyne as stopping far short of this, when he says,

"We have never seen a case of disordered mind, even when attended with the most subtle malignity, which could not be explained upon natural principles. We acknowledge the power of Satan, and it may be as great as ever in the dark places of the earth, which have received no benefit from Christianity; but as there are no rules for distinguishing between the workings of the human mind, when influenced by bodily disease—when yielding to its unrestrained propensity to evil, and when acted upon by Satan, the extent of Satanic agency cannot be known, nor ought the mode of its operation to be assumed upon conjecture. It is one of the devices of man's great enemy to have his power, nay, his existence, denied by those who are his subjects; and we only play his game, and confirm Sadducean principles, when we allege what we cannot prove. Probably nothing so much weakened Luther's influence, as his accounts of his conflicts with the devil."

Directions are given for the course to be pursued with such as conceive themselves to be "possessed;" but, good as they are, we imagine they appeal to the educated only; at least, we should despair of making it clear to the illiterate, that their favourite sparks of fire, beautiful streams of water, and bright angelic appearances, which most of us must have heard adduced by dying persons of the lower classes as evidences of salvation, are produced by disorder of the optic nerve, or brain ; or that the sweet music that angels sung round their beds, or other discordant sounds, “solely depend upon accelerated circulation throughout the brain, or affections of the auditory nerves.” It is important, however, to know, that Dr. Cheyne has often, by this kind of explanation, “removed a mountain of perplexity from those who had thought themselves demoniacally possessed.”

This essay concludes with the following instructive case :

“ We once, by a very obvious question, relieved the mind of a young gentleman who thought that if he were not in some measure to blame, he never could have been persecuted by injections into his mind of wicked thoughts and articulate promptings of blasphemy. We asked him, if he were locked up in a chamber with a profane swearer, would he consider himself blameable for hearing words which he disliked and protested against? This young gentleman was delivered from his supposed (?) temptations by mild purgatives, alkaline bitters, and country air. In a word, we must cure the choler ” (in allusion to Baxter’s odd view of the case), “ and the choleric operations of the devil will cease.”

This may be the truth, but it is not, we think, the whole truth. For the temptations were not only “supposed,” but real. Whence they arose is another inquiry. However, there must be a tempter to make a temptation ; and unless the mind can tempt itself, when no internal want exists, which is altogether doubtful, we prefer our own solution, that such favourable opportunities are watched for by the foe, so often beaten away from other points ; and then he selects the only kind of temptation which their case admits of, and against which the mind itself is all but too feeble to bear up. In the majority of cases, too, this corporeal condition is superinduced by indiscretion—to use a mild word which does not adequately mark the offence of breaking the laws of nature—either in diet, or some other manner. And hence the punishment is not to be regarded as a mere accident, nor as inappropriate, nor as useless, since, when rightly understood, it may afford inducements for future self-denial (the Christian’s best help and safety), and as acting the part of the prophet to the woman, as we made it act that part to the woman above spoken of—“ art thou come to call my sin to remembrance ? ”

The next essay illustrates “ the disorder of the mind, confined to a single faculty.” Of these the memory seems most exposed to injury from excitement of the brain, or external injury. In one instance the knowledge of the vernacular tongue was lost, whilst the patient could utter his thoughts only in a dead language. Other instances are related.

On the gloomy and awful subject of hereditary insanity, important revelations are here made to the spiritual adviser. It may appear necessary, in particular cases, to draw aside the veil which time, and delicacy, and tenderness, have thrown over the more private history of a family, for the welfare of the living. Dr. Cheyne has no hesitation in affirming, that various immoral and vicious practices ought to be ascribed to insanity.

“When periodic insanity has shown itself in a large family, it is probable that some members of the family will evince a propensity to thieving and swindling. And when more children than one of the same parents, bursting through all the restraints imposed by carefully-established principles on established habits, engage in swindling transactions, it will appear, upon inquiry, that insanity has broken out in that family.”

One example may be required to illustrate this:—

“One individual of this (particular) family, devoted to the highest interests of man, has been exposed to danger in his attempts, perhaps not always the most judicious, to extend a knowledge of true religion; others, although sometimes odd or fantastical, have passed respectably through life, performing their relative duties in an irreproachable manner; one has been guilty of various incongruities, one is an incorrigible liar, one a dexterous swindler, and two have been in a lunatic asylum. Falsehood and swindling in such individuals are but symptoms of mental derangement.”

What a relief to the burdened soul of the puzzled and baffled minister would not a knowledge of such well-established principles of the moral afford in similar cases?

Dr. Cheyne is anxious to prove that “the imagination may be insane, while other faculties, were they not acted upon by it, would be in a natural state.” Such, we suppose, might be Hamlet’s, who had “a method in his madness.” The author has limited himself in this essay to a particular consideration of two powers of the mind, and endeavours to show what havoc may be produced by a single faculty being destroyed, while the intellect, in other respects, remains inviolate. The examples are curious. Thus, in some cases, the power of pronouncing a single letter is lost; or again, the strokes of letters in writing are misplaced, and one word employed for another; or the power of pronouncing or writing the name of individuals and places is lost. These are traced up, not to a failure of memory, which is usually the alleged cause, but to “a failure of utterance, as every thing in connexion with the individual, whose name cannot be recollected—his appearance, character, circumstances, are stored up in the mind." We quote a singular example of the suspension of that faculty by which thought is communicated by speech or writing.

"On the 31st of January, 1772, Dr. Spalding had to speak to many people in quick succession, and to write many trifling memorandums concerning very dissimilar things, so that the attention was incessantly impelled in contrary directions. He had to draw a receipt for interest; he accordingly sat down, and wrote the first two words requisite, but in a moment became incapable of finding the rest of the words in his memory, or the strokes of the letters belonging to them. He strained his attention to the utmost in endeavouring leisurely to delineate letter after letter, with constant reference to the preceding, in order to be sure it suited. He said to himself that they were not the right strokes, without being able in the least to conceive wherein they were deficient. He therefore gave up the attempt, and partly by monosyllables, and partly by signs, ordered away the man who was waiting for the receipt, and quietly resigned himself to his state. For a good half hour there was a tumult in part of his ideas. He could only recognize them for such as forced themselves upon him without his participation. He endeavoured to dispel them to make room for better, which he was conscious of, in the bottom of his thinking faculty. He threw his attention, as far as the swarm of confused and intruding images would permit, on his religious principles, and said to himself distinctly, that if by a kind of death he was extricated from the tumult in his brain, which he felt as foreign and exterior to himself, he should exist and think on in the happiest quiet and order. With all this there was not the least illusion in the senses. He saw and heard every thing about him with its proper shape and sound, but could not get rid of the strange confusion in his head. He tried to speak, for the sake of finding whether he could bring out any thing connected; but however vehemently he strove to force together attention and thought, and though he proceeded with the utmost deliberation, he soon perceived that unmeaning syllables alone followed, quite different from the words he wished. He was as little master now of the organs of speech as he had before found himself of those of writing. I therefore, says he, contented myself with the not very satisfactory expectation, that if this state should continue, I should never in all my life be able to speak or write again; but that my sentiments and principles, remaining the same, would be a permanent spring of satisfaction and hope, till my complete separation from the unfortunate ferment of the brain. I was only sorry for my relations and friends, who, in this case, must have lost me for duties and business, and all proper intercourse with them, and looked upon me as a burden upon earth. But after the completion of the half hour, my head began to grow clearer and more quiet. The uproar and vividness of the strange and troublesome ideas diminished. I could now carry through my process of thought—I wished now to ring for the servant, that he might request my wife to come up. But I required yet some time to practise the right pronunciation of the requisite words. In the first conversation with my family, I proceeded for another half hour slowly, and in some measure anxiously, till at length I found myself as free and clear as at the beginning of the day, only I had a very trifling headache. Behold, instead of fifty dollars for half a year's interest, as it should have been, I found in as clear, straight strokes as I ever made in my life—fifty dollars through the sanctification of the bri-" with a hyphen, as I had come to the end of the line ; I could not possibly fall upon any thing in my previous ideas or occupations which, by any obscure mechanical influence, could have given occasion to these unintelligible words."

The philosophy of tears is sadly and beautifully expounded. "Weeping," Dr. Cheyne tells us, "is as much the language of grief, as speech is of thought." A severe injury done to one of the affections has interrupted tears as effectually as words, by the destruction of one of the faculties of the mind. How ready are those who are under a stunning bereavement to declare, whilst the wound of the heart is fresh, that they cannot shed a single tear ! "How often have we, in passing through this VALE of TEARS, heard the following lament—'Oh, that I could only cry ! I feel as if it would so relieve me ! There seems nothing natural in my grief. I, who wept so bitterly for my father, have not a single tear to shed for my child. Ever since my husband, or son, or daughter died, my affections have been frozen, and my eyes dried up.'" When however the more violent, selfish, or ecstatic stage of the passion has had time to subside, tears will again flow.

Other examples of the deviation of the mind are recorded, which might amuse, were not the subject too painful and humiliating. For example, there is found in some what has been humorously called "the lust of finishing." Dr. Cheyne has known some who, otherwise perfectly sound in intellect, when they have seen a herd of cattle in a field, or on the road, could not resist a desire to count them. Another, a man of great power of thought, confessed to a propensity, which he was not always able to resist, viz., to rise up and lift a chair, and thump it on the ground a certain number of times, and then replace it in an exact line with the rest ; nay, more,—

" 'I am sometimes,' said he, 'as it were, impelled to subject a whole range of chairs to the same discipline ; and when I overcome this fancy I experience dissatisfaction,—a sort of scruple which seems as if it belonged to the non-performance of a duty ; and now, my dear sir, what is this but insanity ? ' "

And then he would force a laugh, at the same time that he blushed for shame.

A whole family, with which Dr. Cheyne was intimate, is mentioned, in the majority of whom there was this "lust of finishing." One, whose house stood near a lake, seven miles in circumference, rode round it every day of his life, and when he gave his horse to his servant, would frequently say, "Lord help those who must ride in all weathers." It is impossible not to have our estimate of a man lowered in whom, as is so often the case, we see some petty peculiarity or oddity, evidently adopted to gain notoriety. But the deserved contempt, if it were a manifestation of vanity, would be exchanged for a kind compassion, if we could trace up any deviation from the ordinary rules of society to some physical or moral disorganization warping the judgment. Indeed, one of our objects in recording these examples is to illustrate a philosophy to which so many are entire strangers, and which may serve to turn the unchristian ridicule, at the oddities of others, into pity and humble gratitude for our own exemption. Amongst other examples of similar modes in which predisposition to insanity shows itself, Dr. Johnson is introduced; and there can be very little doubt, Dr. Cheyne remarks, that he was often on the brink of insanity, and that many passages in his life serve to support this opinion. He refers to one which seems to have puzzled his "very entertaining biographer."

"He had another peculiarity, of which none of his friends ventured to ask an explanation. It appeared to me some superstitious habit, which he had contracted early, and from which he had never been called by his reason to disentangle himself. This was his anxious care to go out or in at a passage, by a certain number of steps, at a certain point; or, at least, so as either his right foot or his left, I forget which, should constantly make the first actual movement when he came close to the door or the passage. This I conjecture, for I have, upon innumerable occasions, observed him suddenly stop, and then seem to count his steps with a deep earnestness; and when he had neglected or gone wrong in this sort of magical movement, I have seen him go back again, put himself in a proper posture to begin the ceremony, and having gone through it, break from his abstraction, walk briskly on, and join his companions."

The next essay, on "a Disordered State of the Affections," may add another chapter to the Anatomy of the Melancholy of human life. The object proposed in it is to show that disturbances of the whole mind may also take place, in consequence of one of those endowments becoming much excited or depressed, being in a passionate or apathetic state. He instances the effects produced by the encouragement and discouragement of romantic love; by attachment, "founded on hope, and exalted by disappointment;" an obviously true classification. Examples are given of the absurd provocations by which this passionate "love" may be utterly extinguished ; thus proving, by the way, that this theme of the thousand and one novels of the year, this ἔρως, is a base offshoot from the lowest parts of humanity, and utterly, therefore, disowned by the spiritual ἀγάπη, for ἀγάπη οὐδέποτε ἐκπίπτει. Spiritual anatomists should pay more attention to this fact, as capable of yielding lessons of instruction, so truly needed by the many of our days, whose whole education has been tacitly founded upon the contrary doctrine, and whose subsequent reading has perpetually fed and pampered the falsehood.

Frequently, the active minister has been baffled in his endeavours to advance the spiritual progress of certain individuals in his flock, by a passionate desire for children, which has far surpassed the bounds of Christian moderation. When all those arguments, which of course must always have the precedence, arising from our relations to Christ and his to us, have failed in subduing this sinful passion, the clergyman may fall back upon the philosophy expounded in this book, and, in the words of Dr. Cheyne, warn, that "such an impatient desire for a possession, attended with so many cares and dangers, may so fill the whole mind as to end in insanity." Our own experience—an experience which has been corrected, amended, enlarged, or responded to, "as face answereth to face in a glass," again and again in these pages—enables us to add an item to this. A case exists in the circle of our own knowledge, in which this passionate desire is not only impeding directly growth in grace, but also indirectly injuring the whole character, by gradually subduing the affection naturally due to others.

Other moral problems, which have puzzled and wounded both spiritual guides and parents, are here solved. For example, some have no wish for children, and are devoid of parental affection ; and some, who have been attached parents, have lost all regard for their children, and, conscious of the change, have acknowledged and bewailed a want of affection, which they have ignorantly viewed as criminal. Dr. Cheyne refers to a lady who, by force of principle, or regard for character, discharged her maternal duties after every feeling of affection for her children was eradicated. Our estimation of the value of the wisdom contained in a knowledge of such laws as these, is great indeed. For to be able to relieve the mind of one who has committed herself to our spiritual guidance, from the mountainous load of conscious guilt thus imposed by a falsely directed conscience, which, if just, must also nullify every prayer, every sacramental privilege, every act of faith, is one of the sweets of the ministerial life.

Another fact, which is contrary to all preconceived probabili-ties, viz. that the maternal love is more liable to extinction than the paternal, is accounted for by the occurrence of bodily disease; —“Can a mother forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion on the fruit of her womb? yea, they may forget.” (Isaiah xlix. 15.)

Another wretched passion of human nature may be assaulted by a similar weapon, which may succeed, where others of a more legitimate kind have failed. The cupidity of the miser and collector, says Dr. Cheyne, sometimes becomes not merely the ruling passion, but the only passion, of their souls, gaining such an ascendancy, that at last it subdues all other desires which might have proved correctives to it; and when these are completely mastered, the mind is left in a state of derangement, which is generally incurable. It seems to us, that this philosophy relieves Christianity of much for which it is unjustly made responsible. It pretends not to work in spite of physical laws. We find, moreover, in it a commentary upon the words, “Ephraim is joined to his idols, let him alone,” which show that they may imply something more than an arbitrary judicial visitation, which, as it befel them in a moment, so it might be as speedily withdrawn. Anti-spiritual laws had been so long allowed to work their sure effects, as, by the laws of moral and physical nature, to render powerless the ordinary operations of spiritual laws. So, as we conjecture, Pharaoh’s lust of possession gained such an ascendancy over him, “that at last it subdued all other desires which might have proved correctives to it,” and ended in what is designated “hardness of heart,”—a moral derangement which defied not only all appeals to the superstition that lies in our nature, but also to the first laws of life, self-preservation. Dr. Cheyne religiously adds, that the Great Physician has prescribed but one cure for all this, “excision of the object of desire, even if it be precious as the right eye or right hand.”

We have now reached that essay to which Dr. Cheyne regards the former as introductory, “On Insanity in supposed connexion with Religion.” It opens with the following remark, or text, which is luminously illustrated by facts and arguments:—

“That mental derangement may originate in superstition or fanaticism, by either of which, behind a visor of religious zeal, all sobriety of mind is lost, to the interruption of social and domestic duties, will be understood by those who know that insanity, in the predisposed, may arise from any cause which excites, at the same time that it agitates, the mind. But that true religion,—which removes doubts and distractions, explains our duties and reconciles us to them, and teaches that ‘all things work together for good to them that love God,’ and thus not only guides but supports us as we toil through the weary maze of life; which in every pursuit demands moderation and method, and calms every rising storm of the passions,—that true religion should be productive of insanity is not easily credible, and would require the clearest evidence."

The French physicians have remarked, that, before the Revolution, a large proportion of the insane of France were monks. Whilst we would draw the attention of many, whom, in our day, this fact may especially concern, to this singular statement, we do not think that Dr. Cheyne's ready solution of it satisfies. He says, "we cannot draw any conclusion in favour of the opinion that religion causes insanity, from the fact of its prevalence among a class of men over whom superstition domineered." He omits to add, how far he regards that mode of life, constituted as it generally has been amongst Roman Catholics in the apparent expectation that heaven would work miracles to counteract the most daring defiance of the laws impressed upon human nature, is responsible for such consequences. If a man places himself, irrespective of his prejudged qualifications for its demands upon him, in a situation from which there was no escape, and in which, from constitutional peculiarities, his whole life must be one fierce struggle to stand up against the force of the strongest laws under which his Creator has placed him, both physical and moral derangement, of some kind, and to some extent, must issue. The history of the evils (including insanity) of Romanist monastic life, cannot be admitted as evidence against the principle itself of any such association, because it has been almost always founded upon, not only a disregard, but a violation, of those laws, under which God has conditioned humanity, and which He Himself, as we believe, never disregards or violates in his government of the world. We consider this to be a better and completer solution of the fact than Dr. Cheyne's.

So, it is added, it would be just as unfair to infer, that we must trace insanity to true religion, because it is possible to discover evidences of monomania among fanatics at home, who have mistaken "unequivocal symptoms of hysteria, or the inarticulate growlings of enthusiasm, for manifestations of the Holy Spirit."

Again, our own experience enables us to do justice to Dr. Cheyne's criterion for judging of the injustice, in particular cases, of making religion responsible for natural effects.

"In a person devoted to religion who may have become insane, it is desirable, as in every other case of insanity, to ascertain what faculty, affection, or sentiment, is prematurely disordered. If we find that all religious feeling is in abeyance, while, through exaggerated pride, vanity, selfishness, or imaginativeness, the mind becomes deranged, surely the case ought not to be ranked under the head of madness from religion."

The case of a female once under our own immediate notice, and now (or lately) in confinement, illustrates this criterion. We never once heard a doubt amongst her numerous acquaintance of her being a sincere and affectionate disciple of Christ, ever speaking of Him to others, though not always with the serpent's wisdom, and urging unwearied struggles for pure obedience to his laws. The primitive disorder lay in "imaginativeness," which manifested itself in occasional eccentricities in pursuit of the darling object of her life, which sometimes, perhaps, might suggest to bystanders the exploits of the hero against the windmills of Spain. There was, however, in her, what we so often find amongst the middle classes, utter ignorance of all dietetic rules, which in no cases can require attention more than where the brain is disordered. We have seen her meals consist of what must have been almost as poison to one encompassed about with her infirmities. Had she been aware of the laws of health and disease, we believe that her happy religion would not only, as we believe it did, have postponed the threatened calamity for many years, but, perhaps, altogether. The difficulty and apparent evils, however, of such cases, lie in rescuing them from the misconception of the poor. They ask, if Christianity be true, how can God permit such faithful disciples of Christ to fall under such calamities? Not long since, the parish of ——— was one morning shaken to its centre, by the strange tidings of the suicide of one whom all confided in as the meek, and laborious, and useful servant of Christ. Of course, there were the old attacks against the more serious profession of religion, which, unfortunately, there was not one at hand to refute. We alone possessed the key of the mystery. There was in her a predisposition to melancholy. An illness came on, which ended in an attack of the jaundice. Anxious to regain her health before the departure of the holidays should summon her to the superintendence of her infant school, she rashly put herself out of the hands of the regular practitioner, and consulted a clever quack, who promised to do all she required. The directions, and cautions to avoid spilling one drop upon her clothes, which accompanied the vials, proved that they contained a kill-or-cure remedy. Apparently, she speedily recovered, renewed her duties at the promised time, when the injuries wrought within the stomach by those burning drops, ascended, as Dr. Cheyne would have told us, to the brain; derangement followed, and she hanged herself. In reply to the breathless inquiries of her friends, why did God permit so terrible a catastrophe to overtake so faithful a servant? we could have replied (but we had left the neighbourhood), that unless He, by a miracle, had prevented her from consulting that well-known and, unhappily, well-trusted, strolling, drunken (his very vices seemed to gain him the confidence of the poor) doctor, the result was inevitable.

The following abbreviated fact may aid the guardians of Christianity in rescuing some unhappy professor from the charge of a life of hypocrisy. An unmarried lady, nearly fifty years of age, whose sound religious principles had never been called in question, was observed to pay an unusual attention to dress, which gradually advanced to such changes as would have been more becoming in a girl than in one of her mature age. Other symptoms indicative of attachment to worldly follies followed, until, at length, having apparently lost all sense of religion, she was removed from society. Dr. Cheyne's explanation of this phenomenon is satisfactory and cheering :

“ In consequence of bodily disease,—of one of those irregularities of the circulation which take place at critical periods of life,—the brain became affected, and the mind suffered in consequence. The sentiment of vanity naturally strong, but for a long time suppressed, became ungovernable, and swept away every trace of religious feeling.”

We cannot omit another remarkable example of the aids to Christian charity and ministerial wisdom which are wrapped up in this philosophy.

“ A friend of ours was one day riding with a clergyman of refined manners, who, for a good many years, had been devoted to the service of God. To the amazement of our friend, his companion, without any adequate provocation, fell into a paroxysm of ungovernable fury, swearing at a wood-ranger, and threatening him with vengeance because he had been dilatory in obeying an order which he had received relative to a matter of little importance.—Had this fact become public, all the devotedness to his profession for which this excellent clergyman was distinguished, would by many have been considered as assumed; and his habitual humility of demeanour, arising from a sense of his own unworthiness, as the result of hypocrisy. Such things must be expected. We cannot entertain a doubt that this was a monomaniacal explosion, in which aristocratic pride, much fostered during the youth of this member of a noble family, was roused by cerebral excitement, and for a time renewed its original ascendancy. We come to this conclusion upon the following considerations :—First, this gentleman had, shortly before, undertaken a duty which led to over excitement of the brain. Secondly, he appeared quite unconscious of the incongruity of his conduct,—an unconsciousness which is one of the usual attendants upon insanity.”

We recollect, when very young, hearing a gentleman of profligate life, a leader in a branch of the legal profession, ask the keeper of a lunatic asylum—one of those ignorant persons who, when these institutions first began to spread more widely, was thought competent for a post which is now properly confined to regular medical practitioners—if religion was not principally, or very generally, the cause of insanity? The keeper, a man both illiterate and irreligious, replied without hesitation that such was the case. And from our recollection of certain individuals in the extensive asylum over which this broken-down glazier presided, we can easily believe that he was deceived by appearances, concerning which his ignorance ought not, for a moment, to have been consulted. But what is worse, this man's betters have put forth the same superficial statements. It is plain, however, that a mere superficial acquaintance with Christianity and its proper effects upon the human mind, does not qualify any man, however well in other respects he may be endowed, for sitting in judgment upon such a vital question. We listen to Dr. Cheyne because he understood both Christianity and medicine. Thus, in discussing this case, he remarks, that maniacs who, when sane, were inattentive to religion, in the course of their derangement will sometimes fasten upon a dogma of religion which they first pervert, and then incessantly rave about.

"We almost invariably observe," says another able writer, "in long continued cases of insanity, where the hallucinations are in any degree variable, that perverted ideas of religion will present themselves, though utterly unconnected with the original cause of excitement."

Yet in returns from establishments for the insane, such cases, Dr. Cheyne says, are generally reported under the head of "insanity from religion." Such, we believe, was almost the invariable judgment of visitors to the asylum we have alluded to, as formerly known to ourselves, when they saluted a respectable tradesman of better appearance who was confined there, and heard his unchanged reply uttered in tones of despair,—“forsaken by God and man.” Yet we never heard of him as a stricter professor of religion when in health. We believe that such libels against Christianity are now seldom put forth; and if they were, we should confidently reject them, relying upon such an authority as Dr. Cheyne, who avers that the Gospel, received simply, never produced a single case of insanity.

"Fanaticism," he continues, "and superstition have, as well they might, caused insanity: nay, derangement of the mind may often have been caused by the terrors of the law, but by the Gospel—by a knowledge of a trust in Jesus—never!"

Dr. Cheyne, however, admits, that true religion, though a preservative, is not a complete preservative, against derangement of the mind. This admission we have already required for the explanation of facts occurring within our own unprofessional experience. He only contends that insanity, in such cases, is not produced by the creed, but in spite of it. He has, for example, known instances in which all sense of religion has been permanently destroyed by insanity. And the solution is both simple and rational; "that there is nothing in the Scriptures to warrant an expectation that religion will change the laws of the natural world" to meet the apparent wants of any individual, however much he may live under its influence. Insanity always depends upon the state of the body. A vicious parent, who may have wept floods of tears over his past sins, will not the less corrupt his offspring. Religion may directly and indirectly alleviate such evils, by the self-denial it teaches; but it no where promises a cure.

This essay concludes with a quotation from the writings of Dr. Combe, highly lauded by Dr. Cheyne, which is so much in harmony with our deep anxiety to call the attention of our clerical readers to this branch of philosophy, that we must give it entire.

"When fairly examined, indeed, the danger is seen to arise solely from the abuse of religion, and the best safeguard is found to consist in a right understanding of its principles and submission to its precepts. For if the best Christian be he who in meekness, humility, and sincerity, places his trust in God, and seeks to fulfil his commandments, then he who exhausts his soul in devotion, and at the same time finds no leisure or no inclination for attending to the common duties of his station, and who, so far from arriving at happiness or peace of mind, becomes every day the more estranged from them, and finds himself at last involved in disease and despair, cannot be held as a follower of Christ, but must rather be held as the follower of a phantom assuming the aspect of religion. When insanity attacks the latter, it is obviously not religion that is the cause; it is only the abuse of certain feelings, the regulated activity of which is necessary to the right exercise of religion; and against such an abuse, a sense of true religion would, in fact, have been the most powerful protection. And the great benefit of knowing this is, that whenever we shall meet with such a blind and misdirected excess of our best feelings in a constitutionally-nervous, or hereditarily-predisposed subject, instead of encouraging its exuberance, we should use every effort to temper the excess, to inculcate sounder views, and to point out the inseparable connexion which the Creator has established between the true dictates of religion and the practical duties of life, which it is a part of his purpose in sending us here to fulfil."

The next essay, "on the Constitution of Man, upright, fallen, and regenerate¹," is an attempt to prove, from philosophical considerations, the share which the infirm physical part of man has in preventing his attainment of that mental holiness which it is the ceaseless object of the Christian's aim. The text from which the essay is expanded is this :—

"By acquiring a just view of the present constitution of man, we may learn that his obedience to God must of necessity be imperfect; 'by the infirmity of his nature' even the mature Christian 'cannot always stand upright;' all that he can hope for is, that his desire to serve God, proceeding from a right principle, shall be earnest and sincere."

The commentaries of certain writers on the Epistle to the Romans are entirely confuted by this philosophy; indeed, it is an essential key to some difficult portions of that work. We shall learn from it, too, to moderate our expectations of obtaining more than imperfect aids in our struggles after holiness of heart, and lip, and life, by means of even the severest discipline of fastings, and other such aids as experience may suggest are required by individual temperaments to correct inborn or superinduced excrescences. Many, we doubt not, who had dreamed that fasting would prove a panacea for all the evils of the fall, have, on discovering their error, foolishly relinquished that Christian duty and means of grace: with such, and many others, the soul seems to be regarded almost as an abstraction, which is solely to blame; so that, in very ignorance of the terms of the union of body and soul, a wilfully pampered body has obtained a mastery over the soul, at which the poor struggler has stood aghast. We believe that a deeper insight into this philosophy would set the discipline of fasting upon philosophical grounds; so that the mode in which it is brought out in the New Testament—short, we admit, of a positive precept, and therefore courting accessory aids, if they can be obtained, from the light of nature, as well as traditionary observation—would not be regarded as affording a loop-hole for the escape of the self-indulgent; but rather as taking for granted a necessary physical-moral principle, which all might or ought to know, but which was not re-published as a positive enactment, because our merciful Saviour would admit of such modifications in obeying it, as are demanded by the circumstances of climate, and constitution, and the pursuits of life.

¹ The reader will find it necessary, occasionally, to make allowances for a few less definite theological terms, which were in current use some years ago. One thing, however, may be relied upon, that if there are not always right technical expressions, there is always right feeling.

Dr. Cheyne, in tracing, ab ovo, the fault of our nature, is not prepared either to admit or reject the speculation, that the physical effect upon Adam's frame of the forbidden food introduced into it was, by an inevitable law, a tendency to disease; yet he considers that such a theory is strongly supported by the effects of particular kinds of food. He instances the nature and functions of insects, modified by food; the fecundity of the bee, depending on what apiarians have called the royal jelly, or the effects of food on beasts of prey; as the royal tiger of Bengal, "having attained full growth, may continue domesticated in the compound, and playful so long as he is fed on vegetables, but the moment he obtains the taste of blood he will dart into the jungle, and from the friend become the enemy of man." This theory, however, of the origin of particular propensities in wild beasts is contradicted by two authorities. One is that of an Eastern gentleman, who confidently domesticated a young lion, whilst rearing him upon such food as milk, potatoes, and turnips², and, judging from appearances, was triumphing in his successful experiment, when one morning the beast was found in its master's room, amusing itself with the remnants of its master's skull.

The other authority for a contrary theory is Æschylus, in the Agamemnon, who thus tells his story, leaving it to ourselves to add the obvious commentary for less competent Grecians, who might not know the state of society in those times.

ἔθρεψεν δὲ λέοντα
 σίνιν δόμοις ἀγάλακτον οὖ-τως ἀνὴρ φιλόμαστον, ἐν βιότου προτελείοις
 ἄμερον, εὐφιλόπαιδα,
 καὶ γεραροῖς ἐπίχαρτον.
 πολέα δ' ἔσχ' ἀγκάλαις
 νεοτρόφου τέκνου δίκαν —.

So far all went on well, proving the converting efficacy of a vegetable and milk diet (ἀγάλακτον does not destroy our hypothesis of the milk diet; it only means that the youthful brute had given up sucking its mother), and daily he sought the acquaintance of those who had vegetables and milk to give, overflowing towards them with what has been called cupboard love;—

φαιδρωπὸς ποτὶ χεῖρα, σάι-νων τε γαστρὸς ἀνάγκαις.

² Our authority for these particular vegetables, which we think must be exotics at Bagdad, is Hawkstone, in which the story is told with much humour. See vol. ii. page 33, 2nd edition.

least, suggest caution and self-observation. The biographer of Lord Byron, Mr. Moore, represents his lordship, during that period of his life in which he was seeking to starve down his obesity, as standing over himself one day, whilst devouring a beefsteak, and asking him, if it did not make him feel fierce? We have heard too, that the French soldiers claim one kind of superiority over English soldiers, namely, that they can fight with an empty stomach, whereas an Englishman is nothing until he has eaten his beef. Dr. Cheyne illustrates by a fact, that the admission of a deleterious substance into the human system, may bring about a great moral revolution. "If," he says, "the human body is dissected before putrefaction takes place, the dissection, if he cuts himself, or if he has a wound in his hand, is in danger of absorbing from the cadaver a something which is frequently destructive of life."

"A good many years ago, a medical gentleman, of liberal mind and amiable disposition, while engaged in the dissection of a body which was quite fresh, imbibed the poison referred to through a puncture of the skin, in consequence of which he had well nigh died. From the time of his illness, from which he slowly recovered, it was observed he was morose and selfish. The conclusion of this short story is remarkable. Several years afterwards the same individual came under the influence of godliness, some of the first effects of this—the only principle of true reform—was an act of great generosity; and ever since his life has been a course of gentleness and unostentatious beneficence."

In seeking further proofs of the close connexion existing between the body and the soul, they are so evident as to force upon the thoughtful man the moral and religious duty of paying obedient attention, for his soul's sake, to the laws by which the body is affected. For it seems that we can now perceive, think, and act, only by means of the bodily organs;—"Compress the nerves which convey sensation, and all perception of the qualities of bodies will be interrupted; compress the brain, and thought will be suspended; compress the nerves of motion, and the mandates of the will can no longer be executed." To us, such considerations suggest solemn thoughts, as we look abroad and see how many, by a sinful disregard of these laws, wound, through an abused body, the soul, are prematurely laid by from life's duties, and thus may be almost said to die the suicide's death. The Christian teacher, who properly understands this subject, may be enabled, by the weapons it supplies, to make a breach in the enemy's walls, in certain instances, which would make way for the regular spiritual artillery. This luxurious age, too, makes demands upon every resource to which the Christian minister can find access. He who disregards the warning that he is killing his soul, may not disregard the warning that he is killing the body,—for the “board kills more than the sword.” Diseases are constantly brought on by the daily and ordinary intemperance of the world’s examples of temperance. Mr. Abernethy (we think we saw the remark in his writings) observed, in reply to an expression of surprise at the great increase of medical practitioners, that they no more than met the demand, as modern luxuries, up to his day, had introduced diseases into the human system which had no name when he was young. We are not quoting these facts as illustrating any medical theory, but as showing that the Christian is required to consult for his soul’s health, not only by the kind of doctrines he imbibes, and the form of Church discipline he submits to, but also by the prudence and self-denial he manifests at his daily meals. We have been more than shocked,—we must speak out, for we find ourselves amidst the humiliating details of humanity,—by hearing clergymen complain of their unspiritual condition for the Sunday afternoon’s duties, after their carelessly chosen and as carelessly eaten meal,—meaning, in fact, that they could not pray, though required to kneel down and utter the words of prayer. The gross view of this is offensive enough; but take the higher view, and it is an example of our subject, that the mind is, by ordinary carelessness, awfully affected by the body; and that, therefore, it is a part of a man’s religion to comprehend its demands upon his self-control, and to submit, in the fear of God, to the trammels they confer upon him. “If thou be a man given to appetite, put a knife to thy throat,” for the suicide’s grave is dug by both. We confess to a shrinking as we read of those modern feasts—held, too, sometimes when they ought not to be held—at which “every luxury of the season” tempts the body to do a wrong to the soul. We refer to them here not on the ground of extravagant expenditure; of waste of the means of life; not as ministering to the pride of life; not as the direct cause of corporeal diseases; but as inflicting diseases on the soul through those diseases of the body. There is one set-off to these evils, permitted by Him who brings good out of evil when it suits his wisdom, that they often entail premature sickness on their victims; and thus, by damming up the accesses to these and kindred worldly pleasures, pave the way, not unfrequently, for repentance, and prayer, and amendment, and benevolence, in giving that to heaven for which earth can no longer offer them an accepted equivalent.

In like manner, this philosophy enables the Christian teacher to warn against the violence of the passions, on the lower ground that health of body is injured, or altogether destroyed, by that which is also injuring or altogether destroying the soul. "Violent anger has induced an attack of the jaundice; it is attended with the excitement of the brain and nervous system." The physical evils of these states are thus told in few words: "they disturb the secretions, and especially retard the flow of the bile, which is thrown back and absorbed." And this brings us to the morality of the doctrine of bile. We need not remind the majority of our readers that there are other symptoms of bile besides the yellow skin. Addison, in alluding to this, traces up to it the peevish and quarrelsome folio of many an angry polemic, and suggests, as a preventive or cure, the game of σκιομαχία. This—another name for proper exercise—may prove an useful ally to the Christian's temperance, which we wish to see grounded on a true knowledge of the nature and properties of that machine which God has given to be used for the highest purposes, by which a consistency of temper may be maintained; the want of which, in those who bear the name of Christ's more faithful disciples, so often puzzles domestics and children, who cannot comprehend why such pious people should be good-tempered one day and cross the next. The sin of such evil tempers is thus seen to be twofold, and cannot be without injurious effects in retarding the formation of the interior character.

Dr. Cheyne tells us, that the sinkings of despair are not more absolute than the hopelessness which depends purely upon disease of the nervous system. Now, the preservation, or the disorder, of the nervous system mainly depends, in general cases, upon those laws of prudence which the Christian at least cannot violate without committing sin. No one who has watched the variations in his spirits, being competent to judge of the causes, has failed to observe how much they depended upon himself. Hence the loss of time, and want of energy for life's duties, and the disquietude occasioned to those around us during such seasons of despondency, are very often self-created moral evils, for which a man must take himself to task.

Another painful topic of much importance to the Christian minister is thus brought before us:—

"From the soul becoming the minister of the body, in consequence of the ascendancy of the carnal principle, many evil practices have arisen which have still further impaired the physical constitution of individuals and families, and thereby further degraded their minds. For example, to preserve domestic purity, intermarriages between near relatives are prohibited. When the divine law in this respect is broken, a degenerate offspring, as in the case of the Bourbons, may be expected. Even from intermarriage of first cousins, inveterate forms of scrofula are sometimes generated and a liability to insanity. Various diseases—originating in sensuality — descend in families. A vicious habit of intemperance will excite in children, procreated after the habit is established, a propensity to the same habit, which has descended to the third generation."

This, as we judge, is one of the true explanations of the doctrine of the second commandment. It is not, as some seem to think (probably, the majority), that the mode of inflicting this awful punishment is arbitrary; that is, that because the parent has sinned somehow, therefore the children must suffer somehow, but not according to a fixed moral law, defining and limiting the kind and the measure of punishment. If this be not so, then Ezekiel not only apparently, but truly, contradicts Moses. "Doth not the son bear the iniquity of the father? When the son hath done that which is lawful and right, and hath kept all my statutes, and hath done them, he shall surely live. The soul that sinneth, it shall die. The son shall not bear the iniquity of the father." (Ezek. xviii. 19, 20.) "The sins of the fathers shall be visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generation:" so said the lawgiver Moses, with one object in view; and so says the physician, Dr. Cheyne, with another. Ezekiel means, therefore, to teach, that if the parent commits a crime, he shall suffer the direct punishment, and not the son. For each and every act of intemperance the parent shall give in an account at the judgment-seat of Christ: this is the doctrine of Ezekiel. But this same "vicious habit of intemperance will excite in children, procreated after the habit is established, a propensity to the same habit, which has descended to the third generation:" this is the doctrine of Moses. If greater prominence has not been given by Christian teachers to this awful doctrine, it may be traced up, we think, to their want of confidence in its philosophy. It seems to us to lie very close to the foundation of Christian morals, and to be capable of forming the materials for making the most powerful appeals to natural affection. For what sight can be more painful and humiliating to an awakened parent than that of a beloved offspring suffering in body and mind through his own depraved indulgences, so that, in consequence, their path to eternal life has been made tenfold more rugged? A man engaged in a course of vicious indulgences may resist altogether the ordinary rebukes of the Christian minister, who might yet be arrested by the question—"do you mean to marry, in the hope of having posterity to inherit your wealth or honours?" Or, supposing he is married, the arguments for a virtuous life have received a powerful impulse from the considerations that the reply he might make to rebukes for irregularities, "I am willing to bear the consequences," is not the full one; the whole includes this,—“ will you take upon yourself to answer also for your posterity, who may suffer both bodily and mentally for your violations of the published laws of God ? ” Our own experience has fully established in our minds the truth of this terrible doctrine of the divine government, by bringing us into contact with instances of human depravity for which we could find no other solution that gave a moment's satisfaction, but the existence of a moral hereditary propensity, which illustrated the warning of the second commandment. The exultation of Sir —— that the originally poor family baronetcy was amplified by the addition of Mr. ——'s wealth, is sadly tempered by the recollection that the blood, which accompanied the money, contained within it the seeds of the family gout. Bishop Burnet has illustrated the permanent injury which the physical nature of man sustained at the fall by similar examples.

Again, the philosophy which this work brings out is made to bear upon the difficulties of the Christian life. The Wesleyan-Christian perfectionist, early Quakerism, Jansenism, and the like, were all founded upon laudable aspirations after an unattainable purity—unattainable by the laws of our earthly condition. There are, says Dr. Cheyne, two things which are never to be forgotten by the Christian desirous of living in a more pure and serene air, who is kept in sadness by his inability to serve God in holiness : first, that the inward work of the Holy Spirit leaves the body fallen and degraded—a body of death—the carnal principle fiercely warring with the spiritual desires of the renovated soul : and, secondly, that the growth of the spiritual principle is generally a work of time, of difficulty inconceivable, unless by the experienced Christian, “ and not completed till the soul of the dying man is on the wing.” “ Nothing,” Luther truly remarks, “ can be more useful for sincere and pious persons than to know St. Paul's doctrine concerning the contest between the flesh and the spirit.”

“ For the believer, who, in dwelling upon his transgressions, feels that his access to God is interrupted, the histories of many of the Old Testament saints have been written in vain ; they have been written in vain, if they do not demonstrate the power of the carnal principle in the strongest believer, and the power of the grace of God in the weakest.”

The next essay, upon “ Conscience,” opens with the opinion, that the causes of monomania, which have been termed religious insanity, are to be traced up to disorders in the conscience, or in the Christian's principal sentiments of faith, charity, and hope. Conscience is regarded by Dr. Cheyne as a part of our nature, which, therefore, like every other mental endowment, is improved by being properly exercised; and by this means habitual rectitude of conduct is established. In cases where the conscience is much exercised, whilst the intellectual faculties are weak or easily perverted, scrupulosity and inconsistency will be the consequence. The physical injuries done to conscience may arise from the use of "ardent spirits, opium, tobacco, and other narcotics, which become irresistibly attractive, partly from habit and partly from the loss of mental energy, caused by their acting injuriously upon the nervous system." The destruction of the conscience, Dr. Cheyne says, is especially the effect of the disease arising from continued inebriety. This is a physical view of the drunkard's case, which may point out to the clergyman that the main hope of success, in his endeavours to reform him, must depend more upon the probable influence of temporal considerations, than upon appeals to the dead or dormant faculty of conscience. We do not know how much light this view of the case casts upon a question once put to us by a clergyman, who, having himself taken the pledge, was anxious to turn the temperance movement in his parish to a religious account;—"could we account to him for the fact, that the reformation of so many teetotallers stopped short of Christian reformation?" Our reply, as not including this deeper cause, was probably radically wrong. Not many hundred yards from where we are writing there lives one who, about three years ago, suddenly relinquished the most incorrigible and ruinous habits of drunkenness, and took the pledge, which, we believe, he has never broken. But though, perhaps, one of the most moral men in his little village, we should say he is the least religious. He seems to consider that he has found his salvation in the teapot.

Again, we learn that diseases of the brain, or nervous system, are sometimes productive of similar moral changes. Dr. Cheyne knew a young woman, afflicted with St. Vitus's dance, accompanied with slight palsy, "who lost all respect for truth, of which, before her illness, she was by no means regardless." Other examples follow, which are explained as not arising in the wilful violation of moral principle (which would probably be the conclusion of the minister who had never been taught that other causes exist to account for such effects), but to moral insensibility, produced by disease, which frequently occasions the standard of rectitude to decline from that more or less upright state in which it is found in every sane man.

It will not a little astonish some to hear that conscience is, more or less, active according to the state of the body; yet most religious persons, if they consult their own experience, will admit the truth of the following proofs :—

“ When the body is exhausted by pain or sickness, or even fatigue, the conscience becomes less sensitive ; in that half dreamy state, which often precedes sleep, especially after great fatigue, trains of thought or lines of conduct are allowed to pass through the mind, which would at once be dismissed were the body in vigour and the conscience on the alert.”

What awful emphasis do such considerations give to the earnest warnings of our Lord, “ Watch and pray, that ye enter not into temptation ;” “ the spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak.” And what a distinct duty is thus set before the follower of his Lord, to resort to such unrelaxing discipline as shall give him the mastery of that foe which will otherwise master him ! “ The spirit is willing—the flesh is weak ;” these few words form one of those short sentences that none but a master can utter, which contain in them all that can be written upon their subject. The only value of Dr. Cheyne’s book to the Christian is, that it is a valuable contribution towards a commentary upon them. What St. Paul has written upon the “ carnal ” principle is another commentary upon them. Since, then, the corporeal element of humanity claims such dominion in the union, as not to exempt even conscience, which is supposed to be the most spiritual of all the faculties of the soul, from its influences ; it cannot be denied, we think, that an accurate knowledge of its laws is necessary to aid the Christian in bringing it under.

However, care must be taken, as Dr. Cheyne teaches, not to extend too far excuses for the irritability of disease. For however the disease is to be accounted for, whether personal indiscretion or accident (that is, the will of God), still, so long as exaggerated irritability stops short of derangement, moral accountability exists and must be enforced. The fretfulness and temptations of disease must be struggled against by appropriate Christian means, as one of the trials permitted or sent, to exercise in resignation to the Divine will, and in that patience without which we cannot hope to inherit the promises. It is well added, that “ sanctified experience of this kind establishes a disposition of mind which leads the Christian to prefer the power of patient submission to a removal of suffering.” Let us add to this the example of Dr. Shaw, the eastern traveller, who, when suffering in foreign lands all the hardships of the plague, records that he, however, dreaded its departure, not because he did not deeply feel its calamity, but because he was more than recompensed, as he lay under it, by the peace of God that passed all understanding.

In accusing religion as the cause of insanity, of course the effects of a disturbed conscience would be naturally seized upon, without the trouble of inquiring whether it was enlightened or not. One of Dr. Cheyne's friends told him, that conviction of conscience actually drove him mad. No appearances of insanity, however, ever showed themselves in him afterwards. And so long as mental agitation continues to be one of the causes of insanity, this result is intelligible and to be expected, without impeachment of Christianity. Dr. Cheyne thus discusses this case :—

“ What is the essence of religion ? Is it not a knowledge of Christ as a Protector and Saviour ? Had the gentleman in question been acquainted with the Gospel, he would have known that there was balm provided for his wounded spirit ; which, had it been skilfully applied, would have preserved him from distraction.”

This part of the subject is summed up by a declaration, that during a period of forty years' experience of, and inquiries into, the nature of insanity, such cases as the above are not in the proportion of one in a thousand to the instances of insanity which arise from wounded pride and disappointed ambition.

Dr. Cheyne puts two questions and replies to them, which contain such important directions to the spiritual guide, that we particularly direct attention to them :

“ How shall we distinguish between a sound and unsound state of the enlightened conscience ? Chiefly by the right application of the blood of the Lamb of God. If that imparts no relief, its unsoundness is probably connected with bodily disease. Again, how shall we distinguish between a sound and unsound state of the natural conscience ? By attending, first, to the cause of compunction. Secondly, to the state of bodily health. If we discover that there is what must be counted a disproportion between its cause and the degree in which remorse exists, it will be our duty to inquire into the state of the bodily health of the sufferer. If we discover that the conscience is disturbed at times, and that at other times, without any mental change having occurred to relieve it, ease is restored ; and more especially, if it should appear that disease of the digestive system, or fever, or nervous irritability concur with the disquietude, we may infer that the conscience is unsound, in consequence of some disease of the body, which is exercising an evil influence over the mind.”

Speaking for ourselves, we regard such lessons as teaching us a priceless knowledge.

The gloom which often attends the dying hour of the most eminent Christians, is reducible to the mastery of the body over the soul, i. e. to disease. Mr. Pearson, himself we believe a surgeon of eminence, in his life of Mr. Hey, observes, "good men may be unusually depressed, and bad men elevated, under the near approach of death, from the operation of natural causes." A valuable hint for correcting the exaggerated accounts of happiness, and transports it may be, of men who profess to believe that the penitence of a few hours or days, entitle them thus to proclaim to the world their joyful entrance into eternity.

We are glad to see Dr. Johnson's case, which has often been unfairly dealt with, quietly disposed of upon these merciful principles.

The advice which Dr. Cheyne gives to the spiritual guide in such cases is, that there is little prospect of conquering feelings of remorse, unless we cure first the disease which maintains them. Moral or religious statements, he says, will rather promote (as in cases enumerated by him) the delusion, than remove it, so long as the bodily disease is unmitigated. We ourselves attended, many years ago, a farmer's wife, who manifested what our raw experience judged to be symptoms of even horrible remorse. Time passed on, and still all such weapons as our weakness was then master of, fell harmless to the ground. At length the doctor took her in hand, cured her, and sent her forth without one symptom of religious amendment, except one or two feeble efforts to break through her former godless habits on the Sabbath.

Our limits do not permit us to proceed further in this mode of testifying the value we place upon this work. We must, however, catch a few straggling thoughts amidst the remaining pages, to make our own work a more faithful epitome of the whole subject.

Diseases of the body, Dr. Cheyne remarks, in the "Essay on Faith," and consequent delusions of the organs of sense, which the mind receives as truths, or defect of judgment, often give to faith an excitement productive of fanaticism. He then proceeds to discuss, as the Christian physician can alone discuss them, such cases as Miss Fancourt's, the miracles of Prince Hohenloe, that of the nun of the convent of St. Joseph, and others. The story of the nun of St. Joseph is probably forgotten by most of our readers; and as it is capable of yielding an important moral, never more needed than in our own times, we proceed to sketch it.

Whilst this nun was recovering from a typhus fever, the chapel of the convent was consumed by fire, March 10, 1819. She escaped for her life, after midnight, and took refuge in the damp grass of an adjoining field, when, as she supposed, the disease was contracted, under which she lingered for four years. On the morning of August 1, 1823, after having been helplessly confined to her bed for many months, she was impressed with a belief that God, through Prince Hohenloe, in a supernatural manner had interfered in her behalf; and when having prepared herself by a sacramental confession, which she could only make by signs, to receive the most adorable eucharist, and the Rev. Mr. Meagher offered the divine sacrifice of the mass in her chamber, she could only receive it as a viaticum; and when receiving it, she could not project her tongue beyond her teeth; and, at the end of the mass, finding no change, she was resigning herself, when she suddenly found strength to exclaim, "Holy! holy! Lord God of hosts! heaven and earth are full of thy glory," and that strength was at once given her to quit her bed, dress, and walk down to the chapel.

We cannot follow Dr. Cheyne in his masterly dissection of this vaunted case, but his refutation of the miracle is complete.

Again, he teaches that Christian faith is sometimes inactive in bodily diseases; as, for example, in the commencement of a sick head-ache the sufferer appears to be not only without faith, but completely incapable of devotional feeling, though the sentiment is only dormant; and, therefore, the offence is not in its absence, but in those indiscretions by which sick head-aches are usually brought on.

In the essay "on Love to God, Charity, and Hardness of Heart," there are some profound Christian philosophical reflections. A whole host of cruel insults to religion is dispersed by such sentiments as these:—

"When love to God, in imaginative persons, escapes from the necessary restraints of reverential fear, it may introduce into the exercises of devotion a familiarity productive of effects obviously injurious to the cause of religion. By enthusiasm, more allied to superstition than to fanaticism, recluses of former times were infected; they entertained for their canonized patrons a sentiment which there is reason to think degenerated into a species of erotomania, of which also instances might be produced, exemplifying a very revolting form of mental derangement."

"Hope is the expectation of happiness, by the aid of which man accomplishes the pilgrimage of life."

This is an excellent popular definition. Its characteristics are, that it may be active, strong, extravagant, weak; or inactive, or extinct; or, alternately, active and inactive. The essence, Dr. Cheyne says, of that species of monomania which is generally termed melancholy, and which always depends upon bodily causes, is the suppression of hope. Much valuable instruction upon this Christian sentiment will be found in this essay; and the concluding sentence of it should be treasured up in the memory of the Christian minister.

“One point, with respect to melancholy, is never to be forgotten; namely, that if it be curable, it is by medical rather than moral treatment, consequently that all such cases ought, in the first instance, to pass through the hands of the physician.”

This remark alone must prove the value to the Christian minister of a proper acquaintance with this branch of philosophy.

The last essay, “On the Presence and Absence of Devotional Feeling,” affords some specimens of high Christian philosophy, which we must leave to be studied in the work itself. Two sentiments only seem to press themselves on our notice.

“We have known,” Dr. Cheyne says, “excitement of the mind thus occasioned (that is, by the annual meetings of religious societies in London and Dublin,) give rise, in delicate females, to nervous diseases; and we are persuaded that, to some, after a succession of meetings at Exeter-hall, or the Rotunda, the calm service of a church will appear as insipid as plain food after a ragout.”

The fit name which we have heard given to the continued attendance at such meetings is religious dissipation.

The other remark is a wholesome warning to the writers and publishers of spiritual diaries. The following is a quotation from the diary of a devoted servant of God:—

“July 1. Much sweetness of prayer this morning. In the afternoon was sunk and depressed; seemed a poor, miserable, useless wretch.”

The description of such alternations of elevation and depression, says Dr. Cheyne, which have been liberally introduced into the lives of Christians, are surely sufficient to illustrate this species of trial, from bodily affliction, to which they are exposed, and need not be repeated in future publications. In fact, the account of such changes is not to be sought for in the Bible, but in almost every popular work on medicine; and such diaries would seem to be more useful to the doctor than to the Christian, whose religion they represent as being no more under the regulation of known principles than the weathercock.

Our hope is, that the reader will now resort to the work itself, —especially the clerical reader, for whose use its lamented author took up the task,—which we are sure cannot be perused, studied rather, without much advantage both to the intellect and the heart. There is a depth of religious earnestness about it, which, coming from such a quarter (where the clergyman cannot often look for help), we cannot rate too highly. There may be some theological statements which we deem are inaccurate, in words at least, if not in sentiments ; but they are minor blemishes, belonging more to a school than the man, and do not at all affect the real claims of the work upon the professional student.

After lingering so long amidst pages which our imagination has invested with a character of sacredness, and to which we ourselves owe deeper obligations than we can describe, for the ability to discharge an unlooked-for duty with success, at which we should have stood aghast but for the accidental (so far as intention was concerned) perusal of them ; we cannot quit our willing task without turning to the affecting autobiographical sketch of the author prefixed to his work. We have already pointed to the lessons of practical wisdom it teaches, not only directly to those of his own profession, but also indirectly to the general reader, and, not least, to the clergyman. We will quote one edifying instance in illustration of his rare diligence, which ought not to be thrown away upon the clerical student.

“I obtained, when a young man,” says Dr. Cheyne, “a mass of consultations, many of them written with great care by the most eminent physicians in Edinburgh, during the middle and towards the end of the eighteenth century, that had been preserved by my grand-uncle, father, and grandfather.”

The obvious commentary upon this very dry and laborious process of fitting himself for a future post he might, or might not, reach, would enable us to show how alone there can be reared up within the Church of England a supply of spiritual practitioners of a very different order from those who have, in such numbers, dreamed away their youth in an indolent discharge of the mere letter of their duties, apparently unconscious that ministerial success is no more the result of accident or ignorance, than medical success ; that it is not the sermon copied, it may be, at random, nor the utterance of the same common-places to all, without discrimination of character, that can command success.

John Cheyne was born in Leith, February 3, 1777, where his father, John Cheyne, practised medicine and surgery. "He would visit the poor as promptly as the rich, and his half-crown was as freely given to those who had no means of procuring food as his prescription." His uncle, John Cheyne, also of the same profession, acquired the name of "the friend of the poor."—"The generation of the upright shall be blessed." Family estates and titles are but the types and shadows of such an inalienable heritage as this. The peerage of such men may be dormant, but will never be extinct.—The ambitious blood and maxims, and the high principles of worldly honour, were on the mother's side. His education, which it appears terminated at thirteen, was, though professedly liberal, of course, in all respects, imperfect. We find ourselves standing too near, in imagination, his melancholy tomb in Sherington church-yard, to sketch the ludicrous account of one of his schoolmasters, though it belongs to the defects of his education.

Before he was sixteen he had begun to attend medical lectures in the University of Edinburgh. This he calls the "second false step in his education," as being premature. In 1795 he entered upon his duties as assistant-surgeon in the Royal Regiment of Artillery at Woolwich, which he discharged for about four years, when, dissatisfied with his prospects, he returned to Scotland, assisted his father, learnt lessons of more than professional wisdom from Sir Charles Bell (who, "as an example of diligence in study, could not be surpassed"); ultimately determined to practise as a physician, and, providentially, was led to select Dublin. In the latter end of 1809 he took up his position there, as a candidate for public favour, where he passed the summer, "neither expecting, nor indeed wishing, for rapid advancement, as what is easily acquired is little valued, and not unfrequently soon lost." We omit to notice other professional details, and merely add, that in obtaining the appointment of Physician-General to the Army in Ireland, "he had fully attained the object of his ambition."

The course of his prosperity was at last arrested by the failure of his health. Atossa, with that dark mythology which would make prosperity a curse, and not a privilege, might have introduced the rest of the story thus:

εἰς δ' ὑμᾶς ἐρῶ
μῦθον, οὐδαμῶς ἐμαντῆς οὐσ' ἀδείμαντος, φίλοι, μὴ μέγας πλοῦτος κονίσας οὐδας ἀντρέψῃ ποδὶ
ὑλβον, ὃν Δαρεῖος ἦρεν οὐκ ἄνευ θεῶν τινός⁴.

⁴ Æsch. Persæ. Scholf. 163—166.

In the year 1825, when Dr. Cheyne was about to enter on his forty-ninth year, "a period which is often critical to those who are engaged in anxious business," he became affected with a species of nervous fever, brought on, or much increased, by the frequent failure of means in individual cases, for stemming the tide of a fatal disease then prevalent in Dublin. To this were added anxieties of another kind, until he became so weak, as to be in fact no longer fitted for such arduous duties. Two months' relaxation in England appeared to partially restore his lost strength, and he again returned to Dublin, to encounter one duty, which completed the downfall.

"I found," he says, "one of my most esteemed professional friends, the father of fifteen children, labouring under a disease which ultimately proved fatal. He had awaited my return, in order to put himself under my care. His sufferings proved an incubus on my spirits, which strangled every cheerful thought. I now began to comprehend the nature of my own illness—a climacteric disease was forming, which ever since has been slowly executing its appointed mission."

After a few more vain efforts, he relinquished his profession, crowned with honours (as significant to him as the votes of both houses of parliament to the successful patriot), which were conveyed in two letters expressing the deep sympathies of his professional brethren; one signed by forty-five of the most eminent physicians practising in Dublin, telling him of "their deepest sentiments of esteem for his private virtues, and respect for his exemplary professional character, proved whilst he occupied for many years the very first rank in his profession:" the other, signed in behalf of the apothecaries in Dublin. A glorious type, surely, of another verdict, "Well done, good and faithful servant."

He took up his abode in the village of Sherington, in Buckinghamshire, where he continued to heap up materials to justify the formula of acquittal before the future Judge: "I was an hungred, and ye gave me meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me drink; I was a stranger, and ye took me in; naked, and ye clothed me; I was sick, and ye visited me." Three mornings in the week he went to a neighbouring cottage, and saw the sick villagers, giving advice and dispensing medicines, which were prepared in his own house. On the fourth morning, the sick came to him from distant parts of the county, for whom he prescribed.

The above records have been gathered from his own autobiographical sketch. The remainder is told by the editor, we presume one of his children. In a very few months after he had made his first corrections to the manuscript of these Essays, having already lost the sight of one eye, and being otherwise reduced to a wreck, he died, January 31, 1836.

We learn from the following unfinished letter to a friend, that what was the true secret of his life of honour, was, also, the secret of his death of peace:—

"On a bed of languishing from which I know not that I shall ever rise, I write once more . . . to tell you the condition of my mind. I am humbled to the dust by the consideration that there is not one action of my busy life which will bear the eye of a holy God. But when I reflect that on the invitation of the Redeemer (Matt. xi. 28), and that I have accepted that invitation; and moreover that my conscience testifies that I earnestly desire to have my will in all things conformed to the will of God, I have peace—I have promised rest—promised by Him in whom was found no guile in his mouth."

Once more, just before his decease, he took up his pen—so far as we know, for the last time—and we give what proceeded from it, without mutilation or abbreviation:—

"DIRECTIONS RELATIVE TO MY BURIAL, &c.

"My body, attended only by my sons, is to be carried to the grave by six of the villagers, very early on the fourth or fifth morning after my decease. I would have no tolling of bells, if it can be avoided. The ringers may have an order for bread, to the amount usually given upon such occasions; if they get money they will spend it in the ale-house; and I would have them told, that in life or death I would by no means give occasion for sin. My funeral must be as inexpensive as possible: let there be no attempt at a funeral sermon. I would pass away without notice from a world which, with all its pretensions, is empty.—'Tinnit, inane est.'

"Let not my family mourn for one whose trust is in Jesus. By respectful and tender care of their mother, by mutual affection, and by irreproachable conduct, my children will best show their regard for my memory.

"My decease may be announced in the Irish newspapers in the following words:—'Died, at Sherington, Newport Pagnel, Bucks, on the——day of——, Dr. Cheyne, late Physician-General to the Forces in Ireland.' Not one word more. No panegyric.

"I believe there is a vault belonging to the manse, but if it be under the church I should not wish my body to be laid in it, but in the churchyard, two or three yards from the wicket which opens from the path through the fields. I pointed out the spot to ——, and chose it as a fit place for a rustic monument, without marble or sculpture ; a column, such as is represented in the accompanying sketch, about seven or eight feet high. On the column, on hard, undecomposing stone, are to be engraven the following texts :—St. John iii. 16, ‘ For God so loved the world,’ &c. ; St. Matthew xi. 28, 29, 30, ‘ Come unto me all ye that labour,’ &c. ; Hebrews xii. 4, ‘ Follow peace with all men,’ &c.

“ As these texts are meant to rouse the insensible passenger, they must be distinctly seen. The following inscription is to be engraven on the opposite side of the column :—

“ ‘ Reader ! the name, profession, and age of him whose body lies beneath, are of little importance ; but it may be of great importance to you to know, that, by the grace of God, he was brought to look to the Lord Jesus, as the only Saviour of sinners ; and that this ‘ looking to Jesus’ gave peace to his soul.

“ ‘ Reader ! pray to God that you may be instructed in the Gospel, and be assured that God will give his Holy Spirit, the only teacher of true wisdom, to them that ask Him.’

“ If any objection be made to the spot pointed out for interment of my body, let some other be chosen, where the inscription on the column to be erected over me may be seen with advantage. The monument is for the benefit of the living, and not in honour of the dead.

“ I wish the inscription to be preserved, and leave this to my children and my children’s children.”

These directions, says the editor, were scrupulously attended to ; and the monument which marks the spot where Dr. Cheyne lies buried, besides the texts and inscription, bears only the initials, J. C.

Few efforts of our own pen have given us keener enjoyment than this endeavour to rescue from oblivion, and hand down to posterity, the name and the writings of a great and good man.

“ After life’s fitful fever he sleeps well.”

What a glorious reward for one to whose body and mind, for the greater part of life, the stern demands of duty had refused the sweets of calm repose by day or by night, to realize the promise, “ there remaineth a rest for the people of God !” And what a glorious change for one whose earthly sun had, at its setting, shone upon all but sightless orbs, to find himself where his “ sun would no more go down, neither the moon withdraw itself.” Or, in the words of the divinest poet of Greece, who thus marries the same thoughts to immortal verse :—

THE archbishop was accompanied in his flight from Northampton by two monks and a servant. He himself was disguised in the dress of a monk, and assumed the name of Brother Dearman.

After having ridden about five-and-twenty miles, in a night of violent storm, the party rested for some hours at a village¹; and early on the following day they reached the city of Lincoln. Thence they descended the Witham, about forty miles, to a lonely hermitage, belonging to the monks of Sempringham²; and at length, travelling by an unusual route, and for the most part during the night, the archbishop reached Eastrey, a manor near Sandwich, the property of Christ Church in Canterbury. At this place he remained a week, waiting for the means of passing over to the continent; and we are told that the chamber which he occupied had an opening into the church, through which he was able, without being seen, to share in the service, to receive the kiss of peace, and at the end of the offices to bestow his blessing on the people. On All Souls' Day³, before dawn, he embarked at Sandwich in a little boat, managed by two priests, and in the evening he reached the opposite coast.

On the same day the sea was crossed by a deputation of bishops and others, whom the king had sent off to plead his cause with the pope. The biographers tell us, that, while the saint found the water delightfully calm, his enemies were tossed about by a tempest,—a contrast which brings to Herbert's mind the exemption of Israel from the Egyptian plagues⁴. Here, however, there is something of the usual lying; for Herbert forgets that he had before described the archbishop as having suffered from the roughness of the sea⁵. And there can be no doubt that if the contrast had been reversed, an explanation favourable to Becket would not the less have been put on it⁶.

The archbishop did not yet consider himself out of danger. The news of his flight had by this time spread, and every stranger from England was looked on with suspicion. The Earl of Boulogne had an old grudge against him, for having opposed his marriage with the Abbess of Romsey, daughter of the late King Stephen; nor was his brother, the Earl of Flanders, to be trusted. It seemed well, therefore, to avoid the ports; and the fugitives landed on the sand, about a league from Gravelines. The archbishop, unused to walking on rough ground, stumbled and hurt himself. He lay down, declaring himself weary and unable to go any further. A boy was sent to the next village in quest of a horse, and the length of his absence raised all manner of apprehensions. The horse was brought at last—apparently what our friend Father Blackhal would have styled “a lasche jadde⁷,” and with no other equipment than a halter made of hay. The monks spread their cloaks on his back, by way of a saddle, and the archbishop mounted; but after riding a little—as Johnson gave up talking French to Paoli, on “finding that he did not do it with facility⁸”—he judged it “easier and more respectable⁹” to betake himself to his feet again.

³ Joh. Sarisb. in S. T. C. i. 330. Herbert here remarks, that Tuesday was the day of the week on which the most remarkable events in Becket's life took place, and that All Souls' Day was Tuesday, a fortnight after that on which he “fought with beasts” at Northampton. (S. T. C. vii. 163, 164.) It would appear, however, that in 1164 All Souls' Day fell on a Monday, and that it wanted but a day of three weeks since the last day of the council. Various other incidents of the journey are related:—how, as he passed through a town, a woman, struck with his appearance, presented him with a stick, which, although sooty, greasy, and scorched, from having been employed for hanging up fish in the chimney, he received graciously, and gladly made use of: how he was near betraying himself by the interest with which he looked at a falcon on a young man's wrist—a relapse into his old tastes, for which Alan supposes that he may have atoned sufficiently by the anxiety to which it exposed him¹: how, at a hostelry where he halted at night, the landlord discovered him, although he took no precedence of his companions, by his lofty and noble look, the whiteness of his long and slender hands², and the air with which he distributed morsels of his food to the children of the house; and how the saint had much ado to keep the tongues of this good man and his wife from betraying him to others, who might have been less disposed to reverence him.

At length, partly on foot and partly by water, the archbishop and his companions reached the monastery of Clair-Marais, near St. Omer's. There they were joined by Herbert of Bosham, who had been charged at Northampton to repair to Canterbury, and endeavour to secure some portion of the revenues of the see, which were then in course of payment. He brought, however, no more than a hundred marks, with some silver plate. The king had ordered that the primate's property should be under custody, as the pending appeals to the pope prevented a confiscation.

After spending some time at Clair-Marais, where others of his clergy also joined him, the archbishop proceeded to the monastery of St. Bertin, at St. Omer's, bearing with him as a present to the community a large fish, which had miraculously jumped out of the water into his bosom, in order that the arrival of the party might not press too heavily on the fast-day provisions of their hosts.

At St. Bertin's, Becket had an interview with the grand justiciary Richard de Luci, who was on his way homeward from a mission to the king of France. This old friend strongly urged him to return to England, and offered to make his peace with the king; but the archbishop was not to be persuaded.

In the mean time, Henry's envoys had an audience of the

French king at Compiègne, and from thence went on to the court of the pope, at Sens. Louis was engaged in the interest of Becket, at once by his rivalry to Henry and by his devotion to the Church. Soon after the breaking out of the troubles, he had sent a message to the archbishop, that, if his fortunes should take him into France, he might reckon on being received, "not as a bishop or archbishop, but like a brother sovereign³;" and his behaviour to the English envoys was a strong declaration as to the part which he was now resolved to take. When their master's letter was read, in which Thomas was designated as "late Archbishop of Canterbury," Louis asked by whom he had been deprived, and added, that he himself, although no less a king than Henry, could not venture to deprive the meanest clerk in his dominions. To the demand that he should give Becket up, under an agreement between the two sovereigns for mutual surrender of fugitives, he replied, that he knew of no such agreement; but that, if it existed, it could not imply the delivery of the archbishop, who was not the vassal of the English king, but rather his superior⁴. The Earl of Arundel reminded him of the damage which Becket had done to France in the war of Toulouse; Louis replied, that the chancellor had acted as a faithful servant of his king, who had since requited him most unworthily. And, at last, when the envoys requested him to write to the pope in behalf of their master, he wrote to beg that Alexander would show his love for him by treating the banished archbishop with love⁵.

Herbert of Bosham and another of Becket's train were appointed to watch the movements of the envoys, and to counterwork them. They arrived at Compiègne a day later, and met with the most gratifying reception from Louis, who granted the archbishop an assurance of safety throughout all his dominions, declaring it to be one of the "royal dignities" of France to defend the persecuted, and especially those who were suffering for the Church. On arriving at Sens, Herbert and his companion were not received with any show of honour, but in the evening they were admitted to a private interview with the pope, who expressed an interest in the archbishop's cause.

The following day was appointed for the audience of the English king's envoys. The Bishop of London opened the case by strongly blaming the primate for the evils which had arisen. In allusion to the flight from Northampton, he quoted the text, "The wicked fleeth when no man pursueth." The pope on this remonstrated with him, telling him that such bitterness was more hurtful to himself than to the object of it; and Foliot said no more.

The next speaker was Hilary, Bishop of Chichester, whose delight in the music of his own eloquence is a frequent subject of amusement to the writers of the opposite party. His grammatical acquirements, however, were not on a level with his rhetoric; the portentous word oportuebat excited the laughter of his hearers, and, after some vain attempts to recover himself, the orator broke down⁶.

The Archbishop of York and the Bishop of Exeter followed; and the king's cause was wound up by the Earl of Arundel, who avoided the risk of an exhibition like his diocesan's by speaking in his native tongue, the only one which he professed to understand. He reminded the pope of king Henry's good service and attachment; he allowed the high merits of the archbishop, and requested that the pontiff would study to restore harmony between the parties, for the sake both of the Church and of the kingdom.

The result of the audience was unsatisfactory to the envoys, and they then attempted to gain Alexander by private solicitations. He remained inflexible, however, although they made various tempting offers, such as that Peter-pence should be paid from England by classes which had before been exempt, and that the impost should be secured to the see of Rome for ever. He refused to depose the archbishop; and when they requested him to commit the final decision of the matters in dispute to two cardinals—a species of dignitaries which Henry had reason to believe not inaccessible to money⁷—he replied that he would never abdicate his office by granting a commission in which the appeal to himself should not be reserved.

The envoys hurried away from Sens—partly because the king's instructions had limited their stay there to three days; and partly because they had reason to believe that some knights of the neighbourhood,—“friendly to the archbishop,” as Dr. Giles tells us⁸ with an apparent pride in the friendship of such persons for his hero,—had a design of attacking and plundering them.

On the fourth day after their departure, the archbishop entered the city. He had been accompanied by the abbot of St. Bertin's and Miles, Bishop of Terouenne, to Soissons, where he was received with honour by the French king; and now, by the munificence of that sovereign, he appeared with a train of three hundred horsemen. The two parties had seen each other by the way, on the opposite banks of a river.

The pope's sympathies were naturally with the champion of the clerical immunities; and the power of France swayed him in the same direction. There were, however, various contrary forces which also acted on him. He was afraid of the king of England; he was afraid of the anti-pope; for, although his original rival was lately dead, another had been set up, who had in his interest all Germany and a part of Italy, so that Alexander was an exile from his own city; and, on the whole, his conduct was as unheroic as possible—unsteady, crooked, double, and pusillanimous⁹. An emissary of the archbishop's, who had been sent abroad soon after the council of Westminster, represented the feelings of the papal court as follows, in a letter to his master:—

“ They all extol in you that courage of which they feel themselves in every way devoid. They are all in such a state of imbecility, that they seem to fear God less than men. They are so affrighted by a number of occurrences which have happened all at once, that they would not at this time dare to offend any prince—especially the king of England,—in any point; nor, even if they could, would they try to succour the Church of God, which is in danger all over the world.”

The utmost help that could at that time be obtained from the pope was a recommendation of the archbishop and his church to the prayers of some Cistercian communities. When, however, Becket visited him at Sens, he was disposed to take a more decided part. The king of France's letter, and the imposing cavalcade of three hundred, were not without their effect on him.

He received the archbishop with honour, placed him at his right hand, and desired him to be seated while stating his cause—a task which devolved on Becket himself, as all his clerks (although, we are told by Roger¹, there were many learned canonists and eloquent men among them) declined it, from fear of rendering themselves especially obnoxious to the king. After a short opening, in which he declared himself willing to endure any thing rather than consent to the demands which were made against the liberties of the Church, the archbishop threw himself on his knees, and spread out before the pope the parchment which he had received at Clarendon. The constitutions were read aloud; the pope emphatically expressed his disapproval of them. Some, he said, might have been borne with, although none were good; but ten out of the sixteen he pronounced abominable, contrary to ancient canons, and to all that was sacred. He reproved Becket for having joined with the other prelates in consenting to them even for a moment—a submission, he said, which amounted to renouncing their priesthood, and reducing the Church to the condition of a handmaiden. He declared, however, that the archbishop's subsequent conduct had atoned for his passing weakness; "and thus," says Herbert, "having first rebuked him with the severity of a father, he dismissed him with the sweetness of a mother's consolation".

On the following day, the archbishop was again admitted to an audience. He broke out into lamentations over the unhappy condition of the Church, and traced all her calamities to his own promotion—effected, as it had been, by the intrusion of royal power, and not by a fair canonical election. He professed that he had long been weary of his office; that he had withstood the advice of his brethren who wished him to resign it, because he would not give a precedent of sacrificing the Church's rights in order to appease a prince's anger; but that he had only reserved his resignation until he should be in the presence of the supreme pontiff,—in whose hands he now placed the see of Canterbury, beseeching him to appoint to it a successor more capable of benefiting the Church. So saying, he drew off the archiepiscopal ring, and delivered it to the pope; and the tears with which he accompanied the action affected all who were present.

He then withdrew, and the conclave debated as to the acceptance of his resignation. Some of the cardinals,—“and these,” says Alan, “were of the Pharisees”—bribed by the king of England, according to other writers—regarded it as the best means of extricating the Church from the difficulties which beset her; but the opposite counsels prevailed. Becket received his office anew from the pope's hands—a manner of appointment which did away with all scruples as to the regularity of his former title. The pope assured him of his constant support and sympathy, and committed him to the care of the abbot of Pontigny, a Cistercian monastery about twelve leagues from Sens. "Hitherto," he said, "you have lived in abundance and luxury; but, that you may learn to be in future, as you ought to be, the comforter of the poor, and as this lesson can only be learnt from poverty herself, who is the mother of religion, we have thought fit to commit you to the poor of Christ³."

³ The story of the resignation is told by all modern writers; and we have not deviated in the text from the track of our predecessors. Among the older biographers, however, the incident does not by any means appear so distinct and certain. The "dicitur," with which Fitzstephen introduces his statement, does not much bespeak our confidence; neither does even the "ut mihi pro certo dictum est" of Grim (S. T. C. i. 52—244); and, on the other hand, the account given by Alan, which we have chiefly followed, has even too much of detail. But the most remarkable circumstance is the silence of Herbert, who was himself with Becket at Sens. He tells us of the audience at which the constitutions were exhibited; and then he states that on the following day many cardinals and other persons of the court (politicians of the Mr. Worldly Wiseman school) remonstrated in a friendly way with the archbishop on the unseasonableness of quarrelling with the king while the Church was suffering from a schism; to which censure the biographer replies in a very long discourse put into the mouth of his hero; but of the resignation he says nothing whatever. It is hardly worth while to mention small variations in the story; as that Alan makes the reading of the constitutions to have been at a public audience, and the resignation in the pope's chamber, while Herbert expressly states that the former incident was in the chamber; that Grim represents the whole as having taken place at one interview, while Alan makes two; that, according to Alan, the restoration of the see was on the same day with the resignation, while Fitzstephen tells us that there was an interval of three days; that Herbert speaks of Becket as having himself chosen Pontigny for a residence, and petitioned to be placed there, while Alan's statement is that given in the text, &c. On the whole, we think the story of the resignation extremely doubtful. Such writers as we have to do with were equally capable of inventing a falsehood, or of suppressing a fact; but Herbert's narrative has a much greater air of probability than Alan's. And what motive could Herbert have had for suppression? Or what likelihood is there that Alan should have been so very circumstantially informed as to an incident of which Grim and Fitzstephen speak so uncertainly? And if the scene took place as Alan describes it—in the presence of the cardinals, many of whom were in Henry's interest—how could there have been any mystery or uncertainty about it? Surely it would very soon have become universally known. Becket himself alludes, in a letter to Cardinal Hyacinth, A. D. 1167, to something which took place at Sens, "Partes vestras diligentius interponatis, ut confirmationem primatiæ nostræ, quam in primo adventu nostro Senonis D. Papa nobis concessit, per vos obtineamus" (Ep. ii. 14); this, however, evidently means, not that the pope restored him to his archbishopric, but that he promised him a formal confirmation in certain privileges, as attached to it. If the story of the resignation is untrue, one of Lord Lyttelton's charges against Becket will fall to the ground—viz., that while to the pope he professed to consider his promotion uncanonical, he yet maintained its perfect validity and regularity in writing to the

It was on Christmas eve that the king of England heard from his envoys the report of their ill-success at the papal court. Two days later he issued orders that the archbishop's property and the revenues of the see of Canterbury should be seized; and that all Becket's kindred, clerks, and servants, should be banished—the same oppressive measure which had been threatened against Foliot, in order to overcome his opposition to the archbishop's election, being now enforced against the primate himself. The bishops were commanded to withhold from the clerks attached to him all the income of preferments within their respective dioceses, and were required to bind themselves, by a solemn promise, that they would not quit the kingdom, hold communication with the exiles, appeal to the pope in any matter whatever, or receive his rescripts. It was forbidden to mention the primate in the public prayers. The sheriffs were charged to arrest and imprison all persons who should appeal to the pope. Peter-pence were to be gathered into the royal treasury. Any one who should be caught with letters from the pope or the archbishop was to be put into a crazy boat, and turned adrift to the mercy of the waves¹.

The chief instrument in the execution of these measures was Ranulph de Broc, an old and persevering enemy of Becket, whose original cause of enmity was probably a claim made by the archbishop to his castle and lordship of Saltwood, as an ancient possession of the see of Canterbury². He is said to have performed his commission with a barbarity beyond what was required³. "Those," says Grim, "of whom God especially styles Himself the Father and Judge,—orphans, widows, children altogether innocent and unknowing of any discord, aged men, women with their little ones hanging at their breasts, clerks, lay folk, of whatever age and sex, of the archbishop's kindred, and some of his friends,"—were seized in the depth of winter and mercilessly transported beyond sea, after having been obliged to swear that they would seek out the archbishop, and present themselves before him, in order to add to his afflictions by the sight of their misery. The pope absolved them from their oath, and those who were less able to travel remained in Flanders⁴. But many found their way to Pontigny; and Herbert fills much space with a long oration, in which the archbishop's eruditi are said to have endeavoured

English bishops. (Ep. i. 127. Lyttelton, ii. 401.) Our scepticism on this point had not arisen when our former article was printed, or we should have worded one or two passages of that article (pp. 52—60) somewhat differently.

voured to soothe his grief at the piteous spectacle of the multitude which was suffering for his sake, and with one still longer which is described as the reply. The cause for which the exiles suffered, however, procured them a welcome in foreign lands, so that many of them, according to Herbert, were better provided for than they had been in their own country⁸. The women were received into convents; and the men were entertained by princes and nobles, bishops and clergy, with a hospitality from which we should not think of detracting, did not the exaggerated praises of some writers compel us to observe, that the motives of it at first may not have been altogether free from faction⁹, and that its warmth subsided long before the necessity was at an end¹.

Some of the archbishop's connexions found means of concealing themselves in England; and our friend Fitzstephen obtained leave to remain, by composing a curiously rhymed Latin prayer for the King's use².

Becket's residence at Pontigny lasted nearly two years. Soon after his arrival, he requested that he might be furnished with a monastic habit, hallowed by the papal benediction; for he wished, says Alan, to mark his renewed appointment to his office by becoming a monk like the archbishops before him. The pope complied with his request; and Alan, in reporting some pleasantries which passed on the occasion of first trying on the garb, takes occasion to inform us, that the archbishop's spare figure was so stuffed out by the unsuspected shirt of hair, that all the world supposed him a portly man³.

He now endeavoured in every thing to conform to the strict

⁹ It is curious enough to find Becket expressing warm thanks for the kindness shown to his friends by the king and queen of Sicily, and at the same time requesting a Sicilian prelate to intercede with these royal persons for the recall of the Archbishop of Palermo from banishment, as a measure which would gratify the King of France.—Ep. i. 58.

² This gives countenance to the conjecture (p. 40), that the biographer was the same Fitzstephen who is found in the service of the crown after Becket's death. It seems also likely, (although we would not speak too positively on the point,) that he may have been the William, described as "late chaplain to the archbishop," who was imprisoned in 1166—seemingly in retaliation for his master's proceedings at Vezelay—and for whom Foliot then interested himself with the king.—Ep. i. 123. 130.

rule of the order to which his hosts belonged ; but, as before at Canterbury, with a studious attempt at concealment. His table was placed by itself in the refectory, so that he was safe from the general observation. Viands suitable to his dignity were served up on it ; but the monk who waited on him was privately instructed to place among them the coarse and unsavoury “pulmentaria” of the Cistercian dietary ; and to these, for a time, he restricted himself, allowing the more delicate food to be carried away for beggars⁴,—from whom M. Thierry might claim a share for Saxon refugees.

Grim adds other and more wonderful details of his mortifications and devotion,—borrowing somewhat too largely (we suspect) from the stock list of the hagiologists : that he was wont to lock himself up in an oratory, employing his time in exercises which might be guessed at from his loud and frequent groans ; that he used to stand for hours chilling himself in a stream ; that, instead of occupying the bed which was prepared for him “with clean and costly coverings, as was meet for an archbishop,” he spent much of the night in prayer, and then used to rouse his chaplain, and submit himself to him for discipline ; that when the chaplain returned to his couch, weary with exertion and unable to flog any longer, the saint tore his own flesh with his nails, until at length, in a state of exhaustion, he lay down on the bare floor, and, with a stone for his pillow, yielded himself to a short slumber, which the galling shirt of hair and the gnawings of his multitudinous vermin rendered a pain and additional weariness rather than a refreshment⁵.

That he soon fell ill is certain ; and then, says Grim, he was haunted by visions of malignant cardinals bent on plucking out his eyes, of savage men cutting off the tonsured crown of his head, and other such dire appearances. Herbert of Bosham, who does not mention any other cause of the illness than the unsuitable diet, tells us that he himself discovered this cause with some difficulty ; and that, in obedience to his remonstrances, the archbishop returned to his Canterbury practice of placing his mortification rather in the scantiness than in the plainness of his food⁶ ;—eating, we may suppose, his morsel of pheasant with abstinence, while the brethren of Robert of Molesme and Stephen Harding might be gluttonous over their beans and their bran.

Although, however, the archbishop’s personal habits were thus severe, his general style of living was such that his friend the Bishop of Poitiers thought it necessary to urge repeatedly a reduction of his establishment. “Your wisdom,” he says, in one of his letters, "ought to know that no one will think the less of you, if, in conformity to your circumstances, and in condescension to the religious house that entertains you, you content yourself with a moderate establishment of horses and men, such as your necessities require⁷."

Much of his time was now given to study⁸, in which his chief associates were Herbert of Bosham and Lombard⁹, a learned native of Piacenza, who was afterwards Archbishop of Benevento. The direction of his reading was such as his wisest friend, John of Salisbury, could not regard without fear for its effects on the archbishop's peculiar temper.

"Laws and canons," he wrote, "are indeed useful; but these are not what will now be needed. For, in truth, they raise curiosity rather than devotion. Who ever rises pricked in heart from reading laws, or even canons? I would rather that you should ruminate on the Psalms, and should peruse St. Gregory's books of Morals, than that you should philosophize after the fashion of the schoolmen. You would do better to confer on moral subjects with some spiritual man, by whose example you might be kindled, than to pry into and discuss the contentious parts of secular learning. God knoweth with what intention, with what devotion, I suggest these things. You will take them as you please¹."

‡ The study of ecclesiastical law, as it then was—"developed" by forgery, ignorance of antiquity, and the usurpations of the clergy, which had been advancing for centuries—was especially

⁷ Ep. i. 35. Froude, 570.

⁹ This person has been confounded with Herbert, in consequence of a mistake in the Quadrilogus, p. 157. The error runs through many works, down to Mr. Froude's, p. 116. It is corrected by Dr. Giles in the Preface to S. T. C. vol. viii. (which had probably not been seen by the writer of a letter on the subject in the British Magazine for July, 1846—Dr. Giles' volumes having been published by instalments.)

fitted to bring out the defects of Becket's character, by filling his mind with exaggerated notions ; while his austere manner of life would arm him with a stern determination to carry out his ideas of duty, abating nothing of what he conceived to be his dignities and the rights of the Church.

And now the correspondence becomes voluminous and important. Unhappily, however, the editors have done all that was in their power to prevent the possibility of reading it with any ease or pleasure. The old edition is intended, no doubt, to have something of a chronological arrangement ; for each of the five books, into which it is divided, professes to contain the epistles of a certain period ; but a glance at Mr. Froude's list of the letters will show how ill this pretence is borne out. Dr. Giles' principle of arrangement is different, but at least equally unsatisfactory. He divides his four volumes of correspondence into two pairs,—placing Becket's letters² at the beginning of the first, and those of Foliot at the beginning of the second ; excluding the letters of John of Salisbury and Arnulph, as belonging to other portions of the “Patres Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ,” and distributing the miscellaneous epistles between the parts which are chiefly devoted to Becket and Foliot respectively. These arrangements would of themselves be enough to make considerable hunting necessary in an attempt to read the correspondence with understanding. But the difficulty of finding our way is strangely increased by the internal order of the classes ; for this is regulated, in the case of Becket's and Foliot's letters, by the rank of the receiver ; in the others, by that of the writer. The clergy take precedence ; and after the smallest of these come emperors, kings, and queens ; from whom the scale descends to the rest of the laity. When a late voluminous baronet published the letters of his correspondents in the order of heraldic precedence, he had the satisfaction of parading in the most imposing way the greatness of the personages who had written to him ; this was in his case an object, and furnished a motive for such a disposition ; but in the case before us nothing could be more absurd or vexatious. And so utterly indifferent is Dr. Giles to any real utility or convenience, that he has not even taken the pains to put into their proper order the letters addressed to the same person by Becket or Foliot, or those of the same writer in the rest of the correspondence !

There is, indeed, Mr. Froude's list to guide us about the old edition ; and Dr. Giles has furnished another (of the most meagre and unsatisfactory kind) ; so that the laborious reader may, if he will, pick out his way, after some fashion, through the four octavos and the corpulent little quarto, by the help of two lists, which do not agree with each other ; (and all this labour is necessary, since each edition has both more and less than the other ;) but we need not say how different such a process is from reading onwards in a collection digested by an intelligent and careful editor according to the order of dates³. And as to other matters—care of text, accuracy of printing, and the like—both the old and the new editions are as choice specimens as could readily be found of the method described by Mr. Carlyle in his “Cromwell ;”—“editing, as you edit waggon-loads of rubbish—by turning the waggon upside down.”

It is not for a reviewer to enter into the details of this mass of correspondence. The reader, if he fears to embark on the great ocean itself, may gain an idea of it from Mr. Froude's work⁴. We cannot say, that, as a whole, it gives a favourable idea of the time. There is abundance of violence, falsehood, and insincerity ; mean selfishness and artifice trying to veil themselves under fine professions and language ; cant, too evidently known to be cant by those who used it ; strange tossing to and fro of allegorically misapplied Scripture ; duplicity of pope, corruptness of cardinals and other high dignitaries, intemperance of Becket and Henry, hypocrisy of Louis, politic smoothness of Foliot. Exeter Hall itself might enrich its abuse of the Church of the middle ages from the language and imputations which her eminent personages lavish on each other. She appears distracted by schism and faction, corrupted and degraded by a multiplicity of evil, pitiably subjected to the variations of temporal affairs, and ³ We do not wish it to be supposed that we have read the correspondence in the thorough style here described ; and therefore we cannot undertake to speak of Dr. Giles' demerits in detail. We may, however, mention one specimen of editorship which we have by chance observed. A part of a letter from Foliot “to G. [Geoffrey Ridel], Archdeacon of Canterbury,” (Foliot, ep. 197,) is repeated as a letter to a person unknown (ibid. 292). The want of acquaintance with his own book which the editor has shown by printing the letter twice, is discreditable ; but there seems to be something far more discreditable than this in the matter : for the index makes no mention of the second insertion ; and the only way in which we can account for this is by supposing that Dr. Giles, in making his index, discovered the repetition, and that he thought to conceal the fact from his readers by omitting the reference to the second place where the letter appears. A comparison of the two copies is not calculated to inspire much confidence in Dr. Giles' accuracy as an editor. In the one he reads adduxeritis, where in the other he rightly gives adauxeritis ; and in the copy which is free from this blunder, there is an error of punctuation which alters the sense.

⁴ In referring to this volume, we do not attempt to distinguish between Mr. Froude and the friend who completed and edited his papers.

attempting to assert herself against the world, not by leavening it with a higher and purer element, but by setting up pretensions unfounded, mischievous, and of a rival worldliness.

The letters of John of Salisbury are, we think, the most readable in the old collection. He, at least, is free from cant, and writes with apparent honesty. He is genial, learned, and sensible. Although a strenuous adherent of Becket, he is by no means blind to his faults, or sparing in reproof of them; and his ill opinion of the fair-spoken Bishop of London shows itself in a variety of amusing ways.

In the spring of 1165⁵, Henry entered into a negotiation with the German adherents of the antipope, Paschal. His envoys are said to have gone so far as, at a diet which was held at Würzburg, to swear in their master's name that he would renounce Alexander and acknowledge Paschal; and the authority for this statement is nothing less imposing than an edict of the Emperor Frederick Barbarossa⁶. Lord Lyttelton suggests, and with great probability, that the edict may have represented as absolute an engagement which was only conditional—depending on the course which the pope should take in the disputes between the king and the archbishop⁷; but it is clear that the affair, however qualified, was discreditable and injurious to Henry. He backed out of it by setting John of Oxford, who had been one of the envoys, to swear before the pope that in the German transactions nothing had been done “against the faith of the Church, and the honour and interest of the pope⁸.” It was at Rome that this oath was taken; for the state of affairs had encouraged Alexander to return to Italy, and he entered his capital in November, 1165⁹.

The king of England spent the following Easter at Angers; and there he had an interview with John of Salisbury, Herbert of Bosham, and others of Becket's clerks, in consequence of an attempt made by the king of France to procure their restoration to their country¹. The clerks all refused to abandon their master, or to admit the usages except in so far as the pope should warrant ; and they left Henry in great indignation at their firmness, and especially at the swaggering deportment of our friend Herbert.

A negotiation which the archbishop himself opened with the king, about the same time, or perhaps somewhat earlier, had no better result. It began in the most conciliatory manner. The envoy was a Cistercian abbot, named Urban—"a man," says Herbert², "urbane in reality as well as in name, and of urbane speech;" and he bore with him a letter of corresponding blandness—"a most sweet letter," as the biographer describes it, "containing supplication alone, and nothing or next to nothing of reproof; for," he adds, "the archbishop had sought for words profitable, sweet, and pacific, and wrote in most gentle terms." The king, however, answered roughly; whereupon Becket sent him a verbal message of somewhat sterner tone. The king's second reply was still rougher than the first—(as might have been expected); and the archbishop, finding (says our author), that oil had no effect, proceeded to pour in wine. Another letter was written in a tone of severe rebuke and lofty ecclesiastical dignity; and this, like the first, was sent by a suitable bearer—a monk named Gerard "the shoeless,"—tattered, mortified, and of a burning zeal. The last communication incensed the king to fury; and so the negotiation ended. -

And now our reader—if the story of Becket is not wholly new to him, and if his previous acquaintance with it has been derived from certain sources—may expect that we should tell him how King Henry procured the removal of the exile from Pontigny. We are sorry to keep our reader waiting; but we must tell things in their proper order.

Although the pope had returned to Italy, he was still far from feeling himself independent of circumstances and persons³; and he had tied up Becket from taking any steps against Henry until after Easter, 1166. That time had now arrived, and the archbishop prepared to act.

Threats, conveyed by letter and otherwise, had given the king reason to apprehend that the extreme spiritual censures of excommunication and interdict were about to be pronounced against him. He summoned an assembly of his nobles and bishops to

Chinon, and desired their advice as to the course which should be taken⁴. It was resolved to prevent the sentence by an appeal; for in the case of excommunication an appeal could not be admitted after sentence, as the party was then no longer a member of the Church. The bishops of Lisieux and Seez accordingly proceeded to Pontigny, accompanied by Rotrou, Archbishop of Rouen, who professed that he went rather with a view of mediating between the parties than of aiding in the appeal. They found that Becket had received notice of their approach, and had left the abbey in order to avoid them⁵. They published the appeal, however, although in a manner to which an exception was taken as informal,—as it was only read aloud, instead of being affixed to the abbey-gates.

The archbishop in the mean time went on a pilgrimage to Soissons, attended by some of his clerks, and arrived there in the beginning of the Rogation-week. He watched three nights, before the shrine of the Blessed Virgin, that of St. Gregory, who set on foot the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, and that of St. Drausius, a saint much resorted to by persons about to engage in duels, and therefore, we are told, very germane to the occasion⁶. On the morrow after Ascension-day he proceeded to Vezelay; and on the Sunday following⁷, after preaching at high mass, he entered into a statement of the differences between himself and the king, of the measures which had been taken against ⁴ He is reported to have said, “quod omnes proditores erant, qui eum adhibitâ operâ et diligentia ab unius hominis infestatione nolebant expedire.” (Ep. i. 140, pp. 233, 234.) “These,” says Mr. Froude, “are the very expressions which Henry uttered in 1170, and which were the immediate occasion of the archbishop’s murder.” (p. 150.) “C’était,” writes M. Michelet on that occasion, “la seconde fois que ces paroles homicides sortaient de sa bouche.” (iii. 187.) There is, however, nothing homicidal, or suggestive of violence in the Latin here, although we cannot say the same of Mr. Froude’s translation—“who had not zeal and courage enough to rid him,” &c.

⁵ Dr. Giles tells us that “Herbert says [the archbishop] withdrew from Pontigny purposely to prevent notice being served on him.” (i. 333.) What Herbert really says is considerably different—“We knew that on the ground of domicile appeals might be made, although the parties appealed against might be absent, or might absent themselves; but we withdrew in order to avoid intercourse with the envoys.” (S. T. C. vii. 233.) Herbert represents the visit of the bishops to Pontigny as having taken place after the excommunications—apparently confounding the proceedings of the Norman prelates sent from Chinon with those of the English bishops, on hearing what had been done at Vezelay. We here chiefly follow the correspondence.

⁶ Ascension-day, the last day of Becket’s stay at Soissons, fell on the feast of this saint, June 2.

him, and the failure of his attempts to bring Henry to a better mind; and then, with all the awful forms of the Roman Church, he pronounced the sentence of excommunication against John of Oxford, for his intercourse with schismatics, and his intrusion into the deanery of Salisbury³; against Richard de Luci, Ranulph de Broc, and others of the king's party, for having advised measures against the good of the Church, for having infringed her property, and other such offences. He anathematized six of the constitutions of Clarendon in particular, and all who should act on them; and he absolved the bishops from their engagement to observe them. He suspended the Bishop of Salisbury, for having admitted John to the deanery of his church on the king's nomination, without a canonical election, and against the pope's command. Henry himself would have been included in the excommunication, but that Becket, on arriving at Vezelay, had heard of his being seriously ill. He contented himself, therefore, with summoning him to repent, and threatening to anathematize him if he should persist in his courses.

These censures were uttered in the presence of a great concourse of people, who had met to keep Ascension-tide at Vezelay; and Herbert tells us, that he and the other clerks who accompanied the archbishop were altogether taken by surprise when they heard them; for in the many consultations which had passed, he had given no hint of his object, and they had followed him from Pontigny without suspecting it⁴.

The archbishop forthwith despatched letters to the English bishops, requiring them to carry out his denunciations. They met on St. John the Baptist's day, and agreed to appeal to the pope against him—fixing on Ascension-day in the following year as the term. The writers of Becket's party exult much over the fact that, on this and other occasions, the king and his friends had recourse to appeals — “an expedient,” says Dr. Lingard, “which had been prohibited by the constitutions of Clarendon;” but, as the utmost that was intended by the constitution was to prevent appealing *without the king's consent*¹, the charge of inconsistency appears very ill-grounded.

³ The late dean having been advanced to the bishopric of Bayeux, the pope had forbidden the election of a successor during the exile of some of the canons, to whom the right of electing belonged. Froude, 154.

Letters, long, able, and bitter, were now exchanged between the primate and his suffragans ; among them was that of Foliot, which has been referred to in our account of Becket's elevation to the archbishopric. The pope, soon after, confirmed the suspension of the Bishop of Salisbury and the excommunications of the others, and ordered that all persons who were in possession of benefices or revenues belonging to the exiles should restore them and make satisfaction².

At the general chapter of the Cistercians, which was held at Cîteaux in the month of September, an intimation was given from the King of England³ that, if the archbishop were any longer harboured in any of their monasteries, he would confiscate all the property of the order within his dominions. A deputation of monks was sent to Pontigny in consequence. The king's letter was read over to the archbishop, and he was requested to choose his own course ; the order would not turn him out, but would feel itself greatly eased by his departure. Becket at once resolved to relieve the Cistercians from the danger which they incurred by their hospitality, although the brethren of Pontigny besought him still to remain among them with an earnestness which would have been more meritorious if they had been among the parties on whom the penalty would have fallen.

The Roman breviary represents the king's threat to the Cistercians as having followed immediately on his learning the fact that they had afforded refuge to his enemy. Most of the old biographers say nothing of any provocation given by the archbishop ; as neither does the breviary of Salisbury. The Quadri-logus omits Herbert's account of the scene at Vezelay ; and Dr. Giles, although he relates the fact, yet thinks it too unimportant to deserve any mention in his table of contents, or in the heading of his chapter, which is simply "The pope returns to Italy !" Dr. Lingard, after relating that the archbishop retired to Pontigny, devotes three pages to an account of wars in Wales, and then returns to the subject of Becket, by stating that "amidst these transactions the eyes of the king were still fixed on the exile at Pontigny ;" that he banished the archbishop's kindred, and took other measures against him which we have already mentioned ; that "still Henry's resentment was insatiable ;" that he caused him to be dismissed by the Cistercians ; that Becket found refuge at Sens, and there took to a kind of reading from which his friends "endeavoured to divert his attention ;" and that "at last, urged by the cries of the sufferers" and "the violence of Henry," he proceeded to an excommunication⁴.

This sequence is, indeed, fitted to produce a very different impression from the natural account of the case. The king's measures are here strung together as the expressions of a restless and "insatiable" malignity, with "eyes still fixed on the exile at Pontigny," and going on from one cruelty to another without any fresh provocation. In reality, however, all these proceedings took place at two points of time and no more,—the banishment of the kindred, the seizure of effects, &c. on the return of the envoys from the papal court at Christmas, 1164, before Henry knew that the archbishop was at Pontigny ; the dislodging of the exiles, after the excommunication of the king's adherents. It was at Pontigny that Becket inflamed his mind by the studies against which John of Salisbury remonstrated ; it was thence that he proceeded to Vezelay in order to excommunicate ; and it was in consequence of his doings at Vezelay that the king procured his removal from Pontigny.

Why, we may ask, did the old biographers for the most part omit the fact of the excommunication ? It was nothing private, obscure, or uncertain ; in their eyes it certainly cannot have been unimportant. By omitting it, the King of England's conduct is made to appear unprovoked and hateful ; whereas, in truth, Becket's most intimate friends and most zealous partizans were shocked by the violence of the provocation. We can see no other conclusion than that the biographers wished to falsify the history ; that the compiler of the Quadrilogue had the same motive ; and we leave the charitable ingenuity of the reader to find out some way of accounting for the remarkable series of transpositions by which Dr. Lingard has so curiously changed the character of the story.

Becket now resolved to throw himself on the kindness of the French king, who at an earlier period had offered to entertain him. On hearing the statement of the archbishop's messengers, Louis uttered severe reflections on the Cistercians, as having "deserted the cause of God for the sake of those perishable things of this world, to which they professed to be dead⁵." A man whose worldly interest it was to support Becket, might well be righteously indignant against those who followed their interest by getting rid of him⁶. He desired that the archbishop would choose a residence in any part of his dominions, and assured him of an ample maintenance. Becket fixed on a monastery close to Sens,—the city in which the pope had lately lived, and, according to Herbert, a very pleasant abode⁷.

The abbot of Pontigny accompanied the exiles on their way to Sens, and, observing that the archbishop was sad, endeavoured to console him. On this, Becket told him, under promise of secrecy, that he had been troubled by a vision during the night. He had found himself in a church, pleading his cause in presence of the Roman conclave,—the pope hearing him with favour, while the cardinals opposed him; when four knights entered, and cut off the crown of his head⁸. The abbot is said to have observed, with a smile, “How should one who eats and drinks as you do be a martyr? The cup of wine which you drink accords ill with the cup of martyrdom.” And the archbishop replied, “I own that I indulge overmuch in the pleasures of the body; yet He who justifieth the ungodly hath vouchsafed to reveal this to me⁹.”

The vision is said to have been imparted, under the same seal of secrecy, to another abbot a few days later; and both the depositories of the secret kept it to themselves until it had been verified by the event. This is not exactly after the manner of Scripture prophecy, where, although the meaning might not appear until after the fulfilment, there was never any concealment of the words.

No one will maintain that the conduct of Henry in dislodging Becket was at all magnanimous or admirable, if judged even by a standard which is not the highest. But neither was it very atrocious or inexcusable, —as appears strongly from the circumstance, that those who wish to give it this character have

⁶ The king's support was far from steady. John of Salisbury speaks as if it were cooling very early in the day. (Giles, i. 309.) And as to its generosity, we find by a letter of the Bishop of Poitiers, written about the same time, that his plan was to provide for the archbishop out of the revenues of some vacant see, “so as to keep his own funds unimpaired.” (Ibid. 314.)

⁷ Lord Campbell states that in 1167 Becket removed to Rome (i. 85). The authority for this error is not given.

⁸ This is Herbert's account. We have already given a similar story from Grim, who refers it to an earlier time, and also tells that one day at mass the archbishop had a vision, in which it was said to him, “Thomas, Thomas, thou shalt glorify Me by thy death.”—S. T. C. i. 64.

⁹ Will. Cant. in Quad. ii. 18. The abbot's speech seems to show the narrowness of a monk, unable to conceive any sanctity or abstinence except after the very fashion of his own order. We have already said enough as to Becket's mortifications, but we may take this opportunity of mentioning, that the Passion quoted in p. 53, note ⁸, which, according to Dr. Giles (S. T. C. viii. p. ix.) was “first printed in 1604,” is really that which formed the lessons of the Sarum breviary.

found themselves obliged to omit mentioning the offence which prompted it. We would allow Dr. Lingard and the rest to inveigh against the king at will, if the fact were that he kept his "eyes still fixed on" a harmless exile, whose placid hours were divided between devotion, study, and deeds of love; if it were true that, out of mere "insatiable" malice, without any new incitement, he heaped affliction after affliction on this meek recluse, and at last forced the brotherhood which had sheltered him to turn him out of doors. But when the matter is stated in its true form,—when it is considered that Becket had put the crown to a long course of most vexatious conduct, by pronouncing the highest censures of the Church on the king's advisers, by threatening himself with excommunication and the kingdom with an interdict, by anathematizing his constitutions, and releasing men from their pledge to observe them;—when we consider that the violence of this proceeding alienated from the archbishop some of the English bishops, who before were favourable to him, and provoked the Archbishop of Rouen, "that most firm pillar of the Church," as John of Salisbury styles him, to declare that "all his actions proceeded either from pride or passion¹;"—when we consider that Becket was himself so well aware of the violent nature of his act that he did not venture to consult his most confidential friends on it, out of fear lest their dissuasions should overpower his wishes—we cannot in truth much wonder that Henry should have taken the first means which occurred to him of retaliating in such measure as he could. To abstain from retaliation would have been the part of a character very different from a Norman king of England,—from a prince or noble of that age,—most assuredly from Becket himself. And, if there seem to be something unworthy in the manner of the retaliation, even this may be partly excused when we remember the circumstances of the case,—that Becket had fled from the king's dominions, and therefore it might very naturally be an object with Henry to make him feel that, even in a foreign territory, he was not altogether beyond his reach.

The negotiations which followed, down to the final reconciliation, are very fully related in Mr. Froude's volume, where they occupy about three hundred pages—almost a hundred more than the whole of the previous history. The original letters, which fill the greatest part of the space, give an interest to Mr. Froude's work; but we fear that our readers would find these affairs very wearisome, if we should enter into their complicated details.

We shall, therefore, endeavour to confine ourselves to the most prominent and important transactions.

The first matter which calls for notice is a mission of John of Oxford and others to Rome, in the interest of the King of England. John, excommunicate as he was, was favourably received by the pope, who at the time had pecuniary and political reasons for dealing tenderly with Henry. He placed his deanery of Salisbury in the pope's hands; his excuses for the intrusion were admitted, and he was confirmed in the office. With the facility which procured him from John of Salisbury the nickname of Jurator, he swore whatever he supposed to be for his master's interest—promising, it is said, even that the usages should be abandoned; and he returned home in a triumphant mood, which Becket describes as an “exalting himself above all that is called God, or that is worshipped².” He had obtained, among other things, the appointment of a legatine commission, consisting of two cardinals, William of Pavia and Otho. The former was before noted as altogether in Henry's interest; and Herbert tells us that both were corrupt and greedy, and, “but that they were my lord pope's legates, worthy rather of relegation than delegation³.” During the subsistence of this commission, the archbishop's power of excommunicating, and the sentences already pronounced, were dormant; and it was also granted that in the matter of excommunication the king should be exempted from all authority but the pope's.

The proceedings of the cardinals took up the greater part of the year 1167. William announced his arrival in France to Becket in a somewhat magisterial manner; and the archbishop wrote two answers, which were, one after the other, set aside by John of Salisbury as too offensive in tone. He threw about protests and denunciations on all sides. In his letters to the pope he used a strange vehemence of language, protesting against the appointment of William, and declaring that he would never admit him as an arbiter. He repeatedly alludes to a rumour that the cardinal had been bribed by a promise of succeeding to the see of Canterbury, if a vacancy could by any means be effected. He states that the success of John of Oxford had induced many of the French nobles to give up the cause of the Church as hopeless, and to dismiss the exiles whom they had entertained; some of these, he adds, had already perished from cold and hunger⁴.

The envoys, after having visited the king at Caen, had an interview with the archbishop near Gisors, and endeavoured to obtain his consent to a reconciliation, in which there should be no mention of the constitutions. By this expedient, they told him that he might make sure of an implied withdrawal of the usages, and at the same time might conciliate the king by not insisting on a formal abrogation of them. He replied that his silence would rather be regarded as an assent. The legates then proceeded to Argenton, where they met Henry and some English bishops. The king was disgusted at finding that he had been deceived as to their powers—a more limited commission having been substituted, at the instance of Becket and the French king, for that which had been promised to John of Oxford, so that the cardinals had no authority to go into England, or to arbitrate, unless a reconciliation should first have been effected. He treated them for a time with studied disrespect, but at taking leave he besought them with tears to befriend him at the court of Rome. William cried for company, while Otho was hardly able to refrain from laughing. The cardinals returned to Italy, without having effected any thing towards a reconciliation.

The term of the original appeal by the English bishops had expired while the cardinals were on their journey northward. At the conference of Argenton, which took place in November (1167), they again appealed to Martinmas in the following year. The archbishop deliberated with his clerks whether this appeal should be respected; and the decision was, that, as it was made not for the protection of right, but for the maintenance of wrong (i. e. not for but against the cause of Becket), the inferior judge was not bound to regard it. The archbishop then proceeded to excommunicate for disobedience, in neglecting a summons to appear before him, and for other offences, the Bishop of London, and his own archdeacon, Ridel (whom he somewhere terms "Archidiabolus noster"); and he included with them a multitude of clerks and laymen, who were concerned in invading the property of the see of Canterbury, or the benefices of the banished clergy.

The censures lighted thickly among the persons immediately around the king.

"Almost every one about the court," says Herbert, "was excommunicated, either by name or as having communion with those expressly named, which they were neither able nor at liberty to avoid; so that in the king's chapel there was hardly one that could offer him the kiss of peace at mass, but such as were excommunicated either by name or implicitly." (S. T. C. vii. 253.)

The biographer goes on to give a lively description of the stir which arose in consequence:—

"The king and his party send and send again with all haste. Messengers upon messengers, and then fresh messengers, run, hurry, scamper, to report these doings to the apostolic pontiff. We on our part sent also; our pious king of the French, too, sent and sent again on our behalf. So now the threshold of the Apostles was daily worn, both by our friends and by our adversaries; they run up and down, they hurry, they scamper, both the one party and the other." (S. T. C. vii. 253, 254.)

The "holy pontiff" (as Dr. Giles affects to call him) was in a sore perplexity. He was not disposed to break with Henry, and was much annoyed by the archbishop's hasty and headstrong proceedings; yet he was not willing to abandon him. And if the "gilded and silvered" words of the English king's emissaries weighed more than the "shabby ink-written words" of the exiles, yet, on the other hand, there was the influence of Louis, who zealously espoused the archbishop's cause, and prayed that the excommunications might be sustained; and other potentates are said to have concurred in the request. As, therefore, it would have been awkward to quarrel with either party, the pope judged it most expedient to persuade them to make up their quarrels; and with this view he wrote letters in all directions, which raised up a host of peace-makers—influential personages, both ecclesiastical and secular, all full of love and soft conciliation, busily endeavouring to mediate.

Henry, by means of some envoys whom he sent to Rome, obtained a suspension of the archbishop from dealing forth censures, until a reconciliation should have been effected. The pope seems to have granted this in the full belief that the reconciliation would not be long delayed; we must not, therefore, tax him with any remarkably bad faith for expressing himself to the king without any limitation of time, while to the archbishop he announced that the suspension was only to last until the following Lent⁵.

As, however, there was no appearance of any speedy move, the pope despatched into France three envoys—Simon and Engelbert, dignified ecclesiastics, and Bernard, a monk of Grammont. The statutes of his order bound the last-named personage to abstain from pen and ink; but doubtless his genius found vent in other ways. These envoys were charged with letters to the king, containing exhortations to peace and threats of punishment; the latter to be delivered if the former should be found ineffectual. There was now a general wish for an accommodation. Henry sincerely desired it, although the opposite party charge him with insincerity in his offer of concessions⁶. The French king was eager to act as mediator : some foreign potentates, won by Henry, pressed the expedient of removing Becket by a translation ; his clergy in general were weary of banishment, and willing to meet any conciliatory measures. The primate himself, however, was still unbending. He declared that he would not give up the rights of the Church ; that he would rather die than consent to desert her cause by a resignation of his see.

On the Epiphany, 1169, the two kings held a conference on political affairs at Montmirail, near Chartres ; and Louis induced Becket to be present. On being admitted into the presence of the kings, he fell on his knees before Henry, who immediately raised him up. The archbishop then lamented the differences which had arisen, charging all the evil of them on his own insufficiency ; and concluded by saying that he threw himself wholly on the king's mercy, and submitted to him in all things, " saving the honour of God." This reservation took by surprise many of those who had advised him to concession, and believed that they had prevailed with him. The archbishop professed to have substituted the words salvo honore Dei for salvo ordine nostro, from a wish to avoid the repetition of the offensive formula ; but Henry would not recognize any distinction between the two. He exclaimed that the reservation might be made a pretext for any disobedience : he loudly reproached the archbishop for pride, ingratitude, and disloyalty ; and he concluded by proposing that Becket should yield him that amount of obedience which the greatest and holiest of former primates had paid to the least of earlier kings'. All who were present declared that the king could not be expected to humble himself further ; but Becket remained immovable. It was true, he said, that former archbishops had borne with many abuses ; they had corrected much evil, but not all ; and it was his duty to strive against what remained.

The King of France had now strong reasons for siding with Henry. He, his nobles, and the great body of the clergy who were present (including most of the archbishop's own train), were disgusted at Becket's pertinacity. The kings left the meeting without saluting him ; Louis did not visit him in the course of the evening (as was generally his custom) ; he let him depart on the morrow without leave-taking ; and for some days he held no communication with the exiles, and discontinued their usual allowance of provisions.

⁷ M. Thierry characterizes this proposal as " evidently ironical, and containing at least as much of mental reservation as Becket could have put into his ' saving God's honour.' " (iii. 151.) There is, however, a very clear difference between the two ; nor does the idea of irony appear to have entered the mind of any who were present. Another proposal made by Henry, and much favoured by some of the more moderate among the archbishop's friends, (such as John, Bishop of Poitiers, whom Becket reproved severely for his good intentions,) was, that the obedience of the archbishop should be what the evidence of a hundred men of England, with a like number from Normandy and from Anjou, should determine to have been formerly paid.

Soon after returning to Sens, Becket was in consultation with his clerks as to the course which should now be taken, and had declared an intention of seeking a refuge in Burgundy, when he was summoned to attend King Louis. The king threw himself on his knees before him, acknowledged that the archbishop alone had been in the right at Montmirail, and besought absolution for having taken part against him ; which Becket formally gave. This revolution was caused by the receipt of tidings that Henry had violated the late treaty, by putting to death some leading men of Poitou, who had been in rebellion against him. Louis was now prepared for a breach with the English king ; and he treated the exiles with greater honour than before.

The pope's envoys, having failed to bring about a reconciliation, proceeded to deliver to Henry the second letter with which they had been charged, containing a threat of punishment, unless he should speedily repent.

During the negotiations with Simon and his colleagues, the proceedings against the Bishop of London had been allowed to rest. But at the beginning of Lent (1169) the suspension of the archbishop expired, and he declared an intention of inflicting the highest censures on his contumacious opponents. In order to ward off the blow, Foliot put in a fresh appeal, which was to last until the feast of the Purification in the following year ; and he induced the Bishop of Salisbury, who was in the same danger with himself, to unite with him in this step. Without, however, regarding the appeal, Becket on Palm Sunday pronounced sentence of excommunication against the two bishops and several other persons, at Clairvaux.

Foliot knew how to turn the forms of law to his advantage with the ingenuity of a Bentley. He had appealed ; no citation to appear before his metropolitan had reached him—for the reason that a strict watch was kept to prevent the importation of any letters from Becket into England ; and, although he acknowledged that he had heard a rumour of the excommunication, he professed that he did not hold himself bound to defer to it until he should receive a formal intimation. All possible care was taken to keep such documents at a distance ; but this vigilance was not long effectual. On Ascension-day, when the service of high mass in St. Paul's Cathedral had advanced as far as the offertory, one Berenger, a young French layman, approached the celebrating priest, and held out a packet as his oblation. The priest, on opening it, found—not (as might have been hoped), something equivalent to a modern bank-note, or the title-deeds of an estate bestowed on the Church, but—a letter from the primate to the bishop, announcing the sentence which had been passed on him, and another to the dean and clergy of the cathedral, charging them to avoid the communion of their diocesan in consequence. The messenger then proclaimed the excommunication to the people, and, having escaped under cover of the confusion which ensued, he made his way to York, where he published the sentence in a similar manner^a.

The bishop and the dean were both absent from London when the scene in the cathedral took place. On the next day but one, Foliot assembled the clergy of his church. He read the letters before them, and protested against the sentence on many and various grounds. He argued both from the Old Testament and from the New. He insisted on his appeal, and on the informality of pronouncing sentence without citation and trial—an informality, he said, which could not be excused by the difficulty of serving a citation on him, since the archbishop had found means of conveying the letters of excommunication, which was a far more difficult and hazardous matter. He declared that he owed no obedience to the see of Canterbury, inasmuch as he had not taken any oath to the archbishop at his translation, and because, moreover, London was of right an independent archiepiscopal see, as it had been until the ancient British Christianity was swept away by a heathen invasion^b.

The London clergy in general joined with the bishop in appealing against the excommunication; but the members of his own order excused themselves from supporting him. The king wrote letters in his behalf to the pope, as did also the abbots of Ramsey and Reading, with other ecclesiastics, representing his merits and vindicating his conduct; and, having obtained the king's licence, he set out for Rome, in order to endeavour after a reversal of his sentence.

On the same day when the letters of excommunication were delivered in St. Paul's, Becket himself was busy elsewhere in adding to the list of the excommunicate. The Archdeacon Ridel ("Archidiabolus noster") was among the persons denounced on this occasion.

The pope was much annoyed at hearing of the excommunication of Foliot. Before the tidings reached him, he had (chiefly by way of staving off the importunities of opposite parties) appointed Gratian, a subdeacon, nephew of Pope Eugenius III., and Vivian, a learned lawyer, to go into France as his envoys; and he now sent Becket a letter, expressive of regret that he had resorted to excommunication while negotiations were pending, and advising that further proceedings should be deferred until the result of the embassy were known¹.

In the month of August the envoys arrived in France; being less encumbered with dignity and baggage than cardinals, says Fitzstephen, they were able to travel more expeditiously. Gratian was the favourite with Becket and his friends. He is described by Herbert as "truly gracious, according to his name, and, moreover, more vivacious than Vivian²;" nay, the biographer speaks of him as a very prodigy, inasmuch as "although a Roman, yet he went not after gold³." He and his colleagues held several conferences with Henry, most of which ended in some display of passion on the king's part. There were offers of concession from both parties; but as each wished to make a reservation—Henry insisting on the words "salvâ dignitate regni," while the archbishop was equally earnest for "salvâ Ecclesiæ dignitate"—Gratian gave up the hope of effecting an accommodation, and returned to Rome, declaring himself (we are told) disgusted at the king's untrustworthy character. Vivian was more favourable to Henry—not without special reasons, it is said. He remained behind, and entered into fresh negotiations, for which Becket was but little disposed to thank him⁴. The envoy succeeded, however, in persuading the archbishop to be present at a meeting of the kings, which took place at Montmartre, near Paris, on the Octave of St. Martin (November 18). The Archbishop of Rouen and others presented to Henry, on the part of Becket, a petition for forgiveness of his offences, and for the restoration of himself and the other exiles to their full rights and preferments. This petition was graciously received; and in the conference which followed, there was on each side a studious silence as to all offensive topics. The archbishop made a demand of thirty thousand marks, by way of compensation for the value of the benefices detained from the exiles. The French king said that a question of money must not be a bar to the reconciliation; and Henry promised that compensation should be made as soon as the proper amount could be ascertained by valuation. All seemed to be on the point of a friendly settlement, when Becket—by advice of the pope it is said—requested that the king should give him the kiss of peace, as a security for his good faith. Henry replied that he would gladly do so, but for an oath which he had formerly taken, that he would never kiss the archbishop if a reconciliation should take place. Becket (who states in his letters that the king's insincerity had been evident throughout to those who understood his ways) on this broke off the treaty⁵. The kings rode off towards Mantes, and Becket retired to lodge in the Temple at Paris. Herbert relates, that one of his clerks, in allusion to the name of Montmartre, expressed a belief that nothing but the archbishop's martyrdom would restore peace to the Church; and that Becket replied, "Would that she might be delivered, even if my blood were the ransom⁶!"

The envoys, on beginning to act, had absolved the Archdeacon of Canterbury and others, with the condition that the excommunication was to be again in force if the hopes of a speedy peace should be disappointed; and Gratian, when about to return to Rome, wrote to Ridel and the rest, desiring them to consider themselves as still excommunicate.

When Gratian gave up his commission, the archbishop again felt himself at liberty to deal out his censures. He threatened that, unless full reparation for all wrong were made before the ensuing feast of the Purification, (Feb. 2, 1170,) he would lay the kingdom of England under an interdict, and, if necessary, would excommunicate the king. On hearing of this, Henry despatched Ridel into England, with a commission to exact an oath from ecclesiastics that they would not receive or obey any such denunciations, if the archbishop should proceed to carry out his threats. Some of the bishops absolutely refused compliance, and took refuge in religious houses, by way of sheltering themselves from the anger of the king.

Vivian, after the last failure of his endeavours at mediation, declared himself strongly against Henry; and the king, by way of revenge, gave out that his former favour had been gained by bribery.

The pope was still earnestly desirous to effect a reconciliation; and in January, 1170, he set on foot a fresh commission for the purpose. The members of it were Rotrou, Archbishop of Rouen, and the Bishop of Nevers; with whom the Archbishop of Sens was joined, although not formally. The last-named prelate is described in Mr. Froude's volume as "a warm supporter of the arch-

⁵ In a letter to his envoys at Rome, (Ep. iii. 65,) there is a curious passage, in which Becket shows himself sensible of the value of a grievance—(if, at least, Dr. Giles' translation is correct, as it seems to be)—"If he will repent, and make compensation in part, we for the rest will bear with him in all patience. For it is expedient both to the Church of Rome and the Church of England, that he shall have something in his own possession, which may be objected to him when he is planning disturbance or disaffection." Mr. Froude omits this, p. 461.

bishop's cause ; but the other two," it is added, " were persons of views decidedly opposite to it, and had manifested their opposition only very lately, at the close of Gratian's and Vivian's embassy⁷." As to the previous conduct of the Bishop of Nevers, we do not remember any thing except the fact of his having written to the pope in favour of King Henry on that occasion ; but it is right to mention that the Archbishop of Rouen bore the character of a true and steady churchman, and had been favourably disposed towards Becket until disgusted and alienated by his pride and violence.

" On this appointment being made," says Mr. Froude's editor, " Becket endeavoured to give it a good direction, and wrote a letter to the Bishop of Nevers, how to act in his new situation." We may extract from the opening of this letter a specimen of its tone towards the king.

" Unless I am deceived, your lordship will have to ' fight with beasts ;' for, if he perceives that with promises and smooth words he is unable to circumvent you, he will bring forth his bishops and abbots, and wise men, to assail your constancy.

" And, since you will not easily detect the varied disguises of this prodigy, look with suspicion on all he says, every shape he assumes ; always believe a fraud to be intended, unless his acts manifestly vouch for his sincerity. If he once finds that either by threats or promises he can make an impression on you, that very instant you will lose all authority in his eyes, and become a jest to him and his court. If, however, he finds that he cannot divert you from your purpose, he will swear and forswear, and imitate Proteus ; but at last will return to himself, and from that time forward, unless by your own mismanagement, you will be for a God unto Pharaoh⁸."

The charge given to the commissioners was, that they should endeavour to mediate between the king and the archbishop, and to procure the restoration of the exiles, with compensation for their losses ; that they should prevail on Henry to give the kiss of peace, or, if this were impossible, that they should persuade the archbishop to receive it from the king's eldest son, as representative of his father—an expedient by which Henry had proposed to get over the difficulty of his oath, while the pope, on his part, offered him a dispensation from it. If their attempts to effect a peace should fail, the commissioners were to threaten an interdict at the end of forty days ; but this threat was not to be executed, if within the interval Henry should show any signs of a better mind. They were to absolve the excommunicates if there were a prospect of a reconciliation ; but on condition that the excommunication should revive unless a settlement actually followed.

The Bishop of London was not included in the general absolution; for Becket had always treated him as the mainspring of the opposite party's movements, and had insisted with all his energy that the sentence against him should be confirmed. By personal solicitations at Rome, and other means, however, Foliot procured a special letter^o, empowering the commissioners, or either of them, if the other should be unable to attend (interesse non poterit), to absolve him on his swearing to obey the pope's mandate as to the matters in question. A clause, not easy to understand, required them, on granting the absolution, to notify it to Becket, and to charge him in the pope's name to keep it secret "until it could be published without danger to the Bishop of London himself."

The absolution was pronounced by Rotrou at Rouen on Easter-day; and Becket felt it as a token that his enemies prevailed at the papal court. He wrote to the Archbishop of Rouen, remonstrating against it as informal, because there was no evidence of the other commissioner's inability to be present; and because the Bishop of London, instead of keeping it secret, had forthwith done his utmost to blaze it abroad. The first of these objections appears somewhat captious, and the other utterly unfounded; for the pope's letter did not bind Foliot to secrecy, and allowed the absolution to be published as soon as might be consistent with his interest. But the archbishop's indignation burst forth more remarkably in a letter to a cardinal, which, for furious invective against ecclesiastical superiors, could hardly be paralleled by any thing in the writings of our modern ultra-churchmen. He characterizes the letter by which authority was given for the absolution, as an order that "Satan might be let loose for the destruction of the Church."

"I know not how it is," he continues, "that in the court of Rome the Lord's side is always sacrificed; that Barabbas escapes, and Christ is put to death. With you, the wretched, the exiles, the innocent, are condemned, and for no other reason than because they are the poor of Christ, and weak, and would not go back from the righteousness of God. And, on the other hand, you absolve the sacrilegious, the murderers, the robbers, the impenitent, whom I openly declare, on the authority of Christ, that Peter himself, if he were in the papal chair, could not absolve in the sight of God. Let any one who dares, and who dreads not the sentence of the Judge who is to come, absolve the robbers, the sacrilegious, the murderers, the perjurers, the men of blood, the schismatics, without repentance. I will never remit to the impenitent the things which have been taken away from the Church of God. Is it not our spoils, or rather the spoils of the Church, which the king's emissaries lavish on the cardinals and courtiers of Rome? For my own part, I am resolved no longer to trouble the court. Let those resort thither who prevail in their iniquities, and, after triumphing over justice and leading innocence captive, return with boasting for the confusion of the Church. Would to God that the way to Rome had not caused, for no purpose, the death of so many poor and innocent persons¹!"

There are those who would use the history of Becket as an argument in favour of Rome! There are those who represent the temper of his latter days as that of a man purified by suffering to calm and saintly resignation!

Henry, meanwhile, was busy in preparations for the coronation of his eldest son, now a youth of about fifteen years of age. This, according to some writers, was an expedient intended to ward off the threatened interdict from his subjects, by nominally transferring them to the prince, while others represent it as having originated merely in a wish to annoy the primate by invading the privileges of his see; among which was that of crowning the sovereigns of England. It is very possible that one or both of these motives may have been concerned in the matter at the time which we have now reached; but it ought not to be forgotten that the idea of crowning the prince had been entertained long before; for in the end of 1163, shortly after the council of Westminster, John of Salisbury is found writing of it as having been deferred, in order that it might be performed by the pope in person².

In the beginning of the quarrel, the Archbishop of York, who was then advancing pretensions in rivalry of Canterbury, obtained a letter from the pope³ by which the right of crowning kings was recognized as belonging to his see. Of this Becket had since procured the revocation; and he now obtained from Rome letters forbidding the Archbishop of York and all other bishops to proceed to a coronation in the absence of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to whom the privilege of crowning rightfully belonged. These letters, however, were ineffectual; partly through Becket's remissness in making use of them⁴, and partly through the care which was taken to prevent their reaching those for whom they were intended. It is said that some copies were introduced into England, but that no one would venture to deliver them ; and it is also said, that some of the bishops refused them, or pretended not to have received them⁵.

The coronation took place at Westminster, on Sunday, the 14th of June⁶,—the Archbishop of York officiating, with the assistance of the Bishops of London, Salisbury, and others. No oath to preserve the liberties of the Church was required of the prince ; but the bishops swore to observe the articles of Clarendon. Immediately after the ceremony, the elder king returned into Normandy⁷.

The Archbishop of Rouen and his colleague now renewed their efforts at mediation. They found Henry much inclined to peace,—partly by the knowledge that an interdict⁸ was hanging very closely over his kingdom, as the pope had entrusted Becket with the power of issuing the sentence, and letters to the bishops of England were already prepared, with a view of putting it in force⁹. Becket was prevailed on to attend a meeting of the kings of England and France, which took place in a meadow

⁸ Dr. Giles somewhat exaggerates the horrors of this sentence, where he tells us, that "every church throughout the country would be closed, every bell silent, no one to shrive the dying, or to bury the dead ; the marriage rite no longer to be obtained, and infants doomed either to die under the Church's curse, or to live without her benediction." (ii. 244, 245.) The pope's words, however, are "omnia divina præter baptismum parvulorum et pœnitentias morientium prohibeatis officia celebrari." (Ep. v. 3.) The same exceptions are made by Becket himself, in a letter which is given in Dr. Giles' own English work, ii. 271 ; and these, at least, seem to have been always made. See Schmid's Liturgik, i. 723, 724, Passau, 1840.

⁹ Fitzstephen reports that some one said to the king, "Ut quid tenetur exclusus [archiepiscopus] ? melius tenebitur inclusus quam exclusus ;" and that on this hint Henry acted, with an intention of entrapping Becket. But we do not see the force of the story, since Henry had always declared that he had not driven the primate away, and that he wished him to return.

between Freteval and La Ferté Bernard; and on St. Mary Magdalene's day (July 22), which was the third day of the conference, he had an interview with Henry. The old subjects of offence were avoided on both sides. Nothing was said of the constitutions; nor, according to Herbert, was the kiss of peace mentioned. Fitzstephen, however, states¹, that the archbishop requested Henry to give it, as the pope had absolved him from the oath which had before been an obstacle; and that the king professed himself willing to kiss Becket a hundred times, on mouth, hands, and feet, but wished, for the sake of saving his honour, to be excused until he should be in his own dominions, where the act might have more the grace of appearing voluntary. The two rode apart together. The archbishop desired that he might be allowed, without offending the king, to inflict ecclesiastical punishment on the bishops who had been concerned in the coronation. Henry answered, that he had not supposed their act to be an invasion of the privileges of Canterbury; and referred to the coronations of William the Conqueror and Henry I. as precedents. The archbishop replied, that when the Conqueror was crowned by the Archbishop of York, the throne of Canterbury had no legitimate occupant, as Stigand had not received the pall from Rome; and that Anselm was in exile when the urgency of affairs required that Henry I. should be crowned by one of his suffragans as his representative. On receiving the permission which he had requested, Becket dismounted, and threw himself at the king's feet; whereupon Henry also alighted from his horse, and held the archbishop's stirrup, in order to assist him to remount. And thus, at length, a formal reconciliation was effected.

Very soon, however, it appeared that the harmony was only superficial. The king had promised a restoration of the property belonging to the archbishop and his adherents; and there is a letter, in which he desires his son, who was then administering the government of England, to see that all should be put into the same condition in which it had been three months before the exile²; but the execution of this was impeded in every way by those who had present possession. Some of the clergy, on resuming their benefices, were again violently driven out; the revenues of the see, which fell due at Michaelmas, were seized by the king's officials; the agents whom the archbishop despatched into England in order to make arrangements for his entering again on his possessions, found themselves industriously thwarted by young Henry's advisers, among whom the Archdeacon of Canterbury was prominent. They reported to their master, that all his friends in England united in advising him not to return until his relations with the king should be on a better footing; that Ranulph de Broc (who was especially interested in the matter, inasmuch as his very castle of Saltwood was at stake³) had sworn that the archbishop should not live to eat a whole loaf on English ground; that a scheme had been devised for filling up the vacant sees without his assistance, by sending the bishops-elect to receive consecration at Rome; and they added other rumours of equally unpromising character.

The archbishop, on finding that there were difficulties in his way, sent off John of Salisbury and Herbert of Bosham to press for the fulfilment of the king's promises as to restitution, and among other things, to urge the old claim to the custody of Rochester Castle. "The king," says Herbert, "as his manner was, put off, put off, and again put off⁴;" and at length replied to John of Salisbury, who was the spokesman, "O John, I shall certainly not give up the castle to you, unless I first see a change in your behaviour towards me." It does not appear to what behaviour the king here alluded; and, without the knowledge of this, we cannot think it fair to charge him with all the blame of the disagreements which followed the accommodation at Freteval.

The archbishop again met Henry at Tours, and hoped to draw him into giving the kiss of peace in the service of the mass; but the king eluded the attempt by ordering that the mass for the dead should be said, in which the pax is omitted⁵. They parted on this occasion with mutual reproaches.

Their next meeting, however, was friendly. In the course of conversation the king said, "Why is it that you will not do as I wish? I would put every thing into your hands;" "and," said Becket in relating the story to Herbert, "I remembered the words, 'All these things will I give thee, if thou wilt fall down and worship me'⁶."

While Becket was complaining that the restitution of his property was delayed, the king complained of his lingering so long in France. At length, however, he resolved to set out on his return. It is said that both the French king and the Archbishop of Paris endeavoured, at parting, to dissuade him from venturing into England without receiving the kiss of peace; and that to both he expressed a belief that he was going to his death. Henry had promised to meet him at Rouen, but excused himself on the ground of political business, and sent the Dean of Salisbury—John of Oxford, who has so often been mentioned as obnoxious to Becket—to act as his escort. He had also expected to find at Rouen a supply of money from the king, for payment of his debts, and for the expenses of his journey. None was forthcoming, however, and he was obliged to borrow three hundred pounds of the archbishop, Rotrou.

³ It was said to have belonged to the see until it fell into the hands of Henry de Essex. The king's letter, v. 43, makes special mention of Saltwood, and directs that the claim should be settled by the evidence of some "de legalioribus et antiquioribus militibus." For the history of this castle, see Hasted's History of Kent, iii. 405.

Since the date of the violent letter which we lately quoted, a change had taken place in the policy of the Roman court. The majority of the cardinals was, it is said, now favourable to Becket; and the pope, shamed out of his former timid courses, on hearing of the coronation, empowered the archbishop to inflict the censures of the Church on all who had been concerned in it. The reconciliation had already taken place when this commission reached Becket; and at his request it was modified in such a manner as to authorize his punishing the bishops without touching Henry. Letters were prepared, by which the Archbishop of York and other prelates were suspended from their office, and the Bishops of London and Salisbury were again placed under the excommunication which had been pronounced against them. On arriving at Witsand, near Calais, where he intended to embark for England, Becket heard that the obnoxious prelates were preparing to cross into Normandy for the purpose of claiming the king's protection; and he despatched the letters of suspension and excommunication across the channel, that they might be delivered before his own landing in England⁷. He remained at Witsand long enough to hear that the letters had been delivered to the bishops at Dover; that his enemies were exasperated beyond measure in consequence, and had beset the English coast with the intention to seize him, or, perhaps, to murder him, on his landing; but his resolution to return to Canterbury was not to be shaken by this or by other warnings which now reached him. He declared that for six years he had been an exile, and his Church had been without a pastor; that no danger should any longer keep him from his post.

After a favourable passage⁸, he landed at Sandwich, a port

belonging to the see of Canterbury. As the vessel approached the town, the banner of the cross—the ensign of the archbishopric—was displayed, and a multitude flocked forth at the sight to welcome their spiritual father; some rushing into the water, that they might be the first to receive his blessing, while others prostrated themselves by the way-side where he was expected to pass, and the air was filled with the cry, “Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord!”

His enemies had expected him to land at Dover; but soon after his arrival at Sandwich, a party of them appeared in arms, headed by the sheriff of Kent. The presence of John of Oxford, however, prevented any violence. The sheriff and his companions asked whether there were any foreign clerks in the archbishop’s party, and wished to exact from the Archdeacon of Sens, who appears to have been the only person of this description, an oath, that he had no design against the peace of the kingdom. They also required Becket to absolve the bishops; to which he replied that he had the king’s licence for pronouncing the censures on them. After some high words on these subjects, the sheriff and his party retired.

On the following day the archbishop proceeded to Canterbury. As he passed along the road, he was met by the clergy of the neighbouring parishes, each at the head of his flock. The people stripped off their clothes, and spread them on the way, and the cry, “Benedictus qui venit in nomine Domini,” passed from one party to another in succession⁹.

At Canterbury, the primate was received with processions, music, ringing of bells, and other demonstrations of rejoicing. He entered the cathedral, took his place in the choir, and received every one of the monks to the kiss of peace. He preached on the text, “Here we have no continuing city, but we seek one to come¹.”

Next morning, the sheriff of Kent, Ranulph de Broc, and some clerks sent by the excommunicated and suspended bishops, appeared. They remonstrated against the censures, and required

Giles, in remarking the variations on this point, omits to tell us that he himself in one place dates it on the 2nd, and in another on the 3rd.—Life, ii. 297, and table at the end of S. T. C. i.

that they should be recalled. The archbishop answered, that he did not plot against the bishops, but they thirsted for his blood. "Would," he added, "that they might drink it!—and they will²." He said that the censures had been inflicted by the pope, not by him; if, however, the delinquents would bind themselves to abide a judgment for their offences, he would take it upon himself to absolve them. It is said that the Bishops of London and Salisbury were disposed to accept these terms, but were overruled by the Archbishop of York, who declared himself ready to spend eight thousand pounds, in order to put down Becket's insolence³; and the three proceeded to the king's court in Normandy.

After spending a week at Canterbury, Becket set out with the intention of visiting the younger Henry at Woodstock, and presenting him with three horses, on the beauty of which Fitzstephen dilates with great relish. Richard, prior of St. Martin's, at Dover, and afterwards his successor in the primacy, had been sent before him to announce the visit, and had met with a cool reception; but the archbishop persevered in his intention. In passing through Rochester, he was received with great honour by the bishop—that same Walter, brother of Archbishop Theobald, who a quarter of a century before had protected him against the malice of his constant enemy, Roger of York⁴. Crowds of clergy and laity of all ranks flocked to meet him on his arrival in the capital; but in the midst of their rejoicings, a mad woman repeatedly cried out, "Archbishop, beware of the knife!" He lodged in the Bishop of Winchester's palace, close to St. Saviour's church, in Southwark.

Next day, he received an order from the court to return to his diocese. He declared that he would not have regarded it, were it not that he wished to keep the coming festival at his own cathedral; but he prepared to obey⁵. As he was about to set out homewards, he received intelligence that a vessel laden with

² Fitzst. Becket's fondness for such language will, of course, be observed. On one occasion, he speaks of William of Pavia as "thirsting for his blood,"—meaning that the cardinal had a scheme for becoming his successor by procuring his translation to some other see!

⁴ Walter held the see of Rochester from 1147 to 1182. "Ad hunc episcopum P. Blesensis scribit epistolam 56, quem jam octogenarium a venandi studio dehortatur."—Godwin, 577.

French wines for him had been seized by Ranulph de Broc, who had beaten the sailors, and imprisoned some of them in Pevensey Castle. A representation of this was sent to the young king, and orders were given that the wine should be restored. The archbishop on his way to Canterbury performed some miracles⁶; and there is a strange tale of an interview at Wrotham with a priest, who, by a story of a revelation as to the relics of some saints, procured himself a nomination to a benefice.

The interval until Christmas was full of occupation. The archbishop heard causes in his court; he turned out clerks who had intruded into livings; and his devotion and saintly exercises are described as surprising, even to those who had attended on him during his exile⁷.

During this time his enemies in the neighbourhood, and especially the family of de Broc, were unremitting in their endeavours to annoy him. They attacked and beat his people on the highways; they hunted in his chase, killed his deer, and carried away his dogs; they intercepted supplies of food which were on their way from his estates for the use of his household; and Robert de Broc, brother of Ranulph, a priest who had forsaken his calling, instigated his nephew, John, to cut off the tail of one of the archbishop's sumpter horses.

At high mass, on Christmas-day, Becket preached on the text, "In terra pax hominibus bonæ voluntatis⁸." He told the people that there had already been one martyr among the archbishops of Canterbury (St. Alphege), and there might soon be a second: he spoke of himself, with tears, as about shortly to leave the world; and the hearers were deeply affected. After a time, however, he changed his tone; and in a style which Herbert describes as "fierce, indignant, fiery, and bold," he uttered a vehement invective against the courtiers in general, and his other enemies, and pronounced sentence of excommunication on Nigel de Sackville, a court chaplain, for retaining a living into which he had been intruded, and against Ranulph and Robert de Broc, for the oppressions and outrages of which they had been guilty against the Church⁹.

On St. John's day, he sent off Herbert and the cross-bearer Llewellyn on a mission to the French king and the pope.

In the mean time, the Archbishop of York, with the two excommunicated bishops, had repaired to the king, who was in the neighbourhood of Bayeux. He had already been informed of the censures pronounced on them; and on their repeating the story, he exclaimed, that if all concerned in the coronation were to be excommunicated, he himself would be one of them¹. The archbishop's movements were reported with malicious exaggeration. The popular demonstrations with which he was every where received were represented as of a seditious tendency; an escort of five horsemen, by which he was accompanied on his return from London to Canterbury, was multiplied into a formidable force. The king was wrought up to a fury, which the Archbishop of York in vain attempted to moderate. He asked the bishops to advise him. They professed themselves at a loss; but one observed, "So long as Thomas lives, you will never enjoy a quiet day." The king burst out into a passionate exclamation against his courtiers as thankless cowards for suffering him to be so long exposed to the insolence of a low-born clerk.

These hasty and most unhappy words were caught up by four knights of the household—Reginald Fitzurse, Hugh de Morville, William de Tracy, and Richard Briton². They set out for England by different routes, and on Innocents'-day they are said to have all arrived at the same hour—by a miraculous providence, as the biographers tell us—at their destination. "They landed," says Grim, "at Dog's Haven³,—they who from that time deserved to be called dogs and wretches, not knights or soldiers." Ranulph de Broc received them into his castle of Saltwood; and now, if not before, they must have learnt the fresh offence committed by Becket on Christmas-day.

After the departure of the knights, the king held a council of his barons, to advise on the course which should be pursued towards the primate. The general feeling was one of violent anger, and it is reported that some of the barons advised his death⁴. The absence of the knights had attracted notice in the court, and it was feared that they were bent on some violent design. The Earl of Mandeville and two others were despatched into England, with an order to overtake them, if possible, and a warrant to arrest the archbishop. But this measure was too late.

³ Portus Crana, S. T. C. i. 65, probably a name for Hythe, which is close to Saltwood.

The knights, having collected a force in the king's name, arrived at Canterbury on the afternoon of Tuesday, the 29th of December. The archbishop's dinner was over; but some of his retainers were still at table, and offered them refreshment, which they, "thirsting, not for food but for blood," says Grim, declined. They were then introduced into a chamber where the archbishop was conversing with his clergy. At their entrance, no salutation passed; but after a short silence the archbishop saluted them, and Fitzurse returned the greeting in a contemptuous and ironical tone. Another period of silence followed, which was broken by Fitzurse saying, that he and his companions were charged with a message from the king, and asking the archbishop whether he would hear it in private or publicly. At the desire of John of Salisbury, the clergy were dismissed; but they were again called in when the knights had begun to state their business, as the archbishop declared that such matters ought not to be discussed in private. One of the four is said to have afterwards confessed that while left alone with him they had thoughts of murdering him with the shaft of his crosier—the only weapon which was within reach.

They remonstrated with great vehemence against his late proceedings;—the censures on the prelates concerned in the coronation, which they represented as an attack on the young king's sovereignty—the excommunication of the king's ministers and friends—his going about the country (as they asserted) with formidable troops of attendants, and exciting the people to demonstrations dangerous to the peace of the realm; and they demanded whether he would accompany them to the king's presence, in order to give an account for these and his other acts.

The archbishop replied that he had no thought against the young king's royalty, and heartily wished that it were multiplied threefold; that there was no just cause of offence in the peaceful welcome with which his people had received him after six years of absence ; that if he had exceeded in any thing, he was willing to abide a trial ; that the bishops had been suspended and excommunicated, not by him but by the pope, and that he had been only the instrument in denouncing them ; that he had received the king's consent to their punishment ; that he had no jurisdiction over the Archbishop of York, but would absolve the Bishops of London and Salisbury if they would humbly ask pardon, and would give security to stand a trial according to the canons. The knights asked him of whom he held his archbishoprick. He replied that he held it of the king as to the temporalities, and of the pope in spiritual things. They asked whether it were not the king who had bestowed all on him ; he replied that it was by no means so ; that we must render to the king the things that are the king's, and unto God the things that are God's. On receiving this answer, we are told, they tossed about their gauntlets, and made other signs of rage. The archbishop questioned whether they had the king's authority ; he complained of the outrages which had been committed by the brothers de Broc and others of his enemies. They told him that the king commanded him to leave the kingdom, with the foreign clerks of his train and all that belonged to him. He answered that the sea should never again separate him from his flock ; that he would unsparingly inflict the censures of the Church on all who should infringe her rights ; and at last, appealing to the knights themselves, he reminded them that three of them had become his vassals in the time of his chancellorship.

These words goaded them to fury. They rushed out, charging the clerks and others who were present to see that the archbishop should not escape before their return. He declared that he did not intend to quit the spot where he was ; and repeatedly pointed to his neck, in token of his willingness to die. He followed them to the door, and called on Hugh de Morville, the most distinguished in rank, to return and speak with him ; but his words met with no attention.

While the knights had withdrawn to arm themselves, Becket employed the time in endeavouring to assure his terrified clerks, "with a manner as calm," says Grim, who was present, "as if his murderers had come to bid him to a wedding." John of Salisbury expostulated with him on his obstinate refusal of all advice, and on the violence which he had just exhibited. He replied, that his mind was made up as to the course which should be taken ; and John observed, "Would to God that it may be for good !"

The knights, on returning in their armour, found the door of the apartment shut. Robert de Broc (who had become familiar with the intricacies of the palace, while his brother held the custody of it during the exile,) showed them a private approach; and, by passing through an orchard, breaking down a fence, and entering at a window, they gained admission into the cloister.

The archbishop's friends, in the mean time, earnestly urged him to take refuge in the church. Thirsting for what he regarded as martyrdom, he wished to remain where he was, lest a reverence for the holy place should deter his enemies from assaulting him; and he insisted on the promise which he had given that he would not attempt to flee. The clergy reminded him that it was the hour of vespers, and that his duty called him to the church: but even this argument is said by some writers to have had no effect. The monks and clergy laid hands on him, compelled him to rise, and hurried him along the cloister, while he struggled to get loose, reproached them for their fear, and vehemently desired them to unhand him. The cross was borne before him by Henry of Auxerre⁵.

The door between the cloister and the north transept of the church had long been closed, and the key was not at hand. We are told by one author that two cellarers of the monastery wrenched off the lock⁶; while, if we may believe others, it fell off at the first touch, to the admiration of all men, "as if it had only been glued to the door⁷."

As the archbishop entered the cathedral, the knights were seen at the further end of the cloister in pursuit of him. The vesper service had begun, when two boys ran wildly into the choir, "announcing," says William of Canterbury, "rather by their affright than by their words, that the enemies were at hand." The monks left the choir, and gathered around the archbishop on his entrance, expressing great joy at seeing him alive, as they had supposed him already slain. He ordered them to resume their office, saying, that otherwise he would again leave the church. Some of his followers began to fasten the doors behind him; but he charged them to leave them open, declaring that God's house ought not to be made a fortress, but was sufficient for the protection of its own. He was now urged to make his escape, which he might easily have done, as night was coming on, and the church had many outlets and secret corners; but this he firmly refused.

The monks had hurried him up four of the steps which led from the transept to the choir, when the knights entered with drawn swords, crying out, "Where is Thomas Becket, that traitor to the king and kingdom?" Receiving no answer, they again asked, "Where is the archbishop?" He descended from the step on which he was standing, and answered, "Here am I, no traitor to the king, but a priest of God;" and he added, that he was ready to die for the cause of his Redeemer. He then moved towards the north, and placed himself in front of a blank wall, close to the opening of a small chapel, in which stood the altar of St. Benedict. The knights required him to absolve the excommunicated and suspended bishops. "Never," he replied, "will I absolve those who have not made satisfaction for their offences." He again declared himself ready to die, but desired that no injury might be done to those about him. The knights then assaulted him, trying to place him on the shoulders of Tracy, with the intention of removing him from the church. He threw off the first who laid a hand on his dress, and afterwards shook Tracy with such force as to throw him down. The monks and clergy had all fled at the beginning of the struggle, with the exception of the biographer Grim, and Robert of Merton, the archbishop's confessor; with whose names Fitzstephen joins his own. Becket again provoked Fitzurse by reminding him of the fealty which he owed him, and called him a pander¹. The knight waved his sword over the archbishop's head, exclaiming that he owed no fealty inconsistent with his duty to the king.

The archbishop then bowed his head, and commended his cause to God, the blessed Virgin Mary, St. Denys², and the patron saints of Canterbury. Fitzurse rushed on him, wounded him in the head, cutting off a part of his tonsured crown, and almost severed the right arm of Grim³, who had been with all his might holding Becket back, while they endeavoured to drag him away. Grim, being thus disabled, took refuge at the nearest altar.

² Words of this kind appear to have risen very readily to Becket's lips on occasions of violent excitement. We have already noted an instance, in the case of Earl Hamelin, at Northampton. (p. 75.) The provocation addressed to Fitzurse was, indeed, the immediate cause of the murder.

Fitzurse cried out to his companions, "Strike! strike!" A second blow on the head was given by Tracy, and a third, from the same hand, brought the archbishop to his knees. As he fell, with his hands joined in prayer, exclaiming that he was ready to die for Christ and his Church, and commending his soul to God, Briton inflicted on him a fourth stroke, which cut off the remaining part of his tonsure, and lighted on the pavement with such force that the sword was broken². Morville was employed in keeping off interference, and did not strike the archbishop. One Hugh Mauclerc³, a subdeacon, who had accompanied the murderers, in a military dress, put his foot on the neck of the body, and with the point of his sword drew out the brains, and scattered them on the pavement, saying, "This traitor will never rise again⁴."

When their deed was completed, the murderers rushed out of the church, shouting out, "For the king! for the king!" which

² In assigning the blows, we follow Dr. Giles. The original authors are not agreed.

³ "An accursed man, Hugh of Horsea, known by the appellation of the Ill Clerk," says Southey (Book of the Church, 143), apparently following Fuller. But it was evidently a surname. Benedict of Peterborough ascribes the act to the fourth knight (Morville), whom he also describes as the one whose sword was broken. (Quad. iii. 18.) Herbert says, that "ut dicebatur" it was Robert de Broc. (ibid.) M. Thierry (iii. 190) quotes from a note in Hearne's edition of William of Newbury:—

"Willelmus Maltret percussit cum pede sanctum
Defunctum, dicens; Pereat nunc proditor ille,
Qui regem regnumque suum turbavit, et omnes
Angligenas adversus eum consurgere fecit."

The historian, however, appears to overrate the value of this as a confirmation of his Saxon theory. For (1) the incident most likely never occurred in the manner described. The most authentic writers do not mention any other insult offered to the lifeless body, than that which we have related in the text; and this was probably the foundation of the verses, in which the name of the actor, his act, and his words are all altered. (2) We are not aware of any insurrection, Saxon or other, which could have given occasion for such a speech. (3) Even if the versifier's story were true, it would be absurd to lay any especial stress on the sense of the word Angligenas—brought in, as it evidently is, for the sake of the metre.

⁴ The popular story represents the archbishop as having met his death at the altar. Some say, the high altar; others, with a greater appearance of precision, that of St. Benedict. The fact, however, is as we have stated; he died on the spot which is pointed out in Canterbury Cathedral, but there was no altar behind it. One was afterwards erected in that place in honour of him; but the altar of St. Benedict stood in the cathedral of those days, (which was burnt four years after,) not on the site of that later erection, but in a small chapel near the place. (See Willis's Architectural Hist. of Canterbury Cathedral, pp. 41 and 140.) Ancient representations of the murder depict Becket as falling at the very foot of an altar; but this, as Professor Willis observes, "is only introduced to heighten the sacrilege." There are in the old writers general expressions, which countenance the common story; but they are corrected by the more particular statements. Thus Diceto has "coram altari," and afterwards, "a dextris altaris Sti. Benedicti." Fitzstephen's "secus altare" is not quite fairly rendered in Mr. Froude's volume, "before the altar." (p. 557.)

appears to have been the cry raised on a battle-field after a victory⁶. They hastily searched the palace for money and papers, and carried off as much spoil as they could. A multitude of people flocked in to the cathedral, and gathered around the body, kissing the hands and feet, smearing their eyes with the blood, dipping their garments in it, and each endeavouring to secure some relic of the saint.

“His pall and outer pelisse,” says Benedict⁶, “were, with a somewhat inconsiderate piety, bestowed on the poor for the good of his soul; and happy would their receivers have been, had they not forthwith sold them, preferring the little money which they fetched.”

After a time the monks turned out the crowd, shut the doors of the cathedral, and placed the body of the archbishop in front of the high altar; and they spent the night in watching around it with sorrow and anxiety. Then it was, according to Fitzstephen, that the confessor, Robert of Merton, thrust his hand into the bosom, and drew out the shirt of hair, which had been worn in secret; and the monks lifted up their voices in admiration of this proof of a sanctity beyond what they had suspected.

In the morning an armed force appeared in the neighbourhood of the city; and Robert de Broc, in the name of his brother Ranulph, threatened that the body should be exposed to indignities unless it were buried forthwith, and without ceremony. The monks in haste proceeded to the funeral rites. They either washed the corpse, or, (for here again the accounts disagree,) they did not wash it,—thinking no further cleansing than that of its own blood necessary for a body which had so long been purified by fasting and discipline; and in preparing it for interment they discovered fresh evidences of holiness; for not only was the shirt of hair, but the drawers also—a mortification without example among English saints⁷; and these garments were filled with countless vermin, “so that any one,” says Grim⁸, “would think that the martyrdom of the preceding day was less grievous than that which these small enemies continually inflicted.” And thus, on the day after his murder, the body of Archbishop Thomas was buried by the Abbot of Boxley, in the crypt of the cathedral.

It is not for us to relate at length the sequel of the history;

—the miracles wrought by the saint; his canonization; the wretched end of his murderers (in which the fabulous element appears pretty strongly); the penance of King Henry; the renown acquired by St. Thomas; the immense resort of pilgrims to the place of his martyrdom; the magnificence expended on his tomb⁹; the honours paid to him for three centuries and a half, until in the reign of Henry VIII. his shrine was demolished, his ashes scattered to the winds, his name erased from the service-books, and his memory declared infamous, as that of a traitor to the kingdom. Neither shall we detail the course of opinion as to his merits since that period;—the often grievously unjust and exaggerated censures of Protestants; the generally half-hearted and qualified apologies of Romanists,—until in our own days a re-action, begun in a just desire to discriminate between the deserved and the undeserved portions of his evil repute, has been carried out by paradox, affectation, and idle sentimentalism.

We could, indeed, wish, and we have all along intended, to express with some fulness our opinion as to the character and merits of Becket; but we must now be content with having indicated it in the course of our narrative, which has run out to an unexpected length. If the reader should consider us mistaken, we trust that he will not blame us as unfair.

ART. V.—The Supremacy Question, or Justice to the Church of England. An Appeal to British Justice for the removal of the Difficulties which at present impede the proper Exercise of the Royal Supremacy and the necessary work of Church Reform, &c. By the Rev. G. E. BIBER, LL.D. London: Rivingtons.

THAT the connexion of Church and State gives rise to many embarrassing questions, and that it is liable to the incidental evils of encroachments and usurpations on the one part or the other, is undoubtedly true; and yet it is no such easy matter to put an end to this alliance, as some worthy men imagine it to be. Even supposing the total separation of Church and State to be a desirable event for the Church, and to be actually wished by the Church, it does not by any means follow that the other party interested should take the same view; and yet, without the concurrence of the State, a separation would perhaps lead to evils more serious than any which arise from the present arrangements. It is not impossible certainly that the clergy, if supported by the great body of the laity, might be able to refuse all interference, on the part of the State, in the organization of the Church, as a spiritual body. It might be very possible to resume the election of bishops; to hold synods, and enact ecclesiastical laws, without parliamentary or royal sanction or confirmation; to erect new sees; to effect reforms in ecclesiastical discipline, and to resume the practice of putting to penance notorious offenders. If the prelates, clergy, and people, were prepared to do this, without regarding the pains and penalties which they might incur as a consequence, they might undoubtedly succeed in a great measure, if not wholly, in establishing the independence of the Church. But the question is, whether the Church would not lose more than she gained in such a process? The temporalities would, we apprehend, be lost altogether, and with them the means of supporting the clergy in the rural parishes of England. But putting aside the consideration of the evils which might result from such a conflict, it would seem that, humanly speaking, there is little probability of its occurrence; for, clearly as some men may discern the evils which arise in connexion with the present system, the clergy and laity of the Church do not generally concur in their views. On the contrary, the great mass of the community are persuaded, we believe, that the relations of Church and State do not very urgently require re-adjustment; and, under these circumstances, nothing but a very gross practical violation of the rights, or the discipline or doctrine of the Church, would combine a sufficient number of churchmen, in opposition to the plans of Government or of Parliament, to render such an opposition a means of establishing the independence of the Church. Suppose any measure introduced by Government, which would so far obviously affect the interests of religion as to combine the Church generally in opposition to it, and to furnish a basis, on which it would be possible to influence the great mass of clergy and laity, and carry them on to the assertion of a complete independence, there cannot be, we think, any reasonable doubt that the Government would immediately retire from the contest; and thus those who might wish to carry it on would be left without pretext for its continuance, and would be immediately deserted by the great mass of their adherents.

As to getting up any system of opposition to the present relations of Church and State, we should look on the attempt as entirely without prospect of success, unless the public mind should become most widely different from what it now is. The only issue of such an attempt would be the formation of some insignificant sect of Nonjurors, probably without the support of any bishop.

While, however, we look on all attempts to dissolve the present connexion of Church and State in England as merely chimerical, we are far from regretting the occasional expression of very strong feelings and principles on the subject. No one, who looks on the present state of things as a churchman ought to do, can help feeling very deeply the practical evils which religion is suffering. When mere politicians—men without religious or moral principle of any kind, or even men of unsound principles—are invested with the great control which the ministers of the crown are now enabled to exercise over the Church in many ways, more especially in the appointment of its bishops and clergy, it is impossible that great practical evils should not ensue. There is a possibility that the offices of the Church may be filled by persons of unsound doctrine; but there is every probability that they will be disposed of as so many pieces of patronage, available for the promotion of political or merely secular interests, and without any regard whatever to the promotion of the cause of religion. And yet, on the right appointment of the bishops and clergy, every thing depends. An indolent, time-serving, or worldly hierarchy, and a secular priesthood, intent on maintaining its position in society, would extinguish any Church, even if it were in the free exercise of its synodical action, and otherwise at liberty to act for itself: and, on the other hand, a devoted and apostolical priesthood and episcopacy will accomplish the ends of its mission, in spite of every difficulty that may be placed in its way. Administrative abuses in the system of patronage are liable continually to occur, unless public opinion is brought to bear on those who are entrusted with it. And, therefore, we confess, that, while we do not see our way quite as clearly as some people do, to improvements in the theoretical and established economy of the Church, we rejoice when the conduct of officials is made the subject of searching investigation, and held up to public view; nor do we regret to see even the imagined or real defects in the legal theory of the Church fully discussed and pointed out; because, if there be any faults in the actual working of the system, attacks upon the system itself are likely to improve its administration, and to diminish the amount of abuse and corruption.

The relations of Church and State furnish, confessedly, some of the most difficult problems which the politician and the Christian respectively have to solve. And yet arduous as may be the task of reconciling the action of these two powers, and impossible as it is to adjust them so as never under any circumstances to clash, or to create jealousies and dissatisfaction in any quarter, still it is not possible for a Government to remain altogether neutral, and indifferent to the presence of such an element in the social system as Christianity. It must either persecute or protect; be either hostile or favourable. Its own interests compel it either to strengthen its own influence by a friendly alliance with the Church, or to endeavour to make the Church a passive instrument in its own hands. The present state of every nation in Europe furnishes an exemplification of this. The United States of America, doubtless, acts on a different principle, and preserves a neutrality towards all forms of Christianity; but this arises simply from the fact, that there is no one sect whose numbers render it a matter of any importance to the State to enter into connexion with it. All communions are (relatively to the numbers of the population at large) insignificant. Any connexion of the State with one sect would draw down on it the hostility of the great mass of the population. In the United States, therefore, it is as impossible that the State should unite itself to the Church, as in England it is that the State should separate itself from the Church. A communion which includes seven-eighths of the population cannot be regarded with indifference by the Government of the country: that Government cannot afford to relinquish its power and influence over such a Church.

In the learned and thoughtful Essay which we have placed at the head of this article, the whole question of the connexion between Church and State is historically traced with ability and accuracy. Commencing with details of the temporal supremacy over the Church as exercised by Constantine the Great and his successors, it carries on the reader to the events which occurred in the reign of Henry VIII., the increase of the royal supremacy, and the suppression of synodical action by the State. The learned author is disposed to ascribe more of the evils of the existing system to the suppression of the Church's independent action, than we can quite concur in attributing to that cause. At the same time, we should be doing him very great injustice in leaving any impression that his views tend to the separation of Church or State, or to any infringement on the royal supremacy.

"To those who look for the severance of that connexion," he says, "as for a great social improvement to be achieved, it may be far from useless to be reminded, that that connexion is coeval both with the Christianity and with the civilization of this land; that the proposed separation would strike at the root of a principle which through all the changes through which this country has passed, both by foreign invasion and by internal commotions, has ever been a fundamental principle of our social life; no experiment can be conceived more directly opposed to the whole of our past history, no experiment, therefore, if there be any continuity in the life of nations as well as of individuals, more hazardous to the national welfare."—pp. 46, 47.

Dr. Biber thus briefly sums up the inferences to which he has been led by a survey of the existing state of things.

"This, then, is the sum of the difficulty: the Church must go to destruction unless her synodal action is restored, and made available for extensive reforms. The measures required cannot be submitted to the decision of parliament: the revival of the ancient convocation is both impracticable and objectionable: the episcopate is not in a situation to act synodically: the crown is disqualified from exercising its supremacy."—p. 112.

The remedy for this state of things, proposed by the author, is the institution of a privy council for ecclesiastical purposes, immediately subject to the sovereign, but not to the political advisers of the crown. This privy council to consist entirely of communicant members of the Church. The crown, with its aid, is to organize the representative system of the Church, and to prepare measures of reform in combination with the bishops. Dr. Biber, strong in the justice of the case, has no doubt of the consent of the legislature to the general principle on which such measures are to be founded.

"This cannot, of course," he says, "be effected without the concurrence both of the political ministry and of the parliament; but as far as this co-operation is either required or admissible, it extends no further than an act of common justice, which it is scarcely conceivable that a British ministry should hesitate to propose, or a British parliament refuse to sanction. After the principles of religious toleration have been carried out so far, as not only to secure to religionists of every description the most perfect freedom in the organization and government of the bodies to which they respectively belong, but to admit them, however hostile to the Established Church and the ancient constitution in Church and State, to a participation in all the functions, legislative and administrative, of the body politic,—it would be a monstrous injustice to deny to the Church, which still constitutes the majority of the nation, the same freedom of organizing and governing herself according to her own principles . . . And, therefore, it may be confidently anticipated, that if the case be pleaded on the simple ground of its intrinsic justice, it will meet with consideration and with effectual support."—pp. 113, 114.

We regret that we cannot entertain the same expectations as to the cogency of arguments of this kind when addressed to statesmen in the present day. If the Church herself could agree in putting forward such views, we should think there might be more prospect of success. But is it not probable, that if the Church is without synodical action, the State is not to be held responsible altogether for the deficiency? What has prevented, and what still continues to prevent, the deliberations of convocation, except the disinclination of the heads of the Church and many of the clergy? There never has been any combined expression of opinion in the Church, on a large scale, in favour of reviving convocation. In this case it really seems that the Church herself must bear the responsibility in a great degree. She has never asked for convocation. There has been no unanimity on the subject. So again, in regard to the great ecclesiastical question of the day—we mean, an increase in the episcopate—there can be, we think, no reasonable doubt, that if the Church were unanimous in seeking for this increase, it would be accomplished. Why is it that the Welsh Church has experienced such extreme difficulty in preserving its ancient bishoprics? Merely because one or more of the heads of the English Church were not favourable to the preservation of the Welsh bishopric. This apparent want of unanimity in the Church seemed to render the destruction of the Welsh see inevitable. On the other hand, its preservation would have been morally certain, if certain heads of the Church had concurred at once with the great majority of the prelates, and with the whole body of the clergy. The present position of this question of the Welsh sees is, however, such as to afford the strongest possible encouragement to persevere in calling for an increase in the episcopate generally. It is very satisfactory to remember, that the prelates have, for the most part, expressed themselves favourable to the principle. In the last discussion on the subject of the Welsh sees, the Bishop of London remarked, that the decision of the Ecclesiastical Commission in 1835, against any increase in the episcopate, was arrived at under circumstances altogether different from those in which the Church now finds herself. When one of the most influential of the original ecclesiastical commissioners has thus openly relinquished the decision of the commission, it cannot but materially weaken the authority of that decision. We believe that almost all the bishops, whatever may be their political views, have concurred in the opinion that an increase in the number of bishops is necessary. In that opinion they are supported by the sentiments of the whole body of the clergy, and of great numbers of the laity. All that is requisite now to accomplish this great work, is to obtain parliamentary advocates of the measure, and to support them well by petitions from the clergy and laity in all parts of the country. Let Parliament and the Government only be satisfied that it is really the wish of the Church to obtain an increase in the episcopate on a large scale, and it will be done. We are not apprehensive of any failure, even if one or two of the heads of the Church should oppose themselves to the project, as they have done in the case of the sees of Bangor and Ely. However much such a difference of opinion might be regretted, there can be little fear, we think, that a Government, which had become aware of the fact, that the Church is in a state of decay, and is desirous of a particular measure which would not only increase the influence or patronage of the Church, but which might render a ministry very difficult to adopt any such episcopate, there is no reason to suppose that any such measure with any real effect may be done. It should not establish a precedent, which Charles II. proposed to give to the episcopate of a revolutionary character, by dividing the country into five parishes. The people when they are consulted, will be in favour of one bishop; and if it be right to divide sees in the colonies where the clergy and churches are comparatively few in number, and where the bishops have no parliamentary duties to take them away from their dioceses, it must be at least as right to divide English dioceses where the multitudes of clergy and laity are so great that a bishop cannot possibly discharge his duties, and where those duties are year by year becoming more onerous.

The increase of the episcopate is one of the principal objects which the author of the interesting pamphlet before us contemplates, as results of the proposed alteration in the present relations of Church and State. His argument in behalf of that measure is as follows :

“Touching the other measure of Church reform before alluded to, the increase of the episcopate, its necessity may easily be demonstrated. Inevitable as is the mention of King Henry VIII., whenever the reformation is in question, it is not often that he is referred to in the way of a pattern to be imitated ; yet in regard to this matter his example fairly puts to shame all that has been done since. For at a time when the population of England and Wales amounted scarcely to four millions and a half, Henry VIII. considered the number of bishoprics, which then was twenty-two, insufficient ; accordingly he added five to the number, and a further increase, to the number of twenty altogether, was contemplated by him. Upon an average calculation, therefore, it appears that Henry VIII. considered the charge of 200,000 souls much too heavy for one bishop, and would have reduced it to about one-half ; he actually did reduce it to from 160,000 to 170,000.

By the census of 1841 it appears that the population of England and Wales then amounted to 16,035,804 ; that is, nearly four times the population of the time of Queen Elizabeth, when the census alluded to was taken : and yet the episcopate has not since been increased by a single member. When the erection of the new see of Ripon became a matter of urgent necessity, it was accomplished by the sacrifice of the see of Bristol : the second city of the kingdom was deprived of its chief pastor, and that although its population considerably exceeds¹ what was considered by King Henry VIII. as the largest number of souls that might be put under the charge of one bishop. The average number of souls at present committed to the oversight of one bishop is nearly 600,000 ; and as there are several dioceses in which the number is not nearly so large, there are others in which it greatly exceeds that average ; the population of some being above 2,000,000, or ten times the number of souls which Henry VIII. thought so excessive, that he contemplated doubling the episcopate². In order to bring the amount

² There are cases where one town or parish, or two adjoining parishes, are more than sufficient for the charge of one bishop, according to the calculation of

of episcopal responsibility within the limits to which Henry VIII. actually reduced it, the number of bishops ought to be ninety-six instead of twenty-seven; and in order to bring it within the limits which he contemplated, 160 would be required.

“And what is the ground upon which so glaring a neglect of so evident a duty, as that of increasing the episcopate in proportion to the population, is defended?”—pp. 121—123.

There are, we believe, few, if any, avowed opponents of an increase in the episcopate. The real opponents of the measure, if there be such, have hitherto not ventured openly and directly to express their dissent from the general opinion of the Church. Whenever the question has been brought forward, as in the case of the sees of Bangor and St. Asaph, and the proposed see at Manchester, it has been got rid of, by pretending that so important a question ought not to be introduced indirectly, but should be made the matter of a substantive measure; when the substantive measure was introduced by Mr. Frewen (to whom the thanks of the Church are eminently due for his laudable, though somewhat defective effort), it was again got rid of by Sir Robert Peel and his friends on points of detail, and was treated as a subject of ridicule, not of grave discussion. We trust that Mr. Frewen will not be prevented by any taunts from bringing forward his measure again and again, in such a shape that it may receive the support of Churchmen generally. Certain provisions were introduced in his proposed bill, which could not, of course, have met the concurrence of the Church. We allude to the clause for putting an end to the election of bishops by the deans and chapters, and more especially to that which would empower the crown to remove bishops from their sees at pleasure. This latter clause could never for a moment be tolerated: nor has it any thing whatever to do with the question of increasing the episcopate. We are very far from wishing that the bishops should not be held responsible for the discharge of these duties; they ought, on all sound views of their office, to be quite as much subject to ecclesiastical penalties as any others of the clergy, when they are guilty of offences, and irregularities, and gross neglect of duties. But to render the crown, or the ministry of the day, the judge of the episcopate, would only increase the influence of the ministry (already too great) over the prelacy, and would deprive the ordinary ecclesiastical tribunals of the authority which they have always exercised from the very earliest ages of the Church. If Mr. Frewen, or some other friend of the Church, would introduce a measure free from such details, which are at once superfluous and obnoxious to the Church, we think that it would afford an opportunity for the expression of public opinion on this most important subject, which could not fail of leading to salutary results. The great, we may say, the only danger in regard to it is, that public attention should not be directed to the point. Only let the national mind be fairly brought to bear on it, and the question will be carried. The case is one of such evident and urgent necessity, that when it is once considered it must be provided for. The difficulties and objections which some people make to an increase in the episcopate, cannot stand before open discussion. They will be got over, if the country becomes satisfied that there ought to be a greater number of bishops—that the Church is in a state of inefficiency for want of them. But we are perfectly satisfied, from the events that have passed before us in the last ten years, that if the measure is to be carried at all, it will not be by depending on any government, or any political party, or even on the heads of the Church to bring it forward. The heads of the Church evidently shrink from any such responsibility. Governments and political parties are indifferent; and therefore, it depends on the friends of the Church generally to press forward the measure, and bring it under the consideration of the rulers of the Church and the State. Those rulers will, probably, not originate; but they will consider, and support what is in itself right, especially if it be urged on them by the voice of the Church at large. Let governments be convinced by the expression of public feeling, that the measure would be popular, and it would undoubtedly obtain their eventual support.

Henry VIII.; e. g. Almondbury and Huddersfield, pop. 109,578; Walton-on-the-Hill and Liverpool, pop. 155,744; Ashton and Birmingham, pop. 225,641; Bristol and Leeds, pop. 267,782; and Manchester, pop. 461,277.

The pamphlet before us thus deals with the objection to an increase in the episcopate founded on the want of funds.

“ The plea of that want in the wealthiest country of the world, making no small profession of religion, is a national disgrace, the shameless confession of a great national sin. But this, as has been already said, is an evil which it is reasonable to expect will be remedied by the very fact of the Church being put upon an efficient footing. ‘ The labourer is worthy of his hire;’ and a master who refuses to increase the wages of his servants while he has reason to complain that his establishment is badly conducted, may after all not prove illiberal, if he finds that a spirit of order and activity has succeeded to sloth and confusion. It is not credible, that if an episcopate adequate to the wants of the population were provided, the towns and districts which require such a provision, some of which are the richest marts of our national commerce and industry, would not come forward with the means of supporting a chief pastor of the Church. Besides, there are means in existence which might be applied to this purpose. To say nothing of the surplus revcnues put under the management of the ecclesiastical commissioners, there are in the different dioceses more than one hundred livings of the annual value of 1000*l.* and upwards, in public patronage: these might, as they fall vacant, be annexed to the modest bishoprics, which are all that is required for securing to the Church the spiritual benefits of the episcopate; and being so applied, they would, it is not difficult to believe, be bestowed quite as much for the interest of the individual parishes, and of the Church at large, as they are under the present system of disposing of those pieces of preferment."—pp. 123, 124.

There are abundance of funds for an increase in the episcopate to any extent that could be desired. The episcopal lands and possessions furnish a natural and obvious resource. The increasing value of those possessions, and their management by the ecclesiastical commission, afford reasonable grounds for expecting aid from this source, while the tithe property in the possession of the crown, the wealthier benefices in public patronage, and even the existing incomes of some of the sees, all might be made to contribute very effectually, by degrees, to the support of additional bishops. The difficulty founded on want of funds is plainly untenable. Let the subject be fairly and fully investigated by some competent tribunal, and if it shall be proved that means cannot be provided for any more bishops, then the advocates of the measure must either acquiesce, or provide the means. But it would be most unreasonable to decide, without investigation, that no incomes could be obtained. The rational course would seem to be, to examine, in the first place, what the wants of the Church really are, and then to look for the means of supplying them. If these wants are never investigated, and if it be decided, without any discussion, that nothing can be done, it is pretty certain that nothing will be done; but it would be really in the highest degree criminal, to deal thus with the most sacred and solemn interests of the Church. How could such a mode of proceeding operate on plans for Church building, or Church extension? We turn to the reply of this pamphlet to another difficulty, which is sometimes raised by well-meaning persons.

"The other objection turns upon the injury which the dignity of the existing episcopate is likely to suffer from the multiplication of the number of those invested with the episcopal office, and especially the danger to the seats of the bishops in the House of Peers, by an increase of the episcopate, which could not find admission there, and would establish the precedent of English bishops not being lords of parliament. Unreasonable as the objection to an increase of the episcopal bench in the upper House of Parliament is, considering the increase that is constantly taking place in the temporal peerage, it is quite clear that after the alterations which have taken place in the political constitution of the country, an increase of the spiritual peerage is not to be expected. The question, therefore, reduces itself to this, whether, to avoid the possible danger of losing the episcopal representation of the Church in the House of Lords, the Church is justified in incurring the certain loss, to an extent untold and unknown, of the spiritual blessing of the episcopate. And this surely no man will contend for, that looks with a single eye to the spiritual welfare of the Church, and the spiritual work which lies, at present in a great measure unperformed, before her."—pp. 124, 125.

With all the respect which is due to the motives and feelings of individuals who have objected on such grounds as these to an increase in the episcopate, surely it seems that they spring, after all, from a want of reliance on Divine Providence. If the Church does her duty spiritually,—if she looks, in the first place, to the promotion of the spiritual welfare of the souls entrusted to her care, she need not fear temporal dangers or evils; or, if they do come, she will be amply repaid for enduring them. How earnestly do we wish that this simple view of the Church's responsibilities could be taken,—that men of worth and of piety would judge and act for the Church in the same spirit of faith in which, we trust, they act for themselves. But why should these apprehensions about seats in parliament still continue to haunt the minds of sensible men? On what legal right do the parliamentary seats of the bishops depend? On prescription. Would that title be invalidated by creating more bishops without seats? Or, again, would the argument from the fitness of retaining in parliament some representatives of the Church, be in any way affected by creating some bishops without seats? The apprehensions on this subject really seem to us to be amongst the most unfounded that we have ever met with. And for the objection on the score of "dignity;" it is most lamentable to find any one in the present day urging such difficulties as these. It has been prophesied, that the Church of England "will die of dignity;" and if dignity of this kind, which consists merely in temporal state, and in selectness, were really to be the characteristic of the episcopate,—if it held itself aloof in lordly state, depending on its outward grandeur and station for influence and position,—it would gradually die away; because it would be essentially worldly, and would, in fact, cease to be Christian. It would lose the affections of all the more earnest and serious minds; and would prepare the way, at no distant period, for its own overthrow. Alas! how much do men mistake the real nature and influence of the episcopal office, when they imagine, that to bring the chief pastors of the Church into more close and cordial union with their clergy and people than is now possible, would do any thing but increase their influence and authority.

We extract the following just and striking remarks on this subject from the pamphlet before us :—

“ If, instead of the present system, under which each bishop ordains at once a large number of men, who are sent out with licences in their pockets to serve in congregations to which they are often total strangers, the moderate size of the diocese made it possible for the bishop, in the first place, to make himself personally acquainted with the candidates, who might be usefully employed for a season, during their preparation for holy orders, under the bishop’s eye ; and, after that, to ordain the ministers in the church, and in the presence of the congregation, where they are to serve ; if, instead of sending ‘ a mandate to induct,’ in the case of a minister already ordained being appointed to a new charge, the bishop were to come down in person to introduce the minister to his flock ; if this were done in all simplicity, without ostentation or display of any kind, but with prayer and exhortation, in how much more profitable a manner would many a ministerial career be commenced, how much ignorance might be prevented or dispelled, how much cordial co-operation secured, instead of the opposition which in the present state of things a minister has often to encounter before he has had time personally to know, or to become known to, his flock !

“ Again, on the important subject of Confirmation, how different would be the condition of our Church, if a sufficiently numerous episcopate rendered it possible for that holy rite to be ministered with all the solemnity it deserves ! What a painful sight is a confirmation now, in spite of the best efforts, both of the bishop and clergy, to make it what it ought to be ! The body of the church crowded with young people, brought together from all parts of the country round,—the galleries filled, not with devout worshippers, but with spectators, as for a show ; the candidates marshalled up by an apparitor, with paper certificates in their hands, before the bishop, who is an entire stranger to them ; kneeling for a few moments, feeling the touch of his hand pass over them in the process of wholesale confirmation ; and then marshalled back again by the same apparitor to their pews, there to wait till scores upon scores have been so marshalled and confirmed ! Instead of which, if there were a sufficient number of bishops, confirmations might be held annually or triennially in every church ; the young of each congregation might be called upon before their parents and friends, and before the whole congregation assembled, not for a show, but for a solemn act of worship, to render some account to the bishop of the instruction they had received ; they might then be solemnly consecrated to Christ one by one, with all the decent tranquillity prevailing in a devout congregation on an occasion so singularly touching, and be charged by the bishop to give proof hereafter of their conversation, and, by their diligent attention upon God’s word, and upon his holy sacrament, of the reality of the profession they had now so publicly made before all their neighbours, their relations, and friends. And can it be doubted that such a confirmation would have upon the minds of the parties confirmed, and upon the whole congregation, a very different effect from that which can be reasonably expected from the present mode of administering that ordinance?"—pp. 125—127.

The author proceeds next to show the benefits which would arise in regard to the discipline of the Church from a multiplication of bishops—a discipline not founded on mere canons and acts of Parliament, but on personal influence and example, persuasion and friendly counsel. Most entirely do we feel with the writer that a discipline founded merely on authority, and supported by penal enactments, is far less valuable and effective than one which is based on sympathy, and example, and persuasion. This is what is essential to the character of a truly Christian discipline; not merely Christian and apostolical in its outline and framework, but in its work and details. The Church requires pastors who are not merely in place and in name successors of the Apostles, but who are willing to do the work of Apostles; men who will spare no labour in ministering directly to the spiritual wants of the souls entrusted to their care; men who will look on themselves as missionaries, distinguished in nothing from the clergy who minister along with them, except by the greater extent and variety of their labours, and by their humility. The Church requires bishops, who, looking simply and singly to the performance of the spiritual duties of their calling, will disengage themselves as much as possible from all temporal affairs, that they may give themselves wholly to the work of the ministry. The tendency of the present state of things is to restrain the prelacy from their highest duties, and to absorb them in matters of inferior importance. Withdrawn from their dioceses for a considerable part of the year by attendance on parliament; occupied in attendance on committees of the London societies and of public charities, which might be otherwise provided for; engrossed by railroad committees in the House of Lords; by voluminous correspondence on the temporalities of the Church; and on other topics which are burdensome only because of the small numbers of the hierarchy—how, we ask, is it possible that the prelacy can devote much time to the higher and more essential parts of their duties? An overburdened prelacy cannot, for instance, exercise that practical influence and control over the education of the young, which is desirable and even essential to the proper working of Church education.

It would be in vain, at present, to expect that bishops should visit and inspect the schools throughout their dioceses; encouraging the deserving, and stimulating the indolent. It would be in vain to expect from them parochial visitations, personal examination of the state of churches and parsonages, administration of the holy sacrament to the people, preaching the Word of God, examination of the spiritual and moral state of the laity, personal and frequent intercourse with the clergy. All this is out of the question now. The episcopate has become little more than a jurisdiction, a tribunal, an office for the administration of temporalities and funds; its pastoral and ministerial character as an order in the Church has been, in a great measure, overlaid. Under existing circumstances, a bishop is, immediately on his appointment, obliged to become non-resident for the purpose of acting as chaplain to the House of Lords; an office which is confided to the junior bishop. The effect of this regulation is, to remove the prelate from his diocese precisely at the moment when it is most essential for him to devote himself to its care. It may fairly be supposed, that after a bishop has been for several years resident in his diocese, and has arranged its administration, he may without very great inconvenience leave it for a time; but to call him away from his diocese at the moment when he ought to be busied in becoming personally acquainted with the whole of it, and in forming his arrangements for its government, seems to be an arrangement altogether at variance with reason and justice. Surely the House of Lords would, if this matter were rightly represented, make some other arrangement, so as to relieve newly appointed bishops from a duty which must be felt as a most heavy burden by every conscientious and devoted prelate.

In taking our leave of the pamphlet from which we have derived so much materials for thought, we beg to thank the author for his well-timed and most interesting publication. Discussions such as those which he has so ably treated, cannot fail to be eminently serviceable to the Church.

ART. VI.—Les Arts en Portugal. Lettres adressées à la Société Artistique and Scientifique de Berlin, et accompagnées de documents, par le COMTE A. RACZYNSKI. Paris ; Jules Renouard.

It is not often in these days that an author is fortunate enough to treat on a subject wholly, or in great measure, new to the reading public: such, however, is the case with the writer indicated above. We may possibly be displaying our own ignorance; we will, nevertheless, hazard the assertion of our belief, that even in these sight-seeing days, and in spite of the small pursy-looking "Treasures of Universal Knowledge," teeming apparently to repletion with something about every thing (shall we add, and not much about any thing?), nineteen out of twenty, even of better informed persons, are profoundly ignorant of the fact, that the fine arts have made any notable progress in Portugal. Englishmen have, indeed, been too much engaged in that country during the last half-century, not to have made observation of a venerable cathedral here, or a fine painting there. But that Portugal can boast her 'schools' (we allude more particularly to painting) — this, we believe, but few persons have dreamt of. And yet so it is; nor do we know why this need be matter of surprise to us: for it is very observable, whether in the history of individuals or of nations, that successful efforts of mind and enterprise in one direction have generally been attended with success in other directions. Raphael, so great in painting, was not contemptible in architecture; Michael Angelo, so gigantic in sculpture, was professor alike in architecture and painting; and the immortal discoverer of the Binomial Theorem was no less eminent as a mechanic and a chemist, than as a mathematician. So in the case of the nation before us: it is no great wonder, if a people, who can boast the names of a Dom Joam II., of a Bartholomeo Diaz, a De Gama and Cabral, be also able to range beside them those of Garcia de Rezende, Alvaro di Pietro, Vasco, Gonzales, Bento Coelho, and a host of others. To quote from the "mélanges" of the first-named painter, as we find it cited at p. 86.

" Nous avons vu le grand Michel,
Albert et Raphaël:
Et en Portugal il y en a
De si grands et de si naturels,
Qu'ils atteignent presque à leur hauteur."

And yet we have in vain searched the Nouveau Dictionnaire Historique, as well as Pinkerton's and Bryant's Dictionaries of Painters, for the name of any one of the artists of whom Portugal is so proud! At pp. 211 and the following of the work before us, we have notices of no fewer than thirty-seven painters, of whom eight flourished anterior to the reign of Emmanuel the Great, i. e. anterior to A.D. 1495, and the remainder between that and 1557. And these thirty-seven are by no means the whole number of those of whom Portugal can boast; for it could not be supposed (even in the absence of proof to the contrary) that a country, so fertile in those early times, would be barren in days when the rest of Europe was most productive. “J’ose affirmer (is our author’s remark) que jusqu’ici on n’a eu que des notions très vagues sur la nature et sur le degré de l’activité artistique dont le Portugal, à toutes les époques, a été le théâtre.”—Of all epochs, however, that of the reign of Emmanuel was perhaps the most brilliant; he gained for the fine arts on the banks of the Tagus, what the patronage of Leo X. effected on the shores of the Tiber.

The form of the work before us is that of a series of letters addressed, after “a year and a half’s researches,” to the Société Artistique et Scientifique of Berlin, in accordance with their request. The letters of the Count himself are, for the most part, short; indeed, many of them serve for little more than introductions to the papers which accompany them. These papers consist of long extracts from old authors (such as Francis of Holland), public documents, and communications from living Portuguese of acknowledged taste; as the Vicomte de Juromenha, M. François de Sousa Loureiro, directeur de l’Académie, and others: and these, therefore, form the chief value of the book, to those who are neither familiar with the pictures in question, nor upon the spot to compare them with the remarks of the Comte Raczynski. As he himself modestly observes—“Ces préludes seront probablement bien plus longs que le morceau principal, peut-être seront-ils aussi plus intéressans, car je les recueille et je ne les fais point.” The first seventy-three pages are occupied by an extract from, we had almost written, a transcript of a work by Francis of Holland (who, in spite of his name, was born in Portugal; vide p. 444), written in 1571, and dedicated to John III.; who, like a good Catholic, submits in a postscript all that he has written “à être corrigé par la foi catholique et orthodoxe, selon le décret du concile de Trente.” The Comte Raczynski professes to have had the most lively interest excited by this work; an impression which he desires to transfer to his friends at Berlin. And yet, amusingly enough, he seems (in Letter III.) but little satisfied with him: “Il a fait tout un livre rempli de projets et de dessins d’architecture, tandis qu’il convient lui-même qu’il n’a jamais fait de tableaux.” He is a prejudiced complainer:—“Il ne voit pas de peinture en Portugal ; à l'en croire il n'en existe pas ; et cependant il fait lui-même mention de quatre peintres . . . Il est bien étonnant, qu'étant lui-même architecte il n'est pas trouvé l'occasion de parler des monumens dont un si grand nombre avaient déjà été exécutés dans son pays, et s'exécutaient encore sous ses yeux." In his next letter the Count proceeds to refute him by extraets from Garcia de Rezende.

The fifth letter introduces the reader to several pages of extracts from the Memoirs of Friar Luiz de Sousa, a writer of the early part of the 17th century, which bear upon certain pictures and other national works of art ; his writings are highly esteemed in Portugal, as expressing the opinions of a man of talent, a courtier, and a scholar. By the way, this same friar's history involves a little romance, which we will relate for the amusement of our readers. He was (as we have stated) a courtier and of noble birth, and had married the widow of Dom João of Portugal, whom common report had slain at the disastrous battle of Alcaça-Kebir. De Sousa being absent from home one day, a pilgrim presented himself, and thus addressed the dona Magdalena :—

"Je suis Portugais, et j'arrive de Jérusalem. Au moment de partir pour mon pays, je fus visité par un de mes compatriotes, qui me pria et me recommanda fortement de passer en ce lieu, et de vous dire (si vous étiez en vie) qu'une personne qui se souvenait de vous, existait encore en ces lointaines contrées. Tel est le motif qui m'amène ici." "Frappée de ces paroles," continues the narrative, "ainsi qu'on peut le croire sans peine, dona Magdalena s'enquit des traits de celui qui lui envoyait ce message. Tous les renseignemens s'accordaient parfaitement avec le souvenir qu'elle gardait de son premier mari, dom João de Portugal. Une épreuve leva tous les doutes sur le pèlerin. Conduit dans une salle où le portrait de dom João se trouvait parmi beaucoup d'autres, il le reconnut sans peine. Il prit ensuite congé de la dame et partit. Manuel de Sousa, de retour chez lui, non seulement il prit sur le champ la généreuse résolution de se séparer pour toujours de dona Magdalena, d'abandonner les vanités de ce monde et d'entrer dans l'ordre de Saint-Dominique, mais encore il y a décida sa femme. . . . Sousa entra dans le couvent de Bemfica, le 8 Septembre, 1614. Dona M. de son côté entra dans le couvent de Saint-Sacrement. Depuis ce moment les époux ne se virent plus et vécurent saintement."—pp. 83, 84.

But to return. The friar's Memoirs seem, in our author's eyes, to be more curious than useful ; for while they do not mention a single fact capable of throwing light upon the history of the arts in Portugal, they "forment un tableau précieux de l'esprit des couvens, au temps où ils ont été écrits." . . . The friar saw every thing through the medium of his vow. "Luiz de Sousa veut absolument que les images soient nées d'un miracle ou qu'elles en aient fait."

One main object of the Count's researches was the settlement of a disputed question. Of all the painters whom Portugal has produced, one appears to hold the chief place in the estimation of his countrymen. To the brush of Vasco an almost innumerable collection of paintings have been attributed. Now, as on the one hand there have been no fewer than four artists of this name, and as on the other hand it is physically impossible that a tenth part of the pictures which vulgar tradition has assigned to the one Vasco, can be the handywork of a single artist, it was a matter of no small interest, even as it was a task of some difficulty, to distinguish which were the genuine works of the renowned master; and conversely, to settle which of all the Vascos was rightfully entitled to the appellation of "Vasco the Great."

The inquiry, so far as one can judge at this distance, appears to have been conducted with impartiality and skill; of the former position, indeed, we think no doubt can be entertained, when it is known that at the close of it, the author retracts several opinions which he had advanced at an earlier period and with smaller experience. We have not, of course, space to follow him step by step throughout his investigation; which, together with the documents appended, occupies no fewer than 184 pages of his work. We must content ourselves with giving the result, with a brief outline of the process by which it was arrived at, and leave the reader to judge for himself. An antiquarian of the city of Vizeu, Manoel Botelho Ribeiro, who flourished at the junction of the 16th and 17th centuries, and whose testimony is therefore invaluable on such a point, has reported that one of the Vascos lived in the reign of John III. The researches which M. Berardo (who appears to have already written upon this subject of national interest) instituted at the request of the Comte Raczynski, were crowned with unlooked-for success: in the archives of a church at Vizeu he discovered the baptismal register of one Vasco-Fernandez, son of François-Fernandez, a painter, under date of September 18, 1552, which the reader will remember would correspond with the 31st year of the reign of John III. And further, this same Ribeiro declares that a picture of the Crucifixion, in the cathedral of Vizeu, is the work of Vasco the Great. This picture (writes our author) is one of great merit; and though (as he owns) he should have taken it to be of a somewhat earlier date than 1570 (nearly the earliest at which it is possible Vasco-Fernandez could have painted), yet the costume of the figures and architecture of the buildings accord well enough with the style of the epoch alleged. In the sacristy hang four other paintings, evidently by the same hand; and if le Calvaire went far towards establishing the truth of Pereira's assertion, one of these others, le Saint Pierre, was indeed decisive as to the identity of the artist of Vizeu with Vasco the Great. "Je ne peux pas" are the Count's words—

"Je ne peux pas vous dire quelle joie j'ai éprouvée, lorsque en entrant dans la sacristie j'ai aperçu aussitôt, en face de la porte, la superbe tableau de Saint Pierre. L'impression était décisive; en un instant la question fut tranchée pour moi. Je dis pour moi, car je n'impose ma manière de voir à personne."—p. 369.

Vasco's style inclines to that of Albert Durer and the old German school, notwithstanding the current that had lately set in towards Italy. With this remark we must finish our observations upon that part of the work before us which relates to painting: the Count we apprehend to be a man of taste and experience; though we feel bound to say, that in some of his remarks we think he rather confounds the Flemish and the Dutch schools.

An inquiry into the state of the arts generally, must doubtless embrace several branches of art besides painting: accordingly we have letters dedicated to architecture, sculpture, and to what the Portuguese call azulejos, which seem to resemble, as nearly as possible, the old blue and white Dutch tiles, of which we all have a vision, lining the ample sides of the old-fashioned chimney-corners, into which we snuggled in days of yore. In Portugal they find themselves employed in a much more exalted use, than that homely one to which our fathers applied them:

"Il y a peu d'églises, peu de maisons qui n'en renferment. Tantôt ils encadrent les portes des édifices, tantôt ils ornent les vestibules et les escaliers. Dans la plupart des maisons, même dans les plus pauvres, les murs intérieurs en sont garnis jusqu'à la hauteur de trois pieds ou davantage. Il y a des maisons qui en sont recouvertes extérieurement depuis leur base jusqu'au toit."—p. 427.

The designs on them are in relief; and the character of these, together with the form of the azulejo, afford a clue to the date of the manufacture. Those of the 17th and 18th centuries are considered the finest.

Of the sculpture of the Portuguese the Count is unable to speak highly, with the exception of carving in wood. Architecture, however, has been more fortunate; yet in regard to this there is one curious feature (if we understand our author right), that the largest buildings not only do not exhibit any regularity of construction, but remain, many of them, in an unfinished condition. The palace at Mafra is a notable exception. The various buildings partake of the same characters of style as were common in the rest of Europe, during the 13th and 14th centuries. We do not know whether we be correct in the surmise, but we gather from a remark which the author records with approbation, that the buildings of that period present the eye with occasional glimpses of a later (perhaps we should say, of an earlier) style. The remark is touching the architecture of the time of Emmanuel, C'est la résistance du style gothique contre le style de François 1^{er}: in other words, there are indications of a struggle going on between the old pointed style which had issued from Germany, and the resumption of the ancient orders. If, however, he merely mean by this, to intimate that Portugal was slower than France to abandon the one, and revive the other, this is no more than was to be expected; for the cinque-cento tide-wave, which was first raised on the shores of Italy, however early it may have set towards the other countries of Europe, can only be said to have reached these in succession, as they lay further removed from the centre of motion. Thus Spain did not feel it in its full force, till the time of Charles V.'s addition to the palace of the ancient kings of Grenada; and in England we were strangers to it till the 17th century.

In his 14th letter the author enters into a discussion upon the masons' marks to be found on the stones of the old buildings¹, with the great variety of which he seems much struck; and this leads to some remarks (chiefly from the pen of M. Falkenstein, of Dresden) upon the freemasonry of the middle ages, and the authorship of the beautiful convent of Batalha, which owes its origin (as is well known) to a vow made to the Blessed Virgin by John I., before the glorious battle of Aljubarrota, in 1385. It has been asserted by Murphy (who travelled in Portugal at the close of last century), that Batalha was commenced under the superintendence, if not upon the plans, of one Stephenson, an Englishman, invited to the Portuguese court by Philippa, daughter of John of Gaunt and queen of John I. of Portugal. That this monarch did invite from distant countries the most celebrated architects and most skilful masons, we know on the authority of Luiz de Sousa; or, as we should rather have expressed it, he invoked the assistance of some of the great corporations of freemasons; corporations which, we know, had planted their lodges in, and enrolled among their members natives of, every European kingdom from England to Greece. Murphy professes, indeed, to have derived his information from the employés in the royal archives at Lisbon; but however proud we might be to have the name of an Englishman associated with a building so magnificent and unique, we must hesitate before adopting this opinion as matter of fact; for the present learned cardinal-patriarch of Lisbon has proved the want of exactness with which Murphy wrote, (see the extracts from his Mémoires Historiques, quoted in Appendix III. to Letter X.,) and we find no such name as that of Stephenson in the list of directors of the works at Batalha, given in L. de Sousa's history. On the other hand, it is a curious fact that this superb convent bears so strong an analogy to our Minster, at York, that Comte Raczyński records his persuasion of their common origin.

"Que le plan de l'église de Batalha soit l'œuvre d'un Portugais ou d'un Anglais, tant il y a que les deux édifices sont nés d'inspirations artistiques analogues, homogènes et contemporaines, le style des deux églises me paraît identique."—p. 336.

But we must bring this notice to a close. The author promises us a dictionary, and a résumé of the whole, containing such corrections or additions as subsequent information may seem to render necessary, accompanied by plates. We cannot, however, conclude without tendering our thanks to the Comte Raczyński (who is, we understand, the Prussian ambassador at the Court of Lisbon) for his very interesting work. We shall always be glad to welcome more from his pen; especially while he acts up to his motto:—"Chercher la vérité, rejeter les absurdités, et douter tout qu'on ne sait pas."

1.—Sermons, preached at the Parish Church of St. Andrew, Clifton. By GEORGE RUNDLE PRYNNE, B.A. London: Burns.

WE very much like these Sermons. They are published "by request," as the title-page informs us; "with a view of forwarding the erection of a new church in a poor mining district, in the county of Cornwall," as the advertisement speaks. They are just what sermons should be—short, practical, sound, and earnest. The author loses no time in long-winded introductions, but goes straight to his point at once; and, though the writing is by no means offensively rugged, he is evidently more careful for the matter than the manner. We will present the reader with an example or two, selected almost at random. His third sermon is entitled "The Magi, examples of Christian wisdom;" and having pointed out their courage, perseverance, and promptitude, in following the indications of God's will, he says—

"Self, if not fought against, will soon convince us that the heavenward path is not so narrow or strait as it really is, and so will relax our energies, stifle our holy desires, chill our souls, and make us lax and languishing in an affair which demands all our ardour and zeal. We are not generally so easily checked when in pursuit of some worldly good. We can easily then persuade ourselves to make sacrifices in order to its attainment. But when it is for the things invisible the struggle is to be made, we are apt to be easily frightened, and turned aside, and persuaded that the task is too hard for us. Such a state of mind cannot surely be that in which we would wish to die; and if not to die, then not to live, 'for in the midst of life we are in death.' . . . We must not take it for granted that all is right because all goes on easily and smoothly with us. The converse is nearer the truth, and we should rather fear that that way cannot be a safe one for us which requires no sacrifices or efforts, on our part, to enable us to persevere in it: 'for strait is the gate, and narrow the way, which leadeth unto eternal life, and few there be that find it.'"—pp. 39, 40.

Of all the subjects treated of in Holy Scripture few are more awful than that of spiritual blindness; and none, we fear, to the signs of which in themselves men in general are more blind. We extract with pleasure the following passage, bearing upon this subject, from Sermon XI. :—

"Now, of all the sins of which a man is capable, none seems to run more directly contrary to salvation than that of wilful blindness. It excludes that divine light, without which we cannot advance a step in the way of salvation. If we reject this light, we have nothing to walk by. We throw a moral obstacle in the way of receiving any further graces. These God reserves only for those who profit by what He gives, and seek more. . . . If, by wilful sin, we have changed the light that was in us into darkness, our case is, indeed, a desperate one; for not only do we lose the light, but also all desire of it. . . . What I mean may be illustrated by the case of the blind man of Jericho. . . . Instead of saying, 'Lord, that I may receive my sight,' we secretly pray that we may see nothing that will serve to trouble or disturb us. 'What wilt thou that I should do unto thee?' might our Lord reply to the prayer of such. 'Wilt thou that I should save thee without grace? that cannot be. Desirest thou grace without light? I have none such to bestow. Or, dost thou expect that I should overpower your will, and sanctify you, in spite of yourself? That is contrary to the laws of my providence, and justice forbids my altering them.'"

Should these sermons reach a second edition, we think their author would not do amiss to revise them in point of language, as here and there they bear marks of rather careless writing. Such as, for instance, "too puffed up," for "too much puffed up." Again, in the last quoted passage, "dost thou expect that I should overpower your will, and sanctify you?" He spells the past participle of to "dim," dimned; we should be glad to know, by what analogy? However, these are small matters; and it is only a pity that a blemish of any sort, however trifling, should be found in such excellent sermons.

11.—Discourses, preached in the Parish Church of St. Mary's, Truro. By the Rev. W. WOODIS HARVEY, M.A. London: Rivingtons; Burns.

THE author of these Discourses tells us, in his preface, that—

“They were written with the endeavour to make them specially suitable to the congregation before whom they were delivered; and, to this end, he always considered, in regard to every subject discoursed upon, what topics might be properly omitted,—what might be most usefully and appropriately chosen,—and in what manner most fitted to his audience his thoughts should be expressed.”—pp. vi. vii.

We never were at Truro, and have no means, therefore, of knowing the temper, wants, and capabilities of the people there; but, judging from this specimen of the dietary administered to them by their spiritual physician, as that “most fitted to his audience,” we should say that they must be suffering under considerable weakness of the digestive organs. They evidently cannot bear much “strong meat;” and we must do Mr. Harvey the justice to say, that he appears to have laboured most conscientiously, and with considerable success, in determining “what topics might be properly omitted,”—and consequently (we suppose), under these circumstances, “what might be most usefully chosen.” “Line upon line; here a LITTLE, and there a LITTLE,” is manifestly his rule. For instance, the fourth Discourse is what he calls “Short practical Reflections on the circumstances and results of the destruction of the Ancient World by the Flood.” The “reflections” are five in number, averaging three pages each; and consist of an amplification—i. e. a dilution—of the sacred narrative, with a sprinkling of moral sentiments, rendered somewhat imposing by a plentiful supply of “notes of admiration.” Let us not be mistaken. We find no false doctrine or heresy; so far as doctrine goes, the author appears to be sound. We are not offended by any lax principles; we do not complain of any thing inherently bad, but rather of (as it appears to us) the want of very much that is good. What little there is, having any pretensions to the hortatory and the practical, is so lamentably tame and uninterestingly put, that we much question whether it would catch the attention of any of the good folk at Truro. These Discourses are just of that common-place, safe description, that we make no doubt the preacher is a great favourite: his hearers, we should think, cannot complain that they ever have a single prejudice offended.

The volume is published (we see) in order to assist “towards the improvement of the church in which they were preached, and of a small chapel belonging to his parish." This being the case, some of our readers may possibly think we have been unnecessarily severe upon them. We do not think so. We are weary of the heaps of common-place sermons under which our library-table is for ever groaning afresh. We cannot prevent men preaching trash, but if they will publish their trash, our duty to the public and themselves constrains us to tell them that good intentions, even when backed by the regular announcement of the sermons having been "written without the least intention of their publication," can lay no just claim to exemption from "the severity of criticism." Had we thought this volume formed an exception to the general run of sermons in these days, we should have said less about them: but is this the case? For our own parts, we avow our conviction, that the standard of preaching in our churches is below par. It is seldom that one hears a sermon which is not made up of the merest common-places; and when one does stumble upon something better on the subject, it is nearly certain to be spoiled by the mode in which it is expressed. Preaching is not every thing, nor the chief part in the services of God's temple; but it is nevertheless a great instrument in His hands for good: and we speak advisedly when we say, that there is a culpable neglect in regard of this part of ministerial duty, and ministerial education. No wonder that so many of our people wander from the dulness of the Church to the excitement of the conventicle!

III.—An Exposition of the Fifty-third Chapter of Isaiah, being a course of six Lectures delivered in Glasnevin church. By the Rev. MOSES MARGOLIOUTH, Incumbent of Glasnevin. London: Hatchard. Dublin: W. Curry.

WE have not been able to bestow upon this volume the attention which it demands, and which is absolutely necessary, if we would critically investigate its merits. It is prefaced by an extract from a letter to the author, written by the late Bishop Lindsay, of Kildare, suggesting that "it would be unjust to withhold from the public at large" this series of sermons: and we have no doubt that the judgment of the deceased prelate will carry with it its due weight.

The author is of opinion,

"That this chapter is to be at some future time a penitential hymn, which the Jewish people shall use with contrition of heart, soon after their national conversion to the truth as it is in Jesus; mourning, as it were, over their long obstinate unbelief."—p. 12.

An opinion which has been hinted at by Bishop Horsley, in his “Biblical Criticism.” Not that by this view he would “deprive this chapter of its prophetic import.” Indeed, his whole aim is to demonstrate its vital importance in this last point of view ; for which purpose he takes it verse by verse, and comments upon each expression critically, historically, polemically, and practically. This translation differs from the authorized version, from Bishop Lowth’s, and, indeed, from all which have been heretofore proposed, in some respects : and while we cannot, with the hasty glance which alone we have been as yet able to give to it, perceive any thing manifestly wrong in his renderings, we are bound to acknowledge that some of them render intelligible what has hitherto been obscure. Thus, by way of example, his fifth lecture opens with the eighth verse, which, in the authorized version, runs as follows :—

“He was taken from prison, and from judgment :
And who shall declare his generation ?
For He was cut off out of the land of the living :
For the transgression of my people was He stricken.”

A passage which (as our author observes) “has embarrassed all commentators, philologists, and critics.” The reader may compare with it Mr. Margoliouth’s rendering :—

“Without restraint, and without sentence, was He taken away,
And who can speak of his habitation ?
But He was cut off from the land of the living,
Because of the transgression of my people—
Because of the stroke that should have been to them.”

Perhaps the reader will thank us for transcribing here, in juxtaposition with these two versions, that from the pen of Bishop Lowth :—

“By an oppressive judgment He was taken off ;
And his manner of life who would declare ?
For He was cut off from the land of the living :
For the transgression of my people He was smitten to death.”

Of these it may be remarked, that the first is a literal translation of the LXX., and the last of the Vulgate. Bishop Lowth has a long note upon the second part of the first hemistich, in which he endeavours to explain it by a reference to the custom (as the Mishna alleges) of making proclamation, before any one accused of a capital crime, for any to come forward and declare what he knew of the prisoner’s innocence ; which was not done in the case of Jesus. But we confess, that this has always appeared to us a frigid explanation. With respect to the authorized version, Mr. M. justly remarks that the passage, “ Even as it is quoted in the New Testament, (Acts viii. 33,) does by no means lead us to suppose that Jesus was in prison. He was, indeed, bound and placed under a guard, and was thus secured, but never incarcerated, as one would be inclined to conclude from the text, according to its present translation. Moreover, no judicial sentence ever passed upon Jesus. It was because of the excited and wicked populace demanding the death of Jesus, that Pilate impiously consented to it, and delivered Him to be crucified ; but not under any form of law, which the following expression implies :—

‘ He was taken from prison and from judgment.’

But read the text according to the literal translation, and we find at once a comment on it in the Gospel history of our Lord's suffering. We shall now, therefore, simply proceed to expound our text, line by line, according to the original.

‘ Without restraint, and without sentence, was He taken away.’

Instead of preventing or restraining the Jews from carrying into effect their murderous purposes against our Lord, Pilate ‘ delivered him to their will.’ Instead of pronouncing a formal sentence upon Him, the governor, occupying the judgment-seat, declares Him ‘ a just man,’ and yet ‘ delivers him to be crucified.’ Not only did the Gentile judge not interfere in using his authority to prevent such a wicked and unprecedented perpetration, but also his brethren after the flesh forsook Him and denied Him ; no one uttered a syllable in his defence as soon as He was taken to the judgment-seat, which the Psalmist was instructed to describe—long ere the awful scene happened—‘ My lovers and my friends stand aloof from my sore,’ &c. (Ps. xxxviii. 11—13.) He was thus, as it were, an outlaw ; He had no home, whose inmates, who would certainly be his relations, might interfere at all hazards, on such a desperate occasion, to prevent his being put to death without a proper investigation. But,

‘ As for his dwelling-place, who can speak of it?’

The comment on this line you will find in Matt. viii. 20 :—‘ The foxes have holes,’ &c. The same word which is rendered in our text ‘ generation,’ occurs in Isaiah xxxviii. 12, where it is rendered ‘ age,’ as also in Ps. xlix. 19, where it is rendered ‘ generation.’ But almost all philologists have properly substituted, in the two last places, ‘ habitation.’ I am at a loss to account why they did not substitute the same proper word in our text, especially as all acknowledge that it ‘ is by no means easy to fix the right meaning’ of the text as it reads at present, namely :

‘ And who shall declare his generation?’

Whilst the literal translation, which I have suggested, removes all difficulties at once, and throws a great deal of light on the chapter before us."—pp. 97—99.

We had marked for transcription his observations upon the next hemistich; but we have already exceeded our limits. Mr. Margoliouth, we gather from some passages here and there, is himself a son of Abraham after the flesh; and, whatever his critical powers may be, is evidently very familiar with the Hebrew tongue, and with the various arguments and objections of Jewish writers against Christianity. There is an Appendix, which appears to contain much rabbinical information. However, the investigation of the true value of the work, would imply a far longer and more minute examination than we have yet bestowed upon it. Still, we feel that we are quite safe in commending these lectures to the attentive perusal of all who are interested in this most wonderful prophecy.

- IV.—1. The Retrospect: being an inquiry into the fulfilment of prophecy during the last twenty years; and also how far the Church is thereby furnished with any good grounds for expecting the instant coming of the Lord. With a Chart. Vol. I. London: Painter.
2. The Translation: or, The Changing of the Living Saints, and their deliverance from the judgments which are coming on the earth. By the Rev. JOHN HOOPER, Rector of Albury. London: Painter.

It is, we believe, somewhere about twenty years ago, that Mr. Faber, not content with the interpretation of fulfilled prophecy, began to exercise his ingenuity in that which is yet to have its accomplishment. He turned prophet himself, and had the temerity to predict, that in a certain year, then at hand and now gone by, a given event would come to pass. The year came, but not the event; so, in a succeeding work, Mr. Faber was compelled to confess that he had made some unaccountable blunder in casting his horoscope; whether or not he uttered a fresh vaticination we really forget. The author of the Retrospect appears to be emulous of distinction in the same line; but, having Mr. Faber's discomfiture before his eyes, deems it more prudent to prophesy without a name. He informs us at the outset, that he addresses "those, and those only, who profess to believe, or are disposed to admit" certain "leading points which it is considered" a controversy, which, in the author's opinion, has lately been waged among us, "left as established truths." Whether the reader is desirous of being included in the number of these, and may, therefore, consider himself as one of the “addressed,” he will probably have no great difficulty in determining, when we inform him, that—

1. Notwithstanding the unanswered arguments of Mr. Maitland, and the still later volumes of Dr. Todd, the author of the Retrospect starts with the assumption that Daniel’s “days” are years:—

2. That the expiration of the 1260 days of Daniel, or the pouring out of the First Vial, synchronized (according to him) with the French Revolution, A.D. 1792; a period which “it is well known to all students of prophecy,” is to be reckoned “from the Edicts of Justinian, A.D. 532,” (the issuing of which edicts the author looks upon as the commencement of “the Papal ‘little horn’” !):—

3. That the commencement of the Seventh Vial is to take place in A.D. 1847, “which synchronizes in all Scripture with the coming of the Lord, the resurrection of the dead saints, and the change of the living:”—and,

4. That the pouring out of this Vial will continue for twenty years; during which, “from A.D. 1847 to A.D. 1867, the various acts in the drama of the coming of the Lord shall take place.” So that

“In little more than twenty years from the present time, the final acts of judgment upon Christendom and the world will have passed, and all the kingdoms of this world have been brought into subjection to the Lord Jesus Christ.”

This truly is bold; this is handsomely done! As old Dr. Eachard quaintly says, “I hate all small ambiguous surmises, all quivering and mincing conjectures: give me the lusty and bold thinker, who, when he undertakes to prophesy, does it punctually.”

The other work named at the beginning of this Notice is a pamphlet of fifty-six pages in length, in which Mr. Hooper attempts to soar likewise on the wings of unfulfilled prophecy. They prove, however, to him, no less than the former author, to be the wings of Icarus.

v.—Anthologia Davidica; or, a Metrical Translation of the whole Book of Psalms, selected from our published Versions, with alterations: being an Essay towards the compilation of a National Psalm Book. By PRESBYTER CICESTRENSIS. London: Rivingtons—

Is a work, the object and the manner of whose execution is sufficiently indicated by the title-page. We confess we were not prepared for the fact announced in the Preface, namely, that "from the era of the Reformation down to the present time, there have appeared no fewer than sixty-five versions of the whole Psalter; and of translations of selected parts of it, from a single Psalm to a very considerable portion of the entire Book, it is hardly possible to ascertain the number." It would be useless to give any extracts from a work like the present, as they could not do more than manifest the excellence of particular Psalms; whereas the difficulty is not to find versions of individual Psalms of even very great merit, but to find a translation of the whole, of sufficient goodness throughout, by one and the same hand. We like what we have seen of the book.

VI.—The Use of the Body in relation to the Mind. By GEORGE MOORE, M.D. London: Longman.

DR. GEORGE MOORE is already favourably known to the public by his previous works, and the present volume will fully maintain him in his high position. His aim is one of great importance, namely, to prove that the right use of the body is essential to the well-being of the mind. Dr. Moore shows that true wisdom consists in identifying in one purpose our bodily and mental powers, and that to elevate one at the expense of the other, is but to depreciate the end for which we are created, and to lessen our powers of happiness both here and hereafter. In the words of the Preface, "the right use of the body involves the whole doctrine of human economy in regard both to sociality and self, not only in relation to time, but also to eternity." Some minds are so formed, that the simple words of Scripture produce conviction and faith; but there are others who yearn for evidence corroborative of revealed truth in the things of the material world—in the present social condition of man—or in the discoveries of science; the former class cannot fail to derive pleasure from the present work, and the latter will also find much assistance to aid them to go on their way rejoicing. Nothing, in our opinion, tends more to elevate the soul to high aims and endeavours than a due appreciation of the wonders of our corporeal existence—an existence, which will be prolonged beyond the grave. Apart from the utility of the work before us, we are led on from page to page by interesting illustrations of the subject. As a good example of intellectual exaltation, in keeping with moral character, under the influence of a medicinal agent, the author quotes the following case from Dr. O'Shaughnessy's account of the effects of Indian hemp :—

"In a lad of excellent habits, ten drops of the tincture induced the most amusing effects. A shout of laughter ushered in the symptoms, and a transition state of cataleptic rigidity occurred for two or three minutes. He enacted the part of a rajah giving orders to his courtiers ; he could recognize none of his fellow-students or acquaintances, all to his mind seemed as altered as his own condition ; he spoke of many years having passed since his student days, described his teachers and friends with a piquancy which a dramatist would envy ; detailed the adventures of an imaginary series of years, his travels, his attainment of wealth and power : he entered on discussions of religious, scientific, and political topics, with astonishing eloquence, and disclosed an extent of knowledge, reading, and a ready apposite wit which those who knew him best were altogether unprepared for. For three hours and upwards he maintained the character he at first assumed, and with a degree of ease and dignity perfectly becoming his high assumption."

And on the influence of exercise and air on the nervous system we find the following :—

"When the Honourable C. A. Murray had been living for some time entirely on buffalo beef among the Pawnee Indians, his body got into the true savage training, and in the excitement and liberty of the wilds he enjoyed the perfection of his animal nature. The kind of intoxication arising from over-stimulating blood is well expressed by him : 'I have never known,' he says, 'such excitement in any exercise as I have experienced from a solitary walk among the mountains ; thoughts crowd upon thoughts, which I can neither control nor breathe in words ; I almost feel that I am a poet, but' (as Byron beautifully expresses it) 'I "compress the god within me ;" 'all the beloved dwellers in the secret cells of my memory walk by my side ; I people the heights of the hills and the shades of the forest not only with those I have known, but with all my friends from fairy land ; and in these illusions of my waking dream I forget time, fatigue, and distance, and sometimes lose my way.'"

The horrors of the Black-Hole of Calcutta, so well known to every one, lead the author to observe,— "That there is great probability that the temper of an assembly is often vastly influenced by the state of the air which it breathes, and to talk of a moral atmosphere is not altogether a figure of speech. A physiologist may reasonably inquire whether the foul air of St. Stephen's have contributed to intensify the ill-feeling of parties, and by causing bad humours, have led to the enactment of bad laws."

We recommend the consideration of this passage to the reformers of Birmingham and Manchester. We think, too, that it would be no uninteresting matter for experiment on the part of the clergy, to ascertain in our churches the exact conditions of the atmosphere which induce certain tempers in the congregation. It would then be easy to construct a barometer, the indicator of which should point to the various states of DOSING—ATTENTIVE—EXCITED, and so on; and it would doubtless often be a valuable guide if this could be suspended in the study during the previous composition of the sermon.

But to pass to something of a more serious and tangible nature, to persons desirous of carrying out the instructions of the Church respecting fasting, the chapter on this subject will be found very useful. The following is a curious fact:—

“ True religion enjoins abstinence only in connexion with meditation and prayer. That fasting even when under the supposed authority of religion kindles the murderous passions in those who are not habituated to self-control, and the devotedness of holy motives, is largely exemplified by the information of those who have travelled in superstitious countries. Thus the author of Eothen, who though anonymous is evidently well informed, states that the fasts of the Greek Church produce an ill effect upon the character of the people, for they are carried on to such an extent as to bring on febrile irritation with depression of spirits and a fierce desire for the perpetration of dark crimes. Hence the number of murders is greater during Lent than at any other time of the year.”

The chapter on the stages of life is written in very beautiful language; and we cannot refrain from extracting the following passage, no less eloquent than true:—

“ Christians, in this land of parishes, where is the proof that you deem children heirs of immortality and the special charge of the Church? Remember that the soul of man and woman when left to the working of untaught nature must ripen into desolation and misery. And it is in early youth that your most strenuous efforts are most demanded, and most effectual. If the attention be not then duly employed on suitable objects, which the wise alone can present in their true shape and colour, the mind will fix itself upon the body, and either a morbid consciousness will spring up in the place of happier activity, or else sensual propensities will speedily entrance the captive and ignorant soul, and fling a spell over all its powers, not to be broken but by a miracle of divine interference to restore it from the ruin which the godly discipline of Christian institutes was intended to prevent.”—p. 123.

The following also is well expressed:—

“ The wisest and best productions of the human intellect have proceeded from those who have lived through the bustling morning and meridian periods of their day, and calmly sat down to think and instruct others in the meditative evening of life. Even when the brilliancy of reason's sunset yields to the advancing gloom, there is an indescribable beauty haunting the old man still, if in youth and vigour his soul was conversant with truth ; and even when the chill of night is upon him, his eye seems to rest upon the glories for awhile departed, or he looks off into the stars, and reads in them his destiny with a gladness as quiet and as holy as their light. When our little day is folded up in shadows, the darkness must be deep indeed which does not reveal eternity by the rays of light which reach us from afar ;—but the soul that can rise above the clouds of the earth can always behold the infinity of heaven, and perhaps every rightly taught man, before God takes him, ascends to a Pisgah of his own, from whence to look farewell to the wilderness he has passed in the leadings of Jehovah's right hand,—and to catch a glimpse of the promised land lying in the everlasting orient before him." —p. 131.

In conclusion, we cannot do otherwise than recommend this volume for perusal. We do not perhaps agree with the author in every sentiment he has uttered, and we think his mode of expression is not always the clearest. The scientific man, however, will be interested, and the young receive instruction and amusement. We see, with pleasure, that the author promises the public another volume of a more precisely practical character, concerning the discipline of the will.

VII.—Pasilogia: an Essay towards the formation of a system of Universal Language, both written and vocal ; with suggestions for its dissemination throughout the world: including a succinct review of the principal systems of similar character heretofore published. By the Rev. EDWARD GROVES. Dublin: McGlashan.

WE remember to have seen it reported not long since, that Mons. Guizot (we think it was M. Guizot) had propounded to the wise men of France his opinion, that an universal language would, one day, prevail throughout the world ; and, added he with truly national grandiloquence, that language will be French. Mr. Groves' work, while he assents to the French minister's major, is at variance with his minor. That an universal language will prevail, he believes—and so do we ; and that the system which he offers to the world stands a fair chance of reaching that proud distinction, he thinks probable—so do not we. Mr. Groves' book is well and clearly arranged, and a large portion of it is occupied in a review of the systems already proposed. "The only portion of the Essay," says he in his Advertisement, "for which he claims the merit of originality, is that which treats of the system devised by himself;" and we feel bound to record our deliberate conviction, that this is the least useful portion of his book.

He tells us, that his proposed universal language

"Consists of a series of vocal sounds connected with a corresponding series of written characters; each sound forming a monosyllable, and each character being capable of being delineated by a single act of the pen."—p. 88.

And again, at p. 96 :—

"Every word should express one idea; or, if more than one, each should be totally distinct from the other."

We object to this, in limine. In the first place, Mr. Groves is attempting an impossibility; he is attempting to construct proprio Marte, what, there is good reason to believe, was the gift of the Creator in the nucleus (Gen. ii. 19); and which—in each of the 2000 modifications of the original, which Balbi declares to exist in the world—has arrived at its present state by the force of circumstances, and by means of a slow progression. In the next place, we hold it to be "a true conclusion of experience," (as Lord Bacon has it,) that mankind will not hazard an outlay, whether of money or of labour, except there be a reasonable prospect of corresponding advantage in return. Men must have a quid pro quo. Now we ask whether the advantage to be derived from the adoption of a language, whose fundamental principle is that which we have just quoted, is likely to be such as to repay men for the trouble of learning it, and for all the confusion which must for a while result from this unsettling of the constituted customs and relationships of the world? Let any one analyze the process which takes place, under ordinary circumstances, in the mind of the listener or the reader, as the case may be; and he will not fail to perceive, that neither in the one case nor in the other does the mind stop to examine each word, still less each letter; nor generally does it wait for the entire sentence to be placed before it, ere it catches and comprehends the meaning; though the degree in which this takes place depends, doubtless, upon the position of words according to the genius of each particular language. We feel persuaded, that no system has a chance of succeeding as an universal language, which is based upon the principles enunciated by Mr. Groves. We are of opinion that any language, to ensure adoption, must, among other requisites, include this one: viz. that the characters employed shall express ideas and not words. Who, that is much in the habit of writing, but has often wished for some means of expressing by two or three dashes of the pen that which, as things are, require such an expenditure of time and labour to commit to paper? Our present mode of communication must be felt to be cumbersome to the last degree; unworthy of these days of invention: we require some means of bringing the operations of the mind and of the hand into closer correspondence.

There are several other points to which we are unable to assent, in the plan before us; as for instance, the author lays it down at starting, that

Now we do not profess to understand the exact meaning which he intends to convey by so vague a term as hieroglyphical: does he lay any stress upon the first portion of the compound? or does he use it carelessly for symbolical? But taking for granted that he means the latter, we ask why the characters must not be symbolical? We believe that symbolical or pictorial characters would have a far better chance of commending themselves to the adoption of mankind; for the simple reason that they would be much more easily remembered, than a set of arbitrary lines and curves, which were destitute alike of all connexion with that which they were meant to express, and consequently of all reason why the adoption of one should be preferred to that of any others. Thus, we cannot well imagine a more herculean or hopeless task, than the committing to memory such a language as that which Mr. Groves proposes: a language, “the basis of whose written character is a straight line with a circular projection at one end;” and the variations of meaning in which characters depend upon the roundness or pointedness of the head of each—or upon the exact position of the character in regard to a supposed “centre, so as to correspond with” one of “the eight principal points of the mariner’s compass.”—(p. 90.) Imagine a man stopping to take a mental observation, to ascertain his bearings, before he can decipher the meaning of every half-dozen words! How much superior to this would be characters like the Chinese, which are nothing more in their present form, than “running-hand” representations of the ancient symbols (such as e. g. an ear under a gate, to signify a listener); or even the Egyptian hieroglyphics (as an asp for royalty, or a jackall for a priest).

But we must have done. We feel obliged to Mr. Groves for his attempt, although we are compelled in candour to find fault with it. He does not appear to us to have yet sufficiently studied his subject. His views are too unpractical and confined: and, as one proof of this, he appears evidently to take the English language, certainly not constructed on the most philosophical principles, for his model, and to translate English into Pasiloge.

VIII.—King Charles the First ; a Dramatic Poem in five acts. By ARCHER GURNEY. London : Pickering.

WE are of opinion that the author's purpose has been more felicitous than his execution. His purpose was to draw a parallel between the times of the first Charles and our own, and by the past to warn us of the future. It is “ His ardent desire, on the one hand, to awaken the friends of the Church and State, and the protectors of the rights of labour, from their melancholy and long-continued lethargy ; and, on the other, to yield some aid (however slight) to the enthronement in the hearts and souls of Englishmen of their murdered patriot king.”—p. xv.

He is a most uncompromising Tory, and utters in no veiled and obscure language his opinion of the late premier. He pronounces King Charles I. “ to have been one of the noblest of all mere human creatures that have breathed the air upon this earthly planet.” Falkland and Sidney Godolphin he surnames the “ Young England ” of those days, “ well-meaning, but semi-liberalizing, consorting with smooth Hampdens.” And of Hanipden himself he avers, that he fully believes “ that remarkable man to have been more supreme for vile and infamous cunning, veiled beneath the mask of excessive honesty and single-mindedness, than any one of his factious contemporaries.” However much we may sympathize with the author in many of his feelings respecting men and measures, both of the present and the past, we cannot go along with him in all. We are assuredly no admirers of either Cromwell's politics or character, especially after reading the memoirs of his contemporary Ludlow ; but we think, nevertheless, that the day is past for representing him quite as Mr. Gurney has painted him. In the second scene of the fifth act he visits the king in prison, and their interview ends thus :

“ I have no more to say.
Thou call'st me tyrant ; I will think thee true.
May the great judgment-day prove thee in error,
And me not over-lenient ! Fare thee well !

H h 2

" CROMWELL [after a long pause hesitatingly].

" Farewell ! . . . Charles . . . I . . . [collecting himself]

Soul, arm thee ! Even now

Hell tempts thee only.—King ! despair and perish ! "

Having referred to Ludlow's memoirs above, the reader perhaps will not be displeased if we extract a passage therefrom, which he will find it rather difficult to reconcile with the angelic character which it is becoming the fashion to endeavour to attach to the regicide Cromwell. It is to be found at p. 85 of the 4to edition of the memoirs, published in 1771 ; and we are not aware that it has been quoted by any of the modern writers upon the times to which it relates.

" He [Sir John Barkley] gave him [the king] also a relation of what had formerly passed between himself and Cromwell, whom he met near Causum, when the head-quarters were at Reading, where Cromwell told him, that he had lately seen the tenderest sight that ever his eyes beheld, which was the interview between the king and his children ; that he wept plentifully at the remembrance thereof, that never man was so abused as he in his sinister opinion of the king, who, he thought, was the most upright and conscientious of his kingdom : that they of the independent party had infinite obligations to him, for not consenting to the propositions sent to him at Newcastle, which would have totally ruined them, and which his majesty's interest seemed to invite him to ; concluding with this wish, ' that God would be pleased to look upon him according to the sincerity of his heart towards the king.' "

There are in Mr. Gurney's poem some good lines here and there ; but, on the whole, we are disappointed with the work. As a poem, it is very bald : the measure of the lines being often almost the only indication that we are reading verse and not prose. We would recommend the author to revise his work before a second edition appears. There is good in it in point of matter, but it should be wrought out differently ; and the verse must be polished : all the lines do not scan at present ; and in one page which we opened at random, out of twenty-one lines, no fewer than eleven were eked out by a monosyllabic ending.

1x.—Catechetical Exercises on the Apostles' Creed (chiefly from the exposition of Bishop Pearson). By the Rev. EDWARD BICKERSTETH, M.A., Curate of Holy Cross and St. Giles, Shrewsbury. London : Rivingtons.

THIS is one of those proofs of the growing zeal of our clergy, which are now springing up on every side ; and one of those attempts to teach the Church's children in the Church's way, which we are always glad to hail. Mr. Bickersteth is already known to the public by a similar work upon the Thirty-nine Articles, and we think this, his second publication, an improvement upon the former. Drawing, as he does, from Bishop Pearson, he could hardly go wrong. Still there was the difficulty to be overcome, of adapting that admirable work to the capacities of catechumens ; and in this we think he has not been always quite as successful as could have been wished. Some few of his questions, or rather the answers to them (which he prints at the foot of the page), strike us as not being altogether as plain as they might be. But to do this well, is the most difficult part of a teacher's office : "a child may preach (as it has been said), but it must be a man to catechize." Mr. B. will, no doubt, improve. In a work of this kind there was likewise room for ingenuity in leading the minds of his auditory by easy steps from the subject ostensibly before them to its correlatives : and in this we feel pleasure in awarding to the author our praise. We may instance the way in which, under the head "Suffered," he fortifies them against that difficulty, which will always propose itself to the mind, and which led in early days to the error of the Patripassians. So, again, under the next head, he introduces the typical sacrifice of Isaac, and tells them that most curious (we might say, providential) rabbinical comment on Gen. xxii. 6 :— "Abraham laid the wood upon Isaac his son, as a man carries his cross on his shoulders." We can conscientiously recommend this little brochure.

x.—Tales of Female Heroism. London: Burns—

CONTAINS nineteen tales of various lengths, interest, and merits. The greater part of them are very good, and well adapted to the end in view ; viz. "to show the fortitude and devotion of which women are capable, rather in a feminine and domestic aspect than a brilliant one ; and to exhibit acts of courage and presence of mind in characters distinguished by their conscientious fulfilment of the quiet, unobtrusive duties of every-day life."

The Miller's Maid may be instanced as a beautiful tale, and admirably told. The stories of Mrs. Jane Lane and Flora MacDonald are, perhaps, rather too stale to have been included in the volume ; and we question whether that of Madame la Rochejaquelein, beautiful as it is, be not an example of cheerfulness under suffering, involuntarily inflicted on her, rather than of "female heroism." The compiler has been "tempted to subjoin Mrs. Hemans's touching poem" on the subject of Gertrude Von der Wart;" a temptation which, we think (like most other temptations), he would have done better in resisting. It could (as he himself observes) "add nothing to the pathetic beauty of the wife's original record," were it ever so good; and we confess to thinking the poetry to be of an inferior stamp. We can, however, on the whole, well recommend the volume, which will be found an acceptable little Christmas present.

XI.—The Portrait of Charity. By the Rev. FRANCIS TRENCH, Perpetual Curate of St. John's, Reading, &c. London: Hatchards—

Is, evidently, a series of eight small sermons upon the 13th chapter of the first Epistle to the Corinthians; setting forth the "absolute and indispensable necessity" of "charity or holy love;" its "characteristic features," and "its excellency and perpetual continuance." They seem to be plainly and affectionately done.

XII.—Three Charges, delivered to the Clergy of the Diocese of Barbados, in the years 1843, 1845, and 1846. By THOMAS PARRY, D.D., Bishop of Barbados. London: Rivingtons.

MANLY, straightforward, and earnest, these charges fully maintain the character which the Bishop of Barbados has earned for himself. The second of the three commences with a sketch of the history of the Church in Trinidad, and presents, alas! a tale which meets with too many parallels in our history.

"By some strange inadvertency, not altogether unaccountable or unprecedented, but by no means honourable to our national piety, the duty was omitted [viz., of supplying an adequate number of clergy of the Church of England, to offer the means of grace and salvation, in conformity with the national faith, to the population rapidly increasing by accessions from without, since the capitulation of the island and the slave-emancipation]. The additional multitudes were either destitute of all religious care, or were left to the ministrations of the Church of the Capitulants; even English proprietors urging their people to become members of the Romish communion! . . . For the thousands and tens of thousands who had been brought into this island from Protestant or heathen lands, in this wide country, with all its difficulties of moving from place to place, there was still in 1835 only one English pastor. [The capitulation of the island, it will be remembered, had taken place in 1797!]"—p. 50.

When will our governors learn that ecclesiastical responsibility keeps pace with territorial acquisition?

We cannot resist the pleasure of extracting the following passage from his lordship's primary charge, delivered in Barbados.

"Viewing the question in this light, we cannot but observe a spirit of restless inquiry and unusual activity, extending itself to almost every department of human life. Wherever we turn, we see society in motion, full of excitement, full of energy, full even of conflict. In religion especially, is this excitement observable; and in religion, when the mind is awakened to any new degree of interest on the subject, there is almost always danger of seeking in mere change that which is to be found only in improvement. Men become dissatisfied, and, it may be, very justly dissatisfied, either with their own state, or with that of society around them; they look for a remedy, and find it, they imagine, not in acting more consistently upon the principles which they already avow, not in entering more thoroughly into the truths which they have been taught from their childhood, not in observing more faithfully the holy sacraments, and other ordinances of the Church, with which they are familiar, but in adopting new notions, fresh views, and strange practices. They blame their Church for not supplying their wants, when they should rather blame themselves for not acting up to the directions of the Church, or not entering into the full meaning of her creeds, or not understanding the true spirit of her liturgy. Excited minds look for novelty: to them, what is old, is unpalatable; nay, more, is carnal and worldly. Hence the attraction, to some, of the novelties of dissent; to others, of the novelties of Romanism. There is wanting in both the sound, well-disciplined taste, which would say, 'the old is better;' the old religion of the Church, better than the thousand forms of modern sectarianism; the old religion of the primitive times, which our Church retains, better than the additions which, at the Reformation, she rejected, as having been made to it in some subsequent generation.

"If this be, as I conceive it is, the great peculiarity of the present age, as manifested in our Church; if, with much for which to be thankful, there is much also to be viewed with apprehension; if, with an increased, and perhaps increasing zeal in the discharge of religious duties, whether private or public, there is also an increasing danger of unsettling the foundations of religion itself, and breaking up still more than ever the unity of the Church; if, even of those who have been most instrumental in recalling men's minds to the value of Church principles, and the paramount duty of a devotedness to God's service, some (I must not say all—that would be most unjust—but some few, for comparatively they are but a few) have excited suspicion and alarm by their apparent indulgence, if not approach, to some of the worst errors of popery; whilst others have caused disgust by their affectation of forms of an unmeaning or objectionable character; nay more, if some of those who have been most strenuous in decrying the use of private judgment, have been among the most forward in pressing upon the Church their own peculiar notions; or if others of a different temper, under the influence of a religious panic, are disposed to rush headlong into all the extravagances of Puritanism, and, lest forms should be rested in, or antiquity idolized, or authority overstrained, or the Church too much exalted, at once to reject forms, to vilify antiquity, to despise authority, to abandon the Church, and, through fear of popery, to reject even whatever of Christianity the Church of Rome retains;—surely it becomes us to pause and consider how, with God's grace, we shall best meet the trials of such a state of things, and derive or promote the good which, doubtless, the present excitement was intended to subserve, without incurring the dangers to which it is evidently exposed.”—pp. 21—23.

Would that these things might impress themselves on the minds of those unstable souls, with the account of whose restlessness or defection one is every day being pained! And would that our spiritual rulers were not so often implicated indirectly in the sin of these defections, by their almost systematic mode of damping instead of guiding, and rebuking instead of fostering, the enthusiasm of the younger members of the clerical profession!

XIII.—The Gate of Prophecy; being the Revelation of Jesus Christ by St. John, theologically and historically expounded, &c. By WILLIAM BROWN GALLOWAY, M.A., Curate of Brompton, Middlesex. 2 vols. London: Rivingtons.

AFTER all that has been written in exposition of the prophecies of the Revelation, one opens with a feeling somewhat akin to despair a work which professes to be a demonstration of the inspiration of this book of holy Scripture from the fulfilment of its predictions. Mr. Galloway very rightly condemns those who object to the study of prophecy, and who look on the various expositions which have been given, with indifference or contempt. Nothing can be more inexcusable than such a mode of treating so sacred a subject; at the same time, it is not possible in the nature of things to avoid feeling distrust of new interpretations, however ingenious and plausible, when it is remembered that numbers of different interpretations have been in turn put forth with equal plausibility. We feel assured that any one who should for the first time peruse the works of Newton, or Faber, or Irving, not to speak of more recent writers on prophecy, would be under the impression that the interpretation had been fully and satisfactorily made out. And yet, clear and demonstrative as may be the exposition in each case, other writers will dispel the illusion, and establish different interpretations, which are themselves destined to destruction at no distant period. Mr. Galloway is sanguine that his researches have been rewarded by the only true interpretation. In his general views of prophecy, however, he concurs with the followers of Joseph Mede. His work, like most of our modern works on prophecy, is a compendium of modern history, the materials of which are derived from Gibbon and Alison. Ireland is, we perceive, to be the subject of some very dreadful catastrophe, according to this writer. His task appears to be executed with more than ordinary vigour and animation.

XIV.—Sermons for Saints' Days: preached at different times, in the Chapel of the Holy Trinity, Roehampton. By the Rev. G. E. BIBER, LL.D. London: Rivingtons.

THE discourses included in this volume were preached only on the saints' days properly so called, excluding all festivals connected with the personal history of our Lord, which the author reserves for a distinct publication. We have been very favourably impressed by all that we have seen of this series of discourses. They generally enter at some length on the historical and biographical branch of the subject, and will thus be found to exhibit a series of valuable Scripture narratives, enriched by practical and devotional remarks, and terminating with moral and spiritual inferences. The diction is copious and eloquent; and the general tone of principle is that of fixed opposition to the tenets of Romanism, combined with the assertion of the distinctive doctrines of the Church of England. We can recommend this volume as furnishing materials for thought to the preacher, and as a useful manual for those who are desirous of observing the saints' days, though unable to attend Divine service in the Church.

XV.—Florentine History, from the earliest authentic records to the accession of Ferdinand the Third, Grand Duke of Tuscany. By HENRY EDWARD NAPIER, Captain in the Royal Navy, F.R.S. In 6 vols.; Vol. I. London: Moxon.

THIS volume, which is to be followed by five others from the same pen, demands a far more extended notice than it is possible at this moment to give. From what we have seen of the volume, its popularity would seem to be a matter of certainty. The grace of the style, and the interesting and graphic details with which it abounds, combined with the research of which every page furnishes evidence, promise to obtain for this work a very extensive circulation. The volume before us carries on the history of Florence from the earliest period to about the middle of the fourteenth century. We select the following passage as illustrative of the style.

"Amongst those sparks of liberty that burst from the smouldering ruins of Rome, few ascended more brightly or more rapidly than the Florentine Republic: it shone in arts and arms, in literature and science: and had internal union been maintained, scarcely a state in Italy could have long withstood the genius of its citizens. A fierce and insolent nobility was in the beginning as justly dragged from power as it was afterwards unjustly punished; yet the people fought not as in Rome, for equal rights, but absolute uncompromising power: they legislated in wrath, preserved a false level by unequal pressure, and the tyrannical and once formidable aristocracy became a degraded caste: its power terminated; its insolence stood rebuked; but much of its military spirit was also crushed, and finally ceased to animate the general mass of citizens. No longer trusting to native valour, licentious bands of strangers were hired to defend the commonwealth, and less as servants than as masters: the moral effect was pernicious, and assisted by other causes produced an indifference to military virtue, which without entirely destroying, depreciated personal spirit, and often exposed the country to humiliating exactions.

"Nevertheless we have an example in Florence of the power which even a petty state may attain by the innate force of free institutions acting on a manly energy of character: the first bounds of her authority were but a walk beyond the walls, and the republican territory, even in its most palmy days, did not exceed a third of the present dukedom; yet from that small centre the power of Florence gradually spread over all the neighbouring states, until the sea and the Apennines became its limits."—pp. 2, 3.

Independently of the interest which attaches to this work as a narrative of events, its sketches of the manners, customs, and general state of Italy in the middle ages, appear to be admirably drawn.

xvi.—The Abbess of Shaftesbury; or the days of John of Gaunt.
London: Rivingtons.

THE object of this pleasing tale is to portray the monastic life of the fourteenth century, in its connexion with the feudal system, and the history of the times. The reign of Richard the Second is the period selected by the author; and the vacillations of this weak monarch, the bold and high-minded resolution of John of Gaunt, the perilous state of the Lollards, and the persecuting spirit of Archbishop Courtenay, successively pass before us in connexion with the good and evil fortunes of a young knight and a lady who are betrothed. The Abbess of Shaftesbury, from whom the tale derives its name, is privately attached to the doctrines of Wickliffe, as is, also, the heroine of the story, who is compelled, by an avaricious and cruel uncle, to take the white veil in the Abbey of Shaftesbury, and only escapes from taking the vow of perpetual celibacy by the intervention of the abbess. The efforts of the ecclesiastical power to compel the return of the novice to conventual life, and the various adventures which this unhappy maiden and her friend the abbess are, in consequence, subject to, lend interest to the narrative, which, on the whole, is instructive and well written. We cannot say that it exhibits any great power, but it is pleasing in its tone, and its leading principles will render it a useful publication for the young, and somewhat of an antidote to Romanizing tendencies.

XVII.—Stories of the Crusades. 1. De Hellingley. 2. The Crusade of St. Louis. London: Burns.

THESE tales describe in a very lively and graphic manner the character and some of the leading events of the later Crusades. The author writes like one who is thoroughly imbued with the spirit of his subject; more in the tone of a minstrel than of a historian. In his pages the Crusader becomes the model of all Christian and knightly virtues; the Roman faith and practices, the recognized form of true religion. The first of these stories narrates the history of Sir Rainold de Hellingley and the fair Edith de Warrenn; their expedition to the Holy Land in the reign of Guy de Lusignan, king of Jerusalem; the malice of a disappointed suitor who nearly succeeds in procuring the dissolution of their marriage by alleging a pre-contract with himself, and the various adventures of the war with Saladin. The second tale also has an English knight for its hero, who accompanies King Louis to Egypt, and passes, with distinction, through the campaign which was terminated by the capture of the Christian forces. We must certainly say, that the author tells his story in a very interesting way. There are some poetical pieces in the volume, from which we select the following:—

The Battle of Campo d'Ourique.

“ A lay, a lay, good pilgrims !
How Portugal was won ;
The land that lies in cloudless skies
Beneath the western sun.

The Moors are up, the Moors are out,
 The Moors are clad in steel,
 From Ceuta and Morocco
 To Lisbon and Seville !

- "The downs are white with tents above,
 The vales are white below ;
 As on a hill, when night is still,
 Fast falls December's snow :
 And when they come by thousands
 To reckon up their men,
 The crescent had three hundred,
 The Cross had only ten !
- 'All on the night afore the fight,
 On deeds of glory bent,
 The holy Count Affonso
 Was resting in his tent ;
 By the flashing bright of the camp-fire light,
 The lord of Sousa stole
 To the canvass door with a hermit hoar
 To cheer his chieftain's soul.
- "Now hail ! now hail, Affonso !
 A wretched sinner I,
 For sixty years of grief and tears
 That dwell this mountain nigh :
 Yet thus to thee this night by me,
 Speaketh the Lord on high :
 Look that thou pass at morrow mass,
 And gaze upon the sky.
- "Day breaks upon the Serra,
 And the early rays are flung
 From peak to peak of dark Ourique,
 And morrow mass was sung.
 He clad him in his armour,
 He girded on his sword,
 And out went Count Affonso,
 At the bidding of the Lord."

A vision appears in the skies, and announces to Affonso his approaching victory, and his elevation to the throne of Portugal.

- "The Christian lines of battle
 The holy count enfold,
 As standing in their centre
 That vision strange he told.
 From rear to van the war-shout ran,
 From wing to wing it came,
 'God save our king Affonso,
 The first that bears the name !'

“ To battle, lords, to battle !
 The foe comes on amain ;
 The five kings of the infidels
 Are drawing towards the plain :
 They range their twelve battalions,
 Each in his several post,
 And every such battalion
 Triples the Christian host.”

Space forbids us to carry further the tale of the onslaught ; which is, however, told with energy and feeling.

XVIII.—The Sacraments. Two explanatory Treatises. By the Rev. T. TUNSTALL SMITH, M.A. London : Hatchards.

AT the opening of this work we meet with some positions which seem to be of rather questionable orthodoxy. “ Before the Incarnation of the Son of God, the Holy Ghost proceeded from simple Deity, and his rays had then comparatively little power to renew our fallen nature.” (p. 4.) “ The cistern, so to speak, out of whose fulness the Holy Spirit is now derived, is the human nature of Christ.” (p. 5.) These passages seem, as far as we can understand them, to imply that the Holy Spirit proceeds from the human nature of the Son, which seems to us to be not only a questionable, but an untrue doctrine. Where in Scripture, or in the creeds of the Church, can any such doctrine be found? If the Holy Ghost proceeds from the human nature of Christ, as well as from the divine, his nature is also human, and there is, therefore, more than one person in the Trinity who shares our nature. This seems to us to be highly erroneous doctrine ; in fact, as far as these expressions go, they involve the Monophysite and Macedonian heresies. The pretended procession of the Holy Ghost from the human, as well as from the divine nature of Christ, seems to involve the unity of nature in Christ instead of the unity of person ; and the doctrine involved in such language, as the human nature of Christ being “ the cistern ” from which the Spirit is derived, leads to the inference that the Holy Ghost is a creature, as the Macedonians and Arians contended. Such indiscreet statements on the prime articles of the Christian faith form rather an unfortunate introduction to a discussion on the Sacraments. On the subject of Baptism, the author maintains that a new nature is not infused by regeneration, but that the former nature is changed : that justification is given at baptism ; but, in the case of an infant, “ implies no more than an admission into a federal relation to God ; an adoption into his family : ” that sin after baptism is pardonable ; that the Holy Ghost is given at baptism. On the whole, the language employed by this writer on the subject of baptism seems scarcely consistent with the baptismal formularies of the Church of England. On the Eucharist, he advocates the views of such writers as Zuinglius, in opposition to the more Catholic doctrines of Calvin and Bucer. This sacrament ceases altogether to be a mystery, according to such views, and becomes a mere figure or representation. These sentiments appear to be, at once, inconsistent with the simplicity of Scriptural truth, and with the formularies of the Church. We cannot recommend this work as a safe guide to the doctrine of the Sacraments.

xix.—Theodore, his Brother and Sisters; or, a Summer at Seymour Hall. Edited by the Rev. WILLIAM NEVINS. London: Sharpe.

A PLEASING little tale, in which the education of a Christian family, with continual reference to the baptismal covenant, is described. The volume comprises several interesting tales, and is well adapted for children of eleven or twelve years of age. The Editor states that his task has been little more than that of standing sponsor for the sentiments and opinions expressed, so far as they are of a doctrinal character.

xx.—The Festivals and Fasts familiarly explained. A new Edition. London: Burns.

AN excellent little work, which may be circulated amongst children without any fear. Its language is familiar, and its whole tone unexceptionable in every respect. We view with pleasure the appearance of such works as this.

xxi.—1. Fourteen Meditations for a Fortnight of JOHN GERHARD.
2. Doctrines and Discipline of the English Church, by PETER HEYLIN. 3. Manual of Devotions for Confirmation and First Communion.

THESE little volumes form portions of a series of very cheap publications, of a religious and devotional character, published by Messrs. Burns, and J. H. Parker, of Oxford. The first and third of the works above-mentioned will be found generally useful, though we could have wished that in the latter the scholastic style and title of the "Seven deadly sins" had been omitted. Language of this kind, unnecessarily introduced, is calculated to convey mistaken impressions, which ought not to exist. The little work extracted from Peter Heylin is apparently above the comprehension of those for whom this series of publications is intended.

XXII.—Bohn's Standard Library.

THE most recent volumes of this interesting and extremely low-priced series, which we have seen, are the second and concluding volume of Beckman's History of Inventions, Discoveries, and Origins, with additions and corrections by Dr. Francis and Dr. Griffiths; and the second volume of translations from Schiller's works, including the remainder of the History of the Revolt in the Netherlands, and the Historical Dramas of Wallenstein's Camp, the Piccolomini, the Death of Wallenstein, and Wilhelm Tell. These translations have been executed by persons eminently qualified for this task, and the volume before us is amongst the most interesting which has yet appeared of this library. We sincerely hope that the publisher, to whom the public is indebted for his endeavours to provide instruction and entertainment for them at a cheap rate, will obtain some return for the large capital which must have been invested in the publications before us.

XXIII.—On the Reverence due to Holy Places. By the Author of "Remarks on English Churches." Third Edition. London: Murray. Oxford: Parker.

To few writers is the cause of Church restoration so much indebted as to the excellent Author of the little work before us, of which we are happy to observe the third edition with considerable additions and improvements. Mr. Markland has wisely directed his efforts to the removal of one of the great sources of irreligion in the present day, the want of reverence for holy places. It is his especial wish to address the younger members of the Church, that, to use his own words, "a reverence for holy places may, by God's blessing, even by this simple effort, be lastingly impressed, not only on a portion of the present generation, but on their posterity also, who may be led to 'know the same, and the children which are yet unborn;' so in the beautiful language of St. Augustin, 'in nido ecclesiæ tuti plumescerent, et alas charitatis alimento sanæ fidei nutrent.'"

The following passage expresses feelings and principles with which every genuine churchman will entirely sympathize.

"When the love of some members of our Church has waxed cold, and, faithless to their vows, they have forsaken the altars where they both received themselves and administered to others the bread of life, we may point out, as a beacon light, to all, and especially to those who are wandering in doubt and error, the bright example of a prelate of our Church, who, in days of rebuke and peril, was distinguished for his piety, his constancy, his meekness, his charity; 'one who boldly rebuked vice, and patiently suffered for the truth's sake;' one who, 'for his love to the Chief Shepherd, taught his flock how they might make the knowledge and love of God both their daily study and practice;'

and who in his last but undying declaration made a profession, which 'like a father's commandment and a mother's instruction,' should be 'bound about the heart' of every dutiful and loyal son of the Church of England.

" 'As for my religion, I die in the Holy Catholic and Apostolic Faith, professed by the whole Church before the disunion of east and west; more particularly I die in the communion of the Church of England, as it stands distinguished from all Papal and Puritan innovations, and as it adheres to the doctrines of the cross.' "

We should be happy to see this excellent work circulated widely in every parish in England: its effects could not but be most salutary in all cases. The hints and suggestions which it supplies in reference to the arrangements and care of churches and cemeteries, and on matters concerning public worship, are most judicious and unexceptionable, and conveyed in a style so pleasing that they must have influence with all who may peruse them.

xxiv.—A Hand-book round Jerusalem, or Companion to the Model.

By the Rev. JOHN BLACKBURN, M.A. London: Rivingtons.

THE value of this book is chiefly as an explanation of the Model of Jerusalem, executed by and under the superintendence of the Author. It embraces a compendious view of the information brought to light by the researches of modern writers and antiquarians.

xxv.—A Manual of Gothic Architecture. By F. A. PALEY, M.A.

London: Van Voorst.

THIS Manual may be recommended to all students of Gothic Architecture as very beautifully got up, and as evincing a thorough knowledge of the subject.

xxvi.—Songs of the Wilderness. By GEORGE J. MOUNTAIN, D.D., Lord Bishop of Montreal. London: Rivingtons.

THE object of this little volume is one which must enlist the sympathies of every Churchman. It is designed to engage the interest of the public on behalf of the urgent spiritual wants of Canada, and to contribute towards the erection of a bishopric in that province. There is throughout these poems a tone of piety and of feeling, which inspires respect for their author, and will, we doubt not, render them acceptable to a considerable class of readers.

xxvii.—Miscellaneous.

THE Charge of the Lord Bishop of London, (Fellowes, Rivingtons,) recently delivered, is probably so well known to our readers, that it can be scarcely necessary for us to do more than refer briefly to its publication. Considering the mode in which the bishop's suggestions on rubrical observances in his lordship's last Charge were received, it became a subject of some anxiety and interest, how the whole question would be treated on the present occasion. On the whole, as far as we can gather, the Charge has given general satisfaction. It is a very candid exposition of views and intentions which every one must respect, and of difficulties which, if fairly considered, will remove all those imputations of vacillation of principle, or want of sincerity, which it has been our lot to hear. We sincerely trust that there may be no more difference on questions of minute detail, but that, under the difficulties of the case, all parties may act in harmony for the promotion of the welfare of the Church, and the reasonable carrying out of her directions on all great points, without attempting compulsion in reference to minor points of temporary difference.

The "Form of Prayer used in laying the first stone of Trinity College Chapel, Glenalmond," &c., by the Rev. Charles Wordsworth, M.A., Warden (Rivingtons), will have afforded the highest gratification to the numerous class who are interested in the welfare of the Scottish Church, and of the seminary for the education of clergy, which has recently been erected at Glenalmond. The Address of the Warden on the occasion, is worthy of his reputation as a scholar, a divine, and a sincere and earnest Christian.

"A Discourse on the Necessity of providing an enlightened Education for the Christian Ministry," &c., by Edmund Kell, M.A. (London: Simpkin and Marshall), is a sermon by a Unitarian preacher, who inveighs against the system of instruction at Oxford and Cambridge, and urges the necessity of throwing open the Universities to Dissenters of all kinds. "Education for the People," by the Rev. Scott F. Surtees (London: Bell), proposes a plan of national education, in opposition to that of Dr. Hook. Mr. Surtees is of opinion that the religious education of Churchmen and Dissenters can very easily be conducted together, and is desirous of union between them in various ways.

"The Village Wake," a sermon by the Rev. John Boustead, M.A. (Painter), has the object of promoting a religious observance of the annual feast-day kept in commemoration of the consecration of churches, which has degenerated into an occasion of excess and immorality. "The Cause of Blight and Pestilence in the Vegetable Creation," by John Parkin, M.D. (Hatchards), adduces reasons for believing that the potato blight will continue, and that other classes of vegetables will also become infected, from whence the author takes occasion to suggest extensive fisheries, as the only remedy against famine. His pamphlet is deserving of attention. "The Autobiography of Thomas Platter," from the German (Wertheim), is a very amusing history of the life of a contemporary of Zuinglius, and adherent of the Reformation. "Pauperism," by the Rev. R. B. Bradley (Whittaker and Co.), proposes the abolition of the present Poor Laws, and the substitution of a vast benefit society, supported partly by the poor, and partly by the rate-payers, and which would afford liberal relief to widows, and aged and infirm persons. "Sharpe's Magazine," the cheapest periodical of the day, continues to maintain its character for ability and general interest. Adapted for family reading, it supplies a greater quantity and variety of matter than other periodicals of four times the price.

Mr. Prowett, of Caius College, Cambridge, has published an English metrical translation of the "Prometheus Unbound" of Æschylus. It is preceded by some observations on the differences between the ancient and modern drama. The translation seems well and carefully done.

Four more little volumes of the "Devotional Library" have reached us, from the editorial pen of the indefatigable Dr. Hook. They bear the respective titles of—"Short Meditations for every Day in the Year:"—Part I. Advent to Lent. "The Crucified Jesus; a devotional Commentary on the 22nd and 23rd Chapters of St. Luke," by Anthony Horneck, D.D. "The Retired Christian exercised in Divine Thoughts and Heavenly Meditations," by Bishop Ken; and "Helps to Self-Examination," by W. F. Hook, D.D. The first of these four report assigns to a female pen, and we are specially pleased with it.

"The English Churchman's Calendar for the year of our Lord 1847, compiled from the Book of Common Prayer," is as distinct as red and black, Old English, Roman, and Italic types can make it. It really seems to be an useful publication. It adheres to what is expressed in our Prayer-book; suggests where that is silent; and "has nothing whatever to do with" the "Roman Catholic rules, whatever may be the intrinsic superiority of those rules."

Mr. Burns' "Illustrated Catalogue" is one of the prettiest books of the season.—We have to thank the authors for two or three more small publications, which the press of matter obliges us to defer a notice of, as we have been unable as yet to bestow on them the attention which they seem to deserve.

Foreign and Colonial Intelligence.

AUSTRALIA.—Visitation of the Diocese.—We are delighted to find, by a Visitation Journal of the Lord Bishop of Australia, recently published by the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts, that the Church in that colony is fast recovering from the state of prostration which the Bishop had to lament over on the occasion of his last visitation¹.

The bishop began his visitation tour in the last days of the year 1844, and continued it till the month of December, 1845. In the course of it he consecrated twelve churches, and laid the foundation, or otherwise provided for the commencement, of eighteen churches and chapels. Of the churches to which the Bishop referred in 1842, as remaining in an unfinished state, three only are now unconsecrated, one of them on account of the impossibility of procuring a minister to take charge of it. This, the want of clergy, seems now to be the great difficulty with which the Bishop of Australia has to contend, and for the removal of which he makes an earnest appeal to the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel, that they would consider the "destitute condition to which he is reduced by the want of additional clergymen, and the deplorable consequences which must arise unless that want can be by some means speedily removed." He ordained two deacons in December, 1844; but since that time, says the Bishop, "no suitable candidates for admission have been presented. During the same interval the diocese has lost the services of several; others are at this time completely or partially disabled by sickness; and, in the event of any other casualties diminishing our remaining numbers, it would not be in my power to provide for the ecclesiastical services of the diocese, or to keep open the several churches, much less to occupy the additional ones, of the actual erection of some of which, and of the still further proposed augmentation of their numbers, I have now transmitted a statement."

As regards the social condition of the diocese, the following observations of the Bishop will be read with interest:—"The transportation of felons to this colony has been discontinued six years; and the rapidity with which nearly all traces of the convict system have disappeared in that short interval, is as gratifying as it is surprising. Almost the only remaining mark of its existence is the stockade at Blackheath; and the number of prisoners does not at this time exceed seventy." And at the close of his journal he adds:—"One other circumstance ought for the credit of the country to be recorded. Although continually travelling through the most lonely and unfrequented parts of it by day, and sleeping by night in the remotest stations, exposed to every outrage, had there been the slightest disposition to commit acts of violence, being also perfectly unprotected, except on two or three occasions for a very short time by the attendance of a single mounted policeman, I never met with the slightest molestation, threat, or rudeness; but experienced in all places, and on the part of all persons, from the highest to the lowest, the most perfect attention, civility, kindness, hospitality, and respect. It is right that this should be mentioned, in order to correct any impression that may prevail to the disadvantage of the general character of the people of this colony; my sincere persuasion being, that there can be no country in which an unprotected solitary traveller could have spent so much time, and passed over such an extended space, with a more perfect freedom from annoyance or injury. Some weight is due to this testimony, resting upon the experience of the sixteen years which I have now completed here, in journeyings often in the care of all the churches; but, thanks be to God, without attendant perils of any kind."

FRANCE.—Protestant Religious Societies.—The following summary of the receipts and expenditure of the Protestant religious societies in France during the year 1845-6, is taken from the reports read at their annual meetings, held at Paris in the spring of this year:—

The most important of them, the Société évangélique, whose proceedings have been noticed in a former number of our Review², employed during the last year 146 agents, of which thirty-four were ministers, and five-and-twenty evangelists or lay preachers.

GERMANY.—Critical situation of the Evangelic Church of Prussia; the General Synod.—The deliberations of this assembly, unexpectedly suspended at the end of August last, have had the effect of accelerating the crisis; the approach of which has been clearly indicated by the tendencies manifested of late years both among the clergy and laity of the evangelic communions of Germany. The fearful question, whether the faith of the first, or the infidelity of the nineteenth century, is to have the ascendancy in these communions, has at last been brought to an issue in the representative assembly of the Evangelic Church of Prussia, and the victory, we grieve to say, is for the present on the side of infidelity. The suspension of the deliberations of the synod has thrown the conflict back upon the field of theological literature, and the more dangerous field of public opinion ; there it may be left to rage for a time : but the situation of affairs has become such, that it will not be in the power of the king to delay the moment much longer when a decisive course must be taken, either for the expulsion of rationalism from the Church, reducing the latter, it is to be feared, to a small minority of the nation, or for its legal recognition, and the consequent extinction, at no distant period, of the " United Evangelic Church " as a communion entitled to bear the Christian name.

Before we enter into the particulars of this unexpected, though by no means surprising, result of a measure intended by the king to open the way for the recognition of the Church and the restoration of orthodoxy within her, we will resume our report of the proceedings of the synod, at the point at which it was broken off in our last³, and continue it as far as the notices of the proceedings of the synod, which have also been interrupted, will enable us to do so.

The subject of deliberation in the last sessions reported by us was, it will be remembered, the course of training for the ministry, and the employment of the candidates. In connexion with this point the following statistical data, furnished by the Berliner Allgemeine Kirchen-Zeitung, will be read with interest, as they present a clear view of the actual state of things to which the discussion of the synod applies. The population of Prussia, belonging to the Evangelic Communion, amounts to 9,428,911, the number of ministers to 5839, which gives an average of rather more than 1600 souls under the charge of one clergyman⁴. At the close of the year 1845 there were 1072 candidates who had passed their " examination pro venia concionandi," and 1446 candidates who had obtained their certificate pro ministerio, that is to say, altogether 2518 young men destined and qualified for the ministry, equal to nearly one-half of the acting clergy ; of these only 120 were employed by the Church in the capacity of catechists ; all the rest being thrown back upon secular employments, and that for an average period of fourteen years ; a period which, under the present arrangements, is likely to be still further protracted, as during the six years from 1839 to 1844, the average number of candidates promoted to ecclesiastic offices was only 180 annually, while the number of expectants was swelled at the rate of 230 candidates examined pro venia concionandi, and 261 pro ministerio. Even if all those who have passed their examination, were at once brought into service, as assistant ministers, agreeably to the wish expressed by the synod, the number of souls under the charge of one clergyman would still be upwards of 1100.

From the consideration of the present system of preparation for the ministry, the synod passed on, in its 16th and 17th sessions, (July 10th and 13th,) to the question of superannuation. In the report of the committee the subject was divided under two heads: 1, the rules to be observed in removing a minister from active service to the superannuation list; and, 2, the provision to be made for him in the way of pension. On the first point the committee was desirous of securing to the ministers themselves the right of retiring after a certain period of service, and to the authorities the power of removing them without incurring the imputation of harshness, and therefore proposed to fix the completion of the 75th year as the "canonical" period of retirement from ministerial functions; giving to the consistory the power of extending beyond that period the active service of any clergyman, whom his patron or his parish might wish to retain. To this proposal many objections were raised in the course of the debate. It was urged that the connexion between the pastor and his flock was not to be regarded in the same light as a civil employment, and that actual incapacity alone could justify its dissolution; that the prospect of being dependent on the good pleasure of his patron or his parish for his continuance in office, after the attainment of his 75th year, was likely to interfere with the free and fearless discharge of his functions; that many clergymen were quite equal to their duties at the age of 75, and that although as mere men of business they might not be as able as younger men, the weight of their spiritual influence was likely to be increased, rather than diminished, by their years. More particularly it was insisted on, that in the earliest and best times of the Church, aged clergymen were looked up to with more than ordinary veneration; that in those days a system of superannuation was not even dreamt of; and one speaker aptly remarked, that when the Apostle St. John, by reason of his advanced age, could say no more to his flock, than, "Little children, love one another!" this would scarcely have been considered a sufficient reason for proposing that he should retire from the apostolic office. It was further suggested, that the difficulties arising from the age and consequent infirmity of the minister might in most cases be met by providing an assistant minister, to lighten his duties; and it was pointed out, that in cases where the retirement of a clergyman might on other grounds appear desirable, the process of superannuation at a period of life arbitrarily fixed upon as a general rule, would prove a most inefficient remedy. Upon these and other less important considerations the proposal of the committee was rejected by a decided majority; and the whole subject was referred back to the same committee, with directions to add to their numbers, and to report to the synod upon the following two questions: 1, the best means of making the ecclesiastic authority acquainted with any case of incapacity which might arise; and, 2, the best course of proceeding for establishing in a legal manner the fact of such incapacity, and the consequent necessity of superannuation.

On the second point, the provision to be made for superannuated ministers, the following questions arose: Whether the superannuated minister should continue to draw a part of his official income in the shape of retiring pension, thus crippling the resources of his successor, or whether the latter should come at once into full possession of the income attached to his office; and if the latter, or if the portion contributed from the official income towards the support of the superannuated minister were but small and insufficient, whether the pension was to be provided by the State, or by the parish, or from a separate pension fund to be formed by an annual tax upon all ecclesiastical revenues, or in what proportions those different sources might severally contribute. It was ultimately determined, that the present system, according to which the superannuated minister continues to draw from one third to one half of his official income, should be maintained, and that in addition to this, a pension fund should be established in each province, to be supported in part by the contributions of the clergy themselves, with assistance from the State, and to be administered by the public authorities.

The publication of abstracts of the proceedings of the synod had proceeded thus far, when in the 53rd session, on the 26th of August, the synod determined, that for the future only full reports of the proceedings, with the names of the speakers, should be given to the public. Agreeably to this resolution an official report of the acts of the synod is expected; and in the mean time the information respecting its deliberations is confined to certain documents which have been published, and so much of the history of their discussion and adoption by the synod as has transpired through private channels. The reasons for which the synod came to this determination, do not clearly appear; the Berliner Allgemeine Kirchen-Zeitung complains of it as an unwarrantable proceeding, which no one could have expected; the probability is, that such a course was deemed indispensable to avoid misrepresentation, considering the importance of the questions on which the synod deliberated during its later sessions, and the strong party feeling which its resolutions called forth.

The whole business transacted at the synod, up to the time of its dissolution or prorogation, forms but a very small proportion of the amount of business which was in course of preparation. No less than thirty-five reports on as many different subjects had been drawn up by the eight committees⁵; of which the synod had only had seven under its consideration, when its labours were brought to a close by royal mandate. The seven subjects in question are:—

1. The administration of oaths.
2. Alleviation of the administrative functions of the clergy.
3. Preparation for the ministerial office.

⁵ See p. 207 of this volume.

4. Superannuation of aged clergymen.
5. The obligation of the symbolical books as a rule of faith, for the maintenance of purity and unity of doctrine.
6. The union question.
7. Constitutional organization of the Church of the six eastern provinces of the kingdom.

It is the fifth of these subjects which created in the synod itself the warmest debates, produced the strongest excitement out of doors, and occasioned the interference of the king with the continuance of the synodical sittings. As far as we can gather from the different accounts which are lying before us, the synod brought this subject to a close in its 39th session, on the tenth of August, by adopting a form of ordination engagement, which virtually substitutes a new symbol of faith in the place of the Apostles' Creed; and on the 22nd of the same month the synod was surprised by the following communication from the president, Minister von Eichhorn: "The synod has now been in full action for the space of three months; 33 reports of committees are of themselves sufficient to attest the diligence and devotion of its members; besides which, their strength has been put in requisition by 49 plenary sessions. It would be almost cruel to impose on them a longer continuance of their labours, and a longer detention from their homes, and from the pressing official duties which await them there. It is, indeed, much to be lamented that there has not been sufficient time to deliberate upon the matters which are still in progress: this I feel the more, as I have learned by experience how much advantage is to be derived for the benefit of the Church from the intelligence and good feeling of an assembly of men so highly distinguished; and when I look at the matters which have been deliberated upon, my regret is still further increased. I have, however, yesterday made my report on the subject to his majesty the king, and he too is exceedingly grieved that an assembly, which has so greatly approved itself, and has worked together so well, should not have the opportunity of giving its counsel on the remaining questions also; but he too perceives, that both the ecclesiastical and the lay-members of the synod may not be detained any longer from their ordinary official duties, and those who are not public servants, from their private avocations; and he, therefore, permits this assembly to close its labours at the end of this month, but in such a manner as to be able to reconstitute itself at any time upon his majesty's invitation, in order to advise on the remaining subjects of debate; the time at which this may be done to be determined hereafter."

In pursuance of this intimation, the synod proceeded with all possible dispatch to bring the debate on the question then in hand—the project of an ecclesiastical constitution—to a close; and having finished it on the 28th of August, the 56th and last session was held on the 29th, when the president formally prorogued it, with an intimation that the king intended to convene it again in the course of next year; after which the synod was closed with prayer and a psalm. There was a plentiful exchange of farewell speeches and parting civilities; among others, the synod presented to the president, Minister von Eichhorn, an album, to which each member had furnished a contribution. But even from this testimony of personal regard party spirit was not excluded; the burgomaster of Berlin having inserted, as his contribution, a passage from the famous rationalistic address, presented to the king, in August, 1845, by the municipality of Berlin, for which that body was personally reprimanded by the king⁶; the burgomaster expressly alleging the "address" as the source from which his quotation was taken. As an indication of the spirit in which this great religious conflict is carried on, it deserves to be mentioned, that for thus indirectly bearding the king, under cover of participation in an act of civility offered to his minister, the burgomaster was complimented, a few days afterwards, by a vote of the Gustavus-Adolphus association, as a man "in whose breast dwelt truth and freedom, fearlessness and courage, even in face of the throne."

Having thus completed the history of the synod, we shall now lay before our readers the two most important documents, which it drew up before its dissolution; viz., the new form of ordination engagement, and the PROJECT OF AN ECCLESIASTICAL CONSTITUTION. The latter document is as follows:—

PREAMBLE.

§ 1. It is desirable to establish at length in the eastern provinces⁷ a constitution founded upon an amalgamation of the consistorial and the presbyterial systems, in the manner following:—

§ 2. This development of the constitution of the Evangelic Church to a state of greater independence on the part of the Church, is agreeable to the principles of the Evangelic Church, and is intended to promote the more perfect building up of the congregation on the ground of evangelic faith and confession.

CHAPTER I.

Of the local congregation, or parish, and the presbytery.

§ 3. Every parish is to have a presbytery, consisting of the minister, or, as the case may be, the whole of the ministers, of the Church, and a certain number of lay members (elders). The number of lay members is determined by the parish according to its wants, subject to the approbation of the consistory: the minimum being four members, i. e. two elders, properly speaking, one churchwarden, and one deacon.

§ 4. The lay members hold office for six years, go out by rotation from three to three years, and are re-eligible. Those who have served the office twice, are "honourable elders," and as such eligible for the diocesan synod.

⁶ See English Review, vol. iv. pp. 504—506.

⁷ The western provinces of Westphalia and Rhenish Prussia have been for some years in the enjoyment of an ecclesiastical constitution of their own.

§ 5. The parish elects the lay members of the presbytery by a majority of votes. The presbytery guides the parish in the election by making propositions, to which the parish, however, is not bound to adhere.

§ 6. Qualified electors are all Christian householders who do not live upon alms, and who are of unblemished reputation. Eligible are those only who, besides a blameless conversation, attest their Church feeling by attendance on public worship and on the Holy Communion.

§ 7. If in larger parishes (exceeding 1000 souls) inconvenience should arise, or be apprehended, from the congregating together of all the householders for election purposes, the election of the elders may be effected by deputy electors chosen by the whole of the householders, either conjointly or in sections. The arrangement of matters of detail rests with the diocesan synod.

§ 9.* A set formulary is to be provided for solemnly introducing the elders elect, taking their official engagement, and assigning to them their places of honour in the Church.

§ 10. The duties of the presbytery are as follows :—

1. To maintain discipline and good morals, and to promote a Christian spirit in the parish.

2. To see to outward order in divine service and to the observance of the Lord's day.

3. To administer and superintend the local property of the Church, of charitable foundations and schools, within the limits of legal competency.

4. To exercise inspection and control over the buildings of the Church.

5. To take care of the poor and the sick, as far as falls within the province of the Church.

6. To take a part in superintending the school, and guarding the influence of the Church over the Christian education of youth.

7. To act and vote in the name of the parish in matters of alteration in the liturgy, in the introduction or abrogation of particular services, as far as the parish has a voice in these matters, and provided that they are not of such a nature as to require a direct reference to all the electors of the parish; to take the preparatory measures for the exercise of parochial rights, in the appointment of ministers, and the settlement of calls.

8. To represent the parish in all legal transactions, with the concurrence of the provincial authority; and to appoint the inferior officers of the Church, except in cases where the appointment is already vested in particular persons or corporations.

§ 11. For particular departments of these duties, the special offices of churchwarden and deacon are appointed within the presbytery; the churchwarden undertaking the financial administration of the Church, and the superintendence of the buildings and other property, the deacon the management of the poor. Additional deacons may be appointed in the presbytery for the various branches of Christian charity towards the distressed and the necessitous of every kind. In the smallest presbyteries of four members, one churchwarden and one deacon is appointed; in other cases the number of deacons is to be determined according to the wants of the parish, agreeably to the provisions of § 3.

* § 8 of the draft of the committee was omitted altogether; it had reference to the election of ministers by the parish in some localities.

§ 12. To the minister it belongs, 1. to preside in the presbytery, and in case of an equality of votes, to give the casting vote; 2. to direct the elders and deacons in matters affecting the cure of souls; 3. he is bound by the decisions of the presbytery in matters belonging to its cognizance; 4. he is independent of the presbytery in regard to the personal functions of his office, in matters of doctrine, cure of souls, administration of the sacraments, and all ministerial acts; 5. if the elders should see any thing amiss in the official conduct of the minister, they are entitled and bound to notify the same to the superior authority; 6. the consent of the presbytery is necessary for admission to the rite of confirmation.

§ 13. The use of Churches for other purposes than those of public worship and other means of edification recognized by the Evangelic Church, requires the consent of both the presbytery and the consistory, as well as in certain cases that of the patron. On the question, what acts, besides those prescribed in the liturgy, fall within the scope of the worship and other means of edification recognized by the Evangelic Church, the consistory decides.

§ 14. The presbytery may employ assistant deacons for specific services connected with the functions of the diaconate. These, however, are not members of the presbytery: still if they are employed permanently, though only during pleasure, they obtain an official character, and are solemnly introduced into their office.

§ 18⁹. The rights of patrons are not interfered with by the appointment of the presbytery; but if a patron reserves to himself the right of appointing a steward for the administration of the property of the Church, he nominates the churchwarden from among the presbytery; he is not, as patron, a member of the presbytery, but may become so by election, if he is willing to be elected, and to renounce, for the time being, the right of nominating the churchwarden.

§ 19. Questions respecting alienation of parochial property, parochial rates, and other like questions, on which the parochial officers are not competent to decide, as the law now stands, cannot hereafter be decided by the presbytery. In small parishes such questions are to be decided by the whole of the householders; in larger parishes (above 500 souls), by a body of parochial representatives, whose votes bind the parish; but all such decisions require to be confirmed by the provincial.

authority. The number of these officers, and the time for which they hold office, is determined in the case of each parish by a resolution of the presbytery, subject to the approbation of the provincial authority, with the advice of the moderators of the diocesan synod.

CHAPTER II.

Of the Diocesan Synod.

The diocesan synod consists of the superintendent, all the clergy of the diocese who have an independent charge, not a mere assistant office, and a lay deputy for every parish which has a presbytery of its own. Several parishes united under the charge of one minister, may, at their option, either appoint a common representative, or exercise the right of appointment in turns. If there should be reason to apprehend too great an inequality in the number of the clerical and lay members of the diocesan synod, the provincial synod shall, with the concurrence of the ecclesiastic authority, be empowered to provide a remedy. The assistant ministers employed within the diocese, are to attend the deliberations of the diocesan synod, with the right of giving their counsel, but without the power of voting. The permanently appointed ministers of public institutions, and the military chaplains, have the full right of sitting and voting in the diocesan synod.

§ 21. The superintendent presides over the diocesan synod. He is appointed by the sovereign, from among three candidates, whose names are presented to him by the diocesan synod, acting on the suggestion of the moderators of the provincial synod; he holds his office for life. In addition to the superintendent, the diocesan synod elects, subject to the confirmation of the consistory, a clerical secretary for six years; the two together form the board of moderators of the synod.

§ 22. The diocesan synod meets at least once a year.

§ 23. Its functions are:

1. To discuss Church affairs.
2. To report on propositions made by the consistory.
3. To make propositions to both the consistory and the provincial synod.
4. To take a part in the supervision of the religious condition of the diocese.

5. To take a part in the exercise of discipline over ministers and elders.

§ 24. The superintendent is bound by the decisions of the diocesan synod, in regard to the matters above specified; but in all other respects he is considered as the organ of the consistory, and as such independent of the synod.

§ 25. The superintendent may, in case of need, with the concurrence of the synod, and subject to the confirmation of the consistory, employ the lay assessor of the synod as an assistant for the dispatch of external Church business.

CHAPTER III.

Of the Provincial Synod.

§ 26. The provincial synod consists of the following members:— 1. the general superintendent of the province; 2. all the superintendents of the dioceses and the military chaplains in chief; 3. a clerical and a lay deputy chosen by every diocesan synod; 4. in provinces in which there is an university, a professor of the faculty of theology, and a professor of the faculty of law, chosen by the evangelic members of the respective faculties; in the province where there is no university, a professor of law is to be deputed to the provincial synod by some neighbouring university; 5. the director of the theological seminary, which applies only to the seminary of Wittenberg; 6. the director of the schoolmasters' seminary; if there is more than one such seminary in the province, the directors attend in rotation; 7. an evangelic director of a gymnasium, chosen by all the evangelic directors of the gymnasia of the province.

§ 27. The general superintendent is the president of the province. He is appointed for life by the king; but before the appointment is made, the provincial synod is consulted on the subject. The synod elects, besides, an assessor, who is at the same time the representative of the general superintendent, and a clerical secretary for six years; these together form the board of moderators of the provincial synod.

§ 28. A royal commissary is entitled to be present at the synod, to watch over the rights of the royal supremacy. All the members of the consistory likewise may, with permission of their superior authority, take part in the deliberations of the synod; but without the right of voting.

§ 29. The provincial synod meets at least once in three years.

§ 30. The provincial synod has to watch over the religious condition of the province, in matters of doctrine, worship, and discipline; and to bring defects or complaints under the notice of the consistory. For this purpose the propositions made by the diocesan synods are to be communicated to it by the consistory. The synod deposes members of its own body to take a part in the examination of the candidates, with a right of voting. In proceedings against a clergyman on account of doctrine, or of conduct originating in his doctrinal views, the consistory is not competent by itself to pass final sentence; but after the evidence is closed, the consistory is to call in for this purpose a number of members of the provincial synod, equal to the number of the consistory; such members to be elected for this function by the synod from three to three years, in equal proportions from its clerical and its lay members; and, in addition to these, two members of the faculty of theology, one of which is to be the synodal member, and the other elected by the faculty from three to three years. These, together with the consistory, form the court of judicature in matters of discipline. The synod passes resolutions in Church matters; but such resolutions do not become the law of the Church, until they have received the sanction of the provincial government. The synod reports on Church questions referred to it by the ecclesiastic authorities. The fundamental, peculiar, and legally recognized elements of the Church-constitution of the province in regard to doctrine, worship, and ecclesiastic organization, cannot be altered without the consent of the provincial synod. Nevertheless, in all general matters, the provincial synods are subject to the decisions of the general synod of the kingdom.

CHAPTER IV.

Of the General Synod.

§ 31. The general synod consists of the following members: 1. the presidents of the consistories; 2. the general superintendents and the army provost, or supreme military chaplain; 3. the four royal chaplains; 4. three clerical and three lay members of each province, chosen by the provincial synod from among its own members; 5. a member of the faculty of theology, and a member of the faculty of law, from each of the universities of the land.

§ 32. The president is chosen by the king, either in or out of the synod. The synod elects a vice-president and the secretaries.

§ 33. The general synod meets every nine years, and is convened on special occasions according to the king's pleasure. An extraordinary convocation may be suggested by the provincial synods.

§ 34. The general synod passes resolutions on Church matters, which, however, do not become the law of the Church until they have received the royal sanction. It reports on subjects referred to it by the supreme ecclesiastical authority. No alterations can be made in the fundamentals of the national Church, touching her discipline, liturgy, and constitution, without the consent of the general synod.

CHAPTER V.

Of the Consistories.

§ 35. To complete the constitutional system, it is desirable that a supreme consistory should in due time be appointed; in the first place, as a tribunal of appellate jurisdiction; and in the second place, as a council to be consulted on Church affairs, and empowered to exercise supreme administrative functions. It is to consist of a lay president, and of clerical and lay councillors, if possible in sufficient numbers for every province to be represented; the councillors to be chosen by the sovereign, with the advice of the supreme consistory, and on the suggestion of the Minister of Worship. The functions of the supreme consistory are: 1. to hear appeals from the decision of the consistories in cases of Church discipline; 2. to report to the minister of worship on matters of internal Church discipline, respecting the professors of theology in the Universities; no proceedings touching doctrine and Church life being allowable in those cases, without such report; 3.

to draw up the decrees founded on the resolutions of the provincial synods, which require to be confirmed by the Minister of Worship; 4. to report on the matters to be proposed to the provincial synods, and on general orders touching the doctrine, liturgy, discipline, and constitution of the Church; the Minister of Worship being restrained from acting in the matters aforesaid without such report; 5. to report on the filling up of appointments falling vacant in the consistories and the theological faculties of the Universities; 6. to interpose in the event of conflicts arising between the different ecclesiastical authorities, reserving the sanction of the Minister of Worship to its decisions; 7. to digest and dispatch any matters specially referred to it.

§ 36. The official engagement to be taken by the members of the consistories, and of the supreme consistory, to be so worded as to make it evident that they are ecclesiastical authorities.

CHAPTER VI.

Concluding enactment.

§ 37. The first organization of this constitutional system to be conducted on the principles set forth in § 17¹.

Such is the constitution which it is proposed by the synod to give to the Evangelic Church. Independently of the present state of religious parties in Germany, it is evident, on an attentive consideration of its provisions, that its character is far too democratic; and, what is still more objectionable, that it vests the power on which, practically and ultimately, the faith and the order of the Church would, under such a constitution, be dependent, in the hands of the laity at large, without any guarantee,—not even that of outward church communion, attendance on public worship, and participation in the Holy Eucharist,—for the correctness of their principles, or for their interest in the well-being of the Church, or in the maintenance of the truth of which the Church is the witness. To the dangers with which such an arrangement is pregnant, the consistorial power, which is nothing else than a system of demi-ecclesiastical, demi-political administration, deriving its power from the temporal sovereign, never could oppose a sufficient barrier; and nothing could more strikingly illustrate the evil consequences of the abrogation of Episcopacy, the divinely-ordained organ of church government, than this project of constitution.

But the imminent nature of the danger which the very proposal of such a project by the synod creates, becomes still more apparent, when regard is had to the existing state of religious opinion in Germany, as manifested by the proceedings of the synod on the fifth of the subjects before enumerated, viz., what engagements should be entered into on admission to the ministry, regarding soundness of doctrine. The victory of the rationalistic party on this subject, and the weak spirit of compromise for the sake of a hollow peace, which induced a large portion of the orthodox party to surrender, not only the distinctive symbolical documents of the German reformation, but the ancient catholic standards of orthodoxy, not excepting even the Apostles' Creed, are more significant, and more afflicting, as indications of the utter dilapidation into which the Protestantism of Germany has fallen, than all the previous evidences of that fearful fact put together. Hitherto, candidates for the ministry were, on their ordination, pledged, though not directly by an act of subscription, yet indirectly by an exhortation in which they were supposed to acquiesce, to the maintenance of orthodox doctrine, according to the standard of the Reformation, as expressed in the symbolical documents in force in the different communions and localities. The exhortation to this effect contained in the new Prussian *Kirchen Agende*² is as follows:—"You are to preach no other doctrine but that which is founded on God's pure and clear Word, the prophetic and apostolic writings of the Old and New Testament, our only rule of faith; and contained in the three chief symbols,—(the Apostles', the Nicene, and the Athanasian Creeds, [here, according to custom, the symbolical books are mentioned,] and in the spirit of which the liturgy of our National Evangelic Church, to which you are to conform, is composed."

Loose as is this engagement, in the absence of any express assent, written or oral, to this exhortation on the part of the persons to be ordained, still it did substantially, and in foro conscientiæ, bind the clergy of the United Evangelic Church to these three several standards of belief: 1. to the three ancient Catholic Creeds; 2. to the symbolical documents of the Reformation; 3. to the doctrinal truths embodied and set forth in the public liturgy. But such an obligation is, as it now appears, in the opinion of the majority of both clergy and laity, an intolerable yoke, a restraint upon the liberty of "holding and teaching," altogether incompatible with the "free development" of the religious mind of the Evangelic Church. Accordingly, the synod adopted in its thirty-ninth session, on the 10th of August last, by a majority of 48 to 14 votes, the following formulary to be substituted for that hitherto in use, in the ordination of ministers:—

"Whoever is lawfully called to the office of public teaching in the Evangelic Church, and is to be consecrated to it by prayer and imposition of hands³, is to testify publicly, that he holds the common faith of the Evangelic Church; and therefore, first, that he takes for the rule of his doctrine neither his own opinions nor any other human traditions, but the word of God in the writings of the prophets and apostles; secondly, that he will, with the help of God, faithfully and diligently continue in that interpretation of Holy Scripture, which is given by the Holy Ghost according to grammatical rule, in harmony with the confessions of universal Christendom, and with the confessions of the Evangelic Church, as testimonies of the fundamental facts and truths of salvation, and patterns of sound doctrine. (Here the assent of the candidate is asked and given.) And forasmuch as these facts and truths are chiefly the following: I ask you,—Whether, with universal Christendom upon earth, you confess God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit?—Further, Whether with the whole Evangelic Church you confess, in the first place, Jesus Christ the only begotten Son of God, who made Himself of no reputation, and took upon Him the form of a servant, as the only Mediator, seeing that as a Prophet, mighty in deed and word before God, He preached peace, and was delivered for our offences, and was raised again for our justification, and after that sat down on the right hand of the Majesty on High, and rules for ever as Head of the Church which He gathers together and sustains by the Word and the Holy Sacraments, through the Holy Spirit, which, sent by Him into our hearts, teaches us to call Jesus our Lord, and to know the grace which is given us in Him;—in the second place, Whether in the faith of that joyful message of the free grace of God in His blessed Son you will confess and testify that we all have sinned, but are made the children of God by faith in Christ, in whom being justified in God's sight by grace freely without works, we have the earnest of the incorruptible inheritance reserved in heaven, and that, by the same faith which working by love bringeth forth the fruits of the Spirit, we are in daily renewing of heart being prepared for the day of Jesus Christ. (Here follows the second affirmative answer of the candidate.)”

As it is said of affidavits, that they are more remarkable for what they do not contain, than for what they contain, so it is with regard to this new symbol. Leaving the symbolical books of the Reformation out of the question, there are in the three Catholic Creeds certain points which the modern theology of Germany either directly repudiates, or insists on treating as debatable questions; and which are skilfully omitted or evaded in the above formulary. Such points are the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, the Eternal Godhead of the Son, the miraculous conception of Christ, His propitiatory death as an atoning sacrifice, His descent into hell, His personal ascension and advent, the final judgment, the resurrection of the flesh, and the inspiration and Divine authority of Holy Scripture. Special care is taken, accordingly, to provide a loophole for unbelief by the rejection of “all human traditions,” under which term the symbolical books of the Reformation and the three creeds are of course included;—by the vague profession of general agreement with universal Christendom and the faith of the Evangelic Church, which, in the present day in Germany, may be understood to mean the far more numerous “enlightened” or rationalistic part of those who call themselves Christians, in contradistinction to the “pietists and obscurants;”—by the acknowledgment, not of the writings of the prophets, apostles, and evangelists, as the word of God, but of the word of God in the writings of the prophets and apostles (omitting the evangelists); which leaves it open to the criticism of the rationalistic divines, to separate the genuine word of God in those writings from the alloy of human ignorance and prejudice with which, as they allege, it is mixed;—by the contradistinction between existing interpretations of God's Word, the ancient Catholic creeds and other standards of faith, which are received only as historical records of the way in which the Bible was understood in former ages, and "that interpretation of Holy Scripture which is given by the Holy Ghost according to grammatical rule," which again means practically the critical theology of the rationalistic school;—by the confession of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, without asserting that the Son is God, and the Holy Spirit God, or, that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are three persons and one God;—by the confession of Jesus Christ as the only begotten Son of God, but avoiding the "God of God, Light of Light, very God of very God," of the Nicene, and the "conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary," of the Apostles' Creed;—by the prominence given to the "preaching of peace" as the ground on which the mediatorial character of Christ rests, and the mention of His death in words of Holy Scripture in which the rationalistic school sees nothing but a statement that Christ sacrificed His life in His endeavour to benefit mankind by His purer doctrines, and which in that sense are perfectly compatible with a denial of the doctrine of the atonement, stigmatised by that school with the nick-name, "blood-theology;"—by the assertion of the exaltation and headship of our blessed Lord, again, in words of Holy Scripture, but words to which the German mind has long been accustomed to attribute no more than a figurative, or, as it is called, a "spiritual" sense;—by the admission that "we all have sinned," that "we all are sinners," but in such a manner as to blink the question of original sin, and to leave room for the notion that our sins are the result of a faulty education, and of the influence of ignorance and prejudice, (under which terms the orthodox belief is comprehended,) upon our convictions and our conduct.

We have thought it right to point out some of the insidious omissions and evasions which this formulary contains and provides for; because without a knowledge of the various subterfuges of German rationalism, the formulary cannot be appreciated in its true character, and in the bearing which its adoption by the synod has upon the prospects of the Evangelic Church. A series of able articles, exposing the dangerous tendency of the formulary, is contained in the Evangelische Kirchen-Zeitung, the organ of the orthodox party; in which among other arguments, which our limits will not permit us to reproduce, the gross immorality is pointed out, of retaining the doctrines of the three creeds in the liturgy, so as to impose them as articles of faith on sponsors⁴ and catechumens, and to make them the common lip profession of the congregation, with the minister at its head ; while the latter is, by his ordination engagements, specially absolved from belief in them and conformity to them in his own teaching.

The large majority with which the formulary was adopted, does not, it is said, afford a fair indication of the relative strength of the rationalistic and orthodox parties ; many of the members of the synod, who themselves hold orthodox opinions, having voted in favour of it, on the ground of its being a measure of "comprehension:" certain it is, that the minority too truly indicates, how small is the number of faithful witnesses prepared to oppose an uncompromising resistance to the progress of rationalism and latitudinarianism. That the practical results of the synod, as exhibited in this formulary and the project of an ecclesiastical constitution, are far, very far, from corresponding with the intentions and expectations of the king, as expressed in his speech at the opening of the synod⁵, is, indeed, most evident ; and what course remains now to be adopted, is a problem for the solution of which we are not surprised that his majesty desired to obtain some breathing-time.

INDIA.—Success of the Missions in Southern India ; Seminaries for the Education of native Catechists.—The accounts of the missions in Southern India, and especially the Tinnevelly missions, contained in the Madras Christian Intelligencer for October last, are of a most gratifying and cheering character. During the last three years the number of baptized persons under the spiritual charge of the missionaries of the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Southern India, has increased from 13,937 to 16,617. Independently of this accession of baptized members, the missionaries have under their instruction a large body of catechumens,—no less than 7144 at the date of the report, the end of June last,—who are subjected to a long probation previous to their admission into the Church. Of the 16,617 above mentioned, 4158 are men, 5129 women, and 7330 children ; the proportions among the catechumens are, 2035 men, 2099 women, and 3010 children,—the total number of the flock amounting to nearly 24,000 souls. For their spiritual guidance and instruction there are 20 missionaries, 10 East India catechists, 161 native catechists and readers, and 185 schoolmasters and mistresses. The number of schools is 198, the number of children under instruction 4421 boys and 1363 girls,—total 5784, with an average attendance of 4685. The number of baptisms during the half year ending June 30, 1846, was 154 adults and 324 children ; the number of converts received from the Romish Church,—32 men and 38 women, with 35 children. During the last three years ten new mission stations have been established in the interior of the country, and the work of church-building is progressing satisfactorily throughout the mission districts ; in that of Tinnevelly alone, 18 larger and smaller churches, affording accommodation for 5340 persons, have been erected within the last three years. A great number of additional schools, one of them a model school, and twelve boarding schools, four for boys, and eight for girls, have been built, or otherwise established. For the education of native catechists, two seminaries have been established at Sawyerpooram and Vedarpooram, at the former of which there are at present 124, and at the latter 48, scholars; besides these there are five præparandi classes, or smaller seminaries for the education of subordinate native missionary agents, from which the more promising scholars are drafted off to the seminaries at Sawyerpooram and Vedarpooram. The Madras Church Intelligencer contains an interesting account of the examination held at the seminary at Sawyerpooram on the 12th and 13th of August last, in the presence of a large number of missionaries, catechists, and schoolmasters, assembled on the occasion. The subjects of examination comprised Bible history, theology, logic, and English composition, history, and geography, the English and Tamil languages and literature, geometry, and arithmetic, and singing. The progress made by the pupils, all of whom had two years before been ignorant of English, was most gratifying.

Another very gratifying feature in the proceedings of the Tinnevely Mission is the grant of prizes by the Madras Diocesan Committee to be awarded to the best essays on given subjects, from catechists and schoolmasters. The first adjudication of these prizes took place in August last: the subjects of the essays were: 1. the internal evidences of the truth of Christianity; 2. what is justification, and how is a sinner justified; 3. the types of Christ.

ITALY.—Pope Pius IX.: his history and character. Encyclic.—Ever since the elevation of Cardinal Mastai-Ferretti to the pontifical throne, there has been a great diversity of opinions as to the tendency which in his hands the papacy would assume; and vague hopes have been entertained in various quarters, that a reformation of the Romish Church, opening the way for a reconciliation of all Christendom, might be contemplated by him. The measures of reform with which he began his political administration, the proclamation of a general amnesty for political offences, the re-organization of the civil government of Rome and the pontifical states, and the introduction of railroads into his dominions*, measures which procured for him a degree of popularity, such as few of his predecessors have enjoyed, seemed to give some countenance to the expectation, that in the Church also a like change would be effected by the same bold and energetic hand. This, however, it becomes every day more evident, was a fallacious hope; as the previous career of Cardinal Mastai-Ferretti afforded no just ground for it, so the whole tenor of his ecclesiastical government runs counter to it. It is true that Pius IX. continues to pursue a course which cannot fail to render him generally popular; the simplicity of his personal habits, his affability, the interest which he takes in the success of every kind of institution, whether of an ecclesiastic character, or of a charitable nature, or else purely secular, devoted to the advancement of learning, of arts and sciences, and of industry, cannot fail to secure for him the momentary applause of the multitude, and the more permanent admiration and gratitude of the educated classes; while his determination to see every where with his own eyes, and his declared hostility to the system of nepotism, and to other abuses which have long prevailed in the ecclesiastical government of Rome, cannot but exercise a salutary influence; but all this furnishes no sufficient grounds for the conclusion, that he will abate one jot or tittle from the Ultramontane pretensions of the Roman see, or put the slightest restraint upon the system of imposture by which the errors and superstitions of the Romish Church are upheld.

On the contrary, judging from what has transpired of his history previous to his elevation, and the indications which he himself has since furnished, there is reason to anticipate that Pius IX. will be as firm and bold an assertor as any of those that have preceded him in the pontifical chair, of the most dangerous theories, and the worst practical superstitions of Rome; the only difference between him and his immediate predecessors being, that whereas they have feebly and timorously endeavoured to stem the tide of progress in the human mind, it appears to be the ambition of Pius IX. to follow that tide, with a view to domineer over it, in the interest of the papal usurpation. The policy which has for some time been followed with great success by the Jesuit order, the policy of adaptation to the spirit of the times, is the policy which, with Cardinal Ferretti, has mounted the papal throne.

Born at Sinigaglia, in the March of Ancona, on the 13th of May, 1792, of the noble family of the Counts of Mastai, he received his early education at the college of the reverend fathers of the Ecoles pies, at Volterra. He afterwards studied theology at Rome, having been determined to embrace the ecclesiastic career "by a signal favour," says the Ami de la Religion, "which his faith and tender devotion towards the Blessed Virgin had obtained for him from the Divine Mother of Jesus Christ;" and having received the order of priesthood, he devoted himself for several years to the service of the poor in the hospital of Tota Giovanni, in the quarter of Argentina. His superior at the hospital, Father Muzi, having been appointed Vicar Apostolic of Chili, took his young coadjutor with him on that mission; from which, however, they returned after a short time, in consequence of disputes which arose between the Vicar Apostolic and the government of the republic. Some time after his return to Rome, he was promoted to the post of governor of the hospital of St. Michael's, at Ripa Grande; in 1827 Leo XII. appointed him to the archiepiscopal see of Spoleto, from whence Gregory XVI. translated him, in 1832, to the see of Imola. He was appointed cardinal, but reserved in petto in the consistory of the 23rd December, 1839, and proclaimed in that of December 14, 1840. In both his sees, at Spoleto and at Imola, he proved himself the friend and patron of the Jesuits; a short time before his elevation to the pontificate he had paid a visit of "retreat" to the Jesuit establishment of Forli, and gone through the "exercises;" and after his accession he took the first suitable opportunity of publicly testifying his sympathy with the principles of the order. On the feast of St. Ignatius, the 31st of July, which was celebrated on this occasion with more than ordinary pomp, he proceeded in state to the church del Gesu, as the Ami de la Religion observes, from a feeling of particular devotion to the illustrious founder of the society. He prostrated himself before the altar which contains the relics of the saint, and after having paid his devotions, he proceeded to the convent, where he received the homage of the reverend fathers, and had a long and familiar conference with Father Roothaan, the general of the order. Another practical proof of his approbation of the peculiar system of the Jesuits, he gave shortly after by the beatification of Mary Margaret Alacoque, the notorious heroine of Jesuitism, and foundress of the association of "the Sacred Heart of Jesus." On this occasion, Pius IX. not only presided in person over the congregation of rites, but on Sunday the 23rd of August he proceeded in state to the convent of the "Ladies of the Visitation," the order to which Mary Alacoque belonged, and after the official publication of the decree of beatification, he addressed to the nuns an allocution, in which he exhorted them to follow in the footsteps of their venerable sister. These marks of high favour are, it may be supposed, not lost upon the Jesuits, who testified "their affectionate admiration for the incomparable virtues which shine with marvellous splendour in the great Pontiff Pius IX.," as the Diario di Roma has it, by an academic exhibition of poetry and music, in the great church of St. Ignatius, the subject of which was, evidently with a view to take Pius IX. by his weak side, and to chime in with the popular feeling, "the triumph of clemency." The subject was divided into three parts, the triumph of clemency in the heart of the sovereign, in the hearts of his subjects, and in the hearts of strangers, and the poem was written in three languages, Greek, Latin, and Italian, and the third part besides in Spanish, French, German, and English. The verses were recited before a numerous and brilliant assemblage of cardinals and other dignitaries, and an audience of several thousand persons of all ranks, by the pupils of the college, and the intervals of recitation filled up by the execution of music composed for the occasion. The whole came off with great éclat, amid thunders of applause, and formed a suitable response to the special good feeling and sympathy which Pius IX. has ever shown to the Jesuit Order.

All these demonstrations could leave little doubt as to the spirit in which the new pontiff was likely to administer the affairs of the Church, even without the explicit attestation of a Spanish prelate, resident at Rome, who in a letter, dated August 31st, and published in the Español ranza of Madrid, complains of the strange notion set afloat by the liberal journals, as if Pius IX. was about to prove a "revolutionist," and "regenerator," of Italy and of all Europe. The writer, who has known Mastai-Ferretti for many years, before his elevation to the episcopate, and has been in constant and intimate intercourse with him up to the time of his election to the pontificate, pledges himself that the new pope is a stanch Papist, and mentions among other proofs, that in an interview which he had with him since his accession, he dwelt with particular interest on the religious orders, "from which such great men have issued forth, and which are so useful and even necessary to the Church." The writer conjectures that the object of the liberal journals is to shake the confidence of good "Catholics," and, by flattery, to win over the pope to liberal notions; but, he says, "I am firmly convinced that the revolutionist party will, ere long, be terribly disenchanted."

The most conclusive, however, of all the evidences of the tendency of the new pontificate, is the encyclic which Pius IX. addressed on the 9th of November last, to "all the patriarchs, primates, archbishops, and bishops," and of which upwards of 10,000 copies have been dispatched from Rome into different parts of the world. On account of the great length of this document, we can make room for a few extracts only.

After some prefatory remarks on the critical period at which Pius IX. has been called to the office of chief ruler of the "Catholic" Church, the encyclic adverts in the first place to the "fierce and formidable warfare carried on against every thing Catholic," by the rationalistic and infidel schools of religion and philosophy. This part of the document contains many excellent observations, and ably exposes the folly and the fallacy of "appealing to, and extolling the power and excellency of human reason against the most holy faith of Christ," and the equally fallacious notion of "introducing human progress with rash and sacrilegious daring into the Catholic religion, as if religion itself were not of God, but of men, some philosophical conceit, capable of being improved by human methods;" a passage of the encyclic which clearly shows that the principles of the "Essay on Development" are as much at variance with those of the Church of Rome, as with those of the Church of England. From the rationalists the encyclic passes on to the Protestant controversy, putting forth the pretensions of the Roman Church in the most unqualified terms of aggression.

"Hence it appears plainly, under how great an error they also labour, who, abusing reason, and esteeming the oracles of God as if they were human productions, venture to explain and interpret the same rashly, according to their own judgment, whereas God Himself has appointed a living authority for teaching and establishing the true and legitimate sense of his divine revelation, and deciding all controversies of faith and discipline by an INFALLIBLE⁸ judgment, in order that the faithful may not be carried about with every wind of doctrine by the sleight of men, and cunning craftiness, whereby they lie in wait to deceive. Which living and INFALLIBLE authority exists only in that Church, which, built by Christ the Lord, upon Peter the Head, the prince and pastor of the whole Church, whose faith He promised should never fail, has always its legitimate pontiffs deriving their origin uninterruptedly from Peter himself, and placed in his chair, as the heirs and defenders of the same faith, dignity, honour, and power with himself. And since, 'where Peter is, there the Church is'; since 'Peter speaks through the Roman pontiff'; since he 'always lives and executes judgment in his successors'; and 'furnishes the truth to them that seek after it'; therefore the divine oracles are to be received simply in that sense which has been held and is held by this Roman chair of St. Peter, which is 'the mother and mistress of all the churches'; and has always kept the faith delivered by Christ the Lord, whole and incorrupt, and taught the same to the faithful, showing unto all the pathway of salvation, and the doctrine of unadulterated truth. For this is the 'principal Church, whence the unity of the priesthood took its rise'; this 'the metropolis of godliness, in which is to be found the entire and perfect substance of the Christian religion'; in which 'the primacy of the apostolic see always existed'; with which, 'on account of its superior pre-eminence, all the churches, that is, the faithful in all the world, must, of necessity, agree'; with which, 'whosoever gathereth not, scattereth'."

And, further on, the encyclic adopts and renews the anathemas formerly hurled from the Roman see against all Protestant communions and associations, and more particularly the Bible Societies, which it charges with the endeavour "To make war upon the Catholic religion, and the Divine authority, and the laws of the Church, and to tread under foot the rights both of the spiritual and the temporal power."

This, continues the encyclic,

"Is the object of all the wicked machinations against this Roman see of St. Peter, on which Christ has laid the impregnable foundation of his Church. This the object of those clandestine sects which have crept forth from darkness to the ruin and destruction both of Church and State, and which have been repeatedly condemned by the anathema of the Roman pontiffs our predecessors, in their letters apostolic¹, which letters we confirm in the plenitude of our apostolic power, and order to be diligently observed. This is the aim of the wily Bible Societies, which, renewing the ancient devices of the heretics, cease not to obtrude volumes of the Divine Scriptures, translated, contrary to the most sacred rules of the Church, into all the vulgar tongues, and often interpreted by perverse explanations, in an immense number of copies, at a great expense, upon men of all classes, even the unlearned, in order that, rejecting the divine tradition, the doctrine of the Fathers, and the authority of the Catholic Church, they may interpret all the oracles of God according to their private judgment, pervert their sense, and so fall into the greatest errors. Which Societies, following the example of his predecessor, Gregory XVI., of blessed memory, in whose place we have been substituted, although unequal to him in merit, has reprobated by his letter apostolic², and we likewise do hereby condemn them."

The encyclic next adverts to the "horrible system of indifference to every kind of religion," which is described as being "utterly repugnant even to the natural light of reason," to the attempts made by some parties in the Romish communion itself to get rid of the celibacy of the clergy; to the philosophical system of public instruction, inimical to religion, which has gained ground in universities and other public institutions; and to the "nefarious doctrine called Communism;" but, above all, it holds in abomination—

"That horrible plague of books and tracts which fly about in every direction, teaching men to sin; which, being cleverly written, and full of fallacy and artifice, and scattered at an immense expense throughout every place, for the destruction of Christian people, every where disseminate pestilent doctrines, deprave the hearts and minds especially of the unwary, and do the greatest injury to religion. It is through this overflowing of errors spreading themselves in every direction, through the unbridled license of thinking, speaking, and writing, that morals have been deteriorated, the most holy religion of Christ is despised, the majesty of Divine worship is impaired, the power of this apostolic see is called in question, the authority of the Church is disputed, and brought into ignominious bondage, the rights of the episcopate are trodden under foot, the sanctity of matrimony is violated, the rule of every power is shaken, and so many other injuries are inflicted, both on the Church and the civil state."

In opposition to all these adversaries of religion in general, and of the Roman Church in particular, Pius IX. pledges himself that he will "leave nothing unattempted, nothing untried, to promote with all his power the welfare of the whole Christian family;" and he exhorts all bishops to second him by their most strenuous endeavours,—

"Never at any time cloaking over or tolerating any thing which may seem but in the least degree to violate the purity of that faith, and with no less determination of mind promoting among all men union with the Catholic Church, out of which there is no salvation, and obedience to this chair of Peter, on which as on a most firm foundation the whole edifice of our most holy religion rests."

After some more exhortations in the same style, the encyclic inculcates "the duty of obedience and subjection to princes and powers," with this reservation, however, "unless something be commanded which is contrary to the laws of God and of the Church." Thence it passes on to the necessity of making the ministry of the Church efficient, in regard to both moral character and theological attainment; assigning as a reason why this point is at this time specially to be attended to, that "There are many who, disgusted with the variety, the inconsistency, and changeableness of error, and feeling the necessity of professing our most holy religion, will, with God's help, be led the more readily to embrace and to reverence the doctrines, the precepts, and ordinances of that religion, the more they see the clergy distinguishing themselves above all others by piety, integrity, and wisdom, and by the example and brightness of every virtue."

The encyclic next invites the bishops upon all occasions to address themselves for aid and support to the apostolic see:—

"As nothing is to us more grateful, more pleasant, more desirable, than to assist you all, whom we love in the bowels of Jesus Christ, with all affection, counsel, and help, and together with you to devote ourselves with our whole soul to the maintenance and promotion of the glory of God and of the Catholic faith, and to the salvation of souls, for which we are prepared to lay down life itself, if need require, come, brethren, we entreat and beseech you, come with all boldness and confidence to this see of the most blessed Prince of the Apostles, the centre of Catholic unity, the summit of the episcopate, whence the episcopate and all the authority of that title has sprung,— come to us, as often as ye shall feel yourselves to stand in need of the aid, assistance, and protection of our authority and that of this see.”

Lastly, the encyclic calls for united prayer for the increase of the Romish Church, and the conversion of the world, in an exhortation which contains at the close the following remarkable passage :—

“ And in order that the most merciful Lord may the more readily incline his ear to our prayers, and grant us our petitions, let us ever employ as our intercessor with Him, the most Holy Mother of God, the immaculate Virgin Mary, who is the most sweet mother, mediatrix, and advocate of us all, our firmest hope, and mightiest confidence, than whose patronage nothing has greater weight and effect with God. Let us also invoke the Prince of the Apostles, to whom Christ Himself gave the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and whom He appointed to be the rock of his Church, against which the gates of hell shall never prevail, and his fellow Apostle Paul, and all the saints in heaven, who are crowned already, and have received their palms, that they may obtain for all Christ’s people the desired abundance of divine mercy.”

Such is the character of the document issued by the new occupant of the pontifical chair at this critical juncture: it contains abundant evidence of vigorous thought and determined resolution, such as cannot fail to render the phalanx of Romanism still more compact and powerful, for carrying on the most energetic warfare against any thing which, bearing the Christian name, does not acknowledge the lying pretensions and the usurped dominion of the Roman bishop. It clearly proves, that those who expected from the accession of Pius IX. any mitigation of the various causes of offence which have led to the great western schism, will indeed, to use the expression of his Spanish apologist, be “terribly disenchanted.”
